Mr. Petrillo may act with unattractive ruthlessness; but his industry opponents' ruthlessness is not less for being expressed in better English and concealed behind phony professions of noble motives. Behind those phony pretensions they are ruthless on behalf of corporate profits; whereas he is ruthless frankly on behalf of the welfare of 150,000 or 200,000 union musicians. In the present dispute he has presented a good case to the public badly; and his industry opponents have taken advantage of his ineptitude to make the case itself appear bad to the public. He has made unreasonable demands; and his industry opponents have taken advantage of this to hide the fact that they are not disposed to grant reasonable ones. Understand the men he is dealing with, who would, for example, like nothing better than to fill up broadcasting time with good amateur performance and save themselves the cost of professional musicians at union rates; then you will understand some of his actions that seem so shocking, like his barring of the Camp Interlochen Orchestra from the air unless a professional orchestra were paid to "stand by."

Letters to the Editors

Dr. Barnard Is Right

Dear Sirs: Ellsworth Barnard's letter in your issue of July 3, which has already provoked so much comment, is probably the outstanding letter that has appeared in your pages in the year.

He put his finger on the primary defect in the whole situation—that is, the present-day "education" courses as being the basic cause of poor teaching. His reference to terminology as "unintelligible jargon" is, of course, strictly in accord with the facts. Perhaps it should be added that this senseless and silly jargon merits the same careful and brilliant indictment that Professor Fred Rodell of Yale Law School gave to the legal profession in his book "Woe Unto Ye Lawyers!"

Professor Edgar B. Wesley, former president of the National Council for the Social Studies, writing in your issue of August 28, objects to Dr. Barnard's plain speaking. In fact, he draws the comparison of two Greeks standing on a corner and talking in their native language. Professor Wesley says he himself might unthinkingly remark, "What dumb jargon! I don't understand it!"

The comparison, of course, is silly. The educationists are not like the two Greeks standing on the corner. They (the educationists) are not aliens to the English language. They speak it better than any other language. They are aware of the richness of its simplicity. They know how to use it, but they do not choose to use it. Bent on impressing each other with vague abstractions, they have invented a language of their own, a futile "unintelligible jargon," as Ellsworth Barnard aptly describes it.

As to "education" courses being the cause of poor teaching, the educationists and particularly the National Council for the Social Studies, whose viewpoint Professor Wesley reflects, will vigorously object, but the fact is Dr. Barnard has stated the simple truth.

Of course, there are exceptions. New York State is one of them. When John Lord O'Brien and Susan Brandeis came to the Regents of the University of the State of New York they found that the curriculum of state teachers' colleges was composed of two parts how to teach and one part what to teach. By hard work and determination they succeeded in reversing this monstrous absurdity. Now state teachers' colleges in New York have a basic curriculum composed of two parts what to teach and one part how to teach. When I asked Mr. O'Brien how he got around the influence of Teachers College, Columbia, he replied simply: "That was easy. We just ignored them."

Thanks to John Lord O'Brien and Susan Brandeis, New York State has the best teachers-training program in America. But it still is not good enough. And Dr. Barnard has done an excellent service, despite the objection of Professor Wesley, in pointing to some of the cobwebs remaining.

It is not by accident that New York State schools accord the best treatment to the history of the United States. Likewise, incidentally, to almost every other subject.

Indeed, John Lord O'Brien and Susan Brandeis found Professor Wesley's "two Greeks" standing on the corner and taught them to speak plain, intelligible English! And for that they will never be forgiven.

Consider the Children

Dear Sirs: Is it patriotic to say a word in behalf of the million or more children who will become virtual orphans this year if the War Manpower Commission carries out its announced intention of drafting pre-Pearl Harbor fathers?

For orphans they will surely be, since most of the mothers involved, unable to subsist on the miserable military dependency allowances, will be forced to seek employment while they leave their children in the care of relatives or day nurseries, if any.

The Nation betrays an amazing lack of social consciousness when it states in the issue of August 28: "Surely no one would seriously maintain that dependency status or family relationship should take precedence over contribution to the war effort as a basis for draft deferment." This is sheer war hysteria, on a par with that oft-parroted contention that "fathers have something to fight for." So have pregnant women, but even the most callous individual would shrink from the prospect of conscripting them.

The Nation, with a strange tone o finality, interprets the impending draf of fathers as primarily a squeeze play designed to smoke fathers out of non essential and into essential jobs. But th statements of Selective Service an WMC officials are utterly at varianc with this interpretation.

Indeed, for the past year or mor these gentlemen have waged a war o nerves against 6,000,000 American families with an almost daily needling i the news columns about the draft o fathers. No straightforward statement o policy embodying The Nation's interpretation has ever been forthcoming. O any number of occasions Selective Service officials have warned fathers that th transfer from a non-essential to an essential job would not stave off thei conscription.

Is it political opportunism for a Congressman to view with concern the prospective mass breakup of hundreds o thousands of American families? An who is so omniscient a military exper as to say that we must have an arme force of 11,000,000 men, no matter ho seriously we strain the social fabri thereby?

Public opinion against the draft o fathers is not based on any tender feelings toward the fathers themselves. The are not entitled to any more consideration than any other group. The opposition to their conscription is based rathe on an overwhelming pity for the children left behind, the next generatio which may have to fight World War III Must we start so early to wreck tha generation? SUBSCRIBER

Ardsley, Pa., September 2

[The Nation is in full agreemen with two of Subscriber's criticisms. W agree that the confused and conflictin statements given out by the War Manpower Commission with respect to th drafting of pre-Pearl Harbor fathers ar in large part responsible for the fac that fathers have not flocked into essential war jobs as they were expected to do Moreover, we thoroughly agree that th "miserable military dependency allowances" should be substantially increase in view of the decision to draft father

But the essential issue at the momen is not how well or how badly the Manpower Commission has carried out i duties; it is whether our man-powe licy shall be formulated on the basis each individual's greatest possible ntribution to the war effort or on the sis of "an overwhelming pity for the ildren left behind." Everything pos- le should be done for the children, it in the long run even the families ost directly affected will benefit most om a policy that maximizes our slender an-power resources in order to shorten e war.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

ear Sirs: Last November Mr. James G. cDonald wrote you a letter which be- n: "I opened your issue which reached e last Friday with a curious interest to e whether you, unlike most other critics the State Department's Vichy policy, id been frank enough to admit that the merican and British offensive in orthwest Africa had proved that you id been mistaken and the department nply justified. But I found no such lmission. . . ."

Since Mr. McDonald thought you iould make a public confession of error. have opened each issue of The Nation recent months with a curious interest see whether he had been frank iough to admit in a letter to you that e increasingly clear revelation of what e State Department wanted to achieve Europe by its dealings with Pétain, arlan, Peyrouton, Giraud, Franco, Otto apsburg, and by its snubbing of their o-democratic, anti-fascist opponents id proved that he, Mr. McDonald, had en mistaken and that your criticism the department had been amply justi- d. But I have found no such admis- on.

I should add that this has not sur- ised me. For on a Saturday night in ly, 1942, I was trying to get news on e radio, and a turn of the knob ought me the voice of Mr. McDonald troducing and interviewing—with any respectful "Your Highnesses"— tto Hapsburg. The occasion was the lebration of Austria Day; and not only as Otto being presented as the spokes- an for Austria on this official occasion, it the day chosen for the occasion was e anniversary of the assassination of ollfuss. Mr. McDonald's questions icited from Otto a description of Aus- ia's importance in the war, its people's sistance to Hitler; and then Austria id its people were linked with Doll- ss, of whom Otto said at one point: While one may disagree with certain his views concerning labor"—which as His Highness's tactful way of referring to Dollfuss's armed attack on the workers of Vienna in 1934 and his destruction of their political power—"all must admit his patriotism as an Austrian."

This interview seems to have been one of the opening guns in the campaign for Otto and his Austrian Legion; and Mr. McDonald's participation in it would indicate that he approves of what the State Department wants to achieve and of the methods by which it is attempting to achieve it.

To Make the Angels Weep

Dear Sirs: Reinhold Niebuhr's article England Teaches Its Soldiers, in The Nation of August 21, is very welcome reading to those of us in the ranks who are increasingly appalled by the situation which he describes. There is not a sentence with which the average intelligent soldier would care to disagree, but as I reread and thought over Dr. Niebuhr's article, I wondered if he isn't being a little hard on the army when he blames upon it the cultural and educational impotence of its soldiers. "The American soldier has Hollywood for his leisure hours." While one may regret bitterly, as many of us have, that the army doesn't provide more extra-curricular training, if I may borrow a term from the academic world, one cannot blame the army entirely for the fact that Hollywood occupies the army's leisure time. Water will seek its own level, and if the taste of the soldier is for something richer and better than Hollywood, he'll find it.

I'm certainly not suggesting that Dr. Niebuhr doesn't understand that the stupidity—an unkind, but an accurate word—of the American soldier cannot be explained merely by the lack of an educational program in the army. The soldier is, of course, just as educated, just as cultured, as interested in democracy as his education and his background have fitted and encouraged him to be. I haven't the slightest doubt that Dr. Niebuhr knows this, but I don't think he made it quite clear—or that he restricted his remarks carefully enough to a commentary on the political ignorance of the soldier which might be largely the result of the army's lack of an educational program.

I wondered what the result would have been if Dr. Niebuhr could have made his tour in American camps under the same conditions which attended the tour in England. I seriously doubt that he could say afterwards that "in a week of forums, not a silly question was asked." Provided by some miracle a group of heterogeneous soldiers, all interested in the issues of the war, could be assembled for a forum, I would lay odds that there would be plenty of damned silly questions.

Does the public realize, I wonder, how horribly true the condition described in Pfc. E. W.'s letter (which I was glad to see also in your issue of August 21)? If they think he is too gloomy, too pessimistic, I would invite the skeptics to view the magazine rack at the post exchange. (Dear Editor: I'm so glad you can't see how The Nation is wedged every week between Red Hot Romances on one side and Western Stories on the other.) I would invite the skeptic to visit the day room when the President of the United States is making an important speech. Yes, come on in, skeptics, there's plenty of room; all the boys are at the movie. And for the crowning blow, I would invite him to one of those semi-annual bull sessions when the talk turns for a few minutes from sex to world affairs. I don't think even Hollywood could promise anything as monstrous as the last one was. The line of reasoning went about like this: Let's hurry up and get this over with, doesn't matter much who wins . . . not much difference between the German and American governments. . . . We're really not a democracy, with gasoline and tires being rationed. (Oh, no, Mr. Skeptic, that isn't Mr. Harrison Spangler, that's a private in the army which is fighting for the very life of democracy itself.) In justice, it ought to be said that this bull session, which I swear I have summarized quite faithfully, was below par. Most soldiers certainly feel that there is considerable difference between the Nazis and ourselves, and that we'd better win the war, but beyond that I'm afraid the soldier's knowledge does not extend very far.

Facts like these are enough to make the angels weep—and ought to make every good American citizen wonder what kind of nation, what kind of civilization has produced such an army. The record suggests that we have failed in many respects, but the important lesson to be learned is that we had better start doing something to prevent a repetition of our folly. In bringing to the attention of the public the regrettable state of the American army The Nation is doing a real service to democracy.

The Shape of Things

HEAVY LOSS OF ENGLISH AND AMERICAN lives at Salerno and the steady retreat of the Reichswehr in Russia should serve to impose a moratorium on agitation for a "real second front." It is not the slightest reflection on the prowess of the magnificent Red Army to attribute partial responsibility for the westward flight of the Nazis to Allied activities elsewhere in Europe. Unofficial Russian claims that not a German division has been drained away from the eastern front by the Sicilian and Italian campaigns obviously cannot be checked from here, though it is apparent that the German high command has been pouring reinforcements into Italy at a totally unexpected rate. But even if the Russian assertion is perfectly correct, it is undeniable that pressure on the Balkans and southern France resulting from the Italian invasion, plus the ever-present threat of invasion across the Channel, has pinned down more than fifty divisions which the Nazis might well have used to stem the tide in Russia, or at least to assure themselves an impregnable defense line at the Dnieper. As it is, if the autumn rains hold off long enough, the Germans may fail even at the Dnieper and be driven back all the way to the old Polish border. In that happy event the Western allies will be entitled to some share of the credit, just as the Russians rightly claim some of the honors for the successful penetration of Italy.

IN THE DISTRIBUTION OF THE SPOILS OF war, the Italian campaign so far has favored the Allies by a substantial margin: we have 108 units of the Italian navy and the Germans have Mussolini. At least they say they have Mussolini. Naval analysts agree that the Italian ships will not be usable for a long while to come, but it is doubtful whether the Germans will ever be able to recondition Il Duce. The wild and divergent tales of how the discarded dictator was rescued by Nazi paratroopers, coupled with doubts in reliable quarters as to the authenticity of the radio voice purporting to be Mussolini's, inevitably raise some interesting questions: Did the Nazis really get their man, or is the whole story an emanation from the Minister of Public Enlightenment? If the paratroopers did in fact get to him, did they bring him back alive, or was he first shot by his Italian guards, as reported from Madrid? And if he was spirited away physically intact, is he perhaps in too gibbering a state to send his voice out over the air waves? On our side of the battle lines the equally interesting question arises of why the immediate delivery of Mussolini was not made one of the terms of the armistice. We enjoy the inanity of the German radio reports of how "the whole Japanese nation was overwhelmed with joy" over the rescue and "all Norway under its spell"; but all the same we don't relish the escape of the first of those war criminals whose punishment is a pledge of honor to their victims.

IN THE HEARINGS ON THE WHEELER BILL the top-ranking military and naval authorities of the country have presented an impressive array of evidence to substantiate the case for drafting pre-Pearl Harbor fathers this year. Admiral Jacobs, personnel chief of the navy, pointed out that the navy will require approximately 500,000 men by the end of December if the ships and aircraft now under construction are to be manned. Lieutenant General McNarney, deputy chief of staff of the army, declared that "if we don't get the men we cannot meet the planned target dates, and every single day we delay means an enormous loss of men and money . . . a shift of commitments would affect the whole global strategy of the war." The head of Selective Service, General Hershey, estimated that only 775,000 of the 1,221,000 men before the end of the year could be obtained from the existing reservoir of 1-a's, the new eighteen-year-olds, and reclassified 2-a's, 2-b's, and 4-f's. Under Secretary Patterson asserted that if fathers were not called at this time, 446,000 men would have to be taken out of vital war industries, where production schedules are even now not being met. The War Manpower Commission estimates that 2,000,000 more workers will be required in these industries by the end of the year if our troops are to have the weapons they need. Only two possible answers to the problem have been suggested—the existing work-or-fight order as it applies to fathers, or national-service legislation. Congress will have to make up its mind which course to follow.

WE WISH THE PRESIDENT IN HIS MESSAGE to Congress had said what Henry Wallace did at Chicago, "We must fight not merely to make the world safe for democracy but to give democracy first place in the world." We see no sign as yet that the President and his advisers on foreign policy are determined to give democracy "first place" in the world, much less attack the basic economic evils which Wallace boldly enumerated as the enemies of democracy. The Vice President's attack on cartels found new and unexpected emphasis in the fact that most newspapers, led by the New York Times, omitted from the text of his remarks those sentences which were aimed at the Standard Oil-I.G. Farben cartel. Readers of those papers must have been confused when they came across long statements by Standard Oil answering charges only sketchily reported, if at all, in the same columns. No one familiar with the facts will be taken in by the pious opposition to cartels now expressed by Ralph W. Gallagher, president of Standard Oil. Only a few months ago he successfully opposed passage of a minority stockholders' resolution which would have pledged the company not to resume its cartel relations with I.G. Farben after the war. The Nazis may be doomed but Standard expects to go on doing business with these I.G. gentlemen who supported Hitler's bid for power at home and abroad.

THE CRUDE AND COWARDLY DEVICE BY which the house barred Robert Morss Lovett, William E. Dodd, Jr., and Goodwin B. Watson from office, as of November 15, was a perfect example of the way in which that body allows such penny-dreadful demagogues as Martin Dies to lead it by the nose. It fired the three officials in a rider attached to a deficiency bill which neither the Senate nor the President was in a position, at that moment, to oppose or veto; and the basis for its action was the usual vague charge that the men under attack are "radicals." We are glad the President has served notice that he does not intend to let Congress have its irresponsible way. He proposes to ignore the rider on the ground that it is "an unwarranted encroachment upon the authority of both the executive and the judicial branches under our Constitution" and is not binding upon them. As for the officials concerned, they will go right on working after November 15. Martin Dies has accused the President of seeking support of "the left group" by his defense of three officials against a vindictive and strictly dishonorable attack. In the course of his statement he accused Messrs. Lovett, Dodd, and Watson of not believing in our form of government. It is Mr. Dies, as we have intimated before, to whom that characterization most accurately applies.

INSECTS ARE NOTED FOR THEIR PERSISTENCY but even the ants could learn something from the fourth-termites among the Republicans in Congress. To the average citizen it must have seemed that the President of a nation engaged in the most desperate struggle in its history was only fulfilling his obvious duty when, on the reassembling of Congress, he delivered a comprehensive report on his Administration's conduct of that war. But when an inquiring reporter asked Senator Aiken of Vermont for comment, he said he couldn't understand the purpose of the message unless it was to provide material for the next election—and he made particular reference to the President's suggestion that something be done to protect the future of the men now serving in the armed forces. Senator Taft and Senator Styles Bridges also saw in the President's report on World War II only another campaign document. The inquiring reporter went on to ask other newly returned legislators what the folks back home think about things, including Congress. "One Representative," according to this report, "said he had discovered that 'the old American custom of criticizing Congress has changed, and the law-making body is held in high public esteem.' " We reserve comment, lest we be accused of malice in wonderland.

THE ARREST OF A SMALL-TIME BOOTLEGGER serves as a reminder that Carlo Tresca was shot to death on a New York street corner eight months ago and that his murder remains an unsolved crime. With the detention of the bootlegger, one Frank Nuccio, as a material witness, the authorities will perhaps show signs of cracking a case which in the eyes of laymen has been unaccountably slow in yielding results. It is not as though the circumstances of Tresca's assassination were barren of clues. The victim was known throughout the world as an anti-fascist leader. In private conversation, in public speeches, and in the columns of his own paper he often identified his political enemies, some of whom, he had asserted, entertained against him the most violent of intentions. More concretely, the police immediately discovered a car presumably abandoned by the killers a few blocks from the scene of the murder. Within twenty-four hours they arrested a paroled convict who had been seen driving a car with the same license plate less than two hours before the crime. They have been holding him ever since, technically for a violation of parole. With all these seeming advantages, no further progress was made until the arrest of Nuccio last week. We have a high regard for New York's police and legal machinery and find it hard to understand why it has moved in so halting a fashion in a case of such obvious importance. Carlo Tresca's life was given to the cause of political freedom; his death must not remain a victory for the enemies of that cause.

BRITAIN'S CONCERN WITH ITS RELATIONS with America has become almost an obsession—though an understandable one. A small measure of this preoccupation is the appearance, in the face of the paper shortage, of a new monthly, Transatlantic, published in London under the editorship of Geoffrey Crowther and devoted exclusively to the cultivation of understanding of the United States. The first number is a promising beginning, although it suffers from some superficial defects such as poor make-up and a cover which may be surrealist in intention but in color and general effect suggests an early Mexican miracle board rather than a contemporary magazine. The contents are better. Some of the articles are amusing, some instructive, most of them well written. All but one are by American writers, including among others Carl Van Doren, Nathaniel Peffer, Ogden Nash, and Carroll Binder. The one article by a Britisher, D. W. Brogan, is the best in the issue, and this raises a doubt about the whole plan of the magazine. Can the job of explaining the United States to an intelligent British audience be left to Americans? We believe not. Americans don't know well enough what Englishmen don't know about America. A greater part of the new journal should be turned out by observant British writers who can illumine some of the spots in American life that really baffle our friends—as well as ourselves. Another trouble with Transatlantic is even more fundamental. It should, clearly, be a two-way venture: an attempt to interpret each of the English-speaking Allies to the other; and it should be on sale in this country as well as in Britain.

The President's Message

THE PRESIDENT'S message to Congress was notable for its vigor, its comprehensive review of the war effort, and its statesmanship. If at points it reflected his growing irritation with the press and with his critics, that irritation is understandable and its expression this time was restrained. It is true that "there is no so-called 'news' when things run right" and it is also true, as the President said, that we could not have accomplished all we have "if conditions in Washington and throughout the nation were as confused and chaotic as some people try to paint them." At the same time it is the function of a free press to prod for the correction of errors rather than to spend its time patting officials on the back. This criticism, though it needs the corrective of broader perspective from time to time, is useful. And the President was wrong to link it with the "evil work" of Axis propagandists. His burdens are heavy, his anger at criticism only human, but too many incompetent bureaucrats and bunglers, notably in our State Department, would like to stifle criticism by discrediting the critics.

The President provided a better answer to critics in his survey of the vast problems his administration has had to tackle. He could honestly report that since Pearl Harbor we have done a good job and he could justly say that if anyone thinks we are the only ones to make major mistakes "he should take a look at some of the blunders made by our enemies in the co-called 'efficient' dictatorships."

In answering critics of our dealings with Badoglio, the President in effect only asks us to have faith. He says, "We shall not be able to claim that we have gained total victory in this war if any vestige of fascism in any of its malignant forms is permitted to survive in the world." We do not doubt his sincerity, but he must be prepared for a measure of scepticism so long as he leaves the State Department in reactionary hands and so long as he himself seems to show a predilection for the kings and Pétains of the old world. Little of permanent value will have been accomplished if we wipe out every vestige of fascism but return to power doddering and corrupt ruling-class elements which were fascism's patrons and partners. In the same way it is not enough to speak, as the President does, of rooting out "the war-breeding gangs of militarists" in Germany and Japan. Behind the militarists were big business elements which will be restored to power if our foreign policy continues to be hostile to popular movements in Europe.

As to the secret conversations with Badoglio which the President defends, we suspend judgment. Whether they served to facilitate our entrance into Italy or only to help the Germans prepare defenses against us is a question which cannot be answered until more facts are available. We would feel less suspicious and more tolerant of dealings with Badoglios and Darlans if once—just once—the President and his State Department showed a similar readiness to deal with popular forces.

The OPA Roll-Back

IT IS fashionable in some quarters to minimize the effectiveness of the OPA's roll-back program. Figures were assembled in PM, for example, indicating that the new roll-back would save only 1 per cent of the average family's budget instead of 2.3 per cent as claimed by the OPA. We suspect that PM is probably right in its mathematics, but in dwelling on the apparent error in OPA computations it misses the essential fact that the OPA is succeeding in its campaign to drive the cost of living downward.

To gain an appreciation of what the OPA is doing one should look beyond such immediate questions as whether the ceiling on butter is too high or too low, or whether business men or economic experts should determine prices, and consider the cost of living. Prior to May, 1942, when the first over-all price ceilings were put into effect, the cost of living in the United States was rising at the rate of more than 1 per cent a month—and the rate was steadily increasing. Although hampered by a Congressional prohibition which prevented it from controlling many essential food prices, the OPA under Henderson succeeded in slowing the advance to approximately ½ of 1 per cent a month. Later, when Congress passed the revised Price Control Act giving the OPA greater power over food prices, the advance was slowed still more; and beginning in May, after the President issued the hold-the-line order, the increase was stopped altogether. Between May and August the cost of living was reduced by 1½ per cent and food prices were brought down by more than 4 per cent. There is every reason to believe that the OPA will eventually succeed in restoring the price level of September 15, 1942, provided Congress does not embark on an inflationary orgy such as was threatened last spring.

Compare this record with that of the last war. By the end of the forty-fourth month of World War I the cost of living had risen 40 per cent. From then on it advanced more steeply until it had more than doubled. In the first forty-four months of the present war the cost of living went up 25 per cent, but at that point the trend was reversed. This is an impressive achievement. It has been brought about despite constant backbiting in the press, violent attacks from opposition elements throughout the country, and utter lack of cooperation from Congress. What is even more remarkable, it has been accomplished without an adequate program of taxation or forced savings to mop up the excess spending power created by war expenditures. The OPA's entire price-control and rationing program might still collapse as a result of black-market operations if this excess spending power is not diverted into the Treasury, but the use of subsidies provides a powerful weapon for combating this danger. The chief fear now is that Congress may not authorize sufficient subsidies to continue the promised roll-back and cope with the illegal markets.

Impasse in Chungking

THE decision of the Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang, or Nationalist Party, of China to summon a National Assembly to ratify the constitution no later than one year after the end of the war is rightly being hailed in this country as an important step toward democracy. While it is not the first time that a date has been set for the National Assembly, reports from China a few months ago had indicated that the establishment of constitutional government might be delayed for some years after the close of hostilities. The action of the Central Executive Committee comes therefore as a welcome surprise and suggests a signal triumph for the democratic forces within the Kuomintang. It is a decision which should help remove the unfortunate misunderstandings between China and the other United Nations described elsewhere in this issue by Maxwell S. Stewart.

It is not yet clear, however, what practical effect this decision and Chiang Kai-shek's simultaneous statement on the Communist issue will have on the admittedly tense relations between the Kuomintang and the Communists of the northwest. Chiang's statement was more conciliatory in form than in substance. The newly elected President of China declared that the central government "does not have any particular demand to make on the Chinese Communist Party," and asserted that the problem "should be solved by political means." But he then went on to accuse the Communists of "assaulting national-government troops" and "forcefully occupying our national territory." And he reiterated Chungking's demands for a disbandment of the Eighth Route Army and dissolution of the Communist organizations without offering any concessions to the opposition's demand for an immediate guaranty of the rights of minority parties.

In other words, the Kuomintang-Communist issue appears to remain where it was—at an extremely critical impasse—and announcements pledging the early establishment of constitutional government do not seem to have been accompanied by any real effort to solve the immediate crisis. It is for this reason, rather than because of any doubts concerning the significance or sincerity of the Kuomintang's action, that the recent news has been received with some reserve in Washington. It is quite obvious that China's contribution to the war effort depends to a large extent on a peaceful settlement of the Communist issue, which now keeps more than three-quarters of a million of China's best troops immobilized. Huge quantities of supplies which could readily be used to support an offensive are similarly immobilized. But the most serious aspect of the continuing breach is the political. Although both factions are agreed in opposing the Japanese, the internal conflict has been so bitter and so protracted that the war spirit has suffered materially.

The conflict has dragged on so long that it seems futile to hope for an early solution. If there is to be one, it will have to come through a revitalizing of the war effort such as could be produced by active American and British assistance. If the Burma road can be reopened this winter and large quantities of supplies sent to China, it may be possible to draw up a common United Nations strategy which will make the fullest use of all China's military groups in a great offensive to drive the Japanese out of the country. Once the whole of China is again united in active warfare, many of its most perplexing problems will disappear. Unity will be forged by a common effort that cannot fail to give the Chinese people a new sense of their powers as well as of their essential democratic rights.

INTUITIVE INITIATIVE

X X X and the FBI

BY I. F. STONE

[We have received several criticisms and one major attack on the two articles entitled Washington Gestapo which appeared in our issues of July 17 and July 24. The articles, signed X X X, were by necessity anonymous, and since Mr. Stone vouched for the author we asked him to do a round-up reply.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Washington, September 17

THE only direct reply the Washington Gestapo articles have elicited from the Department of Justice is a long communication from an employee of the department who asks that his letter be kept "off the record" but at the same time demands that we answer his objections in print. J. Edgar Hoover has made an indirect reply in the form of a letter to the Fresno (California) Bee, commenting on an editorial in that newspaper. In this issue The Nation is printing two letters of criticism. One, by Roger Baldwin, director of the American Civil Liberties Union, defends L. M. C. Smith, chief of the War Policies Unit of the department. The other, by Morris L. Ernst, defends the FBI.

I will take up the Baldwin letter first. I think it important to note that the only thing Baldwin objects to in the articles is their reference to Smith. Baldwin says Smith was "made to appear as 'suffering from a "radical" psychosis.' " In the articles the words quoted were applied to Hoover, not Smith, though the context may have been intended to imply that Smith was of much the same mind. The reference to Smith was also criticized by the "off-the-record" communication from the department, which called Smith "an honest liberal" and one who had fought hard to protect government workers "against unjust loose accusations." The "off-the-record" letter also objected that X X X gave a one-sided impression of the unit's work by not citing the fact that it has a Nazi section and a Fascist section as well as a Communist section.

It remains clear that part of the job of the War Policies Unit is to police leftist and working-class opinions. Baldwin's letter admits that the unit did recommend postal action against "the Trotzkyite Militant and the organ of a splinter group in Chicago." Our "off-the-record" friend in the department does not dispute the authenticity of the quotation in which it was explained that the unit helped the FBI "to know about and prepare for any necessary action to protect the country against any illegal activity by the leftist groups in the United States, such as the Communist Party, the Socialist Workers Party, the Industrial Workers of the World, and so forth." I note also that Smith indorsed the Hobbs concentration-camp bill (DJ, 1942, p. 739),* boasted that he got the Post Office to suppress the Militant (DJ, 1944, p. 179), and waved a copy of Adam Clayton Powell's People's Voice at the House Appropriations Committee (same, p. 183), saying, "Here is the Negro press, which, as you know, has been very virulent. It has not been seditious, but it has been very close to it." With all due respect to Roger Baldwin, I prefer to keep my fingers crossed about Smith and about the War Policies Unit.

Morris Ernst says he has kept "a rather close watch" on the FBI for "close to ten years" and has "yet to hear of a single proved case of violation of the basic civil liberties. This is close to a miracle." Like most miracles, this does not stand up too well under examination. In The Nation for March 20 last Ernst will find an editorial on two Supreme Court decisions by Justice Frankfurter in which convictions were set aside because FBI men and local officials were guilty of violating the basic civil rights of the convicted. One case involved eight copper workers arrested in the 1939-40 strike of the Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers at Copperhill, Tennessee. The miracle is also dimmed by the conduct of the FBI in the Bridges case and in its treatment of persons arrested in the 1940 Detroit raids on Spanish Loyalist sympathizers. The record of the Bridges case, as I reported in The Nation in June, 1942, showed that Hoover and the Immigration Service under Major Lemuel B. Schofield fished "in some pretty muddy waters in their anxiety to 'get' Bridges." On the Detroit incident, I refer readers to the letter sent Attorney General Jackson by Senator Norris on March 10, 1940. Jackson's dismissal of the charges against these Loyalist sympathizers serves to underscore the melodramatic lawlessness with which the FBI made the arrests. The accused were routed from their beds between four and five in the morning, subjected to the third degree until three that afternoon, given a scant five minutes in which to see counsel before being arraigned, and led from court handcuffed and chained.

Ernst objects that the author of Washington Gestapo, in listing questions relating to religious affiliations and trade-union attitudes, did not specify which were asked by the FBI and which by the Civil Service Commission. He says this is "as unfair as if someone wrote an article and said that The Nation and Henry Luce 'took the following positions' and then failed to specify which positions were taken by you and which by Henry Luce." The analogy is far from perfect, since the differences between investigators for the FBI and investigators for the Civil Service Commission, if any, are hardly of the same order as those between The Nation and Luce. In Washington I received at least one telephone call from a defender of the commission who implied that such questions were asked only by the FBI. The friends of the FBI return the compliment. From the letters we have received, the experiences of members of the staff, and personal knowledge we believe questions of the sort listed are asked by investigators for both. It may very well be that the heads of neither agency instruct investigators to ask such questions. It is hard to imagine any responsible official of either agency telling investigators to do so. Nevertheless, such questions are asked.

* The references are to the annual hearings before the House Appropriations Committee on the Department of Justice appropriation.

The heads of these agencies cannot pursue tactics that intimidate and then expect persons questioned to demand the names of investigators and boldly send complaints to the commission or the FBI. As things stand in Washington today, that would seem almost a certain way to get oneself put down in the records as a dangerous radical. Our "off-the-record" correspondent in the department is especially annoyed because Washington Gestapo repeated the widely reported fact that government employees are sometimes asked—as a test of subversion—whether they read The Nation, the New Republic, PM, In Fact, and so on. Anyone who reads Hoover's letter to the Fresno Bee in its issue of August 22 will find it easier to understand why. All that Hoover has to offer, besides flat but general denials, is the implication that The Nation is not a "reputable" publication.

As for the "off-the-record" communication from the department employee, I asked permission to print the letter, and I asked for an official reply to the articles from Hoover or from Attorney General Biddle. Permission was not granted, and no reply has been received. I cannot discuss the whole letter here but will pick from it certain points which are factual. X X X said that Hoover has refused to include Negroes among his agents. "There are several hundred Negroes employed by the FBI as agents," is the reply, "and in highly confidential and responsible work." Negro leaders have complained for some time that the FBI does not hire Negroes as investigators. Two responsible leaders with whom we checked the "off-the-record" contention expressed surprise and skepticism. Their impression is that Negroes are used only on "spot jobs" and as stool pigeons. Hoover could settle the controversy by publishing the number of Negroes actually employed as FBI agents.

Our "off-the-record" friend in the department complains of a "snide implication" in the Washington Gestapo articles "that anti-Semitism exists in FBI policy." He says there are "a dozen Jews" among the top-ranking officers of the bureau, "and, ironically enough, the man charged directly with investigations of which you complain is himself a Jew." I don't think X X X intended to accuse the FBI of anti-Semitism. I, for one, would make no such charge. But I do believe that some of the investigators in both agencies have the vague and fascistic idea that Jews and radicals are somehow synonymous.

The "off-the-record" communication from the department also protests that Hoover did not, as X X X stated, "personally direct" the Palmer raids after the last war. He says Hoover had no connection with the FBI at that time and conducted no raids but was special assistant to Attorney General Palmer "and assigned to prosecute the deportation cases." Former Attorney General Cummings, in his book "Federal Justice," says that in 1919 a General Intelligence Division was organized in the department "under direct administrative supervision of J. Edgar Hoover, since 1917 in charge of counter-radical activities as Special Assistant to the Attorney General." According to Cummings (pp. 429-30), within three and a half months this division under Hoover "gathered and indexed the histories of over 60,000 persons. . . . Among these were the warden of Sing Sing, Jane Addams, William Jennings Bryan, Mayor Hylan, and a Who's Who of outstanding Americans."

It may well be that Hoover has changed somewhat since those days. Under a progressive Administration, in a period when the labor movement is strong, the FBI could hardly operate Palmer fashion and survive. The strange thing is that even under these conditions, and during an anti-fascist war, anti-fascists should be as uncomfortable and as suspect as they often are in government service today. I am inclined to think that Attorney General Biddle, for all his weaknesses, has not done too bad a job in curbing the FBI, and I think the latest FBI report on the famous Dies list of subversives, which gives Dies a batting average of about .003 per cent, is to Biddle's credit and Hoover's. But from all I can learn and from the letters we have received there can be little doubt about the main features of the picture drawn by X X X in Washington Gestapo. And it may be that the publication of those articles was in part responsible for the new procedure outlined last week by the President's Interdepartmental Committee on Employee Investigations. Under this procedure there may at least be hearings; I say "may" because the committee's power is only advisory. This is progress.

I can find no better closing than to quote the letter sent the Senate Appropriations Committee in 1941 by John Haynes Holmes, Arthur Garfield Hays, and Roger Baldwin. "The authority given the FBI," over government employees, they wrote, ". . . gives it virtually the powers of a political police—that is, of investigation into matters of political opinion and belief. It is axiomatic that in a democracy no police investigations of political opinion aside from acts in violation of the law should be undertaken."

Cross-Currents in China

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

FOR months a conspiracy of silence has blanketed the strained relations between China and its Western allies. From time to time there have been hints of Chinese displeasure with the United States and Great Britain, but in the interests of United Nations unity not much has been allowed to leak out regarding the nature of American and British anxiety regarding China. Owing to this official silence, little constructive thinking has been done on how to ease the strain so that China may be made a more effective force in the struggle against Japan and in the peace to follow.

The Chinese complain with justification that their country has been consistently treated as a stepchild among the United Nations. For example, the Quebec conference was, according to Prime Minister Churchill, given over primarily to the consideration of United Nations strategy against Japan. But although China will be more vitally affected by the outcome of that strategy than any other nation, it seems to have had no voice in determining it. No member of the Chinese general staff was present at the technical conferences which preceded and accompanied the Churchill-Roosevelt conversations. T. V. Soong, the Chinese Foreign Minister, attended the closing sessions of the conference, but Soong is not a military man, and it is to be presumed that the basic military decisions were taken long before he arrived on the scene. Since China had no part in the planning, it is probable that the coming Pacific offensive will be mainly an American-British show. From the Chinese point of view, this bespeaks a continuation of the "white man's burden" psychology which has so long been used to justify Western imperialism.

Further evidence that China has not been accepted into full partnership in the United Nations may be found, according to Chinese critics, in our failure to deliver lend-lease supplies in anything like the volume indicated eighteen months or a year ago. To be sure, the decline is in large part due to the closing of the Burma road and the immense difficulties of air transportation from India. But in the eyes of many Chinese the closing of the Burma road was itself a glaring example of the shortsightedness of Anglo-Saxon military planning. Even after the fall of Singapore Burma could have been saved if American and Australian troops had been sent there instead of concentrated in white Australia, or even if Britain had agreed in time to admit the veteran Chinese troops that Chiang Kai-shek dispatched to guard the Burma lifeline.

This, in essence, is China's case against Britain and the United States. While the Chinese are grateful for what help they have received, they can hardly be blamed for feeling that they got along better before Britain and America entered the war, or for fearing that a United Nations victory will still see China playing second fiddle to the Western powers in shaping the future of Asia. Chinese resentment is not softened by the fact that the Japanese puppet government at Nanking, under the nominal leadership of Wang Ching-wei, has gained some following by stressing the duplicity of Western imperialism and that defeatists and would-be collaborators in Free China constantly harp on the same theme.

MILITARY WEAKNESS

Why should the Anglo-Saxon powers thus ignore China's great potential military contributions, and why, above all, should they play into the hands of the Japanese by exposing themselves to the charge of unregenerate imperialism? In the absence of any official defense of our policies from Washington or London, many Americans and Britons have been unduly critical of their governments, accepting the Chinese charges at their face value. Actually, however, the situation is far more complicated than it appears to be on the surface. There are several reasons why the United States and Britain have acted in an apparently high-handed manner. The most important are (1) a feeling that China's military leadership is not good enough to justify intrusting it with major responsibility in the coming United Nations offensive or providing it with the most up-to-date weapons; (2) a belief that China could and should do more to provide itself with the basic sinews of war; and (3) fear that shipments of modern military equipment would be used, not against Japan, but to carry on civil war in China.

Hanson W. Baldwin, military analyst of the New York Times, has presented a strong indictment of China's military leadership. In his opinion most of China's troops are "poorly led and incapable of effectively utilizing modern arms," and China's military situation is not only "bad" today but "will probably continue to be bad for some years to come." He has accused the Chinese of manufacturing paper victories in their communiqués on occasions when the Japanese have in fact merely completed a successful maneuver. Mr. Hanson's views are important not merely because they have been read by hundreds of thousands of Americans but more particularly because they probably reflect the opinion of at least part of the American General Staff.

A similarly harsh indictment of Chinese military leadership was formulated by one of China's best generals after the Chinese setback on the Hupeh front last spring. In a review of the Hupeh campaign published in the China Daily News General Ch'en Ch'eng attributed the initial Japanese success in a difficult terrain to "our negligence." More specifically, he spoke of China's failure to coordinate the military, political, and economic aspects of the war. It will be observed that Ch'en Ch'eng's criticism strikes deeper than Baldwin's, and it is probably much sounder. The remarkable successes gained by Chinese guerrillas against great odds suggest that the Chinese are not without real military ability. Except for one or two bad blunders the Chinese showed up quite well in the Burma campaign, better than the British. When the American air force provided air cover in the later stages of the Hupeh campaign, the Chinese outfought and outmaneuvered the better-armed Japanese. All judgments which suggest that the Chinese are lacking in military ability should therefore be regarded as superficial. The real difficulty lies elsewhere.

THE BRAKE ON CHINA'S WAR ECONOMY

With respect to the weakness of China's war strategy in the economic sphere we shall find more general agreement. At least a year ago Chou Mou-pei, a leading figure in Chungking's machine industry, predicted "the total collapse of the machine industry in the interior" because of its dependence on imported parts. He urged a change in basic policy which would make China more self-sufficient in raw materials and war supplies. In a cable from Chungking to the Institute of Pacific Relations Guenther Stein has pointed out that China's production of iron in 1942 was only about 30,000 tons and of steel 10,000 tons. Competent authorities believe that by utilizing small village industries as well as its large-scale facilities China could increase this several fold.

These facts give point to the severe criticism of the Chinese war effort presented by the Soviet writer Vladimir Rogov in a widely quoted article. It is Rogov's contention that China's immense economic resources have never been mobilized for the war because of "covert resistance" in official circles. A lack of vigor in planning has deprived small local industries, such as the industrial cooperatives, of the needed encouragement. As for large-scale industry, Mr. Rogov declares that "industrial and financial circles prefer to engage in profiteering rather than invest their capital in the armaments industry." Emphasis has been on consumers' goods, often of a luxury type, instead of on urgently needed military supplies. This accounts for China's extreme dependence on imports of munitions from the United States, a dependence made very costly by the loss of the Burma road.

Support for this criticism may be found in Chiang Kai-shek's address to the second production conference recently held in Chungking. After urging that "the financial and material resources of the whole nation be mobilized for the production both of arms and of daily necessities," Chiang said that idle capital must be utilized for "production instead of being allowed to circulate in other fields according to changing market conditions." He did not define the "other fields," but it is known that many of China's wealthy men have found speculation in rice and land more profitable than the production of needed war materials. In commenting on this tendency the Ta Kung Pao, China's leading newspaper, has bemoaned the fact that "the merchants are becoming landlords, while the landlords are becoming merchants, and neither wants to invest in industrial enterprises."

With this statement the Ta Kung Pao placed its finger on the factor which, above all else, impedes the development of an all-out war economy in China and obstructs effective military resistance to Japan—China's archaic system of land tenure. Through a highly exploitative share-cropping system and a usurious credit arrangement the landlord and merchant in local areas maintain a dictatorial grip that throttles efforts to introduce local democracy or to stimulate a more widely based popular support for the war effort. They not only control the bulk of China's idle wealth; they also constitute a powerful political force. Their power, critics charge, is used to prevent the Chinese government from instituting the bold policies necessary to increase production and to bring the present damaging inflation under control.

CHUNGKING POLITICS

This leads us directly to the political problems involved in any strengthening of the Chinese war effort. These problems are extraordinarily complex. Reading of the imminent danger of a renewed outbreak of civil strife between the Kuomintang and the Eighth Route (Communist) Army, many Americans assume that the only important division in Chinese politics is between the right as represented by the Kuomintang, or Nationalist Party, and the left as represented by the Communists. This is far from being the case. The Kuomintang, as the one fully legal party, is an amalgam of many diverse elements. The divisions within it are largely personal and sectional rather than ideological, but important ideological differences do exist.

The three dominant personalities in the Kuomintang —apart from Chiang Kai-shek—are Mme Chiang's brother-in-law, H. H. Kung, Minister of Finance; Ho Ying-chin, Minister of War; and Chen Li-fu, Minister of Education, who with his brother, Chen Kuo-fu, heads a bloc, known as the CC group, that controls the Kuomintang party machinery. These men have different spheres of influence. H. H. Kung may be said to represent the dominant business and financial interests of present-day China; Ho Ying-chin holds a strategic position among the various, often conflicting military factions; while the Chen brothers operate in the political sphere.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

All three groups are represented in the Cabinet, but the CC bloc controls the largest number of Cabinet posts, notably the ministries of education, communication, social welfare, and information. Independent of any of these three groups, and a less important figure in Chinese internal politics, is T. V. Soong, the American-trained Minister of Foreign Affairs, who is a brother-in-law of Chiang's. Although not noted for firmness or clarity of political conviction, Soong is usually identified with the more progressive elements in the Kuomintang.

Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek's position in this complicated political picture is difficult to define. Unlike the heads of most foreign states, Chiang does not owe his position to organized political backing. Nor is his power derived from the fact that he is titular commander-in-chief of the army. He has immense prestige because of his forthright and unfaltering opposition to Japanese ambitions in China, but beyond this he owes his power chiefly to his uncanny ability to play one group against the other and to effect workable compromises to hold the diverse factions together. Although Chiang rarely takes a strong stand on domestic issues, his loyalty to the United Nations is beyond question. In this respect Chiang is allied with the progressive wing of the party, men like T. V. Soong and Sun Fo among numerous others.

Most dubious among the various groups from the standpoint of the United Nations war effort is the CC clique. Its members have been strongly critical of British and American policies since Pearl Harbor, and have often been accused by democratic groups within China of fascist, and even pro-Japanese, sympathies. This charge obviously cannot be proved, but the CC group has invited it by adopting many of the trimmings of fascism in its methods of party organization. It maintains a secret police to enforce its party mandates that is closely patterned after the German and Italian models. The CC group has consistently fought all efforts to make the Kuomintang more democratic and has taken the lead in urging suppression of the Communists.

Ho Ying-chin is also suspect in some pro-democracy circles. When Chiang Kai-shek was kidnapped in 1936, Ho immediately ordered troops sent against the kidnappers even though his action endangered Chiang's life. He opposed Chiang's efforts to form a united front for resistance to the Japanese prior to the outbreak of war, and he is believed to have been responsible for the attack on the Communist New Fourth Route Army a few years ago. As Minister of War he was also involved in the withdrawal from the fighting front of a half-million of Chiang Kai-shek's best soldiers, under the politically ambitious General Hu Chung-nan, and their use in maintaining an active blockade of the region dominated by the Eighth Route Army. General Hu has modeled the political and military organization in the areas under his control on fascist lines.

THE DANGER OF A CLASH

Reliable information on the danger of conflict between Kuomintang troops and the Eighth Route Army is extremely difficult to obtain. The Chinese government has refused to permit either American or British military observers to go into the northwest to obtain first-hand information on the situation and has maintained a rigid censorship on all news pertaining to political developments in that region. As a result, we know only what the right-wing officials in charge of information want us to know. From this source we have recently learned that 10,000 Communist troops "attacked and destroyed" a large force of Kuomintang troops early in August. The charge, however, is denied by an Eighth Route Army spokesman. Chungking denies that liquidation of the Eighth Route Army has been planned by Kuomintang military leaders, although it admits that such action has been demanded by party groups in various parts of the country. Without doubt Chungking is sincere in its denial. But many Americans who have visited China recently have expressed fear lest General Hu or some other ambitious military chieftain attack the Communists in the hope of strengthening his own military and political position. Some feel that this danger would be reduced if American military supplies were sent directly to General Stilwell instead of being shipped to the various Kuomintang armies and if United Nations military observers were stationed in the danger zones. The need for some such precaution is underlined by the fact that Chungking has consistently refused to permit foreign assistance, even in the form of medical supplies, to be sent to the Eighth Route Army.

T. A. Bisson, writing in the Far Eastern Survey of the Institute of Pacific Relations, aroused a hornets' nest in official Chinese circles when he declared that the labels "Kuomintang China" and "Communist China" were misleading. He suggested that more descriptive labels would be "feudal China" and "democratic China." Perhaps these labels also are open to objection, but they serve to drive home the fact that Chinese communism, because of the lack of any other opposition party, has attracted a large measure of support from democratic, progressive groups who have little interest in Marxian dogma. Moreover, because China is predominantly rural and rural China's chief curse is landlordism, the Chinese Communists have become, as Raymond Gram Swing recently pointed out, "agrarian radicals trying to establish democratic practices." The Kuomintang, on the other hand, has avoided drastic agrarian reform, presumably because of its close ties to the powerful landowning groups.

It is not necessary to dwell here on the importance of preventing civil war between these two Chinese factions. Such a conflict would not only destroy whatever military effectiveness China now displays but have possibly serious repercussions on the relations between Russia and China, thus producing the kind of rift the Axis has long striven to create within the ranks of the United Nations. Both the United States and Great Britain have recognized the danger and have sought to prevent hostilities. Prevention of civil war, however, is not enough. China must be so strengthened that it can participate more effectively in the war and be prepared to assume a position of leadership in the Pacific after the defeat of Japan. This will necessitate a tremendous increase in the amount of economic and military assistance provided China by the United States. It will require reconquest of Burma and the opening of additional supply routes. But if assistance is thus to be stepped up, we have a right to expect China's own contribution to be revitalized. Pressure on the government to reorganize its war economy and settle its political differences must not be regarded as "imperialistic." We are partners in a common war; our interests are bound up with those of China. It is therefore our right to ask that it strengthen itself for the final effort, just as it was Chiang Kai-shek's right, a year ago, to press for a settlement of the conflict between Britain and the India National Congress.

DEMOCRACY NOW—THE SOLUTION

A possible basis for the settlement of China's political differences has just been indicated by Chiang himself. At the recent meeting of the Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang at Chungking he declared that all political parties would have equal rights and freedom when a constitutional government was set up after the war. The Central Executive Committee took a noteworthy step in this direction by voting to call a National Assembly within a year after the close of hostilities to adopt a constitution. If this were done now instead of being delayed until after the war, the long-standing difficulties between the Kuomintang and the Communists might quickly be removed. The Communists have repeatedly indicated their willingness to give up their separate army and special administrative districts whenever the democratic machinery that would permit a minority party to function effectively is set up. In postponing the creation of this machinery until after the war the committee left the immediate crisis unresolved. There is even danger that the right wing may insist on eliminating the Communists before the National Assembly is set up. Chiang's subsequent statement reiterating the demand for dissolution of the Communists is disturbing. As long the CC clique controls the administrative machinery of the party and the central government, the danger of conflict will persist. Nor are the appropriate steps for the modernization of the army likely to be taken under the present leadership.

Chiang Kai-shek has been reported on several occasions to be considering a reorganization of the government which would bring in younger, more vigorous leadership. There is reason to believe that such a development would be welcomed in Washington, London, and Moscow. But because all these governments are under compulsion to demonstrate that the days of direct foreign intervention have passed, they have swung to the opposite extreme. They have held aloof, preferring to run their own show independently of China. Surely there is a middle course. If we believe that democracy is the only firm basis for a successful war effort and post-war security, we should not hesitate to say so. A way must be found to strengthen the democratic forces of China, both inside and outside the Kuomintang, in their efforts to rehabilitate the Chinese war economy and to broaden popular participation in the Chinese government and in the conduct of the war.

"Appetite First!"

BY PAUL APPLEBY

UNDER the title We Aren't Going to Have Enough to Eat, Louis Bromfield recently contributed an article to the Reader's Digest on the food situation in the United States. The kindest thing that can be said about the alarming picture painted in it is that though purporting to present the facts it illustrates once more Mr. Bromfield's great ability as a writer of fiction.

Only a long and complicated article could take up one by one the numerous instances of misstatement and misunderstanding in Mr. Bromfield's contribution. Let me follow that method with respect only to three statements in three early paragraphs:

Bromfield: "Our ever-normal granary will have been exhausted by the end of the summer, with nothing but a wheat crop 20 to 40 per cent below normal production to replace it."

Wheat stocks are always at their lowest point on July 1. Figures for July 1 have been compiled for many years, whereas figures for "the end of the summer" were not compiled before 1935. This year on July 1 we had in this country 618,000,000 bushels of old wheat, as contrasted with 632,000,000 on July 1 last year, an average of 150,000,000 on July 1 in 1935-39, and an average of 115,000,000 bushels on July 1, 1920-24. Wheat stocks for "the end of the summer," October 1, will total 1,140,000,000 bushels, as compared with 1,378,000,000 a year ago, 1,164,000,000 two years ago, and an average of 699,000,000 bushels on October 1, 1935-39. We had an ever-normal granary of wheat during the 1935-39 period. This year on October 1 we shall have almost half a billion bushels more than we had in those years. Wheat production has a changing significance as the war goes on, but not in Mr. Bromfield's terms. Wheat has not been and is not now one of the items we need most to be concerned about.

The total wheat crop this year, as indicated in the August 1 report, will be 13 per cent greater than the 1932-41 average, and about 1½ per cent greater than the average for 1920-29. What can be the normal below which Mr. Bromfield says we drop "20 to 40 per cent"?

Bromfield: "I would rather not think about next February. By then most of our people will be living on a diet well below the nutrition level."

It is true that in mid-winter our food supply will be at a lower point than it is now. The winter is always the low season. But that our diet then will be something anyone should shudder to contemplate is simply not true. That most of our people will be living on a diet well below "the nutrition level"—whatever that means—is not true. They will at least be living at the level on which they have lived for years and years without alarming Mr. Bromfield at all. They will be living on a diet that in content of nutrients approximates the recommended optimum allowances of the National Research Council, which are higher than those of the League of Nations. It will be a diet much superior to that of any other substantial population anywhere in the world today.

Bromfield: "The President, and the men about him responsible for the security of the home front, did nothing whatever about the desperate food situation until April of this year."

That statement is so patently absurd that it not only requires no answer but alone should discredit Mr. Bromfield's whole article. His article is not really about food but about politics, and his political purpose is revealed in his frequent demagogic public references to himself as a small farmer, which might well be read as a bid for mass farmer support. East of the Mississippi River there were in 1940 about 3,532,185 farms. Of these, 8,604 were of one thousand acres or more. That puts Mr. Bromfield in the top 0.2 per cent. In fact, he is in an even more exclusive class. He runs a farm of 1,500 acres.

The government has not done a perfect job by any means. It has not done all it should have done. Opinions on this score vary widely, and in this as in other matters it is much easier to find things at which to throw bricks than it is to design a satisfactory structure and actually lay brick. But some six million farmers will testify that a great deal has already been done.

Food production in 1943 is now estimated to be 32 per cent greater than the 1935-39 average, 25 per cent greater than in 1939. Each year the production of each commodity has been amazingly close to the goals set by the government. That didn't just happen. Never in the world's history has there been such an achievement in farm production. It was a planned and directed achievement. It could, of course, have been planned and directed even better.

The body of Mr. Bromfield's article has to do with specific situations. There are actually millions of such situations. Each one requires lengthy consideration, because each is part of an enormous complex.

Let it simply be pointed out that if farmers had no complaints about machinery, man-power, fertilizer, and insecticide shortages, that fact would be positive proof that the war was being badly managed. Under the tremendous demands of war there isn't enough to go around. All the competing needs can come into focus only in Washington, there to be balanced against each other in terms of relative urgencies. The recent failure to reach goals in war production, for example, is definitely related to the deferment of farm workers. Neither Mr. Bromfield on his farm nor the shipbuilder in his office can judge competently the relative values. Both the shipbuilder and Mr. Bromfield contribute to good management when they tell how things are in their establishments. But generalized judgments based solely on any such reports are without significance.

Unnumbered problems face the industrialists and the farmers of America. They are meeting and surmounting countless difficulties every day. The war is a joint product of their efforts and the efforts of those in government who plan, evaluate, reconcile, give shape and direction to the productive effort. The essential story has to be seen broadly. Are we getting the production we need? Is our production of food about right in comparison with our production of ships and guns and airplanes and tanks, and is each right in comparison with the others? The man in the powder plant can't tell whether we are using too much metal making shells. The man on the farm can't tell whether we are using too little metal making farm machinery. These things are revealed only by figures rolling in from tens of thousands of places.

FACTS IN PLACE OF FANCY

What are the essential facts about food? Demands on the food supply would provide material for at least one long study. The factors in production would provide material for another. Distribution is a third big field. Nutrition too is a complicated subject. Yet the facts of vital concern are fairly simple, and they are quite contrary to Mr. Bromfield's sweeping assertions.

First of all, what is the truth about production? In spite of the production difficulties food output here has gone up more than it has in any other large agricultural area in any like period in history anywhere in the world. Here are the United States production figures for the period of this present war to date and for the period of World War I:

INDEXES OF THE PHYSICAL VOLUME OF FOOD-CROP AND LIVESTOCK PRODUCTION FOR SALE OR HOME CONSUMPTION

(1935–1939 = 100)

World War I		World War II
1914	81	1939	106
1915	84	1940	111
1916	81	1941	115
1917	82	1942	126
1918	90	1943	132*

* Based on Crop Report for August 1 and estimated marketings of livestock and livestock products in 1943.

"Cheer up, Edwin dear, they say we're still above the nutrition level."

So much for the production figures. But Mr. Bromfield's article is headed, We Aren't Going to Have Enough to Eat. What are the essential facts about consumption?

For the fiscal year beginning July 1 we know that, except for carbohydrates, there will be available for civilian consumption as much food per person, in terms of nutritional values, as was available in the period 1935-39, or more. In fat, in protein, in minerals, and in vitamins there will be as much or more per person, and the small calorie drop reflects a single commodity situation—sugar rationing—which is not regarded by the public or the nutritionists as a major war-time sacrifice.

Those are the essential facts, completely at odds with Mr. Bromfield's assertions. But for their better understanding more facts need to be given.

WHERE HAS THE FOOD GONE?

Food production is up 32 per cent since 1935-39, but prospective per capita civilian consumption this year is almost exactly at the 1935-39 level. Where has the increased food gone?

The Census Bureau estimates that our population by January 1, 1944, will have increased slightly more than 8,000,000 above the average population in the 1935-39 period. That takes a good deal of food.

By January 1 the food consumed by those in the military services, as contrasted with what they formerly ate in civilian life, will represent an increase equivalent to adding 4,000,000 adults to our population.

Another part of our increasing production is taken by Lend-Lease. In 1942 Lend-Lease accounted for about 6½ per cent of our total food production. But most of the Lend-Lease takings were effective long before we had any talk of shortage, and before we had made our most recent increases in production. We sent more food abroad before Pearl Harbor than we sent again until about March of this year. Shipments in February, March, and April of 1943 were just 8.3 per cent more than the shipments in September, October, and November of 1941. That increase amounts to about ½ of 1 per cent of our production.

So it is not Lend-Lease that accounts for a feeling of shortage. That feeling comes from diversion to the military forces, diversion to our increased population, and—most importantly—from increased employment and increased buying power. Particularly is there increased buying power for food, since wages total so much more than they did and since so many other things that consumers want are not on the market.

There are some other factors in the feeling of shortage. One is that while the figures cited here are valid and normal, there was a time between 1935-39 and now when food consumption per capita reached an unprecedented high. The drop from that level is felt. Another factor is the relative shortage of certain commodities. Although the nutrients we need are available, they are not always available in the form of the food we prefer. Another factor is found in changed distribution. Where rationing is used and is effective it tends to even out consumption, shifting part of it away from the more privileged to the less privileged. Rationing makes for a more equalized consumption, but this means a drop in consumption for some citizens. A shift of a different type is involved in the disposal of more than normal amounts of certain farm products directly from the farm. This has been an important factor in the case of meat. A new privileged class has got rather more than its fair share of meat in this way and nullified rationing to that extent. Other people are thereby deprived of their fair share of meat and feel the shortage. This is a result of the incompleteness of governmental controls.

The realities of the food situation, then, and the reasons for a feeling of shortage should be fairly clear. But the nature of the complaints that are heard—Mr. Bromfield's article is an example—requires some further analysis.

WHY PEOPLE COMPLAIN

The complaints may be divided into three general classes, according to origin. There are complaints that come from farmers—although most farmers, in spite of their many difficulties, are pretty happy and too busy farming to complain much. There are complaints that come from handlers and processors of farm products. There are complaints from consumers. Mr. Bromfield's article lumps these complaints together. Some of them are of one nature, some of another.

Farmers' complaints, growing out of their difficulties, have to do first of all with shortages—of man-power, of machinery, of feed, and the like. These complaints reflect not only the inconvenience and loss caused the farmer by the shortage but his unhappiness over the uncertainty, the time lost, the trouble and delay in getting decisions. The whole complex question of field administration is raised by such complaints, but it is fair to say that governmental efforts to leave partial responsibility with industries and dealers and to use local committees often not selected by or responsible to Washington are one important factor in the situation. The result is loose and widely variable administration. So complaints of this kind are not simply farm complaints. In a measure they are reflections of a democracy surviving under war conditions.

Farmers' complaints also have to do—although to a lesser degree—with prices of farm products and prices of things farmers buy.

The complaints about shortages of man-power, machinery, and other supplies can be considered properly only in terms of competing needs for the same things. Is the army too big? Is the navy too big? Are too many people employed in war industries? Should more civilian-supply activities be curtailed? Are too many ships being built? These are some of the questions connected with farm shortages, and whether or not the government is doing a good job in this respect can be argued only by discussing them from all angles.

Handlers and processors have complained of government controls, limitations on mark-ups, and multiplication of directives. Some have complained of short supplies: a plant processing corn has been unable to get corn; meat markets have been unable to get what they felt—in many cases with reason—to be their fair share of meat, and so on.

Consumers' complaints have been generally about shortages and prices.

Thus most of the complaints, from any source, are about short supplies or about the other aspect of supply, which is price. Where supply is limited, the sense of shortage can be ameliorated only by more equitable distribution. Reduced to their lowest common denominator, then, most of the complaints constitute a demand for assured equity in distribution. And this means greater control of distribution. Most of the complaints are in effect complaints about the incompleteness of control. Some, however, come from people on the other side—people who quite naturally prefer to do things in their own way and therefore object to the existence of any controls.

MORE OR LESS CONTROL?

This is the concealed issue in all complaints about the government's handling of the food problem. The real dispute is between those who, unconsciously for the most part, are demanding that government take full responsibility for distributing essential goods so that coupons shall not merely entitle the consumer to a fair share of necessary items but guarantee their availability, and those who are demanding that the government let people alone to run their own affairs.

The problem for government is to weigh these conflicting complaints. The government is extremely reluctant to undertake controls. So long as war production is not reduced damagingly, so long as it is solely a question of civilian unhappiness about the situation, the problem for the government is this: how strong, how widespread, how deeply felt are these two kinds of complaints? If the people are just moderately unhappy over the things they complain about, the government will not extend its controls for the sake of amelioration. If the people are very unhappy indeed, the government will assume responsibility, extend its controls. Governments, and people, are like that.

While Mr. Bromfield berates the bureaucrats vigorously, he is all unconsciously demanding more regimentation. His conscious demands, however, are directly opposed to government regulation.

First, as one newly come to farming, he has a natural wish to be free to carry out his cherished ideas—to hire all the workers, buy all the materials, his plans call for. His desire is natural, but under war conditions his presentation of it is hardly intelligent. During the war relative short-term efficiencies in the total utilization of manpower and materials must be determining. The nation knows this. The nation will not agree that Mr. Bromfield comes first, the war second.

This simple personal desire of Mr. Bromfield's leads him to his second conscious demand. It is for "such an abundance of food that rationing will be unnecessary." He declares that "the United States can produce that abundance with proper planning, necessary farm labor and equipment, and orderly distribution of food."

Here is a demand that the nation abandon efforts to attain, in the interest of a successful prosecution of the war, maximum total efficiency in the use of its labor and resources. Divert steel from ships to cans. Divert freight cars for the carrying of metals and munitions to the transportation of unrationed foods. Mr. Bromfield's concern is not that we should have food adequate to give us the energy to do our duty in a time of historic crisis. We have and shall have adequate food. His point apparently is that nothing is so important as freedom to become over-weight.

What if the British had said, "We must have so much food that rationing will be unnecessary; that is the first essential"? What if the Russians had said it? What would our boys in the services think of us if we were to say it? What would we think of ourselves?

The answer to this last question is the answer to Mr. Bromfield as he raises his war-time banner "Appetite First!"

Fascism Is Still the Issue

IF THE Italian campaign is particularly interesting from the military point of view, because for the first time the Western allies are meeting the Wehrmacht in full force, it is no less so from the political. For in Italy many of the political questions passionately debated in this country recently will be put to a test which may in some respects prove conclusive.

We shall see, for instance, which were right—those who defended the system of AMG as it was originally conceived or those who criticized it. We shall see whether or not the Allies could have chosen a course other than the one they followed during the weeks between the fall of Mussolini and the signing of the armistice; whether we could not have shortened the breathing space allowed the Badoglio government and so prevented the Germans from intrenching themselves in the north and center of Italy; whether, by establishing a Committee of Free Italy to address the Italian people from Sicily, we could not have obliged Badoglio to move more speedily and drop his double game of appeasing Germany while stretching out his hand to the Allies. We must watch developments closely, for an analysis of what happens in Italy will teach us much that will be valuable in the future in solving the problems attendant upon the liberation of the rest of the world.

One thing is already evident. It is undeniable that the resistance of the Italian civil population to the Germans far surpassed that of the Italian military, even though their means of defense were vastly inferior. German communiqués have admitted that popular resistance took its most violent form in Milan and Turin, that in those two cities the fall of Mussolini had its strongest political repercussions. Some day the whole story of Milan will be known. But even now the fragmentary information seeping out of underground channels tells us how overnight, under clear and energetic leadership, Milan assumed the color of an anti-fascist city and became the potential rallying-point for Italian democracy.

The Milan anti-fascist leaders understood from the beginning that merely to cry for peace and to hail the United Nations was not enough. If the Italian masses were to have an incentive to fight, the movement for liberation had to have real political content. It was natural that the question of the elimination of the monarchy should arise, and that the masses should demand a regime which would inspire them with confidence and hope. Only the poorest school of diplomacy, only columnists with not the slightest knowledge of the way the masses react, could have misinterpreted the cry of "Long Live the King" which greeted the fall of Mussolini on that Sunday afternoon, July 25. From its first utterance, "Long Live the King" meant only "Death to Mussolini," and the next morning both Mussolini and the King, as might have been expected, were subjects of the same curse.

The Italian people could never have been roused to a real fight simply by the prospect opened by the termination of the alliance with Germany. They were truly eager to break with Germany and to come into the war on the side of the democracies, but they would do so only on the condition that every vestige of fascism at home be eradicated. They would not submit to a Badoglio who, while suppressing fascist ideology in the newspapers, admitted four members of the former Grand Fascist Council to his ministerial deliberations.

The heroic resistance of Milan and Turin was forged by the straightforward anti-fascist purpose of the leaders, and the greatest severity was required to quell the "communistic rioting" (we quote from the German communiqué) which so "worried" Marshal Rommel. Unfortunately the heroism was in vain, at least for the moment. As everywhere else in the last ten years, the left in Italy has been delivered into the hands of reaction. While Mussolini has been able to escape his fate, while Ciano enjoys sanctuary in territory occupied by the Allies, while the King and Badoglio, their records stained with crime and shame, may one day be recompensed by the United Nations for their "services," at least ten thousand of the most active Italian anti-fascists have been massacred in Rome, Milan, Turin, and elsewhere by the troops of Rommel and Kesselring, with the help of local Fascists.

We must have the courage to face the truth: the anti-fascist opposition in Italy has been decapitated. As in the past, the best fighters for democracy have gone down without receiving any substantial help from the democracies. (I am sure that many an Italian Socialist in Milan died saying, "Once more we have been betrayed.") The Allies must realize that the enemy has not only strengthened his military position in the north of Italy; he has also crushed the first great Italian movement of rebellion. Since the Italian opposition has been deprived of its best elements within Italy, it becomes more necessary than ever for the United Nations to use, without hesitation, every Italian anti-fascist abroad. Sforza must be used; also Salvemini, Pacciardi, and dozens of others with authority in Italian liberal and labor ranks. What should have been done when Sicily was first invaded must at least be done now—at once. The fact that the working people of Milan and Turin offered the Germans greater resistance than did the well-equipped Italian divisions in the Balkans proves once more that men will willingly sacrifice their lives when they have a firm political line to follow.

In Spain we understood very well that an Italian could be either a poor or an excellent warrior. Colonel Pacciardi, who commanded the Garibaldi Battalion in Spain, will remember my address to his men in the unforgettable days of the Battle of Guadalajara. The battalion had already proved its fighting abilities and was to see action again within the next few hours. I was worried lest the contemptuous tone in which the Spanish press and public referred to the Italian Fascist divisions routed at Guadalajara should jar the patriotic sensibilities of the battalion, and I thought that a member of the Spanish government should visit them at the front. I addressed them like this: "You were born on the same soil as the men who have been so badly defeated by the Republican army at Guadalajara. You belong to the same generation. Like them, you are Italians. But though the soldiers of Mussolini in Spain have been defeated by an inferior force, you have gained the esteem of the Spanish people by your capacity and your courage. The difference is that you are anti-fascists. You have a cause for which to fight. You have suffered fascism in your country, and you are determined to fight it wherever it may appear. That is what makes you such excellent soldiers." The spirit that dominated the Garibaldi Battalion came suddenly alive in Milan.

"Down with Fascism" is not only the most efficient slogan with which to inflame the people of Europe against Hitler; it is the only one that makes sense on the other side of the Atlantic. It is not too risky to assert that, with the exception perhaps of Holland, where for many reasons resistance to the invader has not radically changed the political alignments which existed there before the war, the people of every country of Europe have decisively turned to the left. Everywhere the determination of the people is the same: not to stop until fascism has been wiped off the earth—not gently, not as it was treated in Sicily, where AMG authorities can still collaborate with minor Fascists, but in the ruthless way the workers of Milan and Turin would have extirpated it had they not been crushed by the forces of Marshal Rommel.

Anti-fascism means quite a different thing to the people of Europe from what it means to even the most enlightened liberals in Great Britain and the United States, who have never borne the marks of fascism on their flesh. I have felt the difference more than once in the various round-table discussions in which I have been privileged to join my American friends. Our moral reaction to fascism was the same. But our conception of the nature of the anti-fascist fight was not quite the same. No genuine European anti-fascist could say, as was said last week at the Annual Conference of Science, Philosophy, and Religion at Columbia University, that punishment of the fascist leaders is, after all, not such an all-important problem, that our chief concern is with the organization of the peace. For a European anti-fascist the extermination of fascism is the first step to peace; for him there can be no talk of peace until every fascist responsible for this war is utterly destroyed. For he knows that their survival would make any stable peace impossible.

This fanatical anti-fascism of the peoples of the world need not alarm anyone. While the rising revolutionary tide in Europe may provide more than one headache for the well-meaning members of the AMG, it must surely be recognized that the anti-fascist spirit that has weathered four years of the most brutal Nazi repression is an invaluable source of strength; it can be drawn on to accelerate the winning of the war and to smooth the path toward a real peace. Every city of Europe can be a Milan. Fascism is still the issue.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

IT WAS rumored in Germany that he no longer lived. Propaganda, though hampered somewhat by the necessity of discretion, made vigorous efforts to combat the rumor. The Freiheitskampf of Dresden, for example, on August 25 censured people "who, if they have heard nothing of a certain personage for some time, immediately make him the subject of the most fantastic fairy tales." The purpose of Hitler's radio speech of September 11 was partly to prove that he had neither committed suicide nor been murdered.

But other rumors circulated too. It was said that events similar to the recent change of government in Italy were impending, that Hitler would be shoved aside and his power taken over by the generals. The Zurich newspaper Die Nation reported on September 2 that Munich—"a hotbed of rumors"—was seething with this story. Everyone was saying that the army was preparing to "proclaim the long-planned military dictatorship before the end of the year." The Munich rumors even defined the purpose of the coup d'état: the military would at once "permit the occupation of the Reich by Anglo-American troops in order to prevent the entry of the Russians."

Similar and even more detailed versions of the story were published in the Nya Dagligt Allehanda on September 1. Its correspondent declared that Field Marshal von Manstein was slated to be the future German Badoglio. But he added that there was another group which was planning just the opposite—which intended after the overthrow of Hitler to open the door to the Russians and to form a German-Soviet-Japanese alliance against the Anglo-Saxons.

There is no occasion to dwell on the political aspects of the rumors agitating Germany. What is interesting is that the people's heads were, and certainly still are, filled with Badoglio expectations and Badoglio prognoses. This fact supplied another reason for Hitler's radio speech. It has not been sufficiently emphasized that the high point of the address was the Führer's refutation of the idea that Mussolini's fate was hanging over him. There can be no thought of such a thing, he cried. The men who surround me are faithful. In his own words—though a translation can hardly reproduce his illiteracies and grammatical errors, which were even more hair-raisingly frequent than usual:

> The attempt of the international plutocratic plot to break the German resistance like in Italy is childish. This time they confuse the German nation with some other people. Their hope of finding traitors in its midst today is based on a misunderstanding of the National Socialist state. Their belief that they can bring about a July 25 in Germany also is based on a fundamental misconception of my personal position and of the attitude of my political collaborators and my field marshals, generals, and admirals. More than ever before, the German leadership as a fanatically united group is thwarting such intentions. Any emergency will only strengthen our resolution. In doing so my personal life has long since ceased to belong to myself anyway. I work with the knowledge and with the sense of duty of being able to secure by my contribution the life of my nation for generations in the future.

Even in Germany few persons will be able to accept Hitler's testimony as first-class proof of his field marshals' and generals' faithfulness to him.

How much personal prestige Hitler still enjoys in Germany is an interesting question. A year ago, it should be recalled, he had not suffered a single severe, outwardly visible defeat. At that time an immense number of people believed in him with blind enthusiasm. Even the others could not entirely escape the influence of his continuous victories. "He succeeds in everything," they admitted resignedly. Under the impact of one year's defeats this attitude has been changing at an amazing tempo. On August 1 East Prussian newspapers carried an article by the Gauamtsleiter, Professor Gruneberg, rector of the University of Königsberg. Under the title Res venit ad triarios—The Hour of the Old Guard Has Come—it said:

> It is time for the Führer's Old Guard to gather and prepare for an emergency. . . . The people no longer put blind trust in the Führer. Every true triarius will agree that there is at present a revolting amount of foolish talk. When evil persons do not stop short of criticizing the Führer himself, we must strike hard."

RUSSIA AND SPAIN

Few persons realize how seriously the Blue Division which Franco sent to fight in Russia has disturbed the internal harmony of the United Nations, or how greatly it has aggravated Moscow's distrust of its Western allies. Although militarily unimportant, the Blue Division has served as an effective medium for anti-Russian agitation not only in Spain but in South America. Every Spanish soldier who returns from the Russian front is used as a mouthpiece for inflammatory speeches against the Soviet Union, and these are then broadcast throughout Latin America. Contrary to assertions appearing in the American press, recruiting for the Blue Division continues without pause, although it is becoming increasingly difficult to obtain "volunteers." And in an official statement issued after the Italian surrender, Arrese, general secretary of the Phalanx, again proclaimed as the basis of Spain's foreign policy "the fight against communism." Lately the Soviet press has given particular attention to the subject of Spain, and the Red Star has stated very clearly that no matter what the plans of "other people" may be the Soviet Union will never countenance the continuation of the Franco regime against the will of the Spanish people; nor can it condone the tolerant attitude of the United Nations which has allowed Franco to maintain his Blue Division on the eastern front.

Two recent events may be cited as bearing, if but slightly, on the subject of "Hitler and the Generals." The first is an execution announced by the official D. N. B. on September 9. A Baron Arno von Wedekind had been put to death by the ax. The Baron was twenty-four years old, a student. His crime was things he had said. He had spoken to foreigners "about Germany and its struggle in the basest manner, thus betraying his own people." With Germans "he had used defeatist language calculated to have a disintegrating effect and to undermine German morale."

The second occurred in the Norwegian city of Kristiansund and was reported in the Stockholm Aftontydningen of September 6. Just as a troop train was about to pull out, six officers staged a demonstration on the station platform.

> They tore off their badges of rank and their Distinguished Service medals, crying, "Heil Churchill! Hoch Roosevelt!" Wild rioting followed, and a Gestapo man was knocked down. Finally the Ortskommandant succeeded in arresting the officers.

The Ordeal of Jean Hélion

THEY SHALL NOT HAVE ME. By Jean Hélion. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

WHEN war broke out, Jean Hélion, married to an American, was peacefully painting in Virginia. In January, 1940, he crossed the Atlantic to help defend France. Six months later, five days after the fall of Paris, Hélion and his battalion were captured by the Nazis near the Loire. "A fine epitaph for Hitler," Hélion considers, "would be: 'In everything he had method.' " Hitler's method of preventing Hélion or any one of his thousands of fellow-prisoners from escaping was to tell them that they were going home, then march them for six days 162 miles without food or water. On the fifth day "the column was dragging itself over a forest road when the unbelievable order came: 'Run! Run!' " Nazi guards fired at their heels. Then Hélion saw something which he could not have believed possible: "the whole column ran." He saw seven men fall dead from exhaustion. "One cannot mistake a man falling dead from exhaustion," says Hélion. "It is as if his body had lost the backbone. It drops like clothes from a hanger, and arranges itself gently on the ground." Those who survived that ordeal reached, not home, but Germany.

Probably never has a more exact picture of prisoners of war been drawn than in this book by a Frenchman who for two years was a prisoner in the Reich. So far the press has hardly done his record justice. Space it has been given, but the tendency has been to treat it as just one more "I Was There" war book. Time, to my knowledge, is the only journal to reveal how much more it is than that. But even Time, with its habitual refusal to be all the time serious on an all-the-time serious subject, found it necessary to compare M. Hélion's amazing escape from the Fortress of Europe with "the escape of Casanova from the Leads." Unlike the authors of most war books, M. Hélion preaches no sermons, neither generalizes nor prophesies, makes no pretensions to fine writing (therefore writes extremely well); and, finally, he is as scrupulously fair to the people from whom he suffered appalling misery as it is possible for a decent, dignified human being to be.

Jean Hélion, at thirty-nine, is one of the most distinguished living abstract painters, with ten one-man shows to his credit in the United States alone. He is also a lecturer and expert writer on theory and technique in painting. Short and shortsighted, he might be taken for a modest school teacher were it not for a singular air of authority, an energy showing itself in every word and gesture, and a bush of hair which, when coaxed by its owner to help save his life by lying down flat, flatly refused to do so.

Before embarking on his detailed account of captivity Hélion raises what would seem a very important question. On going to war, he remarks, every soldier is instructed how to dress a wound, "a simple precaution that may save his life." But why, he asks, "isn't he told something about regaining his freedom if he happens to lose it?" Hélion is convinced that his story would have ended here, if only he had received half an hour of instruction from someone who had gone through what was in store for him.

As it was, ignorant and starved, Hélion and fifty-four comrades were gun-butted into an Orléans cattle truck supposed to hold a maximum of 40 hommes, 8 chevaux. He and nine others finally landed on a prison farm in Pomerania, where at sight of their physical condition "the pink, sourish, piggish-faced" overseer gave vent to his disgust "with a wide gamut of howls." Baroness von Z., who owned the enormous estate as well as numerous serfs, expressed her contempt "with a highly distinguished wrinkle." Here, while the "Battle of Britain" raged—an event he did not hear about until two years later, in America—Hélion not only dug potatoes fourteen hours a day and ate them at every "meal" until his stomach swelled with gas, but was forced to peel them when he got "home," exhausted, at night—nights during which the thermometer fell to 34° (F) below zero. Hélion and a friend spent the long winter planning, dreaming, talking their escape—to be made the following June. "We would try to cross the border beyond the source of the Rhine. It meant about 900 miles. . . . We would live on raw grain mashed and soaked in water, and on fish." Final preparations had been made when suddenly, in March, he and 300 others were transferred to Stettin-on-Oder, into the hold of an anchored prison ship which "swallowed" 750 starving Frenchmen.

The days in Stettin the prisoners spent at work in nearby factories, the nights in the darkness of the ship's hold. There "a mysterious and concentrated life began." Strong men—among them Hélion—whose mental alertness managed to conquer fatigue crept from their lice-ridden bunks "toward passionate rendezvous." Under hidden lamps constructed of material picked up from wreckage caused by R. A. F. raids, these men—held in awe by their comrades—met to forge documents, alter smuggled-in garments, perfect disguises for escape. The less adventurous played passionate poker for a year's salary and, when that was lost, for packages that had not arrived and pieces of personal clothing. Others met to collect the largest lice, which by constant practice on a dummy they were able to flip on to their Kommandoführer as he marched down the ranks. A prisoners' "black market" was formed. Hélion, who was held in high esteem and had been made interpreter to the Kommandoführer, bribed that gentleman to treat the prisoners well by offering him every third day a cup of the American coffee which he had received from his wife.

Captivity is a world like no other—a world "within" where, because they know nothing of the world "without," men's thoughts all the time turn inward, on themselves. Well aware of this, the Nazis spread the most insidious of all propaganda. They "allowed" the prisoners to read not only Goebbels's Das Reich but newspapers from occupied France and Belgium. "Dealing with local problems in which every one of us was interested," writes Hélion, "they showed the Nazis at their best, our former politicians at their worst, and the Allies in their most embarrassing positions." The prisoners tried their utmost not to believe what they read, but the words "intoxicated them slowly." To sustain both his own morale and that of his fellow-prisoners in the face of only negative news was the hardest of the many hard jobs Hélion undertook for the benefit of his comrades. Certain facts and beliefs, however, must have done more than any written word to undermine his great fortitude. The most soul-destroying, perhaps, was Hélion's conviction that while some 1,300,000 French prisoners were, and are, solving the Reich's labor problem, and incidentally permitting "the mobilization of more men for the fighting armies," they are also, thanks to the Nazis' confiscation of about one-fifth of their pay, presenting daily to the Reich "at least 2,000,000 marks, net."

One day, "overdriven, tired of dragging the mass of my comrades behind me," Jean Hélion had had enough. That auspicious day was Friday, February 13, 1942. Hélion escaped. Of that odyssey I shall say only this: that while a disguised Hélion was trying to avoid inspection of his forged papers by an official on a train from Berlin to Cologne, I was traveling from New York to Croton. An official, wanting to see my ticket, touched me on the shoulder. My hands jumped. "They Shall Not Have Me" fell to the floor.

Our Naval War

AMERICA'S NAVY IN WORLD WAR II. By Gilbert Cant. The John Day Company. $3.75.

THOROUGHLY competent military critics are rare. When, in addition, these men have a knack of writing interestingly, their material is worthy not only of being read but of being studied closely. As one of the handful of men in the United States with these attainments, Mr. Cant has the further advantage of having been in an especially good position, as war editor of the New York Post, to know details of naval war which, though not secret, have been omitted from the brief and unimaginative communiqués of our "silent service." In "The War at Sea," published a year ago, he uncovered comparatively new information regarding early naval action. Now, in "America's Navy in World War II," he has traced the developments in our sea war from Pearl Harbor through the earlier campaign in the Solomons.

In trying to put together a detailed and complete account of our naval war, the author has operated under the disadvantage of an unwise and arbitrary censorship, which has several times chosen to conceal facts discreditable to itself but perfectly well known to the enemy. The handicap imposed is suggested by the fact that no earlier writer has attempted to produce so comprehensive a book under such unfavorable conditions.

Owing to these circumstances, it is hardly possible to pass final judgment on "America's Navy in World War II" until fuller information becomes available. But almost any reader will find the merits far outweighing the defects. Among the latter is too long an introduction, not all of which is pertinent to the subject. In giving details of naval actions, the author sometimes loses himself in them and does not outline clearly the strategy within which they took place. A few errors of fact have crept in, such as the statement that the four ships authorized in 1883 were expected to steam at eighteen knots. A closer check on naval history would have revealed that the four ships had designed speeds of thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen knots. Several misspelled words and one or two hopelessly involved and grammatically incorrect sentences also indicate hasty or inadequate proofreading.

Despite these shortcomings, "America's Navy in World War II" is an outstandingly good value. It is, indeed, almost a "must" book for anyone wishing a clear understanding of our naval war. The bare skeleton of information made available by the Navy Department has been supplemented by a vast mass of additional facts. There are gaps, to be sure, but they are surprisingly few. The comment which one reviewer applied to Cant's earlier volume, "It is a better book about the war than anyone has a right to expect during a war," also holds true of this work. Although first of all a newspaperman, the author has written history with an understanding and a grade of scholarship that would establish the reputation of any professional historian. The epic story he has to tell has been presented exceedingly well.

It is all to the credit of the writer that he has not fallen into the temptation of becoming an apologist. In many cases where praise is due he gives it unstintingly and defends the navy from criticisms made by others. He does not, for example, agree with some critics in blaming the loss of four big cruisers in the early Solomons fighting on defensive tactics. Nor does he agree with the often-made charge that cooperation between Halsey and MacArthur in the Southwest Pacific was weak. But he is also keenly aware of the navy's shortcomings and points out some but by no means all of them. The tyrannical and inconsistent publicity policy stemming from Admiral King is an object of special attack. Neither is the early fumbling in dealing with submarines in the Atlantic overlooked. However, both in this instance and in dealing with the inexcusable episode of Pearl Harbor the author does not delve much below the surface. He intimates that the admirals bungled affairs, but one is left somewhat in the dark as to why such men were in high position at the time and how a better handling of affairs could have been assured.

In one of the several valuable appendices which complete the book, the author, in discussing Japanese cruiser and destroyer losses, states what virtually every close student of naval affairs knows—that if all American "sinkings" of ships of these classes had actually occurred the Japanese would have a minus number in both categories. The American claims and those of the Japanese concerning the destruction of carriers appear to be about on a par: both are mathematically impossible.

The scope of Mr. Cant's latest book alone sets it apart from the great majority of war books. In sixteen extremely meaty chapters he provides the background of the present conflict, discusses the period of undeclared war in the Atlantic, reviews the Pearl Harbor, Philippine, and Indonesian tragedies, our Pacific raids by task forces, the submarine in the Atlantic and Pacific, the great battles of the Coral Sea and

Midway, the naval activities in the Mediterranean, and the long-drawn-out struggle for the southern Solomons. A last chapter, Which Way to Tokyo? briefly indicates the author's own views of the probable course of the Pacific war. With the basic strategy of beating Germany first there is no quarrel. But Mr. Cant feels, in common with a large number of civilian and military critics, that too little force has been diverted to the Pacific to make a really effective "holding" campaign possible. While awaiting the day of complete concentration on Japan, we should pursue tactical offensives in a number of thinly held enemy areas, devoting ourselves particularly to the reopening of the Burma road and the consequent strengthening of China; and it is on attacks from Chinese bases or from the North Pacific rather than on island-hopping that Mr. Cant places most of his confidence in ultimate victory. The Negro's Economic Place

THE NEGRO'S SHARE: A STUDY OF INCOME, CONSUMPTION, HOUSING, AND PUBLIC ASSISTANCE. By Richard Sterner, in Collaboration with Lenore A. Epstein, Ellen Winston, and Others. Harper and Brothers. $4.50.

THIS volume, the third in The Negro in American Life series, which was made possible by funds from the Carnegie Corporation, is the most comprehensive and at the same time the most fundamental study of the Negro's economic position in American society that has ever been undertaken. Although, as the title indicates, the book is primarily concerned with what the Negro "gets out of the economic system as an income-receiver and consumer," it includes as a necessary part of the analysis an objective account of the conditions under which the Negro participates in the economic life of America. After examining such claims as the racial inferiority of the Negro and his lower living standards as justification for lower wages, the author makes clear at the outset that the value premise underlying his study is the American creed of equality. He bases his position upon the fact that no scientific evidence has been produced to prove the racial inferiority of the Negro and that the lower living standards of the Negro are part of a vicious circle: the Negro lives on less because he receives less and since he lives on less, it is argued, he should receive less.

The book is divided into two parts, the first dealing with the living conditions of Negroes and the second with their social welfare. The first fact of importance in regard to the living conditions of Negroes has been, as the author shows, the movement of Negroes from farming into non-agricultural pursuits. This movement has been taking place on a large scale since the First World War and has been associated with the decrease in the amount of land devoted to cotton production. However, changes in Southern agriculture, which were accelerated by the AAA program, have not had the same effect upon whites and blacks in the South. There has been a much greater decline in the number of share-croppers among whites than among Negroes, and whereas there has been a significant increase in the number of white owners, the number of Negro owners has continued to decline since 1920. As a result of the shift from farming to non-agricultural pursuits, between 1910 and 1930 Negro males lost or gave up 300,000 jobs in agriculture and gained 775,000 jobs in industry. In this shift from agricultural to non-agricultural pursuits the Negro male worker has found a place chiefly in semi-skilled and more especially unskilled occupations, while he still plays an insignificant role in skilled, clerical, managerial, and professional pursuits. Negro women have not fared so well as Negro men, since the shift from farming to non-agricultural occupations has resulted in a large increase of the number in domestic and personal service, while the number of white women has increased significantly in many occupational groups.

It is against this background that the author discusses family incomes and expenditures and the housing of Negroes. Family incomes and expenditures are analyzed in relation to the significant differences between the composition or structure of Negro and white families. Because of the large amount of family disorganization among Negroes, there is a greater proportion of "non-family" persons and families without children than among whites, though Negroes have a larger proportion than whites of families with four or more children. Even when such refinements are made for the sake of statistical accuracy, the incomes of the great mass of Negro families are found to be below the maintenance level, particularly in the South. In Northern cities Negroes have been able to achieve a higher level of living, though there too a large percentage of Negro families have incomes below the maintenance level. The analysis of expenditures for individual items, especially for food consumption, shows to what extent the mass of Negro families must struggle for mere physical survival. Especially significant for the average white American is the fact brought out by this study that the reputed improvidence and extravagance of Negroes are greatly exaggerated and that a substantial number of Negro families "balance their budgets better than the average white family of corresponding means."

The second section of the book contains the best analysis to date of the Negro's share in the various welfare agencies set up under the New Deal. The economic liability of Negro relief cases in those urban areas where Negroes constitute a large proportion of the population and the discrimination in granting relief to Negroes in the South during the earlier years of the New Deal are analyzed in relation to the low earnings of the Negro. However, when the Works Progress Administration was set up, the Negro began to obtain a share proportionate to his needs in the North, though in the South he was still subject to discrimination. Although Negro youth shared in the benefits of the National Youth Administration in proportion to their numbers in the population, because of their poverty and lack of education they did not share in proportion to their needs. In regard to assistance to the aged, the Negro has suffered not only because of the large numbers in agriculture, but also because of the belief in the South that Negroes can get along on less than whites. Nevertheless, through the influence of the federal government the Negro has gradually received a more equitable share in the benefits of social security. This was especially true in regard to some phases of the work of the Farm Security Administration. It was also true in regard to subsidized housing projects, though the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has not only discriminated against Negroes but has tended to freeze the segregation of the Negro in cities.

The special value and, one might say, uniqueness of this study by an "outsider" are attributable not simply to its thoroughness but more especially to the premises, which are made explicit at the beginning. The first is that the Negro has the right to equality of opportunity and rewards in a competitive economy, and the second, that the Negro's share in consumption should be evaluated in terms of a decent standard of living and human welfare. The second premise reflects undoubtedly a point of view which the author, a Swedish social economist, has carried over from his work with the Swedish Population Commission. Although this study is based largely on the researches and materials of American investigators, the author has not only synthesized these materials but has made independent statistical analyses in order to answer the questions arising from his premises. Consequently, the book may not appeal to those having only a superficial interest in the Negro; and though many basic tables are relegated to the appendices, the statistical documentation of the text will tend to repel the general reader. Yet because of the fund of factual information and fundamental statistical analyses contained in the book, it is a work of permanent value in the literature on the Negro.

CHALLENGE TO FREEDOM. By Henry M. Wriston. Harper and Brothers. $2.

BY AN odd coincidence almost all the important things which threaten freedom in the eyes of Dr. Wriston are associated with the New Deal. Some of them are also associated with communism or fascism or both. He concedes that the Republican Party has strayed from the true faith occasionally, but these minor admissions are scarcely intended to disguise the fact that the book is a partisan political document.

As a preelection-year tract, "Challenge to Freedom" may be forgiven many of its unsupported generalizations and even a few misinterpretations of fact. Unfortunately, there are many indications that the author considers himself an honest crusader for freedom rather than a political pamphleteer. If he is writing soberly as the president of Brown University, his distortions of history are really disturbing.

The exaggerations are doubly unfortunate because many of the issues raised in the book are timely and worthy of serious consideration. Wriston is entirely right in his repeated denunciations of the cynical doctrine that the end justifies the means, and he is too nearly right in his charge that American political leaders have followed this doctrine frequently in recent years. The road to this war was paved with cynicism throughout the world, and a return to moral principles is essential for lasting peace.

The dangers of too much centralization of government are real, and are not less so because reactionaries are currently using the charge of centralized power as a stick to beat the Roosevelt Administration. There is at least some justification for Wriston's statement that "there is desperate need for reform in the citadel of the reformers." And any honest liberal should go along with him in this: "We are not faced with the choice between impotence and tyranny, between laissez faire and dictatorship. We can pursue the third alternative, which is the characteristic American solution: a framework of laws which establishes and defines the orbit of action but leaves the individual free to move within that orbit."

But when the author gets around to what he calls a program, his recommendations turn out to be purely negative, despite all his efforts to clothe them in ringing and positive language. He says, "Make the common sense and the common honesty of the common man our common reliance." What he means is to give the common man the good old nineteenth-century gambler's chance to become a millionaire if he can make it and to starve if he can't.

In the last chapters the book is perfectly explicit in its program of reaction. One chapter is devoted to heaping scorn on the ideal of security, and another to attacking the desirability of full employment. "Full employment," says Wriston, "is a political fantasy rather than an economic or social goal." And further: "Full employment is possible, at a price. But the price is the restriction of liberty and a lower standard of living."

Nowhere is there the slightest recognition of the fact that industrialization, mass-production techniques, the growth of large corporations, and a revolution in finance have completely altered the original economic structure of the United States. There is instead a plea that we restore to our children an opportunity to live hazardously, "and stop babbling endlessly about security."

Wriston's euphemisms for reaction offer an interesting lesson in semantics. For example, he writes that ours "is a generation doubtful of its own children. It was fearful of their competition; it sought to keep them off the labor market, passing laws to deny them economic experience. . . ." If this means anything, it is an attack on child-labor legislation and on efforts to prolong the average period of education. It may appeal to some believers in rugged American individualism, but it will have a strange sound to the youth who tried to find jobs between 1929 and 1941.

This lack of genuine realism, this failure to connect generalizations about moral principles with the actual world of the twentieth century, is characteristic of the whole book and the state of mind it represents. The value of human dignity and the rights of the individual need restatement in contemporary terms, but they cannot be restored or preserved by looking backward nostalgically to a world which will never exist again.

IN BRIEF

INDIA'S PROBLEM CAN BE SOLVED. By DeWitt Mackenzie. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

Recently India, which has always been a live topic, has suddenly become also a crucial one—crucial to the fortunes of the United Nations. DeWitt Mackenzie's book is therefore a welcome addition to our information on that second most controversial subject of our time—the first being Soviet Russia. And yet one hardly escapes the feeling that this is one among several books of similar content that have appeared in the last two years. For most of the material presented here has been repeatedly presented before, and the ground covered is practically the same. Its only point of distinction is the final chapter, which bears the title of the book, "India's Problem Can Be Solved." That represents a hopeful mood, displays a constructive attitude, and sends forth an optimistic note at a time when so much gloom hangs over the question of India. What is more, Mr. Mackenzie backs up his optimism by hard facts collected during his recent visit to India—a country he had previously visited two decades ago. For this alone Mr. Mackenzie deserves congratulations and attention.

LIFE IN UNOCCUPIED FRANCE. By Neville Lytton. The Macmillan Company. $1.40.

This little book is a simple, sincere, and very personal story by an Englishman who has lived many years in France, since studying at the Ecole des Beaux Arts before the last war, in which he served in the British army in France. It presents a convincing and quite valuable picture of a France that is awaiting the day of deliverance from Vichy no less than from the Germans.

FILMS

IT IS hard to have clear judgment about war pictures, especially nonfiction war pictures, and the current excitement over the record of the defense of Stalingrad—the full, painfully pleonastic title is "The City That Stopped Hitler—Heroic Stalingrad"—is a good example of how hard it is. The very name of the city is such a sounding-board in most minds, such a bid to emotions and sympathies which addle the power of judgment, that the water is muddied from the start. Added to that, "Stalingrad," like most other record films or newsreels of war, contains images of war so grand or so touching, so much more worth seeing than nearly anything else we ever see on the screen, that we are liable on their account to feel that we are seeing a great picture or, for that matter, that any critical assessment of the picture is vulgar, small, and irrelevant. But that is like being moved by words like love, death, blood, sweat, tears, regardless of how well or ill they are used. It may be harder to use honest cinematic images dishonestly—the truth insists on pushing through—than to use words dishonestly; but nearly every war film proves how actually easy it is, and suggests how hard it would be to use those images honestly, to say nothing of adequately. "Stalingrad" is sensibly and often sensitively edited. But there is hardly a moment in it where the editing—rather than the single shot—even begins to lift a series of images above prose coherence and toward the plain-featured, heroic poetry which might possibly be deserving of the subject. The commentary, meanwhile, almost constantly reduces, or lily-gilds, or angles the power of the images; never does better; occasionally does worse, as in its strange suggestion that it is better for Russians to use flame-throwers on living Germans than for Germans to use them on dead Russians; or in its managing, several times, to make the audience laugh and applaud at the sight of dead, dying, suffering, or humiliated Germans.

Actually, I suppose such films are better assembled and set to words than might be hoped for, so hot after the event; but that does not reduce the fact that they are nearly always inadequate to, and often a dishonoring of, the event, the people recorded, and the people who did the recording. The war camera men themselves, of course, are subject to critical assessment. Varying degrees of judgment, courage, taste, and luck are continuously implied in what they record, and you can see sharp national differences in their styles of eyesight, with the Russians and British generally leading, and the Germans and Americans generally trailing. There is much room for analysis of their work, and for improvement; but I suspect that their several styles are more nearly appropriate to what they are doing than more detached developed judgment could make them. In any case the camera men on both sides of every front are making a record which in proper editorial hands, sooner or later, could be made to yield some of the greatest works of art—or whatever term might have to be substituted—ever known.

It surprises me to find "So Proudly We Hail" confusing many people almost as much. I realize that a good deal of sincerity, emotion, and desire to honor went into it, and I have no desire to laugh at that; but it is impossible to accept the result, except in a kind of fascination. This is probably the most deadly-accurate picture that will ever be made of what war looks like through the lenses of a housewives'-magazine romance. In those terms it is to be recommended. Some reviewers who grant that the story itself is painful feel that the picture is redeemed by the deep sincerity of the players and by the powerful realism of the war scenes. But it seemed to me the most sincere thing Paramount's young women did was to alter their make-up to favor exhaustion (and not too much of it) over prettiness (and not too little of that); and that the bombings of hospitals and the strafings of wounded accurately met their level in the honest matron behind me who kept saying tst-tst-tst. Sonny Tufts, as Miss Goddard's marine, I rather like; but he is making a hit walking rope between mild credibility and the shucks-jeeze brand of ladies'-darlingism, and that rope has just one side to fall on.

"The Adventures of Tartu" disguises British Agent Robert Donat as an oleaginous Rumanian whose business it is to destroy a Nazi poison-gas plant and escape the consequences with Valerie Hobson. It is so easy to enjoy that it is easy to overrate: that is, it gave me nearly as much simple fun as thrillers a dozen times better; but not quite. You are seeing all it has, and bald spots as well, the first time around, whereas with a good Hitchcock or even a good Carol Reed, even the pleasures visible at a first seeing stand up, or intensify, under a third and a fifth; new ones turn up with each seeing, and it is a long time before the whole work wears thin or takes on the staleness of a classic indulged too often.

Very belatedly I want to say that "The Watch on the Rhine" seemed much better on the screen than it did, almost identically, on the stage—though I still wished Henry James might have written it; and that I join with anyone whose opinion of Paul Lukas's performance is superlative. Also that a simple-hearted friendliness generated between audience and screen at "This Is the Army" made that film happy to see even when it was otherwise boring; though I am among an apparent minority which feels that Warner Brothers' cuddly-reverential treatment of President Roosevelt—in "Mission to Moscow," "This Is the Army," and the forthcoming "Princess O'Rourke"—is subject to charges certainly of indecent exposure and, quite possibly, of alienation of affections. JAMES AGEE

MUSIC

STRAVINSKY'S elegantly named "Dumbarton Oaks" Concerto (1937-38) for chamber orchestra, which has not yet been performed in New York despite the demands for it (all by Virgil Thomson), was given at one of the summer concerts by members of the Boston Symphony; and I have had a report on it from my Boston correspondent. The concert began with music by Couperin, Purcell, Gibbons, and Handel for viols—the descant and treble viols, the viola da gamba, the violone—played by the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments; and after this "the second half of the program seemed rather a shame. The magical spell woven by the ancient instruments—to which the audience reacted so keenly it scarcely dared breathe—was utterly dispelled. The Stravinsky is a horrid little thing," of which the first movement "seemed like a travesty of the Third Brandenburg Concerto," the second "repeated a trite little figure around the circle of instruments," and the last was "a bad imitation of his first style on a reduced scale, with elements of what he seems to think a concerto grosso style . . . thrown in. The thing is wholly lacking in feeling for style, in unity of mood or expression, in charm, and almost wholly lacking in melody; it is not even good applied scholarship: I don't think Stravinsky has the foggiest notion what a concerto grosso is . . . I think it is without doubt the worst piece of music to have any pretensions that I have heard in several years."

After this came a suite from Paul Bowles's "The Wind Remains," which was given last spring at one of those Serenades at the Museum of Modern Art that should have been called "A la recherche de Paris perdu." Bowles's music, observes my correspondent, is "written in a nondescript modern idiom that is not too disagreeable"; and he finds its most interesting feature to be its scoring: the usual woodwinds in pairs, one each of the usual brass, "one harp, one violin, one double bass, quite a large set of machines for making noises (these took part in the Stravinsky too), and one electrically amplified violin used only for comic effects—which is just as well: the darn thing has a tone that would make cats leap from back fences and go hasting away."

The concert ended with Brahms's Serenade No. 2 for winds and low strings, which is young Brahms in the process of virtuous self-improvement—that is, taking only a modest first step in writing for orchestra, by writing only a Serenade for only part of the orchestra—and being so dull in the process that the work is enough to make me leap from the concert hall and go hasting away. My correspondent too remarks that he is "not particularly interested in hearing Brahms learn how to orchestrate for wind instruments. . . . They did not have enough violas when they played this Serenade—the first real error of balance in this series of concerts—but the main interest is in the wind writing. There is too much of it, it is too thick, and it cloys." Not, he adds, that the entire effect of the Serenade is produced by the orchestration alone: "the music is too thick, too gooey, and the orchestration just makes it worse: the constant use of the winds, the constant use of mellow combinations (clarinets, bassoons, and horns, for example), and the doublings are what turn the trick."

The conductor of the second half of the concert was Leonard Bernstein, whom Rodzinski has just appointed assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. "Mr. Bernstein belongs to the dynamic school of conductors which does not lower itself to beating time. His is the school of the balled fist, the quiver of the upraised arm at the climax; but he can be properly lyrical at the correct moment. The orchestra seemed to tolerate him, and the winds continued to play as they have during the earlier concerts."

This humorous description of the relation between the young conductor and the experienced members of the Boston Symphony embodies an important truth which was stated seriously by someone who was talking to me about the Petrillo controversy. Having described one device for collecting money to compensate the musicians who had been thrown out of work by the machine, he said: "Some of this money could be used to reemploy some of the men—to create symphony orchestras in smaller cities; and these orchestras would provide the necessary experience for American conductors. The great European conductors did not learn their trade by conducting the great European orchestras; Toscanini learned it by working often, in some cities, with orchestras of semi-amateurs, semi-professionals—men who earned their living in some other way and played an instrument when there was an occasion to do so. Put a young American conductor in front of the N. B. C. Symphony, and it will play; but it would play if he were not there. He cannot teach it anything, and he cannot learn anything from it."

Beecham confirms this in his autobiography "A Mingled Chime," which is another of the books I hope to discuss soon. After describing his early experience of conducting the singers, the toneless chorus, and the incompetent orchestra of a touring opera company for a couple of months, he writes: "I have always considered that this rather uninviting initiation into professional life was of the greatest service to me. To be pitch-forked into such a chaotic welter and be forced to make something tangible and workable out of it is incomparably more useful to the young conductor than to take command of a highly trained body of experts, accustomed through long routine to fulfill their respective tasks with ease and celerity. Indeed the youthful or comparatively youthful musician should not be allowed, except on some rare occasion, to conduct an orchestra of the front rank at all, and if he does I am not sure which of the two parties to the transaction suffers the more from it. It is almost impossible that he can teach it anything, and it is more than likely that its accustomed discipline will speedily relax under a leadership that has neither experience nor authority. Further, the unhappy young man will have to decide between the alternatives of assuming an air of omniscience as comical as a child preaching in a cathedral pulpit, or an abnegation of any effort at real direction; either of which will be equally acceptable to that collection of humorists who make up the personnel of nearly every first-class orchestra of the world."

Letters to the Editors

The Jews of Europe

Dear Sirs: Let me express my hearty appreciation of the editorial in The Nation of September 11 dealing with the American Jewish conference and its resolution on Palestine.

It must not be thought that we Zionists believe that "Jews will not be able to live in Europe after a war fought and won in the name of democracy and racial equality." Any sensible Jew knows that the restoration of civil and human rights to the Jewish communities of Europe is a cardinal objective of every group seeking the amelioration of the Jewish lot. A mass migration, however, from Eastern Europe to Palestine would be of permanent benefit to the Jewish people. The region between Germany and Russia is the perennial battleground of the Teuton and the Slav; it is the cockpit of the world. The sooner Jews distribute themselves elsewhere the better it will be. This does not imply that those who remain in Poland and adjacent territories should not be granted the hard-won rights of a generation ago. Jews will continue to live in Europe, and they must be unmolested. At the same time, however, the upbuilding of Palestine, as your editorial indicates, will bring to Jews who can escape from Europe opportunities which otherwise would be denied them in their lifetime.

The immediate and primary duty of Jews and non-Jews is to furnish asylum for those who survive the Nazi horror. Theoretical considerations are a luxury which should be postponed. When victory over the Axis comes, Jews should be able to take up their life anew in the lands of their birth or adoption. But if multitudes wish to begin again in the Land of Israel, why should they be denied this privilege?

In Defense of the FBI

Dear Sirs: In your well-documented articles on the Washington Gestapo your properly anonymous author says (in your issue of July 24) that J. Edgar Hoover is "joined in the Department of Justice by such men as L. M. C. Smith, chief of the War Policies Unit," who is made to appear as "suffering from a 'radical' psychosis."

Intimate contact with the unit since its creation refutes any such conclusion. It has kept a level-headed course in dealing with the thousands of complaints of subversive activities. The record shows no prosecutions whatever of radicals initiated by the unit and only two instances of action recommended to the Post Office Department against radical papers—the Trotskyite Militant and the organ of a splinter group in Chicago. On the contrary, the unit under Mr. Smith's direction has been almost exclusively concerned with pro-Axis propaganda. It has no relation whatever to the witch-hunt against federal employees.

You may be sure that the Civil Liberties Union would bear no such witness to a prosecuting agency of the government unless the facts amply warranted it.

Another Witness

Dear Sirs: I have been much concerned with the anonymous articles which you ran entitled Washington Gestapo. For close to ten years I have kept a rather close watch on the FBI. I started my scrutiny of FBI behavior because of rumors and gossip and suspicions that basic civil liberties were being violated. I am writing to you to let you know that I have yet to hear of a single proved case of violation of the basic civil liberties. This is close to a miracle. Out of 100,000 cases there has been only one complaint of an abuse that, in the city of New York at least, we take for granted, namely, holding people incomunicado, third degree, etc. The position of Edgar Hoover and his men with respect to wire-tapping sets a new high standard for the constabulary of the United States.

I am writing because I feel that a great injustice has been done by the author of Washington Gestapo and in consequence by The Nation. As a specific example of what I have in mind, I refer to your issue of July 17, where there was listed a half-dozen or so "snooper" questions. I think it was evil of the author to list such a series of questions relating to an applicant's religious and trade-union attitudes in the form of an indiscriminate block-booking indictment. In effect your secret correspondent declared that the Civil Service Commission and the FBI asked a list of such questions. This is about as unfair as if someone wrote an article and said that The Nation and Henry Luce "took the following positions," and then failed to specify which positions were taken by you and which by Henry Luce.

You say that The Nation checked this information. I wonder, in all fairness, whether it is not your duty to say which of the questions were attributed, even by your anonymous correspondent, to the FBI and which to the Civil Service Commission.

The FBI is not perfect, nor is The Nation. But in every case in which I have brought a complaint involving matters of this nature to Edgar Hoover, the complainant and myself have felt that we received sympathetic understanding and proper administrative treatment of the situation.

I have been a pest to the FBI in picking them up on every possible complaint which has come to me. In the course of time these have run to a considerable number. I believe its protection of personal liberty is one of the outstanding contributions to the cause of civil liberties in my time in the United States.

Setting Things Straight

Dear Sirs: Mr. Rosenberger has me wrong. In my reference to "the shallow ponds of the American provinces" no generalization was intended; only allusion to the fact that, if same existed, Mr. Moult would be apt to find them good fishing. Nor should I like any reader to infer that I think all magazines published outside New York are provincial, or that all magazines published in New York are not. But I do think some of the sources from which Mr. Moult took his material are pretty fishy. Also shallow. As to the magazine Fantasy (Pittsburgh), Mr. Rosenberger might have added in praise that its interest in American poetry did not confine itself to the Northern Hemisphere.

Moreover, I might mention the fact that I know that not only good poetry but also good book-reviewing appears in what New Yorkers, parochially maybe, think of as out-of-town periodicals and journals.

That was a beautiful howler Mr. Gustafson caught me in, about my not knowing Raymond Knister had been dead eleven years. The little harm this boner has done to my vanity will be soothed if anybody will take the trouble to look up something about Mr. Knister's life and work; relevant information may be found in the anthology of Canadian poetry edited by Mr. Gustafson and published last year, I believe, by the Penguin Press.

It is cheering to know that people do read reviews about books of poetry.

Education for Living

Dear Sirs: As a temporary guest in your country I should like to compliment your correspondent Reinhold Niebuhr on the fairly objective view he presents of the education of H. M. forces in Great Britain.

I use the phrase "fairly objective" because his article does less than justice to the Workers' Educational Association. As general secretary of this organization and as the person who drafted and initiated the original scheme for army education, I feel bound to call attention to an omission which is probably not Dr. Niebuhr's fault. While he had first-hand experience of the work which was being done, he probably received his information about the contributing bodies from one of the many new entrants to this service who know little about the foundations which were laid by the W. E. A. and the traditions upon which the adult-education movement in Great Britain has been built.

I have just finished a tour of the United States from New York to the West Coast, and everywhere I have found immense enthusiasm for the kind of movement we have in Great Britain, a movement in which labor and learning —the trade unions and the universities—cooperate. The former organize the demand for the kind of education which will provide a background of citizenship in a democracy, and the latter, in conjunction with the W. E. A., supply this demand. Our aim is an education for living, not for earning a living; an education in those sociological and cultural subjects about which labor must acquire knowledge if it is to produce leaders and followers who have any sense of social responsibility.

The connection between this movement and education in the army is that the men who give the W. E. A. classes gave and still give their services to the army-education scheme. In addition, the army uses some university teachers, but without the assistance of the tutors employed by the W. E. A. the army scheme could never have been started. What is more, it was these tutors, with their long years of experience in maintaining freedom of discussion in the classroom, who won the struggle against those who were not too eager to encourage the soldier to think for himself. In fact, the greatest achievement of the army-education scheme is not by any means the 30,000 lectures which are being given each month. It is rather the fact that the scheme has won over the service departments to the need for providing compulsory citizenship education as part of army training. Three hours each week are set aside for this purpose, the army authorities issuing study pamphlets dealing with political, economic, and social problems, and the universities and the W. E. A. providing assistance in finding study-group leaders.

What the W. E. A. has done for the army it has done also for civil-defense workers, the women's land army, and munition hostels. For these sections of the community hundreds of classes were being provided by the W. E. A. when I left Great Britain in June.

Finally, may I mention that it was the W. E. A. which first suggested and later organized and administered a postal-correspondence-course scheme in cooperation with the War Office and various colleges, including Ruskin College, Oxford. Thousands of correspondence courses are being supplied each year.

I think Dr. Niebuhr did not mention that the regional committees for army education offer the same facilities to the American forces in Britain. Unfortunately there has not been any appreciable response, and I wonder to what extent this is due to the fact that there has been no strongly organized, coordinated, voluntary adult-education movement in the American labor movement. I do not mean that there is no adult education in the United States, but what there is seems to lack a definite social purpose, which perhaps accounts for the popularity of vocational subjects in contrast to the humanities.

Nevertheless, I am sure from my experience of the last few weeks that there is in the States a profound recognition of the importance of education for social service and responsibility and that it needs only to be canalized in some way.

I Remember Spain

Dear Sirs: I want to congratulate you on your article Rehearsal in Sicily which appeared in the July 17 issue of The Nation. The political considerations you state in this article are very wise and opportune. I too think that these truths that you point out should be self-evident.

Thinking of the present political problems of the world and of those problems that will arise when the war is over, I remember Spain. The other night I saw at the post theater a short feature on Spain and Franco's regime. The film depicted Franco's militaristic government, its political prisons, and other anachronisms. The scenes I saw made me angry. A United Nations victory in this war will never be complete so long as Franco and his fascist government stay in power.

I am a Puerto Rican of Spanish descent, and I am a member of the armed forces of the United States. I know that I am on the right side in this war. I hope very much that we win the right peace.

The Shape of Things

IT IS MR. CHURCHILL'S "CONFIDENT HOPE" that before the end of the year a meeting will take place between Stalin, President Roosevelt, and himself. Such a meeting has long been highly desirable but now the need for it is becoming desperately urgent. With the Red Army steadily pushing the Nazis back against the old Polish frontier, with the Anglo-American forces reaching toward the Alpine wall of Hitler's fortress, and with the Balkans seething in expectation of deliverance, discussions of the political principles which will guide the peace can no longer be postponed. Before the "big three" get together, however, there is to be a preliminary conference "at the foreign-office level" when, to quote Mr. Churchill, "the whole ground will be surveyed and matters carried forward to agreement wherever possible." Since Mr. Anthony Eden is to represent Britain and Mr. Molotov the U.S.S.R., it would seem that Mr. Hull is the only man carrying sufficient political weight to speak for this country. No subordinate could take to the discussions the same authority; he would have to refer back constantly to Washington and so hamper the proceedings if not destroy their utility altogether. Yet, according to a Washington dispatch to the New York Times of September 26, Mr. Hull is still hesitant about undertaking this duty. This seems almost incredible. The Secretary of State has insisted that, under the President, he carries sole responsibility for the foreign relations of the country and he has jealously chased away all poachers on his territory. How then can he even consider turning over such an assignment—perhaps the most fateful of his whole career—to some underling? Responsibility cuts both ways and if those who claim it are unwilling to exercise it, they forfeit their authority.

IT MUST BE A MEASURE OF HOW BADLY things have been going for liberals in Washington that the appointment of Edward R. Stettinius as Under Secretary of State comes as something of a relief. It was illogical to have expected the President to name to the post anyone distinguished for militant convictions about the political nature of the war. After all, it was for precisely such inclinations, however mild, that Sumner Welles was forced out. The far-fetched official explanation, revolving about the health of Mr. Welles's wife, only confirms the general understanding that the issue was political, particularly since neither the text of the resignation nor that of the acceptance was made public. In the circumstances the choice might easily have been worse. The former chairman of the United States Steel Corporation belongs to that select group of big business men who understand the changing nature of the times. He has handled the enormously difficult administration of lend-lease efficiently and without substantial complaint. Nothing is known of his diplomatic skill or of his fundamental approach to foreign policy. He is entitled to a fair chance, and until he reveals himself in action we can at least be grateful that the appointment did not go to someone like Breckenridge Long. As for Sumner Welles, the formula employed in explaining his resignation seems, unfortunately, to rule out the prospect of another post for him in the near future. Chalk up a victory for Cordell Hull and a loss for the Administration.

UNTIL THIS WEEK PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S most vitriolic opponents have been constrained to admit that he knows how to wage war even if his domestic policies are an abomination in the sight of the Lord. This concession, proving deadly to their political hopes of ousting the President next year, is apparently to be discarded in favor of a campaign to undermine confidence in the Administration on all counts. In our belief this is the essence of the trumped-up excitement over General Marshall. No other explanation makes sense. Some one gets wind of the President's intention to give the army's Chief of Staff another post, the nature of which is undisclosed. Immediately tongues are set wagging to the effect that the General is to be "kicked upstairs," that he has displeased the British, that he is the victim of a conspiracy between Roosevelt and Churchill "because he stands up for American rights," and because he favors an early cross-Channel invasion of Western Europe. All of which is as illogical as it is mischievous. As Chief of Staff Marshall has already exercised the two great functions of his office: he has built an American army from scratch and, perhaps more than any other one man, he has molded the grand strategy of the war for the United Nations. The spotlight now shifts from the planning headquarters to the battlefield. Is it likely that if Churchill wished to see Marshall shelved he would conspire to put him in command of all the Allied forces at the point where the General's own strategy is soon to be exercised? And isn't it strange that the McCormick-Patterson press and isolationists in Congress should shriek hysterically over Marshall's "elimination" when they themselves have noisily opposed the second-front position for which they say he is being ousted?

THE MARSHALL EPISODE IS OF A PIECE WITH the repeated efforts to make political use of General Douglas MacArthur. Unfortunately the General, whose contributions on the battlefield entitle him to the highest regard, has not been well advised in his public pronouncements. His most recent remarks seem at once the coyest, the most cryptic, and the least called for. On the dubious basis of press clippings, probably from papers given to political ax-grinding even in their military analyses, the General has seen fit to discuss the contention that he is being given a role in the war subsidiary to that of Lord Louis Mountbatten, recently appointed to the command of Allied forces in Southeast Asia. He has also thought it proper to dissociate himself from the strategy of "island-hopping," which for good or for ill has so far prevailed in the Pacific theater, and to set forth his own idea of what would be a better strategy. We are certainly not equipped to pass judgment on the General's views, though we think he makes an impressive and convincing case. But since when do generals on active duty appeal to public opinion to pass upon strategies determined from above? MacArthur's assurance that he will "play manfully" the role assigned him, "however subordinate," hardly softens the impact of his attack. On the contrary, it feeds ammunition to those who have been sedulously building him up as a martyr to the jealousy and political fears of the President. Exploiting military heroism for partisan ends is a time-worn, if objectionable, tradition of American politics. But it has little to show in the way of success—at least in wartime. MacArthur-for-President boosters are respectfully referred to the Lincoln-McClellan campaign of 1864.

SENATOR WHEELER'S HOPE OF USING THE prestige of Bernard Baruch to offset the testimony of the top-flight military and naval leaders regarding the necessity for drafting fathers met with well-deserved failure. Baruch refused to be trapped by Wheeler's cross-questioning, and blurted out that "if George Marshall says that a specified force is needed by our strategic planning, give him what he wants. If you don't do that, then throw him out. No cheese-paring." This outburst seems to have killed the last possibility that Congress might disrupt the administration's military and man-power policies by passing the Wheeler resolution to defer all pre-Pearl Harbor fathers until the end of the year. There is still danger, however, that some compromise measure might be forced through to save the face of the group that has been fighting the drafting of fathers. One such proposal is that the induction of fathers be deferred until November 1 to permit Congress to make a thorough exploration of the man-power question. Senator Taft's suggestion that all fathers under 30 years of age be taken before those over 30 are conscripted has more chance of adoption. Although the Army is not likely to object to a plan that would give it younger men, the Taft program would be acceptable as man-power policy only if the nondeferrables and men over 30 in nonessential industry were drafted ahead of those under 30 who are engaged in essential war work.

THE CRUDE EQUATION OF LIVES TO MONEY which has characterized the promotion of the third war loan would surely convince a man from Mars that the United States is even more crass and materialistic than its severest critics have made it out to be. By making the "sacrifice" of buying a bond, runs the line, you hasten the end of the war, save lives—and get your money back with interest. The drive might at least have been used to teach the public the lessons it needs to learn about inflation—which the loan is designed to prevent. But that lesson was barely mentioned. If there was ever a time when the average American should realize that winning the war and the peace depends upon the wakeful use of his heart and his brain, it is now. But the bond-drive slogans might easily have convinced him that even the end of a war can be bought with money; and they have pandered shamelessly to the human but not exactly admirable desire to get something for nothing that works while you sleep. The campaign was probably run according to the best advertising and promotion techniques; and needless to say we hope it is a tremendous success. But it has been a pretty sorry spectacle, considering that its backdrop is a world at war.

WE HOPE THAT ALL THREE BRANCHES OF the labor movement as well as liberal organizations the country over will join in the fight begun by the arrest in Texas of R. J. Thomas, president of the United Automobile Workers and vice-president of the C. I. O. Thomas and three other C. I. O. workers were taken into custody after an oil workers' rally in Pelly, Texas, and charged with violating a new state law which requires persons seeking members for a union to obtain a license from the state. Victor Riesel, in The Nation of July 31, told the story of this legislation and of the sinister Christian American Association which sponsored it. Colorado, Kansas, Alabama, and Florida have similar laws, and Thomas declared, "We're not going to let any selfish interests here in America—in Texas or anywhere else—sneak behind our back and put on the people of this country the same kind of restrictions and bans that Hitler put on the German people." The Texas law, which has even aroused the ordinarily slow and cautious William Green to action, limits picketing, opens union accounts to any deputy sheriff, and gives the state wide control over the internal affairs of unions. The Christian American Association has already had too much success. The time to fight laws and organizations of this kind is now. It will be harder to defeat them during a period of post-war reaction.

Churchill and Italy

IN HIS wide-ranging survey of the war, Prime Minister Churchill treated the House of Commons and the world to a magnificent piece of reporting. Yet despite the wealth of detail it offered, despite the brilliance of its descriptive passages, despite the appearance of candor almost amounting to indiscretion, the speech did little to allay the disquiet felt in liberal circles about the political conduct of the war. Particularly unsatisfactory were its references to Italy, and what Mr. Churchill had to say on this matter was rendered all the more unpalatable by his reminder that he commanded a majority of the House and intended to use it, if necessary, to silence his critics.

The Prime Minister's speech showed that he either misunderstood or wilfully ignored the nature of much of that criticism. We do not, for instance, object to the acceptance of Italy's surrender from the Badoglio government. There are, in fact, definite advantages in having affixed to the armistice agreement—the symbol of the bankruptcy not merely of a regime but of an idea—the signature of a man long closely identified with fascism. But does the unconditional surrender of Badoglio and the King purge them of their crimes? Is it really necessary, as Mr. Churchill implied, to treat them now as the only true representatives of the Italian nation? Is it wise to underwrite a regime whose only claim to authority derives from its threadbare rags of "legitimacy"?

Yet this is the policy which Mr. Churchill outlined, and it is, presumably, the policy agreed upon by him and President Roosevelt in their conferences at Quebec and Washington. True, the British Prime Minister did not altogether exclude the liberal and labor elements in Italy from consideration. He was even good enough to offer them some advice. "It is necessary," he said, "that all the surviving forces in Italy's national life should be rallied together around their government and that the King and Marshal Badoglio should be supported by whatever liberal and left-wing elements are capable of making headway aganst the Nazi Quisling gang." The suggestion, apparently, is that the people who have fought fascism for years, the men who forced Badoglio to make peace, should now surrender unconditionally to the turncoats of the eleventh hour. But there is no hint of Allied pressure on Victor Emmanuel to form a truly national government and thus give the liberal forces in the country a share in making policy.

Nor, it seems, are we insisting on the readmission to Italy of the anti-fascist exiles who could do much to rally the Italian masses to the cause of democracy. Mr. Churchill said that he could not speak for Count Sforza when asked if the Allied governments would permit this distinguished exile to return to Italy. According to Pertinax, writing in the New York Times, Count Sforza was expecting to go to Italy shortly but was prevented by an edict of the British Foreign Office. This makes us wonder if a promise has been made to the Badoglio government to keep out anyone it considers "undesirable." We can imagine how gratefully it would respond to such a promise, for with exiled leaders of the opposition barred and the domestic leaders being slaughtered in the industrial cities of the north, its chances of survival would be distinctly improved.

Mr. Churchill described the Anglo-American forces in Italy as "armies of liberation," and in this case our natural allies inside the country are, as we have pointed out many times, the workers and others who have long fought against fascism and suffered under its tyrannies. They are, in fact, the spearhead of resistance within the German lines which is making the Nazi task of organizing defensive positions increasingly difficult. There is not much evidence that the higher civil officials and military commanders are responding with any fervor to orders to fight the Germans. At best Badoglio and the King command the loyalty only of time-servers who after licking Mussolini's boots for years turned against him to save their skins and fortunes. We cannot expect such men to take risks to rid Italy of Germans. According to Swiss dispatches, German victories in Milan, Turin, Genoa, and Bologna proved easy, thanks to "generals who were unwilling to resist, commanders who sabotaged, and high officials who betrayed."

Formal Italian resistance proved feeble, but it has been succeeded by guerrilla warfare on a scale which is causing serious embarrassment to the Nazis and rendering substantial aid to our forces. It is improbable that this uprising owes anything to Badoglio's appeals; it is rather the spontaneous action of the workers and lower ranks of the army, who are seizing a long-awaited opportunity to finish fascism once and for all. And they don't make fine distinctions between those men who still cling to Mussolini and those who ceased to follow him on July 25. These fighters—trade unionists, radicals, republicans—are our true allies in Italy. Have we no message for them save cold instructions to rally to a feeble monarch and a discredited general whom they rightly regard as traitors?

The Fulbright Resolution

PASSAGE of the Fulbright resolution in the House of Representatives by a vote of more than twelve to one is highly encouraging as an indication that the American people have definitely turned their back on isolationism. In the years immediately preceding Pearl Harbor the House was consistently isolationist on most major issues—far more so, we believe, than the public as a whole. The House passed the Spanish embargo with but one dissenting vote; it adopted a Neutrality Act which prevented the government from promising aid to the potential victims of Axis aggression; and, on the eve of the outbreak of the war, it pinned a cash-and-carry amendment to the act, which said, in effect, that further Axis attacks were of no concern to the United States.

The Fulbright resolution represents a complete repudiation of those policies. It places the House on record as favoring overwhelmingly the participation of the United States in "appropriate international machinery with power adequate to establish and maintain a just and lasting peace." This involves a recognition of our international responsibilities that should strengthen the President's hand immeasurably in the United Nations negotiations that lie ahead. The chief question now is the Senate's attitude on this crucial question. After all, it is the Senate and not the House that is invested by the Constitution with the power to ratify treaties. At present writing the Senate seems inclined to shelve the Fulbright resolution in favor of a formula of its own. Its motive for this appears to be nothing better than chagrin over the fact that the House has stolen a march on it. But the Senate's jealousy, however unworthy as a motive, may have a beneficial effect if it leads to an amalgamation of the principles of the Ball-Burton-Hill-Hatch resolution with those of the Fulbright measure.

There is no conflict in spirit between the two. But the resolution introduced last spring by the two Republican and two Democratic Senators has a distinct advantage over the Fulbright resolution in that it contains a specific program of action. It proposes that the United States take the initiative in forming an organization of the United Nations (1) to prosecute the war more effectively; (2) to set up temporary administrations for the liberated territories; (3) to take charge of relief and rehabilitation activities in these territories; (4) to establish machinery for the peaceful settlement of international disputes; and (5) to create a United Nations military force to prevent future aggression. Some of these steps, notably in the field of relief and rehabilitation, are already under way. The fourth is implied in the Fulbright resolution. But crucial in any scheme for post-war organization is recognition of the necessity for an international military force to check aggression. It was largely because of hesitancy over the military sanctions in Article XVI that the United States repudiated the League of Nations after the last war. Consequently, a clear statement pledging American cooperation in military efforts to preserve the peace would do more than anything else to reassure the world. The Senate is the only body that can speak authoritatively on this question. Unfortunately, while prompt action would be of immeasurable value in the tri-partite conversations soon to begin in Moscow, Administration leaders, fearing noisy opposition from the isolationists, seem bent on postponing debate.

Balkan Possibilities

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

THE invasion of the Balkans may take place before this commentary appears, or it may be deferred until after further developments in Italy. From the point of view of the political problems which will face the Allies when they land there, the date is a matter of indifference. Now or later the crux of the Balkan situation lies in the amount of active support which the Allied cause can obtain from the Balkan population.

There may be some circles in which the feelings and opinions of the Balkan people are of no great importance. The only consideration for them is that the Allies succeed in marshaling sufficient shipping, men, and air superiority to expedite their military operations. This habit of thinking simply in terms of war and not in terms of a struggle for democracy would make things wonderfully easy were the territories which must be invaded occupied only by enemy armies. Unfortunately, the people are also involved, with their aspirations, their experiences, and their hate of fascism.

There are two ways in which the United Nations can deal with the people: they can leave to the German generals, as in the case of Milan and Turin, the job of exterminating the democratic nuisance, or they can accept the people, from the beginning, as their real and most effective allies. We suggest that now, in the concrete case of Yugoslavia, the People's Liberation Movement be recognized and dealt with as the actual expression of Yugoslav democracy.

When they enter the Balkans, the Allies will find the people armed with more than love of freedom. Without waiting for the arrival of the liberators, they armed themselves with guns and took up the fight against the Nazis. Elsewhere in this issue we publish an article by Bogdan Raditsa dealing mainly with Yugoslavia. His presentation of the problem is particularly timely because in recent days some obvious attempts have been made to confuse the news coming from that country, chiefly through the Yugoslav Democratic News Agency. The purpose is clear: to give entire credit to General Draja Mihailovich for all action against the Germans and to minimize the efforts of the Partisans. The same people who are transforming Marshal Badoglio into one of the great benefactors of the United Nations would make of the Yugoslav general a legendary hero of the entire Balkan region.

There are even those who dream of Mihailovich emerging from the war with enough prestige to head a Balkan army which would prove to Russia that it could not dominate Eastern Europe. A fantastic hope! The attraction which Russia has always exercised on the Balkan people has been immeasurably strengthened by the glorious Soviet military victories. The Balkan countries can constitute a most useful link between Russia and the rest of Europe. But if anyone hopes to use them as a cordon sanitaire around the Soviet Union, or to force them to choose between Russia and the West, they will move even more readily toward Russia. Moreover, this movement in favor of Mihailovich is directed by elements which can only discredit him utterly in the eyes of the Yugoslav people and ruin whatever value he might have had as a military leader.

One of the chief arguments cited against accepting the cooperation of the People's Army of Liberation—even for the coming Allied landing operations—is that it is not a part of the regular Yugoslav army, recognized by the government-in-exile. This raises the question to what extent the government-in-exile is recognized by the Yugoslav people. All through the various ministerial crises, which he was obliged to settle far away from his country, the young king never succeeded in forming a Cabinet that could be considered representative. The four governments preceding the present one—that of General Simovich, the two headed by Professor Slobodon Jovanovich, and that of Milos Trifunovich—included prominent political leaders, but they were unable to agree on the national structure of Yugoslavia. While inside the country, according to all available reports, the idea of a democratic federal Yugoslavia is growing stronger and stronger, in these governments a continuous struggle has been waged between those who favor a centralized state under Serbian hegemony and those supporting a federation of autonomous states.

The latest government was born of the impasse over this issue. Headed by an intelligent and subtle diplomat, Dr. Bozhidar Purich, whom I remember well from meetings of the League of Nations, this government offers only a "diplomatic solution." It does not represent the present mood of the Yugoslav people. Its worst feature is its domination by General Zukovich and Ambassador Bogoljub Jevich—two of the most unpopular figures in Yugoslav political life, participants in the dictatorship that ruled Yugoslavia after 1929, who dream of becoming again the strong men to bring "order" out of the post-war "chaos."

Official relations with the government in London should not be permitted to cut the Allied powers off from the most reliable forces of resistance in Yugoslavia. Long ago Britain and the United States should have insisted on a democratic Yugoslav regime and complete reconciliation with the Partisans. This should have been made a condition precedent to any material support. They failed to do so, and as a consequence are now confronted with a situation which offers no further opportunity for diplomatic maneuver. Even if they maintain formal relations with the government-in-exile they must with all possible speed establish full political collaboration with the People's Movement of Liberation and recognize it as the only anti-fascist force in Yugoslavia.

The recognition of this movement would not only give the Allies important military support in the invasion of the Balkans but open the way for a solution of some of the difficult problems that will arise after the war. The question of Italian-Yugoslav relations, so grave in the past, can be solved only by genuinely democratic elements among the two peoples. Already the Yugoslav Partisans have won over the Italian forces on their soil and induced them to join the fight against the Germans. This is an indication of what an intelligent democratic conception of political warfare could achieve in preparing the ground for a free and peaceful Europe.

Straw Vote on the Future

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, September 24

THE debate on the Fulbright resolution and the resolution itself were made to order for a certain kind of bright comment. The House of Representatives has only a vague and indirect power over the conduct of foreign affairs, and in that sense the balloting was—as one opponent of the resolution protested—merely a "straw vote." Most of the House members were bored and uninterested, and the leaders had difficulty in keeping the discussion going for the allotted four hours. Many of those who did speak said their piece for the Congressional Record and left without bothering to hear what their colleagues had to say. Others contented themselves with an "extension of remarks."

The general indifference was so great as to elicit a scolding from Representative Eaton of New Jersey, ranking Republican member of the Foreign Affairs Committee. The angry outburst was blue-penciled out of the Congressional Record. "What are we fussing about here," Eaton asked, "when we haven't enough interest to fill these seats, and when we do fill them we sit around and gab and gossip like a bunch of old women at a sewing party?" "If we haven't enough interest," he added, "we should get out and give room for some decent people who have a sense of responsibility about these issues. . . ." It may be interesting to recall the discreet elision of this rebuke from the Record next time Congress complains that the OWI is "coddling" the people by failing to give them the brutal truth.

The Fulbright resolution is vague. Mundt of South Dakota, perhaps the most strongly isolationist member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, voted for it and said he couldn't see how anyone could vote against it: "Within its boundaries is haven enough for the most ultra-isolationist in the country as well as the most 'super-dooper' internationalist." The original resolution merely said that Congress favored "the creation of appropriate international machinery with power adequate to establish and to maintain a just and lasting peace among the nations of the world," and "participation by the United States therein." "Through its constitutional processes" was a last-minute amendment added by the Foreign Affairs Committee just before it unanimously reported the resolution to the House.

Great value was placed on this phrase by the Republican isolationists, who have never been more Talmudic, if not downright cabalistic. They have been attributing a mysterious potency to words like "sovereignty" and "constitutionalism." Bloom of New York objected that the addition was unnecessary because Congress could hardly authorize any other than constitutional processes. But those in the House, like those at Mackinac, who have no intention of supporting a genuine international order, obviously expect the words to provide them with the necessary loopholes. Articles X and XVI of the League Covenant were similarly attacked as an infringement of "sovereignty" and a violation of the constitutional prerogative of Congress to declare war.

It is the memory of the League debate and of what preceded it that makes so many people here cynical about the Fulbright resolution. They remember Taft's League to Enforce Peace in 1915 and Lodge's indorsement of it in 1916. The most enthusiastic felt the chill when Madden of Indiana read from Jim Watson's "As I Knew Them" the account of a secret meeting with Lodge on the strategy of defeating the Covenant. "It appears to me," Watson told Lodge, "that 80 per cent of the people are for it." "Ah, my dear James," was Lodge's reply, "I do not propose to beat it by direct frontal attack but by the indirect method of reservations." Those reservations also revolved around the concepts of constitutionalism and sovereignty.

This background is discouraging, and much of the debate was on a depressingly low and chauvinistic plane, notably the contributions of the Illinois delegation. Day warned against "a veritable mob of foreigners demanding the things which we Americans call our own," and Miss Sumner thought it "the most dangerous bill ever presented to an American Congress." But there were other voices, too, voices which I think more truly reflect the thinking of the American people. Wadsworth of New York, Eaton of New Jersey, Vorys of Ohio, Judd of Minnesota, Voorhis of California, Johnson of Oklahoma, and Luther Johnson of Texas, members of both parties, men of both the right and the left, were united in a desire to find some way to prevent another world war. Johnson of Oklahoma said it very simply, "I submit in all seriousness that peace—a lasting peace—next to winning the war decisively and getting our boys home as soon as possible, is closer to the hearts of our people than any other problem."

Let those who dismiss the Fulbright resolution as meaningless think how disastrous its defeat would have been. True, the victory is a precarious one, despite the unanimous vote of the committee and the 360 to 29 vote in the House. The Republicans ran out last time on expressions much like the Fulbright resolution. But the vote reflected the politicians' recognition of the public's deep desire for a system to enforce peace, and whether the resolution turns out to be another disillusioning fraud or the first tentative step toward a new order depends on whether or not the country keeps the heat on Washington.

There is danger that the whole issue will be shelved in the Senate for some time. The Senate, which does have a great constitutional role to play in the formulation of our foreign policy, looks down upon the Fulbright resolution. Senator Connally, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, seems to be ready to put aside not only the House resolution but the Senate's own B2H2 resolution, which is more explicit. In part this reflects his ambition to bring forward proposals of his own; in part Administration caution. It is feared that under the Senate's rules allowing unlimited debate many harsh things might be said of our Russian and British allies just as a badly needed three-power meeting was in the offing. Better than postponement would be popular pressure to force favorable Senate action by a large majority, despite the utterances of our new bitter-enders. That depends on you and me.

Financing America's Future

II. DEMOBILIZATION DAY—A PREVIEW[1]

BY STUART CHASE

THE bells will ring on Demobilization Day. Everybody will have a shout in his heart. But the American economic system will be a wonder to behold. It promises to look like something from the back of the moon. Any prophet who might have been bold enough to picture it in 1940 would have been run in by the police as mentally unbalanced. I remember the blank, terrified stares of a group of business men when I ventured to say in 1940 that the national debt would presently go over one hundred billion dollars if the United States entered the war.

The National Debt. I was a rank conservative. When the war ends, the national debt will stand at two to three hundred billion dollars, according to bank presidents, chiefs of great insurance companies, and other financial experts. What is even more astonishing, they seem to take the idea in their stride. To quote Emil Schram,[2] president of the New York Stock Exchange: "I am not appalled at the prospect. The American system is equal to any burden which it may have to carry." Myron F. Converse, former head of the National Association of Mutual Savings Banks, says that a public debt of $250 billion will not ruin the country if the national income remains above $100 billion, and affirms that we are going to hold it there under our present "managed money" methods.[3]

The National Income. British experience shows that the debt burden can be serviced without too much difficulty if it does not exceed twice the annual national income. In 1943 the national income in the United States will certainly reach $125 billion. By D-Day it may be running at the rate of $150 billion at 1943 prices. If prices have moved up by then, and they probably will move up farther in a creeping inflation, the figure will be considerably higher measured in future dollars.

The War Output. The output for war goods and services is estimated at $80 billion for 1943. If the total national output in 1943 reaches $140 billion, the war will thus be taking 57 per cent of American production. Where will the ratio stand on D-Day? I believe that 70 per cent is probably the limit, based on British and German experience. Donald Nelson looks forward to an annual war cost of $106 billion in the near future. This would be approximately 70 per cent of a national output of $150 billion.

These figures sound insane. When the National Survey of Potential Product Capacity estimated that we could produce $130 billion worth of goods and services in 1929 dollars, the findings were laughed at as wildly and weirdly extravagant. Yet here we are, ahead of that volume, and destined to be far ahead of it by D-Day. None of us, not even the most starry-eyed dreamer, ever imagined the quantity of goods the American productive machine could fabricate once it was given a green light for full speed ahead.

War Taxes. Do you remember when a rise of 2 per cent in the income tax was considered practically confiscation? Our leading cartoonists blossomed forth with sketches of homo Americanus clad only in a barrel. Happy days! The 1942 rates would have caused apoplexy in many editorial chairs in 1940. As for the rates we can expect on D-Day, no substantial citizen could have looked at them and lived. Yet we shall pay them and live. Federal taxes are likely to amount to at least half the annual dollar cost of the war. If that cost is running at $100 billion, we shall be paying $50 billion in federal taxes.

Lend-Lease. In the last war we loaned some $10 billion to our allies, who defaulted on most of it. The unpaid war debts were an ugly political question for many years. Senators as well as common citizens found it difficult to see that our refusal to take large shipments of imports made it impossible for our allies to pay. We prevented them from paying by virtue of our high tariffs.

This time there will be no such debts—though I am not sure there will be no political arguments. Congress has already appropriated some $50 billion for lend-lease advances to the United Nations. In recent months we have been shipping as much as a billion dollars' worth of goods a month on this account.

It is the theory of lend-lease that such shipments do not constitute a formal loan in dollars, but rather an advance in goods and services which, in due course, will be offset by goods, services, or assistance remitted in return. Substantial offsets in the shape of food for our soldiers abroad are already being made.

The Banks. Long before D-Day the banking system of the country has already become in a sense a ward of the federal government. Let Mr. Kiplinger, the famous business-service man, describe the banks as they appear to him:[4]

> Banks look the same on the outside as they did ten years ago. They have the same awesome fronts, the same barred windows and tellers' cages. But inside they are different. They look to government. . . . They get paid for following instructions, or "suggestions." The pay is the interest on the money they lend to government by buying the government's bonds. The pay amounts to a subsidy to banks. . . . The business of lending has become different. It already has become dominated by politics. . . . The war puts government firmly into the driver's seat as the general manager of the people's money, as the social director of the uses to which the people's savings shall be put. . . .

Savings. The Department of Commerce, in a release in April, 1943, estimated that savings in the hands of individuals will reach the unheard-of figure of $60 billion by January 1, 1945. The American people are getting more money in their pay envelopes than ever before in history. They cannot begin to spend it all. They have not points enough in their ration books. There are still many school teachers, farmers, workers, whose pay is below the average, and who are saving nothing, but they are offset by the new class of employees in war industries who draw more pay than they can dispose of. These savings could start a serious post-war inflation. If wisely managed, however, they can help cushion the shock of demobilization.

BACK OF THE MOON

The dollar figures mentioned earlier are necessarily guesses, but perhaps not too wild. Let us venture a few guesses about other aspects of the economy on D-Day.

There will be at least 12 million men in the armed services when the war ends, great numbers of them overseas. Most of them will have been out of touch with civilian life for several years. Some younger men will never have had any regular job but fighting for their country. The whole force will have been extremely well cared for physically—the best of food, the sturdiest of clothing, the finest medical attention, every sort of equipment which their terrible tasks demand. They are already seeing much of the world. In many critical situations they are taking great responsibility. They are highly skilled in using the intricate machines of modern warfare. They feel that they belong, that they have a cardinal place in the American scheme of things. Certainly every speech they read or hear emphasizes the importance of that place.

When D-Day comes, most of these men will be glad to go home. But they will not, I think, be glad to sell apples on the street. They may not take kindly to being deprived of their high status in the community. They may not understand such treatment—and they promise to be very tough, well-disciplined, and resourceful young men. We have never had such a terrific human force in our economy before. It is a force which will need to be treated with extreme consideration. Representative Dewey of Illinois knew what he was talking about when he said: "Local boards are drafting these boys into the army. They will come back strong, lean, seeking opportunity and determined to have it. Why should they not find other boards ready to induct them into gainful enterprise? . . . If they don't, look out!"

I live twenty miles from Bridgeport. It had a terrific war boom in 1918, but that was nothing to the one it has now. Bridgeport never recovered from the devastating after-effects of the first boom. Citizens looked forward with dread to another such fever. Now they have it, only worse. Bridgeport is but one of hundreds of American cities seized with munitions elephantiasis. On D-Day there they will be, helpless in their bloated immensity, their chief reason for existence gone or going. The workers in Bridgeport, like the men in the army, have been given a vital feeling of belonging to the community. Like the men in the army, they may not take kindly to being suddenly classed as untouchables at the bottom of the social pyramid.

Seventy Per Cent of Man-Power. If the war ends with 70 per cent of our national effort going for military purposes, the man-power situation promises to look something like this:

		Per Cent
In the armed services	12,000,000
In war industries and activities	33,000,000
Total for war	45,000,000	70
In the civilian industries	20,000,000	30
Total national man-power	65,000,000	100

Thus some 45 million citizens may be on the federal government's pay roll—directly in the armed forces, indirectly in the war industries and services. The government cannot fire 70 per cent of the working population the way a meat market fires a butcher boy.

By D-Day the ranks of industrial labor may hold 10 million women, boys, and men not subject to the army who, if the war had not come, would be running their houses, playing bridge, living on investments, clerking in stores, studying in various schools, sunning themselves in Florida, or looking for a "respectable" job. The class structure of America has never been so rigid as that of Europe, but this wholesale migration by the middle class into the "proletariat" is something new under the sun.

My daughter went from her college commencement to a sanding machine with which she processed aluminum parts for fighter planes. In my little Connecticut town I can already count a score of professional and highly educated neighbors who are getting themselves covered with grease on the night shift of Bridgeport factories. Suddenly, as history goes, a great segment of our population, well-educated and observant, finds itself faced with the problems of hours, wages, working conditions, safety—not by reading about such things at home, but by punching time clocks and standing in the assembly line. What is this likely to do to the official labor movement? It is likely to push it in two directions. On the one hand, it may make the closed shop far more difficult in many unions. On the other hand, it may make millions of Americans more sympathetic to the problems of individual workers. Women who used to keep two maids will perhaps learn how it feels to be bawled out by the foreman.

The Great Steam Roller. One by one the barriers which divide the wealthy from the poor will be lowered as D-Day approaches. The poor have had their wages raised and, better still, have been delivered from work relief and unemployment. They are self-supporting Americans again. Progressive income taxes are reducing the net incomes of the well-to-do. Where will the levels be when the war ends? Quincy Howe has estimated that no family will get much less than $2,500, or much more than $25,000—a ten-to-one range. It would take a long war, however, to reach this level.

The luxury trades will have been pretty well wiped out by D-Day except such mass luxuries as movies, beer, and cigarettes. Servants will be in the factories or fighting, and the women who stay at home will be doing most of their own work. Already the maid shortage parallels the gas shortage in Suburban Heights. Will servants who have found relative independence in the factory want to go back to "Yes, sir," "No, sir," and "Please, sir"?

Most powerful of all forces making for equality may be rationing. It will be directed more and more toward seeing that every American family receives the essentials of life. Mr. Byrnes has flatly said as much. By D-Day there may be a graded distribution of essentials—the best cuts and qualities for the armed services, next best for the workers in heavy war industries, grade three for the rest of us, with Judy O'Grady doing just as well as the Colonel's lady.

A great steam roller is bearing down to flatten out economic classes and economic distinctions. The big house on the hill is closed, while the people across the tracks have more money than they can spend. It is not to be concluded, however, that we shall be reduced to one dead level of achievement. The steam roller promises to grind over stuffed shirts, deflating reputations blown up by fast-working publicity men. At the same time a new group of managers will be raised up, men who can get things done—produce goods, organize civilian effort, win battles, eliminate waste, bring us nearer to victory. The war on the home front still has its aspects of Hollywood, as Life once said. Sooner or later we have got to replace the stage men with real men.

New Patterns for Business. D-Day will see the structure of industry drastically revised. The so-called "concentration" movement may by then include many consumer-goods industries. Take the manufacture of stoves. New stoves are now being produced in a few "nucleus" plants, primarily the more efficient factories. All other stove plants are converted or closed down for the duration, their labor distributed to war production. More than eighty consumer-goods industries in Britain have been "concentrated," and we are beginning to follow the same road. The closed plants may keep a skeleton administrative staff; perhaps their brands will be kept alive by the nucleus plants. But in many cases the private brands will be dropped in favor of "victory models," simplified and standardized stoves, shoes, household tools, furniture, and the rest.

Quite apart from the concentration program, it is inevitable that many thousands of small businesses should be eliminated as the war goes on. The vast roadside industry has already been hard hit—filling stations, garages, automobile and tire dealers, road houses. Many Main Street stores are being hit, and will be hit harder as the volume of consumers' goods declines. By the end of 1943, inventories are expected to be savagely reduced. The stores which remain in business will have to drop trimmings, frills, and special services to the consumer. The customer will no longer always be right. The lady who orders five frocks expecting to return four of them after closer examination may get no service at all.

The whole great structure of competitive advertising no longer has much point. In Britain advertising is kept precariously alive by using space to advise the public not to purchase the advertiser's canned soup or his motor cars. In this country advertising still keeps going on "good-will" campaigns, where the advertiser's name is tied up with "buy bonds now" and pictures of charging tanks. As the war strips us to bare essentials, one wonders how much of this can be retained. Salesmen are suffering a similar decline as their services become meaningless. Many are in the army or have switched from white collars to overalls.

Big business may be easier to recognize than little business when D-Day comes, but here also there are sure to be great changes. Many of the ablest executives are already working for the government, their horizons widened to a real comprehension of the public interest. Patent monopolies and pre-war practices involving the restriction of output may be largely broken up. Some great industries—like the automobile industry already—will be working exclusively to government order when the war ends, producing not a single item for civilian use except possibly spare parts. It is not going to be easy to reconstruct the old techniques, where production was delicately adjusted to maximum profit or minimum loss. The market itself has disappeared for the duration.

Foreign trade in the old sense has already disappeared. Lend-lease now accounts for most of our exports, and such private traders as remain can move their goods only by permission of the Office of Economic Warfare. Perhaps we should drop the word "trade" for the duration. There are no free international markets left, almost no meeting of private buyers and sellers haggling for a just price. What we have now, and are sure to get more of, is a condition of exchange where the several governments decide what they will swap to speed the war effort, or to keep raw materials out of the hands of the Axis.

When the war ends, the economic systems of the United States, Britain, Canada, Mexico, the Caribbean countries, New Zealand, Australia, North Africa, may have been hammered into one super-system which will make the old national tariffs, currencies, trade practices look like remnants of the Stone Age. To unscramble this pattern will not be the work of a day.

The American crop output is sure to be very different on D-Day from what it was in 1941, being designed to feed armies and foreign allies as well as to provide subsistence for citizens on a balanced-diet basis. There will be few surpluses dumped to rot. The farm labor force will be greatly changed. Perhaps squads of youngsters from the schools will do much of the seasonal work. The railways, highways, airways, waterways, pipe lines may be under one integrated control. This control, after the bugs are shaken out of it, may be so much more efficient in moving freight that one wonders how successful the effort will be to dismantle it.

The great American recreation industry, shorn of its cash customers by the restrictions on pleasure driving, may have retreated to its condition in about the year 1900.

This is but a modest preview of the changed national picture on D-Day. If the war is long, the change may be still more drastic. The date I had roughly in mind was early in 1946. Perhaps the end will come in two instalments, the first in Europe, the second in the Far East. A military miracle or a sudden internal collapse of our enemies may happily move up the date of the final cease-firing order.

The free market gone; foreign trade obliterated by lend-lease; the government ordering 60 to 70 per cent of everything produced; new and strange contractual relationships; the incentive of competition badly weakened; great areas of little business boarded up; a scarcity of man-power, and the ranks of labor inundated by a flood from the middle class; the distribution of the national income leveled and shifted in curious directions; the crop pattern rearranged; great taxes, great public debts, great levies of forced savings, great national income; the government in complete control of the banks, the British Empire and Latin America sitting in the middle of our laps. Is there any road back?

One cannot operate a financial system in a vacuum. Behind the dollars lies a background of men, women, and things. I have tried to indicate the surprising nature of that background on the day when the guns cease to speak.

Choices in Italy

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

REMINISCENT of the days of blitzkrieg has been the speed with which events have moved in the Mediterranean. The liquidation of German resistance in Tunisia, the conquest of Sicily, Mussolini's downfall, the aerial blasting of the Italian mainland, the successful invasion of southern Italy, and the unconditional surrender of the Badoglio government have been telescoped into a period of a little more than four months. The suspicion that Italy was the weak point of the Axis has been abundantly confirmed, for resistance from the Italians before their surrender was in many cases no more than nominal.

The fighting in both Sicily and Italy has been highly creditable to the troops and military leadership of the United Nations. The most critical single step, the landings in Sicily, were made with comparatively light losses and a high degree of cooperation among air, sea, and land units. General Patton's men, after encountering severe initial opposition from superior German forces, made good their bridgehead and in the later exploitation of gains did as well as any army has done during the entire war. After the American Seventh Army scored its break-through, the result of the campaign was a certainty; the only question was that of the time required, and this was reduced by the sea and air superiority which made our problem of reinforcement much simpler than the enemy's.

The campaign in southern Italy presented a different set of problems. The landings in Calabria were as simple as such military feats can be, as a result of the lack of Italian resistance, the few beach defenses, the short distance to be covered, and the powerful air and sea coverage. But landing General Clark's Fifth Army at Salerno was a more risky procedure, since it permitted the Germans to concentrate a superior force against the American bridgehead. Once that bridgehead was secured, however, all German troops to the south were threatened with the cutting of their communications and line of retreat. Probably the nearest parallel in this war was the Malayan campaign, in which the Japanese, who at that time held command of sea and air, compelled the British to retreat continually by landing forces behind their lines. In a country with the geography of Italy this process can be repeated almost indefinitely as long as air and sea control is secure and the troops landed are strong enough to take care of themselves.

The Germans have in Italy more troops than were used by the Axis in Sicily. But the Allies have lines of reinforcement that are more secure and also the choice of where and when to strike. Hitler faces two alternatives. He can pour men into Italy and make a serious attempt to hold the country. Or he can retreat after resistance by small German units and the application of a thorough scorched-earth policy have multiplied Allied problems.

Neither of these policies can be termed desirable from the German point of view. The only real value of a determined effort to hold Italy would be to prevent or at least delay air and land offensives against more important sectors of Hitler's fortress. And by land few roads lead from Rome to Berlin. Moreover, a decision to hold Italy would mean the employment of large land armies and further depletion of German reserves. Garrisons everywhere else would have to be weakened and the risk of utter disaster in the east accepted. If such a policy were persisted in, Italy might well become a real second front according to the Russian definition of the term, and one on which the Allies would in all likelihood be victorious.

The second plan, a retreat up the Italian peninsula with possibly a determined effort to hold along the Po, certainly at the Alps, neither of which lines could be readily flanked, would appear to be the more profitable strategy. But not even this can be done without danger. The longer the Germans resist the greater their danger of becoming involved in a costly campaign or, if the resisting forces are left small, of having their retreat cut off by landings farther north. Yet prestige hardly permits a hasty withdrawal, and the threat of close-range bombing of Austrian, Czech, and Hungarian war centers is not one to be lightly considered.

Many of the fruits of complete victory in Italy are already falling to the United Nations. The main gains are three:

First, the surrender of most of the Italian navy greatly affects the naval balance of the war. While few of the ships can be profitably incorporated in the Anglo-American fleets, their surrender releases a great deal of British sea power for employment against the Japanese in the Bay of Bengal. Allied naval superiority is now overwhelming. A successful campaign in Burma is therefore brought materially closer to realization.

In the second place, the balance of European land power, already leaning toward the United Nations, is now tilted very decidedly in their favor. Italian troops, notoriously poor fighters, have previously been used in garrisons and to protect lines of supply, thus releasing Germans for active duty. Germany must now choose between weakening these garrisons and supply lines, which would play into Anglo-American hands, or weakening its front in Russia—a short cut to complete disaster. Mr. Churchill's estimate that Axis strength has been diminished 10 per cent may very well be accurate, but the importance of such a decrease is heightened by the fact that German military resources are now barely sufficient to stave off catastrophe.

Finally, the Italian surrender is a great blow to Axis prestige. All Europe shows the effect of it, though probably the German public has not yet grasped its full meaning. Neutrals like Sweden are becoming more courageous, and the satellite powers, especially Bulgaria and Finland, are uneasily attempting to find a not too disastrous method of reaching peace terms and escaping involvement in the expected German collapse.

Our recent gains in the Battle of Italy are also paving the way for offensives elsewhere. With the Mediterranean cleared for Allied shipping and new Italian and Sicilian bases at our disposal, a Balkan campaign becomes for the first time entirely practicable. The Italian surrender has opened Greece and the entire eastern coast of the Adriatic to attack and so effectively flanked the German position in the Balkans that Crete and the other Aegean islands which guarded against a thrust based on Alexandria are all but worthless. An invasion, if it is launched, will very probably come from another direction. At the same time the growing unrest in the satellite Balkan states and the reduction of garrisons there have created conditions highly favorable to an attacker. Should our leaders choose to strike here, they would of course face a hard problem in the civil divisions and local conflicts for which the Balkan states are celebrated, as well as in the difficulties of the terrain, but the war has repeatedly demonstrated that handicaps of this sort need not stop a skilled and determined invader.

Southern France looms as a second possible battlefield. The approach in this case could be made either by an amphibious force based on Corsica and Sardinia or by land armies advancing directly along the Mediterranean coast from the Italian Riviera. (The mountain route directly north is probably too difficult.) Both moves assume preliminary preparations, in the form of establishing nearby bases and bombing shore targets, which have not yet been made.

The greatest drawback to either of these offensives is not tactical but strategic. If undertaken after the thorough preparation which has characterized other Anglo-American moves they would be quite likely to succeed. The trouble is that success in neither area, nor indeed the complete conquest of Italy, would strike a blow at Germany in a vulnerable spot. With nothing but defeats for the past year Germany today is groggy and sagging at the knees. We can continue to punish it with land, sea, and air attacks before striking a final blow. But if we are to land the knockout punch, we must use a far greater proportion of our available land power in a better location than we have used it heretofore.

Five Years of "Munich Peace"

BY EMILE BURE

SEPTEMBER 29 is the fifth anniversary of the signing of the Munich pact. By now the entire world is in agreement that for the French and British the pact was the greatest diplomatic defeat in modern history. But it was not an isolated defeat. It was the culmination of a series of shameful submissions that began in 1936 when German troops entered the demilitarized Rhineland and Mr. Chamberlain informed Sarraut, the French Premier, that he found it entirely natural for the Germans to reoccupy territory which they had been forced to cede that France might be secure. For him the Treaty of Versailles and the Locarno pact were scraps of paper. Hitler, who had already decided to violate them despite the opposition of the army leaders, took Chamberlain at his word. He was convinced that nonentities ruled in London and Paris, and Mussolini shared his conviction after meeting Pierre Laval at Rome and Stresa.

Before Laval met the Duce I went to see him at the Quai d'Orsay. "Do you at least agree with the Belgrade government's rejection of Italy's offer of an Italian-Yugoslav alliance which would be contingent on Yugoslavia's denunciation of its old treaty with France?" I asked. He smiled, then, shrugging his shoulders, said scornfully, "You political traditionalists annoy me to death. I'll use my common sense." When I saw him again on his return from Italy, he warned me clearly of the event which his visit had made inevitable. "You know," he said, "no one can stop Mussolini from invading Abyssinia." I knew then that he had given Mussolini a free hand to assassinate a nation friendly to the French people, one which had been admitted to the League of Nations at the demand of the Fascist government supported by the French representative. When Abyssinia was attacked, Laval was forced to ask for sanctions against the aggressor, but he maneuvered so well that the sanctions were never applied, and Mussolini was saved. Jules Romains in his "Sept mystères du monde" writes:

> In 1937 I spoke with S. E. Yotara Sugimura, Japanese ambassador to Rome. I put this question to him: "At the beginning of December, 1935, did Mussolini really believe that his game was up?" Weighing his words carefully, the ambassador replied, "Yes, there's no doubt about it. I was on very friendly terms with Mussolini and saw him frequently in that period. I can say categorically that he thought himself lost. In a box on his desk he kept a loaded revolver. He once showed it to me. He was ready to blow his brains out at any moment during those days."

In betraying Abyssinia, France betrayed itself. The Spanish War followed—and then came Munich. At Munich France and Britain sacrificed their national honor for the illusion of peace. Laval was no longer Premier, but he still exercised enormous power through his accomplices in the Daladier Cabinet. Georges Bonnet, Minister of Foreign affairs under Daladier, once solemnly affirmed in the presence of the American ambassador, William C. Bullitt, that his country would remain faithful to the Czech alliance, but those who saw him daily were not deceived by his lying protestations. He was continually pointing out that France was not prepared for war, but when I suggested that he urge the government to buy planes from the United States, he paid no attention. When Guy La Chambre, Minister of Aviation, ordered some Curtiss planes, friends of Bonnet and Flandin protested that the Curtiss models were worthless and that their purchase would deprive French airplane companies of legitimate profits. And besides, it was necessary to save the gold of the Bank of France! Bonnet was resolved to abandon Eastern Europe, and unfortunately Daladier, though he doubted the wisdom of such a policy, was too weak to oppose it.

The French press, already thoroughly corrupted by the agents of Hitler, Mussolini, Franco, and Bonnet, whipped on the defeatist elements in the government. The former Radical deputy, Joseph Barthélemy, a professor of law, received 50,000 francs from the secret funds of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs for telling the readers of the Temps that the Franco-Czech alliance had been invalidated by the violation of the Locarno pact. Flandin developed the same theme for the readers of the Journal. General Faucher, head of the French military mission in Prague, revealed that "certain French newspaper articles had scarcely appeared in Paris before they were reproduced in leaflet form and exploited to the limit by the German press and radio." "It looked to me," he said, "as if certain of these newspapers were outright agents for German propaganda."

The moral—or immoral—state of France on the eve of the Nazi invasion of Czechoslovakia, so glaringly revealed in Henry Torres's book, "La Machine infernale," is clear from a rereading of the French press of those days. The newspapers entered into a veritable contest to see which of them could most grossly attack President Benes, an ardent friend of France. "Why fight the Czechs' war?" asked Léon Daudet. "Why fight for the Jews?" echoed Charles Maurras. In Je Suis Partout

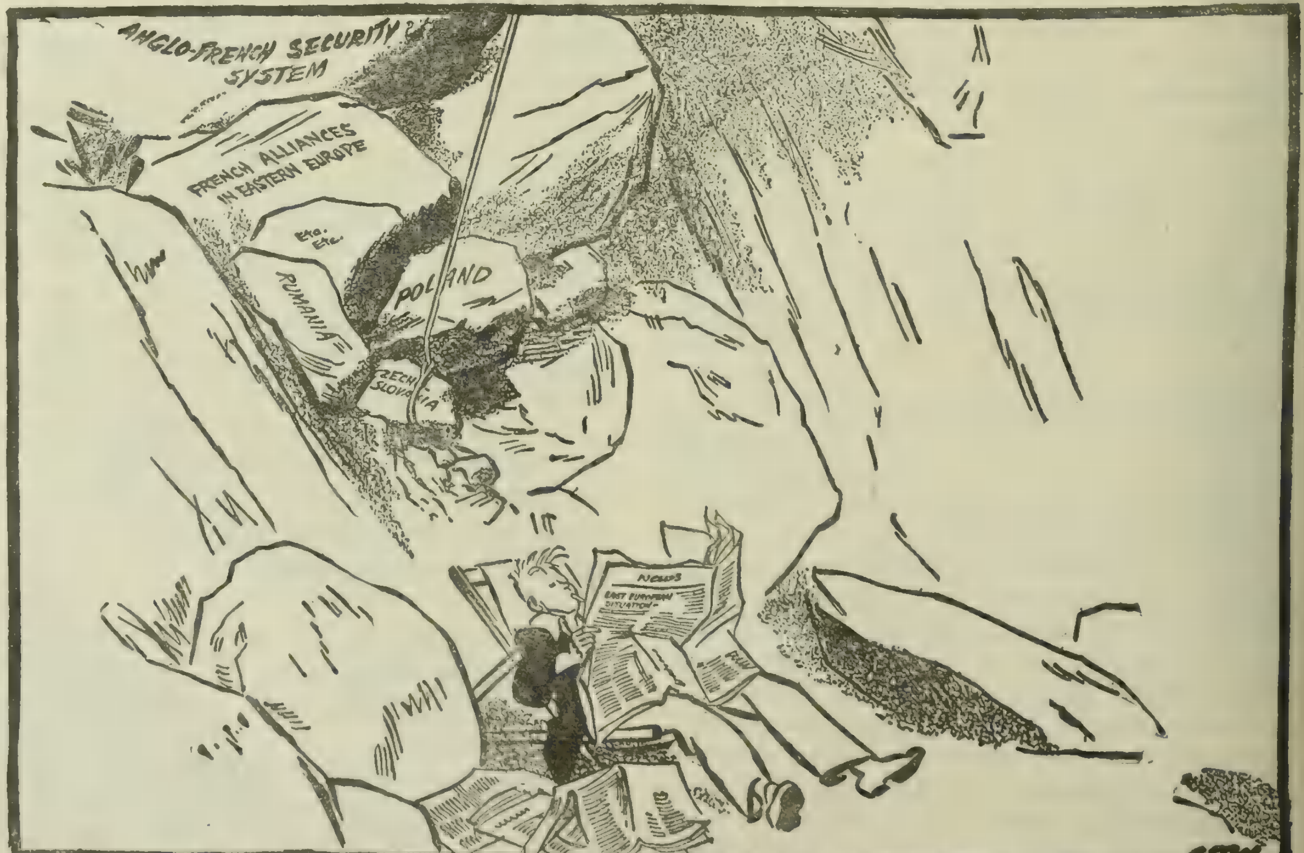
Robert Brassilach and Pierre Cousteau, disciples of the two directors of Action Française, went even farther: "Benes, that villainous wretch"—"that ignoble human excrement which goes by the name of Benes." Nor did they spare Mr. Roosevelt, whom Germany had good cause to fear. "Of all the idiots who have blossomed forth on the malodorous soil of the democracies, Franklin Roosevelt is probably the most perfect specimen, the newest model of his kind," wrote Pierre Cousteau. "He is of Jewish extraction, descended from a family named Roscampo which was driven out of Spain in 1620 and took refuge in Holland, where Roscampo became Rosenveld and finally Roosevelt," added his colleague Tracy.

I was not surprised therefore to learn one morning that Georges Bonnet, despite his promises to Osuski, the Czech minister to France, had informed President Benes that France would not fight for Czechoslovakia and that if his country resisted, the French government might even make common cause with the aggressor. Mussolini had won the hand. He dragged the representatives of England and France to Munich to be humiliated and blackmailed. Chamberlain, with his symbolic umbrella, returned to London certain that he had secured "peace in our time" and was received with acclamation. Daladier, a professor of history, had no such illusion and was afraid of being booed. When, instead, he was greeted with cheers, he muttered even as he acknowledged the applause, "What imbeciles!"

I watched the French people, so cruelly deceived by their own press, celebrating in the streets and then returned to my paper, utterly discouraged. "What sense is there in continuing the struggle?" I asked my colleagues. "Aside from l'Humanité [the Communist newspaper] there are no more than two anti-Munich papers in Paris—ours and Kerillis's Epoque. Léon Blum himself in the Populaire is savoring the shame of his pacifist satisfaction." "Boss," said one of the reporters, "you have no right to call quits, to let us down. Write your article. But be moderate, for it's true we are almost isolated." I wrote:

> I am too human not to have been touched yesterday by the joy of mothers who saw their sons return home and the horrors of war recede. I wish I were as convinced as they that the danger of war is over for good. But I would be lacking in intellectual honesty if I denied my anxiety about the Munich accord. . . . The Drang nach Osten will meet no more obstacles, and the last hope for peace will be found from now on in the good-will of Hitler and Mussolini, whose intentions I must be allowed to doubt.

The next day I got a grip on myself; I abandoned the sentimental note to lash out at Daladier, who remarked to one of my friends, "I'll have that fellow Buré



WHAT'S CZECHOSLOVAKIA TO ME, ANYWAY ?

Reprinted from The Nation of September 24, 1938 shot yet." What a strange period when one had to fight the government of one's country in order to oppose the enemies of one's country.

In the weeks that followed Munich the big Paris papers launched campaigns for contributions with which to buy gifts for Chamberlain. The Provost of Launay, president of the Municipal Council of Paris, invited the English Prime Minister to attend an extraordinary session of the council. On October 20, before the tomb of the Unknown Soldier, Daladier publicly celebrated the victory which he had brought back from the Bavarian capital. That evening the pact was acclaimed in the Chamber of Deputies. Outside the Communist bloc in the Chamber, only one deputy opposed a vote of confidence in the government. In the night clubs they danced the Chamberlaine; in the candy stores the boxes of chocolates were adorned with pictures of the English and French Premiers.

On December 6, 1938, the situation became serious again. Von Ribbentrop, the Reich Minister of Foreign Affairs, arrived in Paris to meet Georges Bonnet and prepare a Franco-German pact. The Temps of December 7 listed an imposing array of industrialists who attended the banquet at the German embassy. With customary German delicacy, ham from Prague was served—the two Jewish ministers, Jean Zay (Education) and Georges Mandel (Colonies), had not been invited. Madame Campinchi, wife of the Minister of the Navy, cast a slight shadow on the celebration by declining the invitation because of a previous engagement—with Madame Osuski, wife of the Czech minister.

Did Bonnet in these conversations with Ribbentrop give Germany carte blanche in the east? The German minister has declared that he did; the French minister denied it before the defeat of France, and admitted it afterward. In any case, on March 14, 1939, Hitler, as had been foreseen, decided to break the Munich pact and destroy Czechoslovakia. Summoning President Hacha of Czechoslovakia to Berchtesgaden, he informed him of his decision. "I give you one hour to sign the capitulation of your country," he said. Old Hacha broke down completely; when he recovered he cried, "I cannot—I cannot sign." "Very well," answered Hitler, "tomorrow our planes will reduce Prague to ashes; millions of women and children will die. And you will have killed them." Hacha yielded. Even before his arrival at Berchtesgaden German troops had occupied Moravstra Ostrava on the frontier. The next morning at nine o'clock they entered Prague.

The day after Munich I and several other friends of Czechoslovakia met in the small house in the rue des Beaux Arts which had been the cradle of Czechoslovak independence. Speaking over the radio, I said, "France is henceforth a captive. It will not be free until Czechoslovakia is free." I say that again today.

In the Wind

A SERIES OF SHORT MOVIES designed to stimulate recruiting for the WAC is offered as an advertising medium by its producers. These patriotic films "provide you with an unprecedented opportunity to put your company and product name in the line of march to victory. . . . Each subject closes with the sponsor's name and message impressively narrated against a musical background."

PAUL MALLON OFFERS this thought on social security: "The cure for unemployment is employment—not insurance."

AMONG THE NEW ORGANIZATIONS devoted to the cause of preventing future wars is one called Forever This; its prospectus begins, "This plan for perpetual peace is based upon mutual distrust. . . . We must come to the clear realization that any argument between nations had better resolve itself into twenty-five years of dissension than twenty-five minutes of war!"

WHERE CREDIT IS DUE: Printers' Ink, an advertising trade magazine, editorializes thus: "It will probably never be possible, not even after the war is over, to justly gauge the tremendous contributions to victory made by advertising. . . . But the average citizen will remember that it was what he read in an ad that made his Adam's apple swell until he just had to go out and buy a bond to prove he's glad to be an American."

THE FASCIST Sinarquist movement in Mexico is thus described in Columbia, a Catholic magazine published in the United States: "It is essentially a Catholic agrarian movement. Its object is to establish every family on its own land and provide an education for all. It aims at a 'Christian order,' a 'Christian democracy' based on the family. It intends to lift the peasant masses out of ignorance and practical serfdom, and it is unalterably opposed to totalitarianism in government."

THE PRINCIPAL SPEAKER at a recent meeting of the Staten Island, New York, Foremen's Association was Dr. Charles Copeland Smith, a representative of the National Association of Manufacturers. According to the Staten Island Transcript, "He said that foremen would lose their identity as part of management by becoming associated with labor organizations."

FESTUNG EUROPA: A tank trap one-third of a mile wide now cuts across The Hague from end to end. All buildings in the way were destroyed. . . . General Chatlos, commander of the Slovak army under the Nazis, has been bringing units of troops back from Russia and parading them in various towns of Slovakia to prove to the people that most of their boys survived.

Tito's Partisans

BY BOGDAN RADITSA

THE Allied invasion of Italy has sounded the alert throughout the Balkans. Under the vigorous leadership of General Tito, the Yugoslav Partisan forces of the People's Liberation Army have surged down the Adriatic coast from Gorica to Split, and the interior is flaming with revolutionary fervor. When the armies of the United Nations are ready to march through the Balkan gateway, they will find it open and the people ready for military action.

The pillars of the satellite system, in fact, are swaying. Bulgaria, the only puppet state which has not declared war on the U. S. S. R., will collapse at the first appearance of Allied soldiers at its borders. The Rumanian peasants, weary of a quisling collaborationist regime, will rise when they are given the signal. In "independent Croatia" Pavelich grows weaker. The German commander, von Horstenau, has taken control; his henchmen —the new Premier, Nikola Mandic, and the new Minister of War, General Navratil—struggle against the rising tide of rebellion.

Hitler's puppet in Serbia, General Nedich, has made two nervous visits to Hitler's headquarters in recent days. Hungary is making hasty arrangements to insure that it will not be forgotten in the future Balkan set-up. Turkey anxiously watches Soviet Russia and clings to its neutrality. The Greek guerrillas fight on, assured by their exiled king that after his return they may choose between monarchy and republic—they have already chosen.

Yugoslavia is composed of three nations—Croatia, Serbia, and Slovenia. Only in the measure that these three nations can form a social, political, and economic unit will Yugoslavia be able to participate advantageously in the post-war settlement. Under General Tito the three peoples have already united in one national movement of liberation. Two hundred and fifty thousand people—workmen, peasants, intelligentsia—have closed their ranks against the invader and thereby laid the foundation for real political unity.

The animating force of the People's Liberation Movement is the aspiration of the masses for social justice and political equality. In its manifesto the People's Movement announces as its aims and principles: (1) the liberation of the country from the occupation forces and the establishment of truly democratic rights and liberties for all peoples of Yugoslavia; (2) the inviolability of private property, with full opportunity for initiative in the economic field; (3) no radical changes to be introduced in the social structure, except that reactionary district administrations are to be replaced by others democratically elected; all social and administrative measures to be decided after the war by representatives freely elected by the people; (4) no violence or lawlessness to be tolerated; (5) full recognition of national rights for Croatia, Slovenia, and Serbia, the Macedonians, and others.

The organization's political head and the chairman of its Anti-Fascist Council is Dr. Ivan Ribar, former president of the Yugoslav Constituent Assembly. He is a small, tough democratic leader, with the open, sympathetic face of a Croatian peasant. The military leader is General Tito, whose real name is Josip Broz or Brozovich. Before the war he was a worker in the railroad machine shops in Zagreb. Reports from his headquarters describe him as energetic, clear-minded, decisive, audacious. He is not a military man by training, but his deep understanding of revolutionary movements has enabled him to bring about political and military cooperation among his followers. The puppet paper Nova Hrvatska does not underestimate his power. "When he came to Slunj," it said, "and appeared among the Partisans, they looked upon it as the greatest event. He enjoys great political influence among them." The German military command in Yugoslavia has offered a reward of 100,000 gold marks for information leading to his capture, dead or alive.

The Anti-Fascist Council which heads the movement has sixty-five members, forty-nine of whom are Serbs, nineteen Croats, and four Moslems. The Slovenes are represented by the leaders of the Slovene Liberation Front. The Executive Committee is made up of ten members under the presidency of Ivan Ribar. The organization operates everywhere—in the liberated areas publicly, as the civil administration; in occupied territory underground.

The military organization of the movement consists of the People's Army and the Partisan units. The first is composed of large units commanded directly from army headquarters. The smaller Partisan groups are scattered over the country, and although they receive instructions from headquarters, they operate individually. Their leaders are mostly former officers of the Yugoslav army or men who served in the Spanish War, where they learned a dynamic, disciplined strategy for guerrilla warfare against the Germans.

On September 6 Dr. Ribar asked Allied headquarters in the Middle East for a status similar to that of the French Committee of National Liberation. Soon afterward the Middle East commander-in-chief, General Sir Henry Maitland Wilson, in a broadcast to Yugoslav and Greek guerrillas called upon them to facilitate the departure of Italian troops garrisoned in Greece, Albania, and Yugoslavia, and to avert a general uprising or any other movement which might "play the German game." Reports from Cairo say that high Allied officers are now at the headquarters of the Greek guerrillas, of General Mihailovich, and of the Yugoslav Partisans. The Stockholm newspaper Aftontidningen reports that Russian officers have arrived in Yugoslavia to assist the guerrillas, accompanied by political advisers who will seek to coordinate their activities with British and American plans. The Partisans have finally been recognized. Tito, however, has made it clear that Allied officers have not supplanted him in command.

According to other reports from Cairo, the Germans have now concentrated nearly 250,000 men in the Balkans, under the Balkan military expert Field Marshal Maximilian von Weichs. The German commandant in Zagreb, von Horstenau, has proclaimed the whole of Dalmatia and also Fiume—until now part of Fascist Italy—to be part of the puppet state of Croatia and has rushed German and Ustachi troops there. General Wilson recommended that the Partisan forces await further instructions from him, but they were impatient and have started large-scale operations along the whole of the Dalmatian coast and on the islands to resist the entrance of German troops. On September 9 the Free Yugoslavia radio announced that the "People's Liberation Army of Yugoslavia now controls areas of that country larger than the entire area of Switzerland." And a CBS correspondent in Switzerland has reported that the Yugoslav Partisans control almost the whole northern Adriatic coast, "constituting an enormous Balkan bridgehead for the forces of the United Nations."

On September 11 the BBC said that fighting had broken out in Split, the main Dalmatian port, when the Germans tried to disarm the Italian soldiers. In the ancient streets of the Dalmatian town the Italian Bergamo Brigade, changing its name to the Garibaldi Brigade, joined the Partisans. As soon as the Italian soldiers in Slovenia and Croatia learned of Italy's surrender, they began to fraternize with the Yugoslav patriots and volunteered to cooperate with them. On September 18 a proclamation was broadcast to the Italian soldiers:

> Since for more than two years the People's Liberation Army and guerrilla detachments of Yugoslavia have been fighting, together with Allied troops, against the German invaders . . . Italian officers and soldiers, we call upon you to surrender your armaments and stores to the People's Liberation Army and to join our men in resisting the German violators. Thereby you will hasten the defeat of the enemy of our peoples—sanguinary Hitlerite fascism. . . . Long live the alliance of the Italian and Yugoslav peoples in the struggle against their common enemy—Hitlerite Germany.

The People's Liberation Movement and its army today is a coalition of all democratic and progressive parties of Serbia, Croatia, and Slovenia—the Croatian Peasant Party, the Serbian Democratic Party, the Independent Democratic Party, and a small minority of Communists. It is a popular front composed of Slovenes, Croats, Serbs, Moslems, Catholics, Jews, and anti-fascists from all Southeastern Europe. It is trying to build a new Yugoslavia and a new Balkan order based on a commonwealth of free and equal nations.

Another element in the Yugoslav picture, in Serbia, where the Partisan movement has its roots, is General Mihailovich, Minister of War, to whom the Yugoslav government in exile has remained loyal and to whom the Partisans are strongly opposed. In order to understand Mihailovich's significance one should analyze objectively the background from which he derives.

Mihailovich is the last representative of the Chetnik warriors who during the nineteenth century fought to liberate Serbia from Turkish and Austrian rule. But he is also a product of still older Serbian traditions—those of the great medieval empire of King Dushan, during whose reign the Serbian Orthodox Church, after separating from Byzantium, identified itself with the state. The triangle of church, state, and military is symbolized by General Mihailovich and his political committee. All the old Serbian political parties, especially the Radical Serbian Party, are imbued with this ancient spirit—and that is understandable, for through it Serbia was lifted from the ashes and made free and independent.

This spirit is too static for today, when the Yugoslav people are fighting for a new and better world. The Liberation Movement is closer to the life which will emerge from this revolutionary war. The new, dynamic forces of the liberation movement look on Mihailovich and his committee as a purely military force, a sort of military dictatorship in which the state is inseparably bound up with the church, and which offers no basis for modern democracy.

The pitched battles which have taken place between Mihailovich's men and the Partisans in Yugoslavia show the tremendous chasm which exists between them. To bridge that chasm, the whole political and social structure of Serbia, of Yugoslavia, of the Balkans, and even of Europe as a whole, must undergo a complete change. Yugoslavia cannot accept the medieval conception of the state because it eliminates the possibility of union between the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, and condemns, a priori, any federalist solution for Balkan problems.

BURLINGAME

If this war is not to lead Yugoslavia and all the Balkans to open revolution, the various elements within the country must come to an agreement. The Allies have already made efforts to help in that direction. But more is needed. It is imperative that Great Britain, the United States, and Russia arrive at a thorough understanding of the Balkan problem, and that they uphold the principles of democratic legitimacy which constitute the genuine, spontaneous expression of the people's will.

The poor and ill-equipped Balkan masses have been fighting valiantly, manifesting to the world their political maturity and moral strength. For centuries they have been betrayed by their own rulers and by foreign powers which have exploited them for their own imperialistic ambitions. Now they are finally approaching political and social liberation. They are inspired by a great ideal. They know what they are trying to create; they are conscious of the end of one world and the beginning of a new. No one will be able to use them as a tool. They are forging their own destiny.

BY ARGUS

IN CONNECTION with the Salerno episode it may be useful to establish certain facts. The newspapers, it will be remembered, reported that the German radio was announcing a severe defeat for the Fifth Army, the beginning of its evacuation, a new Dunkirk. Then they told us that the Germans had "tuned down." And finally they rebuked the public for having been influenced by enemy propaganda.

Now it may be useful to know that such announcements were never made in Germany and never "tuned down." In no official communiqué, in no comment published by any German newspaper or broadcast by any German station, was there one word about a defeat of the Fifth Army, its reembarcation, a Dieppe, or Dunkirk, or Gallipoli. All announcements said that for the first time an Anglo-American landing in full force was being combated, and that a furious struggle was in progress. As has been the practice ever since Stalingrad, the greatest pains were taken to give the German people no news of victory which within a few hours might be proved false.

It was not the German radio but stations in the occupied countries that gave out the Dunkirk story—Radio Paris and others. And that is quite another thing. For it is notorious that German propaganda in the occupied regions is bound by very different rules from those it observes in Germany. For some inexplicable reason it indulges outside the Reich in the most careless fantasies. Why the American and English news gatherers pay so much attention to Radio Vichy, Radio Paris, and the others is not clear. Those stations are entirely dependent on Berlin for information. Their broadcasts are either the same as those from Germany, in which case there is no need to listen to Vichy or Paris, or they contain news which, like the Dunkirk story, is not broadcast in Germany, thus showing it is not of the quality that Goebbels wishes to set before his people. When anything so dubious is repeated here, there should at least be a note saying that it is a German representation which is kept from the Germans themselves.

The course of events has made the terms of the armistice between Eisenhower and Badoglio fairly unimportant. But not in Germany. On the contrary, Goebbels is using them as one of his principal themes. Though the document has never been published by its signatories, the Germans claim to know its contents. They have disclosed what they allege to be its "thirteen points" and choose to call them "the most shameful degradation, the most pitiless enslavement, ever known in the history of the world." In short, the armistice shows how a people fares when in the hour of peril it is deprived of its great leader! As Goebbels expressed it on September 17 in his weekly article:

> The Italian example will not attract us Germans but rather scare us off from anything similar. We look on it as a school exercise in how things may not be done. The consequences that followed the betrayal of a great leader of the people by the Roman clique around the king are for Germans a lesson and a warning. They have opened the eyes of the most stupid and most frivolous. In the flood of letters we have received in the past days are some whose writers offer a repentent apology for having given way to discouragement at the time of this or that calamity. A university professor wrote us that though he is a peaceable man, after he had read of the conditions of surrender imposed on the Italians he took a solemn vow to beat up with his own hands anyone who even by intimation ranged himself against victory. So think all people in Germany today.

Fortunately there can be found in Germany, so Goebbels says, no parallel to the "perfidious Italian gang who misused their high offices in obedience to that false cleverness which seeks to evade danger and just because of that perishes." And fortunately Germany is a republic. There is no "degenerate court society" to overthrow a great leader "because it has the blind delusion it can get along without him." And there is no king:

> If one would blame Fascismus at all, it is for having believed in the loyalty of a king whose throne was saved by the March on Rome in 1922 but who like most kings in recent history rewarded the strong political line of his faithful servant by betraying him and going over to the enemy. Kings are not usually distinguished by the virtue of gratitude. Wilhelm I, whose faithfulness to Bismarck made him an exception to the rule, was for that reason called Wilhelm der Grosse.

Here Is China

BATTLE HYMN OF CHINA. By Agnes Smedley. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

WHAT to praise most in this deeply passionate and sincere book I do not know. There have been other sincere books that have purported to deal with China's struggle; yet looking back on them one sees that sincerity can be exercised about abstractions and their shadows. Beside the sense of reality, beside the utter nakedness of the land and the people described in "Battle Hymn of China," all but one even of the novels on China merely smoke a little as they fade out. (I except only "Man's Fate," which still remains brilliant, with the false discoloring brilliance of fluorescent lighting.) And, to compare it with another fine work of reportage, in sheer informativeness Miss Smedley's book exceeds even Edgar Snow's still invaluable "Red Star Over China." For it is an army forming itself in campaign which the author describes in the superb eyewitness chapters of her Sixth Book. Having read "Battle Hymn" one dismisses with an incredulous shout all the stuff that the "Far Eastern experts," including most of those writing in liberal magazines, are handing out about China's future. Listen, the diseased dragon of China's past is spewing green poison over the face of her dying present! It is, indeed, a tragic book, a powerful, heart-breaking book Miss Smedley has written, and yet a glorious courage and revolutionary determination burn through even its starkest pages.

I had taken voluminous notes in preparation for this review. They had to do with such matters as the evolution of the "new" woman, the Sianfu incident, Western appeasement, and the one lonely mention of an old classical poem. The silk-working girls of the south are notorious throughout China as Lesbians. Why have they been given this name? Miss Smedley obtained permission to travel up-river on one of the steamers of the Canton Silk Guild. She was accompanied on much of her months-long trip by a young whippersnapper of a silk expert who revered the fat-chopped merchants of the Guild. The girls jeered at him as they sat around the steaming vats, amid the stench of cocoons, their parboiled fingers twinkling as they worked with incredible speed. They were Communists, he said, and they had certainly gained the ten-hour day by means of a strike. They scorned marriage, the little man said—as one whose contribution to womanly happiness had been refused. If these "Lesbian" girls were forcibly married off by their parents, then the girls often used a part of their wages to bribe their husbands to take a concubine. And in truth the government had just issued a decree forbidding this disrespectful practice. "They're too rich, that's the root of the trouble," the silk expert said. "They earn as much as eleven dollars a month and become proud and contemptuous." In short, they reject Confucius and they have found a way to escape the intolerable degradation of the old-time marriage.

Then the Sianfu incident. Miss Smedley was in the City of Western Peace at the time. Chiang Kai-shek was captured on a mountainside in his nightshirt and carried pickaback into captivity to spare his bruised feet. Old-time chivalry and the interests of the struggle against Japan—which Chiang at that time refused to undertake—caused his captor, Marshal Chang, to release him. Whereupon Chiang threw his unusually generous captor into prison, where to the bitter resentment of all Manchurian patriots he still lies. Then about appeasement. Until Pearl Harbor the International Red Cross committees which controlled the distribution of all foreign aid would supply no drugs to the Chinese army. That would have been contrary to some devilishly respectable law or other, even though the Chinese soldiers may have been wounded by war materials sold to Japan, quite licitly, by American capitalists.

But most of these themes had to be put aside because as I write on this morning of September 8 the newspapers report that in Shantung the Communists have scandalously revolted against the Kuomintang and have made war against its Peace Preservation Corps in that region. Now any man in his senses who had the least knowledge of Chiang's past and the Kuomintang's social content would be suspicious of an outfit with a name like Peace Preservation Corps. Considering that China is at war with Japan and that Shantung is held chiefly by guerrillas organized by the Communists, one would take such a name to mean that the corps was an anti-Communist political police. And not merely anti-Communist but anti-democratic also. As long as Chungking considers such a movement as the National Salvation League dangerous, as long as it permits no trade unions to be organized and forbids and persecutes the popular anti-Japan committees and seeks to lay its dead hand on the industrial cooperatives—which were originally financed with British, not Russian money—as long, I say, as bureaucracy and corruption and sheer medievalism cramp the Chinese people's effort, it is to be expected that the Kuomintang will fear the popular guerrillas.

But it so happens that Miss Smedley gives an abundance of facts on the "suspended civil war." She spent many, many months with the Fourth Army, she took part in its political troubles, in which, she says, she nearly broke her political neck. She was, with others, responsible for the fact that this Communist fighting force came to possess the first regular military medical service, despite the stubborn opposition of its Communist commissar, Hsiang Ying. Everything she writes about the Fourth Army rings as true as a silver dollar. There were troubles in that body. Chiang, or his Minister of War, took care to insure that by appointing an ex-party member, Yeh Ting, as its commander. Hsiang Ying, whose enemies said of him that "intrigue and craftiness had become part of his nature," notwithstanding his suspicion of the new doctors, did more than conspire against his chief. He built the most effective and intellectually enlightened force in the enemy rear. Compare the Fourth with the opium-smuggling anti-Communist Fiftieth next door and you begin to believe that in China the honest man is left with no real political alternative. And, the author insists, the Fiftieth itself was an army in transition. There were far worse than this in the field.

On four continents he possesses a reputation for a mordant tongue, and his epigrams are celebrated. He has always been able to accomplish practically everything he set out to do. And the tip-off on the man himself is his explanation of why that was possible—he was never ambitious!

But there it is. The Fourth was a fine fighting corps, but Chungking had not supplied wages, arms, or ammunition for three years! It lived and fought on materials stolen from the enemy. And its most implacable enemies were the saboteurs in office. Nor did official opposition stop at sabotage. On one occasion in 1940 a Chungking army surrounded and massacred three to four thousand of the Fourth Army guerrillas, hospitalized wounded and unwounded alike. The reason? It goes right to the heart of the contemporary problem, the problem not merely of China but of the entire world. The Chinese guerrillas persist in making contact with the people. They need to do this, for as Chu Teh said long ago, a partisan force must move among the people "as a fish swims in water." That is the inescapable logic of guerrilla warfare, just as contact with the French people should be the logic of our effort, and is not. Since the guerrilla forces are cut off from draft recruiting, they must recruit for themselves. Quite naturally they grow. Chungking, having tried to fix the strength of the Communist armies, objects to their growth. Hence it will neither arm nor nourish them. Fearing the future influence of the Communists, Chungking prefers to sabotage the war against Japan.

Like this reviewer you may have seen something of war and revolution. Nevertheless, a new gravity and a new clarity will possess your mind, I believe, as you read this Battle Hymn. China is dying because its decayed landlord culture desperately needs the revolution now suspended. There is no other route, no liberal way, for there is no genuine liberal movement. There are revolution and reaction and between them a few weak tendencies and a handful of noble and lonely individuals.

To have done with all the piff and the paff of propriety, reaction is now in power. Miss Smedley herself may protest, but her book moved me to an indignation that gave me more encouragement than any book has done for a long time now. The fighting multitudes of China were dying of misery, of untended wounds, when Miss Smedley served at the front. There were only a few hundred doctors in the Chinese army. Why? The old tradition was that educated men were not to be drafted, and doctors were educated men. Chungking therefore allowed them to nurse their private practices, while a few heroic volunteers sank under the avalanche of work at the front. Nor was it merely a matter of the rich and the corrupt. The tradition also stands hard against new things. There were no skeletons for the use of medical lecturers. Chungking and popular superstition would not allow their use, for the disembodied spirits might never find rest. So Dr. Gung and Dr. Chang, while the radio played Beethoven's Fifth, planned competitive graveyard raids. Dr. Chang, a woman, eventually came back with a sack of bones. Her remark will put you down among those far-off hills of China, "She was from my native town of Wusih and she died of tuberculosis," Dr. Chang said of the bones. "I could tell because the body had been wrapped and the orifices stuffed with silk wool. The people of Wusih think this prevents the disease from escaping."

Italy has just surrendered, and like everyone else I want to go out and celebrate joyfully. Yet the force of this book keeps my imagination in China. And that is the function of a book. How rare are those which fulfil their functions one-tenth as well as "Battle Hymn of China." RALPH BATES

Captain Rhodes and Others

SWORD OF BONE. By Captain Anthony Rhodes. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

LOG BOOK. By Frank Laskier. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.

THE LADY AND THE TIGERS. By Olga S. Greenlaw. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

ONLY the British seem to produce such shrewd, lovable, incredible people as those who appear in "Sword of Bone"; and not the least of these fabulous people is the author himself. Captain Rhodes went through the entire British fiasco in France—into the "phony war" of 1939 and out through the definitely non-phony Dunkirk. At no time did he care for war, nor did his pals. They did not have the instincts of world conquerors; they were more interested in requisitioning (stealing) a bottle of champagne from a French cellar. Throughout the whole horror of the calamitous campaign Captain Rhodes kept a humorous, urbanely observant eye on the behavior of himself and those about him.

He was on the beach at Dunkirk, along with thousands of helpless men dotting the shore as far as the eye could see. They pawed holes in the sand, like children at play, seeking futile shelter against the Stukas that roared just above, bombing and machine-gunning them. "Once again," writes Captain Rhodes, "I felt that had our minds not been clouded with petty doubts and fears, it would have been a most exhilarating performance." Those "doubts and fears"—who else could have called them "petty"?

No world-shaking revelations are in this book; from a news point of view it is an old story. Yet it is a wholly fresh story because it is the mental history of a man who loathed war, who loved life in a highly civilized way, and who still was a good soldier and kept his head in the midst of unimaginable terror. People say England always wins the last battle; men like Captain Rhodes are the reason why. People might add that it is a pleasure to live in the world with England after the last battle is over. Again, men like Captain Rhodes are the reason why. Certainly this soldier-author is a pleasure to read.

Frank Laskier is an utterly different sort of Englishman, a life-long merchant seaman who survived three sinkings in the Atlantic and suffered the loss of a leg. "Log Book" is his brief account of the life of a supposedly mythical merchant seaman named Jack whose career apparently paralleled Laskier's in many respects. Jack, like the author, went to sea when he was fifteen. Jack progressed from a cocky, maladjusted boy into a drunkard, a fighting bully, and a thief who served two years in prison. He kept returning to the sea, because that was all he could do. His heart was still full of bitterness when war came, but he didn't shirk the perils of the Atlantic. fight your war for you. We'll win it. But, my God, there'll be some interesting little ceremonies afterward. We'll win the peace."

The unlovely story of this supposedly mythical seaman is told in staccato fashion, with great economy of words and with considerable power. For more than a year now the author has been talking to workmen in shipyards and munitions factories. In that role he no doubt casts the same sort of spell over his audience as did reformed sinners in America who went on evangelistic circuits. Perhaps he himself derives some of the same psychological satisfactions.

On the other side of the world Olga Greenlaw was in the midst of the aerial fighting over China. She was the wife of one of the American Volunteer Group pilots, the only woman among the Flying Tigers. To her the war was just a big adventure, and she is amusingly chatty about it. One of the high points in her lusty story is her not too charitable account of the visit of Clare Boothe Luce to Kunming. Mrs. Luce breezed in and immediately mistook Mrs. Greenlaw—daughter of a Kansas mining engineer—for a Russian adventuress. Mrs. Luce was corrected. Mrs. Luce introduced herself as the noted playwright and part-owner of famous magazines in America. "It had been some time," says Mrs. Greenlaw, "since any of us had worried about theaters or even magazines." Finally Mrs. Luce went away without saying either thank-you or goodby, and subsequently wrote about Mrs. Greenlaw as a White Russian.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

Fiction in Review

IN HER latest collection of short stories, "The Wide Net" (Harcourt, Brace, $2.50), Eudora Welty has developed her technical virtuosity to the point where it outweighs the uses to which it is put, and her vision of horror to the point of nightmare. Of course even in her earlier work Miss Welty had a strong tendency toward stylism and "fine" writing; she liked to move toward the mythical, and she had a heart for decay and an eye for the Gothic in detail. But she also had a reliable and healthy wit, her dialogue could be as normally reportorial of its world as the dialogue of Ring Lardner, and for the most part she knew how to keep performance subservient to communication; she told her story instead of dancing it, and when she saw horror, it could be the clear day-to-day horror of actual life, not only the horror of dreams. There was plenty of surrealist paraphernalia, if you will, in a story like The Petrified Man—the falling hair of the customer, the presence of the three-year-old boy amid the bobbie-pins and sexual confidences of the beauty parlor, the twins in a bottle at the freak show, or even the petrified man himself. But compare to The Petrified Man the story Asphodel from Miss Welty's current volume, with its Doric columns and floating muslins, its pomegranate stains and blackberry cordial and its "old goats and young," and you will recognize the fancy road up which Miss Welty has turned her great talents.

The title story of Miss Welty's new volume is its best story but not typical. An account of a river-dragging party which starts out to recover the body of a supposed suicide but forgets its mission in the joys of the occasion, The Wide Net has its share of the elements of a tour de force, but it has more communicated meaning than the rest of the stories in the book, and it best fuses content and method. Of the six other stories Livvie is the only one which I like at all, and the only story, in addition to The Wide Net, which I feel I understood. Yet the volume as a whole has tremendous emotional impact, despite its obscurity. However, this seems to me to be beside the point, for the fear that a story or a picture engenders is likely to be in inverse proportion to its rational content: witness the drawings of children or psychotics, or most of surrealist art; and Miss Welty employs to good effect the whole manual of ghostliness—wind and storm, ruined buildings, cloaks, horses' hooves on a lonely highway, fire and moonlight and people who live and ride alone. But the evocation of the mood of horror or of a dreamlike atmosphere has become an end in itself, and if, for each story, there is a point of departure in narrative, so that I can report, for instance, that First Love is about a deaf-and-dumb boy who falls in love with Aaron Burr, or that Asphodel is about a tyrannical half-mad Southern gentlewoman, or that A Still Moment is a legend of Audubon, still the stories themselves stay with their narrative no more than a dance, say, stays with its argument. This, indeed, is the nature of "The Wide Net": it is a book of ballets, not of stories; even the title piece is a pastorale macabre.

Now I happen to think that to make a ballet out of words is a perversion of their best function, and I dislike—because it breeds exhibitionism and insincerity—the attitude toward narrative which allows an author to sacrifice the precise meaning of language to its rhythms and patterns. The word sincerity has lost caste in the criticism of serious writing, I know. But this seems to me unfortunate. We live in a very crafty literary period in which what aims to be art but is only artful is too often mistaken for the real thing. When an author says "Look at me" instead of "Look at it," there is insincerity, as I see it. The test of sincerity is wasted in the sphere of popular art, where criticism has sent it; most popular art is nothing if not sincere, and where it is not, it is usually because it is aping the manners of its betters. In these new stories Miss Welty's prose constantly calls attention to herself and away from her object. When she writes, ". . . Jenny sat there . . . in the posture of a child who is appalled at the stillness and unsurrender of the still and unsurrendering world," or "He walked alone, slowly through the silence, with the sturdy and yet dreamlike walk of the orphan," she is not only being falsely poetic, she is being untrue. How does the walk of an orphan differ in its sturdiness and in its dream quality from the walk of a child with two parents? How would you even explain "unsurrender" to a child, and wouldn't a child be appalled precisely by the surrender of the world, if the concept could reach him? This is the sin of pride—this self-conscious contriving—endemic to a whole generation of writers since Katherine Mansfield and most especially to the women of that generation.

Somewhere between Chekhov and Katherine Mansfield the short story certainly went off its trolley. I think it is Miss Mansfield who must be held responsible for the extreme infusion of subjectivism and private sensibility into the short fiction of our day. In Miss Welty's case the subjectivism takes the form, as I say, of calling attention to herself by fine writing; in stories for a magazine like the New Yorker, which happily has no taste for fine writing, the form it takes is rather more subtle—the calling of attention to oneself for one's fine moral perceptions. This is a point I shall develop next week in discussing several other current collections of short stories, including those of Sylvia Townsend Warner.

I have spoken of the ballet quality of Miss Welty's stories: in this connection I am reminded of the painter Dali and—via Dali—of the relationship between the chic modern department store and much of modern fiction. (One day I should like, in fact, to trace what I see to be the direct line of descent from Miss Mansfield to Bonwit Teller.) Although the suspicion intrudes itself that Dali works with his tongue in his cheek, Miss Welty's dedication is of course unquestionable: this should be said at once. Still, the resemblance in performance and the subtle cultural kinship between the two is striking. Both Dali and Miss Welty are mythologists and creators of legend, both take their metaphor from dreams, and yet both are devoted naturalists; and each has a mother-country—Dali, Spain; Miss Welty, the Natchez country—whose atmosphere and superstition permeate his work and whose confines are determining beyond the power of travel or maturer experience to enlarge them. Rather more suggestive, however, than these similarities is their common service to what amounts to a myth of modern femininity.

For if it seemed a strange day for both art and commercialism when Bonwit Teller engaged Dali to do its windows, actually it was not so revolutionary as it looked. In the making of modern myths, the American department store has been at least abreast of the American artist. The chic department-store mannequin is surely one of the great metaphors of our time; the displays of merchandise one of the great abstractions, based upon naturalism, of our art. But more fundamental, we recall the slogan created a few years ago by Bonwit Teller, "Have you that cherished look?" and we realize that it was the department store which stated most unmistakably (so unmistakably, indeed, that the slogan was dropped) the modern woman's dream of herself. Here in all its economic nakedness is the narcissism which is so widely supported in current female writing, including Miss Welty's. This mythologizing of the feminine self, whether by means of clothes or prose, is as far from femininity as from feminism.

There is now running in the magazines an advertisement for a Schiaparelli product, "Shocking Radiance," the illustration painted by Dali. "Shocking Radiance," it appears, is four oils—for the body, the face, the eyelids, and the lips—and to promote its sale Dali has painted a Venus rising from her shell, attended by a trio of sprites, one of whom pours a libation on her breast, while another holds before her the mirror of her self-regard. Even at the risk of satirizing Miss Welty's stories, I suggest a study of this Schiaparelli-Dali advertisement to see the reductio ad absurdum of the elements in Miss Welty's latest work which have no place in such a serious and greatly endowed writer.

Restrictions Lifted on Gift Subscriptions to Overseas Armed Forces

In the past, written requests were required from members of the armed forces overseas before magazine gift subscriptions could be mailed to foreign countries.

The army now approves the acceptance of Christmas gift subscriptions without such requests. The Post Office Department requests that they be placed before October 15, and definitely not beyond the Christmas period.

We urge you to place your gift subscriptions for your friends in the overseas armed forces at your earliest convenience. Our special rate to servicemen remains unchanged—$3 a year.

DRAMA

FOR some time now Broadway has been going through all the motions of beginning a new season, but so far the score, in terms of quality, must be set down as no hits, no runs, and a series of egregious errors. "The Army Play-by-Play," which made the best showing, really doesn't count because it was scheduled for only two weeks. Neither do the revivals of such operettas as "Blossom Time" and "The Merry Widow," which I haven't seen but which are, I gather, adequate but not inspiring exercises in resuscitation. "The music is nice, of course." As for the revivals of vaudeville—this is beginning to sound like the annual report of a life-saving station—one, "Bright Lights," died immediately, and if Frank Fay can keep "Laugh Time" going it will be due to that production's rather shopworn reflection of the glory that was vaudeville, its large infusion of the spirit of radio, and the attitude of the theater audience, which has reached a new high in numbers and what seems to me a new level in toleration. Of this more later.

The only new "legitimate" plays now current are "The Two Mrs. Carrolls," which I have mentioned before, Elmer Rice's "A New Life" (Royale Theater), and "Land of Fame" (Belasco Theater). The Rice play, which is supposed to be serious, is difficult to discuss seriously. It is the Grand Hotel sort of thing which Mr. Rice has done before, only this time it is a grand hospital. Mr. Rice knows how to keep a play moving, and the hospital background is expertly reproduced, even to the bawling of newborn infants, which is authentic. Betty Field, who is very decorative and takes her acting seriously, manages to carry off her part as the young mother with dignity despite rather terrible odds. For, as everybody knows, she is called upon to simulate the throes of childbirth in public, and Mr. Rice has not hesitated to pepper her delivery-room monologue with remarks at which the audience is supposed to laugh—and does. The scene must be set down as sheer and pretty low-cost exploitation. Quite aside from any question of taste, the natural functions, in my perhaps old-fashioned opinion, do not qualify as dramatic material, but, again, the audience seemed to have no objection. The cast as a whole is well chosen except for the husband, who is conventionally handsome and looks like a wooden doll made up by Max Factor. I kept wondering what she saw in him. The radical who knows what it's all about and expresses his point of view in the most simple-minded left-wing terms is uncannily well represented by a young man who might have just come from a fraction meeting. My favorite character—his lines were few—was the old trouper played by a genuine old trouper, Walter Greaza. The only really good scene in the play is the quarrel between husband and wife. "A New Life," even as theater, strikes a low tone, and its social comment, as I have already indicated, is not worth comment. "Land of Fame," which deals with Greek resistance to the Nazis, is surely well meant; but it is so shallow and stagy and amateurish a representation of the deep and continuing agony of Europe that I had to leave after the first act.

Broadway, then, presents a rather sad spectacle at this moment. I second the remark of a talent scout who saw "Othello" in New Haven. "It's a delight," he told Variety, "to see Shakespeare for a change after wading through what's on Broadway."

Yet the Rice play and the Bergner revival are drawing good houses—it is too early to tell about "Land of Fame"—and "Laugh Time" is going strong. Which brings me back to the audiences that keep such productions alive. War prosperity has increased their numbers. The increase has coincided with an acute war-time shortage of good scripts, and most people seeking an evening's entertainment would rather go to a mediocre play than to no play at all. But that doesn't quite account for the apparent attitude of audiences. That attitude is one of passivity amounting to apathy punctuated by indulgent applause at the most feeble attempts at humor or dramatic effect, as if the mere intention were enough. Watching them, I can hardly believe that any play was ever, in the good old phrase, hissed off the stage.

My private theory, which may be wrong, is that the radio audience has finally swamped the theater audience. The radio audience has been conditioned over a period of years to accept, partly by default, bit-by-bit entertainment from which it expects no more than an occasional laugh or titillation and which absorbs only part of its attention. The movie audience is noted for its passivity, but the radio makes far fewer demands than the film.

What effect this extreme toleration will have on the theater I don't profess to know. So far I doubt whether any good plays have gone unwritten or unproduced because the public seems to be satisfied with mediocre ones; but certainly mediocre ones will go on being staged if there is a market for them. This is not a happy prospect; but perhaps the next curtain going up will dispel it.

ART

Feeble War Art

PAINTERS, like writers, have been accompanying the troops as war correspondents. Recently 150 of their "reports" have been exhibited at the Metropolitan Museum, and now these works are to be sent out on a cross-country tour lasting well into 1944. After that the pictures—which were first commissioned by Life magazine—will be donated to the United States government, probably to become part of some permanent war memorial yet to be erected.

The show includes ten painters, of whom Tom Lea is the most ambitious. Lea attempted a lengthy sequence on the last day of the aircraft-carrier Hornet: anxious patrols, bombs ripping decks, water gushing into the hold, survivors dropping off the sides. A great assignment it was, but the result is puny. For Mr. Lea never was moved by this catastrophe. He meticulously finished his silverpoints and polished his canvases—conversing, as it were, in a monotone. Yet he is more impressive than Peter Hurd. Mr. Hurd took a lot of varnish to say that English skies were filled with aircraft, that gunners or pilots sat rigid in their planes, that old castles looked pretty on the greensward. But the tension, fire, and staunchness of the combat are missing. Perhaps they were covered by the varnish. Paul Sample was more sparing with his water-color wash—so sparing, indeed, that his flying fields, camp cooks, and religious services have the aspect of a rather depleted vitality. Edward Laning confected troop trains that slip from the tracks because of their poor drawing. And the color is ashen. Aaron Bohrod's "Idle Hour Park," though populated by soldiers, has more the carnival than the martial note. Fletcher Martin tried very hard, in "Service Club," "Bizerte Ruins," and "Hill No. 609" to say something about the war. A lesson in composition is the only result.

More acceptable, perhaps because more animated, are the water-color "notes" of Barse Miller. Soldiers on guard at tunnels, young chaps lugging up their duffle bags, New Year's Eve in a barracks—these do convey some flicker of spontaneity. Mr. Miller is not adept in his medium, but sometimes he grasps for the lively anecdote and almost gets it. Lieutenant Commander Anton Otto Fischer, well-known illustrator for the Saturday Evening Post, did three more of his customary marine depictions. They have knowledgeability. And Floyd Davis, another successful illustrator, actually laughed and had a satiric moment or two. His tumbling scene in a USO canteen is almost mad enough to be good, and he seldom fails to suggest a direct ocular experience. This was the limitation of almost all the others: they too often gave the impression that they had worked from photographs, in effect, merely tinting them. Such pains are useless, for the camera does better at recording. Hence, too, the general lack of emotion in these reports. They convey little, all too little, of war's calamity, grief, heroism, humor, depth, and generosity. Generally they are cold, noncommittal, dead. If that is good reporting, let us have newsreels.

Why such works should get the support of our museums is still more difficult to explain. Certainly they have nothing to do with art. Nor can it be said that war breaks and severs all art. Constantin Guys long ago, in the Crimean fighting, greatly surpassed these feeble recorders. Our own Winslow Homer sent back many a live, vivid report from the Wilderness campaign. Even Frederick Remington dashed and shouted as he depicted the troops in Cuba. War has produced capable delineators in the past—why not today? And why don't the museums seek them out? JEROME MELLQUIST

RECORDS

COLUMBIA has issued, for September, Serkin's performance of Beethoven's Piano Sonata Opus 27 No. 2 (commonly referred to as the "Moonlight"), which was recorded here (Set X-237, $2.50); and the performance of Weber's Konzertstück for piano and orchestra by Casadesus and an orchestra under Bigot, which was recorded abroad and issued here a number of years ago, and which is now featured as Columbia's record classic of the month (Set X-59, $2.50).

I have the impression that if I heard Serkin's performance of the sonata in a concert hall I would find it well conceived as a whole, though I would be disturbed by occasional crudities of inflection and sentimental retardations and bumpy unevennesses of touch in the first movement. I have to put it in this tentative way because I have to judge by what comes off the records; and the upper range of the recording is so limited or weak that many high sounds in the music are not reproduced at all, while the lower sounds that are reproduced are dull, muffled, and clouded and confused by noise, grit, and—on side three—rattling vibration. With some recordings the defects revealed by wide-range machines have been concealed by limited-range machines; but I have tried this one on everything and found no machine poor enough to make it sound good.

One of the machines I tried it on is in the home of a friend—an editor of a mass-circulation magazine—who exclaimed: "A record company may think it's smart to sell a recording like that if people are willing to buy it; but it's stupid. Someone buys it; and he knows that what he hears must be good because it's Beethoven—the "Moonlight" Sonata — Serkin — Columbia; but he knows also that what he hears is something he doesn't enjoy. All right—it's good music, and good music is not for him; and a potential buyer of records of Beethoven has been destroyed. Multiply him by thousands; and that recording has done enormous damage to the record business and the cause of good music." (If Columbia thinks this is one of the stories that journalists invent to make their points it may have my friend's name.)

Weber's Konzertstück is a virtuoso display piece, but one with passages of delicate charm and loveliness; and Casadesus plays it with brilliance, grace, and finish. But the set is a poor choice for this particular month, since the old foreign recording reproduces the sound of the piano with brightness and clarity and cleanness and quiet background that show up the defects of Columbia's own recording of the Serkin performance. Even the surfaces are quieter, though the records were pressed from the same material and by the same machines as the Serkin records—indicating that the processing of the recording itself had been done better.

A California reader who recently heard all of Beethoven's quartets played by the Budapest Quartet at Mills College writes that "it has been the major musical experiences of our lives," and continues with some interesting observations. For one thing, though she can report that one person stood up most of two hundred miles in crowded trains to hear the performances, she is shocked by the fact that so many who profess to be music-lovers did not attend the concerts; and "while I am not sufficiently naive to suppose that one finds many music-lovers on the music faculties of universities, I was nevertheless surprised to see only one member of the music department here at Berkeley [i. e., the University of California] at only one concert." Then, the reassembled London String Quartet also gave a series of concerts at the University of California, of which the first was "a very sorry affair. . . . I realize that they have not been playing together steadily, and that this makes a great difference, but it is hard to excuse an almost complete lack of unity and two downright sour entrances by Primrose. By the third concert they were in much better form and had much of the style and subtlety that we remembered. I mention this only because I was surprised to notice that the audience went quite wild with applause, forcing one to the conclusion that there is nothing compelling a musician to try to give a good performance except his own integrity, and this must make for a certain cynicism on the part of performers.

"It makes for sadness, rather than cynicism, on the part of the listener, because we, and the composer too, are at the mercy of the performer. This is what is so particularly wonderful about the Budapest—they are such a perfect medium between ourselves and Beethoven. . . . What Beethoven thought and wrote, what the Budapest reads and plays, what conception they have of what conception Beethoven had, what sounds reach us, how amazingly all these unite to bring us the music at last." And feeling presumptuous for saying anything about the musicianship of the Budapest group she adds: "But when I read the local reviews and see the rave notices about the Budapest, and the identical phrases used the next day to describe a mediocre performance by the London, I feel that someone must come out flatly, if not in print, at least in typescript, and say once and for all that there is no other musical organization approaching the Budapest Quartet in any way at all."

I've said that in print; and I say it again. B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

"Music of the Spheres"

Dear Sirs: Last night, while we were listening to the news that Taormina had been taken, the air was filled with an immense, deep vibration. Sometimes I have thought of Goethe's "music of the spheres," but in a pleasant sense. The vibration with its deep low note seemed to fill the room and grip you, as if it were an uncontrollable muscle of gigantic size or an electric current which rendered you powerless. I went out into our little back garden, which contains no more than an acacia tree and, usually, along the wall, a frieze of cats, and which is more or less surrounded by high houses so that the sky space is limited. I was looking for planes in the twilight sky, hardly expecting to see them. And then I saw one flying low, pounding heavily along, and then another. And another. Now and again a small light flashed. Now and again I mistook a star for a light. The heavy planes flew on slowly, relentlessly, heading south, always with this tremendous, vibrating hum—though hum isn't a big enough word for it. I watched them for some time, listened to a crescendo and diminuendo that were so intermingled as to become almost level. It was extraordinarily sinister, and the house-tops helped to make it more so. As it grew darker, I thought the gigantic procession must have come to an end, but then along the skyline of the houses yet another emerged very slowly, and then another until the skyline itself seemed to be broken by bits detaching themselves from it. The emergence of each plane from the solid mass of houses was as impersonal as fate and as terrible. And all the time the frightful vibration went on which seemed to reach from our little garden and the acacia tree to the very top of the sky.

The stern purpose of this endless procession of bombers, their deliberate slowness, the heaviness of it all, hardly bear thinking about. I thought of panic-stricken peoples and the reduction of beautiful things to nothingness or worse. And then I thought of the men in the planes, some of whom would certainly never come back. They must know this and they must wonder which of them it was to be. And I remembered the bombing of London, how we had sat in that very same house and how the inside of it had fallen about us and how a great iron girder from a near-by garage had been flung into the little garden and instead of hitting the house had lodged in the acacia tree. And I thought how the Italians—for it seemed as though it was to be the Italians again—had a few days ago transferred British prisoners to Germany and even how Mussolini had expressed his joy at the honor of being allowed to help in the bombing of London.

It was a long list of indictments, quite sufficient to do more than justify that long, fateful procession of bombers that were filling the whole sky with their progress. And I felt that many of us will have to remember that we are out to stop something awful; the moment the enemy cries out and is panic-stricken and the world is made horrible for him, we shall have to remember this very hard. When the quiet summer night with the thousand noises of little living things that make for peace and loveliness is broken by that sinister vibration, we have to remember the devotion of the lives which go to stop the awful thing that has come upon the world; we mustn't be sentimental—the English are horribly sentimental, and they have no memories; we must be strictly and sternly just. It is a good thing not to shut ourselves away from the fearfulness of retributive bombing but to face up to it, to realize that it is awful, even to see that deadly procession going out on its terrible mission, still more to know, in our own bodies, what that procession is going to do—in short, each and every one of us must shoulder some responsibility for a terrible act which, in this uncivilized world of ours, seems the only means of preventing something even more dreadful.

I couldn't stop thinking about the men in those bombers last night. And the uplift one experiences when—only too rarely—the news comes the next morning: "All our bombers returned safely." I think one of the things which warm our hearts most is the big part your airmen are taking in this most heroic of ventures. I didn't know how we could bear the blitz, but it was quite possible to do so. I can only imagine that airmen, equally, can face an almost unthinkable situation.

What's Wrong?

Dear Sirs: Your issues of August 21 and 28 have stirred me to join the slowly mounting protests in "Letters to the Editors" coming from men in the service.

First, I must join Dr. Niebuhr and Pfc. E. W. in their critical attitude toward service men in general. It is not to be denied that they are "good fellows," yet many are totally lacking in sound moral principles or in any philosophy, sound or unsound, by which to govern their many relations with their fellow-man.

I have been in the service eighteen months, have spent eleven of them over seas. I have seen many men in all branches of the service, and in spite of their vacuous conversations, it would seem that many of them have simply failed to realize their full potentialities. They are mentally alert and keen, but their energies are expended on nothing. This would seem an indictment of our educational system.

It has been amusing—or should the word be disheartening?—to see so many men, looking for something to read, pick up my copy of The Nation, thumb through a few pages, and then pass on. But why should I expect them to read it? Men who can spend hours bragging about their amorous conquests and their staggering capacities for liquor—some put a tank car to shame—cannot be expected to have a moment for sober and serious reading. Why is it that the war has not jarred them loose from indifference and shallow thinking? It still amazes me that men who complain about being away from home and families, men who have spent uncertain hours in fox holes, still can give no thought as to why all this has happened, or why so many must die.

Mine has been a desire to be hopeful for a better post-war world, to be able to see some justification for the small sacrifices I have so far made. Yet, of what avail are the few weak voices of brotherhood and international good-will against the ignorant howl of the pitifully uninformed mass of my fellow-countrymen? Will I be called "Un-American," "unpatriotic" if I venture to say that, at times, I am ashamed of my country? Suppose, for example, that I had to explain past and present foreign policy to a Spanish republican or to a Chinese guerrilla. What could I say? How can I honestly have hope for a better future when so many political acts of my country give the lie to all our fine words? Can I feel other than discouraged and disappointed in the future which looms uglier day by day?

Italy has capitulated. Is my waning patriotism to be snuffed out with Mr. Hull's "blessings on thee little man"? Shall we bolster the discredited House of Savoy and then condemn the Soviet Union for its lack of enthusiasm? Or does the word that Russia has concurred in the armistice give reason to hope for better days?

Presidents and Pressures

Dear Sirs: I have just read I. F. Stone's article, The President and Sumner Welles, in the issue of September 4 with great interest, but find myself somewhat at a loss to understand the position taken by Mr. Stone. It seems to me he has placed a large part of the blame for the present situation involving Welles and the State Department squarely on the shoulders of the President and let it go at that. There is little evidence of perception behind the scenes, or at any rate, a sublime ignorance of the governmental forces which might have motivated Mr. Roosevelt's actions. I view this attempt to lay the blame at the door of the White House, and of the White House alone, as a dangerous new "tack" among liberals which is potential dynamite, playing directly into the hands of the anti-Roosevelt forces.

First of all, the title itself indicates the incorrect emphasis which Stone has given to the State Department affair: The President and Sumner Welles. It is not Roosevelt who should be taken to task but rather the obstinate, recalcitrant, and in some instances out-and-out hostile members of Congress who have hung like dead weights around the President's neck. Admittedly Roosevelt has moved toward the right within the past few months—as evidenced by his support of Hull against Welles, his blast at Pearson, his attack on Wallace, and his indignant repudiation of columnist Samuel Grafton and the OWI. But these are only external symptoms of the great internal pressures being brought to bear on the Chief Executive in a time of crisis. Instead of abandoning the ship of state and its skipper—as the article implies by the reference to "we old-pro-Rooseveltians"—Stone and the rest of us would do well to start cleaning the barnacles off the hull. There are two simple expedients at the present time: (1) to continue support of FDR and his win-the-war policies, and (2) to expose more and more the vicious Congressional sabotage now going on within the government.

Wasn't it The Nation itself which, a few months back, published an exclusive article on the deliberate efforts of antagonistic, isolationist, anti-Roosevelt Congressmen to "gum up the works"? Doesn't Stone read his own magazine?

L. A. GREENBERG

New Rochelle, N. Y., September 11

Mr. Joesten to Mr. Bolles

Dear Sirs: At the end of his penetrating review of my book "Stalwart Sweden" (The Nation, September 11), Blair Bolles writes: "Mr. Joesten himself was born a German, and he has shown that nobody can be more anti-German than a German."

The last time I saw this judicious remark was in the Völkischer Beobachter of Berlin. I did not attempt to explain the matter to the editors of the V. B., but I shall try to do so for the benefit of Mr. Bolles:

I am not and have never been anti-German, any more than I am anti-Swedish or anti-Danish. I have the deepest sympathy for the German people, who has been consistently misled, sacrificed, and betrayed by unworthy leaders. I am even pro-German in the sense that I desire nothing more than to see my unhappy country of origin at last purge itself of all the forces of evil that have controlled it so long and take its place among the democratic and progressive nations of the world. Because I am intensely pro-German in this sense I am, and have been all my life, irreconcilably opposed to Nazism, Fascism, and appeasement.

That Mr. Bolles, who fails to grasp the difference between an anti-Nazi German and an anti-German German, also should feel duty-bound to defend Sweden's policy of interning anti-Nazi Germans while leaving the Nazis free to do as they please does not surprise me. It is merely logical.

As to Sweden and its policies: Mr. Bolles lightly dismisses all my well-substantiated charges, based on a six years' stay in Scandinavia and constant preoccupation with the subject, by merely saying that I have a "grievance." His own knowledge of Sweden springs from a three or four weeks' conducted tour under the auspices of the Swedish Ministry of Propaganda. That, I admit, makes him an authority on the subject.

Workers and Surpluses

Dear Sirs: I have heard much talk about the necessity for draining off surplus earnings of the workers by taxation to avoid inflation. I think such reasoning is absurd. Such talk implies that the worker, our average citizen, hasn't sense enough to handle his personal affairs intelligently. I am sure the worker would resent such implication. Furthermore, if he isn't permitted to retain a surplus earned in an abnormal period, how is he to provide for himself and his family in the subnormal period which is certain to follow? We can't get away from the balancing process—downs will follow ups and ups will follow downs.

Other persons, real and artificial, are permitted to accumulate surpluses for their protection, such surpluses being called reserves for depreciation, reserves for depletion, reserves for bad debts, etc. As a matter of simple justice, the American worker should be permitted a reserve for depression.

Self-respect and self-reliance have been vital American characteristics. We must retain them. Bread lines of depressions and dependency on unemployment insurance have a tendency to destroy both self-respect and self-reliance. With opportunity to provide, and responsibility for providing, for himself and his family, the worker, or the average American citizen, will remain the rock upon which this nation stands.

The Shape of Things

NOW THAT THE REICHSWEHR HAS PUT THE Dneiper between itself and the Red Army will it make a stand or will it merely fight a rearguard action on this natural defensive position and continue its retreat to the west? The answer to this question has an important bearing on the timing of the coming invasion of western Europe. According to Drew Middleton of the New York Times, writing from London, any indication that the German eastern army was becoming demoralized would strongly encourage a revision of the Anglo-American timetable for political as well as strategic reasons. It would suggest a reduction in the risks attending a landing in western Europe, making possible the undertaking of this operation with smaller forces than have hitherto been considered necessary. At the same time the approach of the Red Army to the borders of Poland, and even to Germany itself, would make it politically desirable that the Anglo-American forces should not lag too far behind. This dispatch appeared on September 25. Five days later the same correspondent reported that the majority of military experts in Britain were inclined to reject the popular estimate that the Germans had suffered a defeat of the first magnitude in Russia, and to believe that while their retreat may continue they will be able to make a stand on a shortened line running from Leningrad to Odessa. The facts available do, on the whole, tend to support this view. While the Reichswehr has been forced to retreat rapidly, it has not been routed and remains substantially intact. The comparatively meager number of prisoners reported by the Russians shows that they have not been able to cut off any large segment of enemy forces. But although this may lessen the strength of the political reasoning cited by Mr. Middleton, from our point of view it increases the urgency of an all-out offensive in the West.

THE SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE has finally decided to draft for immediate Senate consideration a resolution on international cooperation to replace the House Fulbright resolution. Chairman Connally had previously declared that in his opinion the Senate should wait until the international picture was clearer before bringing any resolution up for debate.

Fear lest isolationists make statements that would arouse anxiety in Europe or open a breach with our allies appears to have been his primary reason for counseling delay. Fortunately, the President does not share this fear; following a hint to this effect from the White House, Senator Connally announced that he had "changed his mind." Doubtless a full-fledged Senate debate on foreign policy will produce some intemperate and alarming speeches. No one dares to hope that men like Wheeler, Nye, and Reynolds will refrain from statements that will hurt us in the eyes of the world. But these Senators, and others of their type, have been making foolish speeches for years, and it is high time that the world be given a convincing demonstration of the fact that they do not reflect majority opinion, either of the country as a whole or of the Upper House. The decision to shelve the Fulbright resolution is apparently due to resentment at the intrusion of the House into a field which the Senate considers peculiarly its own. We can only hope that this sense of outraged protocol will find appeasement in the production of a resolution even better than that sponsored by Mr. Fulbright.

WALTER LIPPMANN HAS DELIVERED THE dictum that "angry articles in The Nation and PM" about the State Department are not of "cosmic significance." The decision comes as no great blow to the editors, though of course the business office is taking it hard. We are used to hacking away at dragons in our own crude and inconsequential way until such time as real knights like Sir Walter, armed with clarity and charity, decide to give battle. What bothers us about current discoveries that the State Department is unwell, now that rigor mortis has set in, are the pains taken by toplofty critics to dissociate themselves from the "ideological" approach. "What is the good," Mr. Lippmann asks, "of creating a myth about the department's being beset by ideologists when what is wanting is knowledge, judgment, and wise consideration of intensely practical and . . . vital American interests?" If we lived at the heights where Mr. Lippmann has his being perhaps we too would perceive pure knowledge, judgment, and wisdom suspended in a vacuum, without roots in the vulgar soil of "ideology." As it is, we shall have to go on in our angry way relating those attributes to democracy, the only ideology we care anything about.

WHILE WE REMAIN UNCONVINCED THAT the defense of the country is exclusively the function of bachelors and childless husbands, we readily admit that an honest case can be made against the immediate drafting of fathers. What we do not concede is that Senator Wheeler has made out such a case or that he has in fact done anything but reveal the demagogic depths to which his vengefulness toward the President has carried him. The government is riddled with "slackers" who should be taken ahead of fathers was his first argument. Under questioning he was forced to admit both his inability to cite a single instance of draft dodging and his shocking ignorance of the actual number of government men who had been examined and rejected. When this slander was punctured by Senator Barkley, Wheeler pointed out that Britain and Russia are using "thousands of men" who would be classed 4-F by our draft boards. As though these men were substituting for fathers in those countries, or as though any country of the world, in any major war, had ever absolved fathers from active duty. Wheeler then tried futilely to twist General Marshall's testimony to his own purposes, and finally concluded with relish that the "man-power muddle" was attributable to "only one person in the country," supported of course by "bureaucrats" who sit in the safety and ease of Washington. One would think that Wheeler himself were speaking from a foxhole, this man whose only part in the war so far has been a bitter opposition to the Selective Service Act ("this talk about a crisis in this country ought to stop") and untiring efforts to spread disunity and suspicion.

THE INFLATIONARY BLOC IN CONGRESS, relatively quiet since the setbacks of early summer, is again threatening the Administration's stabilization program. In a surprise move the House Agriculture Committee, under the leadership of the farm bloc, approved a bill to guarantee parity prices for all basic farm commodities. Passage of this bill would require the government loans now supporting the principal crops to be made at 100 per cent of parity instead of the 85 to 90 per cent rate now prevailing. Since this would force many food prices above the present ceilings, the Administration would be compelled either to raise the ceilings or to resort to heavier subsidies in order to preserve the existing price level. All proposals to increase subsidies are, however, meeting violent opposition from the same group that pushed the new parity bill through committee. Two large farm-bloc agencies, the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation and the American Farm Bureau Federation, have announced that they will seek legislation prohibiting further direct subsidies such as the one recently announced for milk producers. Meanwhile Marvin Jones, Food Administrator, is preparing to ask Congress for a $500,000,000 increase in the borrowing power of the Commodity Credit Corporation to provide the funds necessary for the roll-back program and for the stimulation of food production. Another bitter Congressional struggle over price policy appears to be inevitable, but the relative success of the roll-back program to date, plus fear of the wrath of organized labor at the 1944 elections, may make the task of the Administration's supporters easier than it was last June.

THE TREASURY'S NEW $10,000,000,000 TAX program, as indicated in Secretary Morgenthau's preview for the benefit of a few Congressional leaders, appears to be soundly based on the principle of capacity to pay. Approximately $6,400,000,000 of the new funds will be obtained from a rise in the rates on individual incomes, chiefly those in the $5,000 to $25,000 bracket. Another billion and a half is to be found by increasing the corporation tax, while the remainder will be obtained from steeper luxury taxes. Although the withholding tax would be stepped up from the present 20 per cent rate to 30 per cent, the burden on families with incomes of less than $2,000 would be reduced through a repeal of the unfortunate Victory Tax. To lighten the burden on the middle-income group, the Treasury has proposed a post-war refund of part of the tax to an amount not exceeding $500 in any one year. A special inducement will be offered to encourage taxpayers to use this refund to purchase government annuities or life insurance at rates based on actuarial tables. This proposal is of particular value since many families in the middle-income brackets are denied protection in old age under the existing Social Security Act, while the advantages of government life insurance have hitherto been reserved for war veterans. Some legislators have suggested that this program might not be liked by the big life-insurance companies, but experience under the Social Security Act has shown that the advertising given to life insurance by a limited government program tends to benefit the big companies.

PALESTINE'S JEWISH COMMUNITY HAS BEEN thoroughly aroused by the charges and insinuations of the British military prosecutor in the six weeks' gun-running trial which recently culminated in the conviction of two Jewish civilians of illegally possessing Australian and American arms and ammunition. Instead of sticking to the proved evidence, Major J. L. Baxter, the prosecutor, built his case on the vague and wholly unsupported allegation that there existed a "huge and ruthless organization" with power and wealth sufficient to obtain arms for the Palestine Jews. He particularly incensed the Jewish group by imputing "Nazi discipline" to the organization and implying that it had the connivance, if not the backing, of the Jewish Agency. The trial has reawakened tension between Jews and Arabs in Palestine. The Arabs profess concern over the steps the Jews may take if immigration is suspended next spring, while the Jews insist that the case is the outgrowth of the anti-Semitic attitude of the Criminal Investigation Department of the Palestine police. Certainly the British authorities in Jerusalem seem to have handled the case with a total lack of statesmanship. It is, of course, their job to stop gun-running—whether Jews or Arabs are involved—but their decision to turn an ordinary criminal trial into a political cause célèbre was unnecessarily provocative. And the irresponsible attacks that have been made on the Jewish Agency are well calculated to increase the influence of Zionist extremists.

WILLOW RUN, THE GREAT FORD BOMBER plant, should have been investigated months ago. Bomber production as a whole is behind schedule, and we hope the letter sent to the President by the United Automobile Workers' local at this famous but continuously disappointing Ford factory will lead the Truman committee to make an inquiry. Despite the man-power shortage at Willow Run, the management still refuses to hire Negro workers, of whom there are 6,000 available in the Detroit-Willow Run area. An additional building is being added to the plant, though its present facilities are idle six hours a day. Personnel and labor-relations policies are bad. Parts departments are being moved from Willow Run, which is to be converted into a final assembly plant. The workers, however, insist "that the record will show that the Ford Company has demonstrated that it can do a much better job of manufacturing small parts and assemblies than it can in performing the final assembly of planes. It has been in the final assembly departments of the Willow Run plant that the company has fallen down." The union "cannot understand why it should be decided, at this late date, to concentrate on this aspect of production, at which the Ford Motor Company has failed so conspicuously." From its first fatal failure to provide adequate housing, Willow Run has been operated in a way that seemed to court trouble and assure inefficiency.

THE RIGHT TO ELECT THEIR GOVERNORS would be given Puerto Ricans by a bill which the President has sent to Congress on the recommendation of an interdepartmental committee headed by Secretary Ickes. Both the President and the Secretary of the Interior have been friends and champions of the islanders, and we hope Congress will pass this long overdue measure. The case for it is eloquently and comprehensively argued by Rexford G. Tugwell, their present governor, in his new report to the Chavez committee of the United States Senate. Less dramatic but equally important is the need to centralize in one pair of hands the operations of all federal economic agencies in Puerto Rico and to make this officer subject to the governor. "If the federal administrators," Tugwell writes of his own troubles with them, "are unable or unwilling to submit to supervision by a Presidential appointee, they will reduce a Puerto Rican governor almost to invisibility." Beyond this desire for greater self-government are the profounder economic and social problems so ably presented by Tugwell. Freedom to Puerto Rico is an illusion unless (1) we enforce the land laws against large holdings, (2) encourage the diversification of agriculture, and (3) help develop new industries to provide employment. The last can be achieved only under government auspices, for Puerto Rican capitalists prefer the protected and subsidized sugar industry.

FRANK E. GANNETT HAS YET TO MAKE GOOD his threat of a libel suit against the author and publisher of "Under Cover," an exposure of fascist activities in the United States, but he is still using it as a means of intimidation. The latest success of the New York newspaper owner is in persuading radio station WGY in Schenectady to cancel a scheduled discussion of the book by its author, John Roy Carlson, and a panel of three critics. Judging by the outcome of Mr. Gannett's previous victories, this action should add thousands to the circulation of "Under Cover." Since it first came under attack this book has shot to the top of the best-seller list and the publishers are hard put to keep up with the demand. They must be grateful to Mr. Gannett.

Expediency plus Caution

WHILE the American and British armies have been thrusting the Germans out of Naples, General Eisenhower and his chief aides, together with Robert Murphy, United States diplomatic representative in North Africa, and Harold MacMillan, British Minister, have been negotiating with Marshal Badoglio at Malta. Although it is almost certain some decision has been reached on the future status of Italy in the war, no official announcement has yet been made. If the Darlan incident taught no other lesson to the Anglo-American high command, it impressed it with the need for seasoning expediency with caution.

Consequently we are now being treated to an unofficial, although rather obviously inspired, build-up of King Victor Emmanuel and Marshal Badoglio. Three different bodies of opinion have to be reassured, or at least neutralized. In the first place, the Italian people have to be persuaded to "rally round the throne," and to this end the King and the Marshal are being permitted to broadcast appeals suggesting that this is the way to rid the country of Germans—an objective which all but a handful of Italians applaud. Thus in an interview in Algiers, beamed to Italy, Badoglio recalled the alliance of Britain, America, and Italy in the last war and said he was "convinced that this new cooperation will produce the same results."

Considering the spoils Italy acquired at Versailles, this suggestion may not sit too well with some of the United Nations—Yugoslavia and Greece, for instance. Nor are the American and particularly the British troops in Italy quite so willing to forgive and forget. The official organ of the British Eighth Army has been extremely frank on this subject, indicating that the men for which it speaks have been disconcerted to find the Italian civil administration hampering their activities. They cannot forget the comrades killed by Italian bullets, and they believe, says the Eighth Army News, that Italians must "pay the price of their folly in believing in Mussolini."

It is easy to understand why the veterans of El Alamein and the Mareth line hold such views; in the interest of army morale, they cannot be left out of account in whatever arrangements are made for the immediate future. Public opinion in America and Britain, however, is apt to take a rather milder stand. It has never been possible to feel that Fascism and the Italian people were as closely identified as Nazism and the Germans. The crime of the majority of Italians has been a negative, fatalistic acceptance of Fascism. But we may perhaps consider that they have made some atonement by their passive rejection of Mussolini's alliance with Hitler and of the war into which it plunged them. If the Italians had fought with the disciplined fervor of the Germans, the task of the United Nations in the Mediterranean theater would have been infinitely harder.

We may agree, then, that the Italian people should be given a chance to redeem themselves by helping to throw out the Nazis who are now ravaging their country. But we also believe that they deserve better leadership in this task than that which is being thrust upon them. And we are not impressed by the inspired statements being put out in an effort to soften or forestall liberal criticism. An Associated Press story from Washington, for instance, quotes an unnamed official as saying that the Italian royal house had a splendid tradition as a leader of liberal parliamentary government. "If the present king has hardly continued that tradition," the dispatch went on, "he nevertheless is the head of the house, thus giving the advantage of legality and legitimacy to the government accepted by the Allies." Hence, it is argued, he is the "natural rallying point for the reestablishment of democratic government." Here we see the State Department mind at work championing the cause of "legitimacy," for which it finds theoretical support in the works of the late Guglielmo Ferrero. Unfortunately, it forgets that the great Italian historian stressed the fact that legitimacy in this age derives from a democratic choice. Thus in urging the Italians to accept the leadership of the king it puts the cart before the horse. He can only achieve legitimacy by winning popular indorsement.

Existing sentiment in Italy clearly rejects the royal house. According to a New York Times dispatch from Capri, the trend of feeling among important elements s toward a republic, and even the army is said to be overwhelmingly anti-monarchical. If this is so, what guaranty have we that the present Italian regime can deliver the goods once we recognize it as head of a "cobelligerent state." It can hardly succeed in rallying he people unless it is put on a much broader basis and ome substance is given to Mr. Churchill's assurance that no arrangements made now will prejudice the right of he Italians to a future free choice of their form of government. This could be done by bringing popular leaders into the Badoglio government, not as window-dressing, but as heads of some of the key departments, such as foreign affairs, finance, the interior, and education.

Italian liberals recognize that the primary task is to rid he country of Nazis. They are prepared, apparently, to put the monarchical question "on ice" for the duration and to accept Badoglio as the head of the army though not as political leader. And on this basis some form of cooperation may be achieved. Badoglio has declared that when the government is reestablished in Rome, "political participation will be extended on a wide basis," while he State Department has agreed to permit Count Sforza o return to Italy. But so long as the campaign to sell the House of Savoy continues, we cannot regard these swallows as signs that the democratic summer has arrived.

The Case Against Cox

NOW that the odor of scandal about Representative Eugene Cox of Georgia has grown too strong even for his friends in the House and he has been forced to resign as chairman of the committee investigating the Federal Communications Commission, it is time for Attorney General Biddle to take his courage in his hands and do something about the case of Cox and station WALB. The Attorney General months ago was given the check for $2,500 paid to Cox by that radio station. He was given evidence that Cox had represented the station in its dealings with the FCC. He was asked to investigate the question of whether the payment to Cox was in return for those services and if so to take action under the law which makes it a felony for a member of Congress to represent a client before a federal court or agency. So far Biddle has done nothing.

Far more courage has been shown in other quarters. Cox's resignation as chairman of a committee investigating the FCC is due principally to two men. The first is Clifford J. Durr, the one member of the FCC who had the nerve to file formal charges against Cox with the Speaker of the House. Durr contended that it was highly improper for the House to permit one of its members to investigate an agency which was in process of bringing serious charges against that member. Sharing credit for forcing Cox out is Eugene Meyer, editor and publisher of the Washington Post.

Only those who know Washington realize that the Washington papers exert a great influence on members of Congress—it is only less great than that of their home-town papers. The Washington Post under Meyer has become the capital's most respected and influential paper. A series of editorials in the Post on the Cox affair culminated in an energetic front-page open letter from Meyer to Speaker Rayburn, printed on September 27. Meyer demanded Cox's removal as head of the FCC inquiry on the ground that "the legislator shall not for private pay place himself in a position of possible conflict with public duty." Three days later Cox turned in his resignation as chairman. This was a victory for decent government, and we congratulate Meyer.

Credit must also go to Representative Magnuson, Democrat, of Washington, a member of the committee investigating the FCC, for threatening to take the fight against Cox to the floor. And the American Civil Liberties Union is likewise entitled to a share of praise. A group acting for the A. C. L. U. placed a comprehensive analysis of the Cox case and the work of the Cox committee on the desk of every member of Congress the day the Washington Post's open letter appeared. The committee was headed by Professor Clarence R. Ayres of the University of Texas and included Charles Beard, George Counts, Morris Ernst, Arthur Garfield Hays, Thomas R. Carskadon, Robert E. Cushman, Dean Christian Gauss of Princeton, William Allan Neilson, Jennings Perry, editor of the Nashville Tennessean, and Clarence L. Watts, a prominent Alabama attorney.

The analysis made by this group paves the way for the next task, which is to remove Eugene L. Garey as counsel for the committee investigating the FCC. The report by the A. C. L. U. committee leaves no doubt about the unfair and one-sided way in which Garey has conducted the hearings, which have "been given over to charges and accusations, largely unsupported by evidence, without a chance for the commission to reply."

The A. C. L. U. report makes it clear that in investigating foreign-language stations, the FCC was not presuming to act as censor but was acting on the instructions of the Office of Censorship. The latter had asked the FCC to look into complaints against pro-fascist Italian and German radio announcers. The witnesses whose grievances were aired by the Cox committee were largely drawn from the stations and the announcers suspected of fascist sympathies. One was an Italian announcer formerly interned as an enemy alien. In this as in other spheres of the inquiry Cox and Garey gave the FCC no hearing, permitted it no defense. The only "free speech" in which they seemed to be interested was that of suspected fascists. We believe the counsel, Garey, should follow the chairman, Cox, into the discard.

Britain Between the Acts

I. WHAT ENGLAND EXPECTS

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

I FOUND Britain immensely difficult to grasp, and now I find it equally hard to write about. Any single concept, any easy generalization, denies itself as soon as it is made. Just before I left London I met with the members of the American division of the Ministry of Information—my official hosts. I tried to tell them what I had seen and what the things I had seen meant to me. My impressions criss-crossed one another; my conclusions were tentative to the point of helplessness. I could have made clearer comments about Britain before I went there.

I say this not by way of apology for what will follow in these articles. The contradictions in British life after four years of war are real: they are important and mark the beginning of the end of a period. It is those contradictions that must be reported and analyzed. The instinct of a reporter is to simplify, to focus his material. Three years ago one could have done that without falsifying the facts. To do it today would be dishonest. Three years ago, even two years ago, Britain was a nation fighting for its existence against unlikely odds. Today it is part of a great coalition certain of ultimate victory but uncertain of what lies beyond victory. Its temper, its behavior partake of both periods. Even its picture of itself is distorted by the swift change in its situation and prospect. English friends told me: "You've come here at a slack moment. This lull affects everybody. We're all tired, and now that things are going well at the front, people are letting down. You should have seen this country after Dunkirk, and all through the blitz." Or they said: "You'll find the workers rather cynical. It's the sort of mood they get into during a lull. They'll come out of it when something happens. Either a big victory or a big defeat stiffens them up."

These comments were true enough; but they were only part-truths. They missed one of the most important facts of all, the fact that Britain is in a process of profound transition. The tension of the months when invasion was a daily possibility, the unity created by the blitz, those are gone, or largely gone. They should go. The fusion of a nation, its ruthless self-discipline, its conversion from a people into an army, are healthy only so long as they are necessary. The girl working at a machine for three-quarters the wage of the man working at an identical machine next to her will accept that situation as long as he and she and their machines are engaged in a struggle for survival. But when a "lull" comes—when the smoke of battle clears and the combatants find themselves not only alive but in sight of victory—then th girl begins to wonder why her pay is lower than his and he too begins to wonder whether it wouldn't b just as well to "upgrade" her so that she can't undercu him and pull down the whole scale after the war. This i the sort of symptom of change you find everywhere i Britain. And you find it mixed with that solid determination and sense of a common cause that still hold th great war machine together. Both moods are there, an many modifications of both. And they affect not onl working people but government officials and journalist and politicians and even factory managers. The future i crowding in on the present, thrusting forward new threat and promises, creating doubts. . . . I asked a forema in a small war plant what he thought would happen to i after the war. Would it keep open? He looked very gri and, for an Englishman, even theatrical. "We'll keep thi place running," he said, "if we have to use a machine gun to do it."

TRANSATLANTIC

The plane was dark and stripped bare of insulation The engines roared, and sleep seemed a remote hope We sat five in a compartment, our light luggage an overcoats strewed around us. N. A., my seat-mate, wa kind beyond all the demands of politeness. He refused t spread out over his share of the long seat; refused even t stretch his legs. He sat quiet as a Buddha, his coat drape over his head, an eyeshade over his eyes, his arms folded his legs propped up on his rucksack. As the noisy hour wore on he scarcely moved. "That's how he survives," decided. "He is not young; he is not strong; but he draw into himself and saves his energy." Wriggling in m corner, I marveled at his immobility. The other occupant of the compartment shifted and heaved and pushed thei luggage around. Our ten legs seemed to multiply in th space between the seats. Once I ventured out into the corridor. A single berth was made up: one passenger wa crossing the ocean in horizontal comfort. Next day discovered who it was—a British M. P., Sir —— —— His exclusive position drew tart comments from severa compatriots; but since he didn't hear them his calm wa unshaken. Englishmen will have to learn to speak loude if privilege is to be made uncomfortable—even in wa time. Its possessors have taken it for granted too long

My first discussion of British conditions was at dinne the second night. We had assimilated the roar of the engines and could hear one another talk. The little dining compartment seemed sociable and bright, and the dark ocean below us was out of mind. My table companion didn't identify himself, and it was not until later that I found he was a member of a powerful old industrialist family and himself a distinguished social worker. He was eager that I should not delude myself into expecting profound social change—or any wide demand for it. "What people want now and will want after the war is security, not change. The men in the forces want their jobs back. They intend to settle down with their families and forget the war. They will vote for people who promise jobs and security; not for those who urge them to rise up and seize new power. Even the young fellows. Many of them have got married during the war. The rest want to get married. After four or five years of war—years snatched out of their education, their work, their normal life—they are looking forward to homes and a settled job."

"I wonder," I said. "Last time there was a lot of restlessness after the war—especially among the demobilized troops. They wanted change. They couldn't settle easily into old ruts. Many went to the left. Many were all but unemployable. Thousands emigrated. . . ."

"Yes, there will be a lot like that. But the men who are emotionally uprooted by war are always a minority; the great mass are normal people desiring with extra intensity the normal satisfactions they've been deprived of. You'll see. In any case, I suggest that you regard skeptically the ideas of leftists who expect great changes after the war."

But his warning was unnecessary. I met very few—left or right—who expect very much.

POST-BLITZ LONDON

London was worse than I had anticipated. The destruction of famous buildings, the empty spaces around St. Paul's, the ruins in the Temple and House of Commons—these I accepted without shock. What surprised me was the minor damage everywhere. Hardly a street is intact. The façades may be whole; but behind them are gutted interiors. The buildings may be sound—and lived in—but the windows are patched. Or entire blocks may give the appearance of normality while in fact every house has been so shaken that it is structurally unsafe for habitation. So many churches were gutted that the blitz came to be symbolized for me by a glimpse of sky through the window of a Christopher Wren steeple.

With Kingsley Martin, editor of the New Statesman, and one of his staff, I visited the East End—street after street of two-story houses in the dreary area down toward the docks. A member of the Women's Voluntary Services drove us. She had worked in that section throughout the worst raids, and both Martin and his associate had put in many days there. Direct hits had wiped out countless houses, but the astonishing sight to me was the rows of structures not smashed or outwardly much damaged but shivered from end to end by lateral explosions. The region is a desert. Houses here and there are lived in; some whole blocks seem populated; but from other sections most of the people have gone. The streets where Mosley's toughs paraded are empty of Jews and fascists alike.

The car stopped at a house in a half-abandoned street next to a demolished church. We walked through to the rear and found an Anglican priest in shabby robes busy tending a garden surrounding a neat lawn. Vegetables grew behind a fine display of dahlias and delphiniums. The priest, Father Richards, had turned the yard of the house and the empty space behind the church, produced by the bombing, into a hidden oasis. We talked a while, and then Father Richards came with us on an inspection of his neighborhood. He had lived there for years, working with another well-known and loved priest, Father Grosser. During the blitz they had done a big job of sheltering and caring for the homeless.

Before the raids began, the government had prepared for a totally different emergency from the one which developed. It had expected wounds and deaths by bombing and fire; London's hospitals had been cleared out and thousands of papier mâché coffins provided. What it hadn't expected were mass homelessness and the destruction of clothes and household goods. Relatively few people were killed, but vast numbers lost everything they owned. As a consequence the authorities were all but helpless during the first great raids; relief had to be improvised in the face of incredible confusion and suffering, and the emergency work was done by the churches and voluntary societies and by heroic individuals like Father Grosser.

The blitz has moved back far enough to take its place in history; but not so far that any of the details are forgotten. People talk about that period of terror as if it were a priceless national possession. They regard it as something to take pride in and exhibit to visitors. And it has produced a voluminous folklore which should somehow be preserved. In it are to be found most of the typical qualities of the nation—its resistance to regimentation, its irritating habit of converting emotion into comic understatement, its talent for creating thoroughly inefficient forms of organization which work with amazing success, even its exaggerated love of pets. All these and a hundred others are imbedded in the endless saga of the blitz—a saga which, like every genuine folk tale at its inception, is still being told by word of mouth. Any individual you talk to has better stories to tell than you ever read.

PLANS AND POLITICS

Several master plans for the rebuilding of London have been made and exhibited. Everybody talks about them. Hitler's bombers have presented the people of London with a challenge that the least imaginative can hardly ignore. A handsome volume embodying the London County Council plan was sold out almost as soon as it appeared. But Father Richards and Kingsley Martin discussed with considerable skepticism the chances of these over-all projects. They doubt whether any of them can get past the organized resistance of the various interests, economic and political, which stand to lose by them. Not even the L. C. C. plan has government backing. And already big sections in the devastated areas have been bought up for speculative purposes. It will take tremendous public pressure to prevent a piecemeal restoration, jerry-built and keyed to profit.

Father Richards said the people of the East End were curiously apathetic about politics. They expect little from Labor and nothing from any other party. A few energetic Communists carry on, but without much following. The electoral truce, however necessary as a war measure, has, he believes, flattened out the opposition and robbed it of its functions. "Of course most of the young men and women are away," he said. "Nobody knows what mood they'll come back in."

In a rather long discussion that followed, he and Kingsley Martin between them developed a position which I shall summarize here without attributing it in full to either man. It is worth setting down for its intrinsic interest and also because it was put to me many times by other shrewd and watchful persons; it is roughly the position of the skeptical left intellectual at this moment in Britain. According to this view, Labor's leaders, both in the party and in the unions, would be afraid of power even if they could get it. They have no serious hope or desire to make a Socialist England. A few modest reforms and retention in the peace of some of the most valuable war-time controls are about all they expect. This moderate program is so obviously essential if economic collapse and dangerous unrest are to be avoided that business and the Conservatives will probably accept it and will keep Labor in a continued coalition to carry the country through the period of demobilization and industrial conversion. Thus a triumvirate of big business, Conservative politics, and official Labor will create a sort of national semi-socialism, propped up on the right by trade pacts and, if necessary, subsidies and on the left by educational reforms, continued welfare schemes, and a fair chunk of the Beveridge plan.

This view, I need not say, is rejected by the Labor people I talked with, whether government officials or trade-union or party leaders. They have, it is true, a stake in a more aggressive and optimistic view of the future; they will also have more to do with creating that future. I shall get around to their opinions in a later article.

Stettinius and State

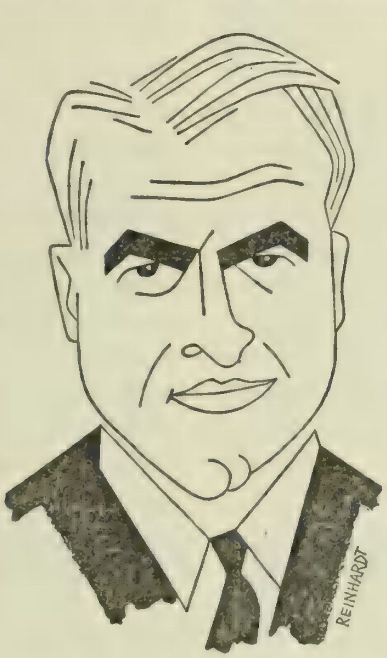
BY I. F. STONE

Washington, September 30

THE inner circle at the State Department suffered a defeat when the President appointed Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., Under Secretary of State and set up the new Foreign Economic Administration. Secretary Hull would have preferred Breckinridge Long or Norman H. Davis as Under Secretary. Some of his closest departmental advisers had hoped to bring Lend-Lease, the Office of Economic Warfare, and Foreign Relief and Rehabilitation directly under State Department control. These agencies were assigned instead to the new FEA under Leo T. Crowley. According to the President's executive order, the new agency was also to take over the Office of Foreign Economic Coordination, which has been operating in the State Department under Assistant Secretary Dean Acheson. But this section of the executive order contained a parenthetic loophole—"(except such functions and personnel thereof as the Director of the Budget shall determine are not concerned with foreign economic operations)"—and the department at this writing seems to be hoping to salvage and retain this office and most of the men in it. It contains many new men and much fresh young blood.

One of the methods which Mr. Roosevelt uses to keep his audience from getting too restive is to shift the scenes and costumes from time to time. If a change had to be made, it wasn't a bad idea to place all foreign economic activities under a single agency, and it was a good idea to organize that new agency outside the State Department. One of the obstacles to good government is the tendency of departments to grow too large for any one man to handle, and a far better administrator than Secretary Hull would have been a bottleneck if these activities had all been placed under his jurisdiction. Crowley has wisely announced that he will retain Lend-Lease, Relief and Rehabilitation, and Economic Warfare as divisions within the new FEA.

Crowley is not one of those characters who burn with a hard, gemlike flame. He has managed to keep several jobs and his health by letting well enough alone. As Alien Property Custodian, he has been nothing to write harshly to the Bank of International Settlements about. Where there has been no outside pressure, Crowley has let big business and the carteleers have their way. But he will also leave alone the progressives under him, provided only that there is peace and quiet. All things considered —I am beginning to feel like Boethius adjusting himself to the barbarians—those agencies could have a much worse boss than Crowley.



Edward R. Stettinius, Jr.

I would not speak harshly of the departed, but it is wise to remember that under Milo Perkins, for all his devoted work and courageous struggle, the Board of Economic Warfare was beginning in many of its sections to be a little replica of the WPB. By a gravitational process whose effects are visible everywhere in government, private interests were taking over control of the strategic posts affecting them. Though Perkins is gone, the same private interests are still active. But Crowley has announced that Lauchlin Currie will remain as executive officer in charge of economic warfare, and I know of no abler or more genuine progressive in Washington. It is equally good news that Crowley has placed Murray Latimer in charge of foreign relief and rehabilitation. Latimer is an old and devoted New Dealer. I know little about Bernhard Knollenberg, who was senior deputy administrator of Lend-Lease under Stettinius and is to remain acting administrator of this division under Crowley.

Almost everyone, including The Nation's own dour correspondent, seemed pleased by the Stettinius appointment. Lindley likes him, Lippmann likes him, the Daily Worker's Lapin likes him (though in moderation), and Helen Essary in Cissie Patterson's Times-Herald positively gurgled. "Mr. Hull, Mr. Stettinius, and Mr. Harriman," Mrs. Essary believes, "will make an elegant trio of good-looking, intelligent Americans when they bow to Mr. Stalin. . . . Long-legged ambassadors are always impressive—and smooth." Stettinius does seem to be what readers of less literate publications than The Nation would call a swell egg—an unfamiliar type in the State Department, where most of the officials seem to be trying hard to look like one of their own ancestral portraits. Since we are gathered together, however, to do more than size up a new recruit for a college fraternity, it might be well to subject the Stettinius appointment to dispassionate scrutiny.

Stettinius is a White House choice, and that means that the Under Secretaryship is once again to be held by a Roosevelt man rather than a Hull man. This is to the good, though the President and his Secretary are much closer than the former likes the liberals to think. Stettinius was acceptable to Hull. Stettinius did not object to giving the State Department greater control over the economic agencies. One plan was to place these agencies in the department and make the heads of each an Assistant Secretary. Stettinius, unlike Lehman, was reported to be in favor of this proposal. For Stettinius does not like to take too much responsibility. He was continually in hot water at the Defense Commission and the OPM when he had to make decisions. He did not begin to make friends and influence people until he was placed in charge of Lend-Lease. Most decisions were made for Lend-Lease by other agencies. Materials were allocated to it by the WPB, food by the WFA, munitions by a joint Anglo-American munitions board. Stettinius could make promises but not assure deliveries. That rested in other hands.

Stettinius is a likable and unspoiled variety of the genus rich man's son. He was one of the big business men cultivated by Hopkins in order to give the New Deal some upper-class support. As head of United States Steel, Stettinius—like J. P. Morgan and Company, the firm's financial advisers—was relatively friendly to labor and enlightened on price problems. At the Defense Commission, where he was in charge of materials, he helped the basic raw-material monopolies, especially in steel and aluminum, to ward off expansion. At the OPM, where he was in charge of priorities, he failed to impose them strictly enough to end the waste of steel, aluminum, copper, rubber, and other vital materials by booming civilian industries. In neither case did his inaction spring from lack of patriotism. He naturally believed what he was told by his big-business colleagues and customers; he is that kind of man. At Lend-Lease, with many young New Dealers on his staff instead of Gano Dunns, dealing with matters which did not immediately affect his own business, Stettinius won the liking of men who had previously attacked him. Again like Morgan, he was friendly to Britain and the Soviets, and this is important in his new position.

He is a man of good-will, but he is not forceful, shrewd, or well-informed. The deft and subtle cliques in the State Department may find this big guileless boy scout easy pickings.

Economics of the Air

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

WHAT will happen to our war-inflated aviation industries when peace comes? Will there be a shrinkage as dramatic as the expansion which has taken place in the last three years? Must we write off as war scrap the colossal investment in plant and machinery? Must the majority of the two and a half million workers now employed in building planes find other jobs? Or have we, as an incident to meeting the demands of war, laid the foundations for an expansion of civil aviation great enough to maintain the manufacture of planes as a major industry?

The scheduled output of the American aviation industry for 1943 is $20 billion—one-fifth of our estimated total war expenditure, one-eighth of our swollen national income. True, it seems unlikely, because of man-power and other difficulties, that this goal will be achieved. But even if we allow for a 10 per cent lag, a total output of $18 billion would still mean a production ten times as great as in 1941 and more than sixty times that of 1938. In 1939 aviation stood forty-fourth in dollar volume among the nation's industries; today it has taken the lead by a huge margin, and it now completely dwarfs the automobile industry, which at its 1941 peak turned out vehicles valued at $3.7 billion.

During the last war, as aviation authorities never tire of reminding us, there was a comparable expansion followed by practical collapse. For a long time government orders were negligible, and large numbers of surplus military machines sold at low prices satisfied the demands both of the amateur enthusiasts and of those professionals who sought a precarious career as barnstormers. It was a discouraging period for manufacturers who had large plants and designs for improved machines but no visible market.

We must remember, however, that prior to 1914 flying was little more than a dangerous hobby and that there had been no commercial development. Under the forced draft of war, techniques of manufacture and operation improved rapidly, and by 1918 aviation was ready for the experimental stage of commercial exploitation. That was the year the United States Air Mail was started, and from then on, although progress often seemed heartbreakingly slow to the impatient pioneers, aviation began to establish itself as an accepted form of transportaion. By the beginning of the present war it was well beyond the incubator stage in the domestic field and was beginning to reach out for international traffic.

When peace comes again, therefore, commercial aviaion will not be starting from scratch. On the contrary, t will have a well-developed organization all ready to go ahead with plans which, but for the conflict, would probably have matured much more slowly. Once again war has proved to be the mother of new techniques. It has fostered new designs, new and cheaper methods of manufacture. It has rapidly advanced the science of meteorology and has promoted the invention of a host of navigational aids. Peace-time applications of "radar," for instance, will make all-weather flying far safer and do much to solve the problems of air-traffic control.

In the last war the plane was only a weapon; in this it is playing an increasingly important part as a means of transport. The Army Air Transport Command is covering more than 90,000 route miles, linking this country with every theater in which American troops are engaged. Hundreds of transocean flights are being made every week with large numbers of passengers and millions of pounds of cargo. And, in addition, the services maintain regular transport flights over many internal routes. Much of this work is being carried out under contract by the established air lines, which are thus being afforded a priceless opportunity for training their pilots in intercontinental flying. "The most important air-line attainment of 1942," wrote Robert S. Morton in Flying for January, 1943, "is this intangible but invaluable experience being acquired in every phase of air-transport operation under almost every conceivable condition. All this, financed by the government, will redound to the benefit of the commercial operators in the post-war period."

Nor are these the only contributions of the war to the future of civil aviation. The training of hundreds of thousands of pilots and navigators and of millions of mechanics is providing both an enormous reservoir of technicians for the industry and a huge potential market of the "air-minded." Again, military exigencies have necessitated the construction of hundreds of modern airfields both at home and abroad. Many of these, of course, have only strategic significance, but others are so located that they can be easily adapted to commercial purposes.

We cannot doubt, then, that after the war conditions will be ripe for a rapid and immense expansion of civil aviation in all its forms. But let us not forget that it will be an expansion controlled and limited by economic factors. Those enthusiasts who prophesy the early displacement by the plane of all other forms of transport are doing aviation no service, for their calculations seem to leave out of account the vital question of comparative costs. In an address delivered in November, 1942, W. A. Patterson, president of United Air Lines, extinguished some of the wilder claims with a jet of statistical cold water. He pointed out that an average freight train operating between Chicago and San Francisco would carry 780 tons of revenue cargo and make two round trips a month at a total operating cost of $50,000. To move the same amount of freight by air, in the same period of time, 57 planes of the Mainliner type used by the United Air Lines would be required at a total operating cost of $1,750,000. Comparisons with ocean-freighter costs are equally illuminating. Mr. Patterson took as an example a cargo steamer carrying a revenue load of 6,400 short tons from San Francisco to Brisbane, Australia. The round trip under peace-time conditions would take about two months, and the total operating costs would be about $120,000. If four-motored transport planes, carrying four tons of cargo, were used to haul the same amount of goods, 1,440 trans-Pacific round-trip flights would have to be made in the same period; 144 planes would be required to perform the job; and these would consume about 18,000,000 gallons of gasoline while the ship was burning less than half a million gallons of fuel oil. The cost of this gasoline alone would be $2,250,000, and total plane operating costs would be $29,000,000. Moreover, in order to lay down the necessary gasoline supplies for refueling in Australia and at intermediate points, three tankers would be needed.

Mr. Patterson's figures are based, of course, on the use of present-day equipment. No doubt these costs will be gradually reduced by the use of lighter metals and materials, by the design of more efficient planes and engines, and possibly by the discovery of more economical fuels. But our inventive geniuses have a long way to go before they can build machines to overcome gravity as efficiently as a locomotive or a ship overcomes surface friction. The major part of the power developed by an airplane motor is consumed in lifting the machine into the air and keeping it there; only a relatively minor portion is available for the task of pulling a useful load.

The economy of the airplane in competition with well-developed land and sea transport systems lies only in the time factor, thanks to which it is able to compete for passenger traffic on medium or long hauls and for specialized freight. In passenger transport the time element serves to increase the costs of the older methods. A man who is spending three or four days in a transcontinental train or upward of four days on a transocean trip wants something more than mere transport; he demands hotel service. That means that every passenger consumes a large amount of cubic space. On the other hand, a plane flying from New York to London in ten or twelve hours, while it may have to provide a meal or two and some kind of sleeping accommodation, does not need to give fifty passengers any more cubic space than a single passenger would occupy on the Normandie. Thus it is not surprising that the air lines are able to forecast future passenger rates to London of about $100 per head, or far below the fares charged by the pre-war luxury liners. And at such rates not only will most of the post-war transatlantic passenger traffic move by air, but a great increase in the total volume of travel to and from Europe can be confidently predicted. The Queen Elizabeth is probably the last of the great floating hotels.

As soon as they can get sufficient new equipment, the air lines will also begin to bite deeply into domestic long-distance passenger traffic. Already the costs of air travel have been brought within striking distance of first-class railroad fares. A recent 10 per cent cut in air-line rates makes it possible to fly from New York to Chicago for only $2 more than it would cost to take a lower berth on a Pullman. There should be still further reductions after the war, and provided that competition between the airplane and the railroad is not artificially restricted, it should be possible in the not very distant future to travel by air at no more expense than is involved in the cost of a railroad coach ticket at present.

When it comes to freight, however, the airplane has an advantage over land and sea transport only when the goods to be shipped have a high value in relation to bulk or when the time element is especially important. Edward Warner, vice-chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board, has estimated the minimum cost of moving mixed freight by air, even when all-cargo planes are used, at 16 cents per ton-mile. Allowing for a post-war increase in efficiency, this authority believes that the cost might be reduced to 14 cents per ton-mile provided speed was kept under 200 miles per hour and frequent stops were made for refueling. Thus the minimum cost of moving a ton of freight by air across the Atlantic would be in the neighborhood of $462, which compares with shipping costs, even at war-time rates inflated by high insurance and crew bonuses, of about $30 for the transatlantic trip, or less than one cent per ton-mile. Obviously as long as anything like such a margin exists, there can be no question of moving bulk cargoes by air. Wheat, metals, gasoline, meat, coffee, machinery—all the items that comprise the major part of international trade—will continue to move by sea for many decades.

It is more expensive to move goods by rail than by water, but even so rail freight rates are far below those charged by the air lines. The average rate on railroad express shipments is around 10 cents a ton-mile, while air express, even after recent cuts ranging up to 12½ per cent, is many times as great. Undoubtedly there is scope for much greater reductions in rates if the air lines organize to get the business, as they have not done hitherto. The recent abrogation of their restrictive contract with the Railway Express Agency is an important first step in this direction.

If within the next few years air freight rates are brought within hailing distance of Mr. Warner's theoretical cost figures, below 20 cents a ton-mile, there will undoubtedly be a tremendous increase in the volume of goods moved by air. But this will not touch the bulk freight business of either railroads or shipping companies. As Mr. Patterson pointed out in the address already cited, the volume of domestic air cargo could increase one-hundred-fold and still capture only 0.1 per cent of the freight now carried by American railroads.

What is likely to happen is that the air lines will develop a good deal of specialty traffic in goods which because of their perishable nature cannot at present be shipped long distances. We may receive in New York, for instance, tree-ripened fruit from California or the Caribbean, or flowers picked in the south of France twenty-four hours earlier. Of a more prosaic nature is the opportunity that exists for the building up of a big business in the carriage of spare parts. Provided they can count on overnight delivery, dealers and manufacturers will be able to absorb additional transport costs by savings on inventory charges.

And while the plane will create new traffic for itself, it will also be the means of originating new business for its rivals. The automobile took many passengers from the railroads, but at the same time it added to railroad freight revenues by its demands for raw materials and the carriage of finished products to distant places. So, too, the growth of the aviation industry will require the services of many freight cars. Shipping will also benefit, particularly the tanker trade, since international air traffic will depend on many bases far removed from fuel supplies.

Assuming that commercial aviation is permitted to develop along economical lines, without interference for the benefit of existing monopolies, what sort of expansion can be safely predicted for the first decade or two after the war? The National Resources Planning Board estimates that within this period air travel in the United States will take more than 70 per cent of the present-day Pullman traffic, which will mean the transportation of roughly twenty million passengers per year. Other good authorities regard this estimate as conservative, and there is in fact reason to believe that the air lines will eventually capture nearly 100 per cent of the long-distance passenger traffic on both domestic and international routes. In 1942 only about 5 per cent of first-class mail moved by air; this figure could be multiplied many times if the air-mail surcharge was abolished—a step which has recently been urged in Congress. Finally, we may expect a very considerable growth in the carriage of goods by air even though the overwhelming mass of freight continues to move by sea, rail, and road.

What will such an expansion in air traffic mean for the manufacturers of planes? Since our commercial air fleet operating over domestic routes comprised only some 50 machines in 1941, even a ten- or twenty-fold inrease might seem rather small potatoes to an industry which is now producing at the rate of 100,000 planes a ear. But if the predictions previously mentioned are fulfilled, an increase of a much greater order may reasonbly be expected. Mr. Patterson, who has earned a repuation for sober prophecy, believes that his United Air Lines alone will require more than 5,000 planes to handle the business which will be developed within the next ten years. On this basis a total commercial air fleet of some 50,000 machines, covering foreign and domestic outes, would not be a far-fetched estimate, and this would mean a replacement market of some 10,000 planes nnually. Add the demands of the export trade and the equirements of the armed services, which are not likely o be reduced to pre-war levels, and we can see that alhough the process of reconversion will be a painful one, the prospects for the aviation industry are not so gloomy as is sometimes suggested. Moreover, we have not taken into account at all the certain but perhaps slower expansion in private flying, for this is a subject that requires separate treatment.

Perhaps the best index to the future prospects of commercial aviation is the huge volume of applications for new routes at home and abroad which are now swamping the Civil Aeronautics Board. The disposal of these applications can hardly be achieved without a settlement of some extremely controversial questions: Should surface transport companies be permitted to enter the field of aviation? Should overseas air traffic become a government preserve, a private monopoly, or be thrown open to competition? On what basis is international air traffic between the different sovereign states to be regulated? These problems will be discussed in further articles.

War Profits and the Press

BY NATHAN ROBERTSON

THOUGH the newspapers are doing their best to keep the public from knowing it, corporation profits are running far higher in this war than they did in World War I, which raised a crop of 23,000 new millionaires.

During the last war there was a lot of talk about profiteering, and yet when the full story was told after the war the public was so shocked that it firmly resolved never to let it happen again. Both major parties pledged themselves to prevent it. Scores of measures were introduced in Congress to control future war profits. And when mobilization for this war started, President Roosevelt promised that a new crop of war millionaires would not be permitted. Since then there has been little talk of war profiteering except with reference to labor unions and farmers. The public has been given the impression hat with a 90 per cent excess-profits tax and a maximum ncome tax of 92 per cent on individuals it can't happen again. Unfortunately, it is happening again.

As was the case last time, we shall not know the full story until the war is over. But despite the silence of most newspapers, the kind of story it will be has already been indicated. Much of the evidence was developed at he recent hearings of the House Ways and Means Committee on the contract-renegotiation law.

Industry has demanded the repeal of the renegotiation law, under which contracts are revised to prevent excessive profits. At the hearings business men tried to show hat they were taking extreme risks for a small and inadequate return, but the evidence they presented was a boomerang. If industry was less harmed than might have been expected, it was only because the newspapers generally ignored the revelations. They carried the business men's scare stories that high taxes and contract renegotiations were going to leave them without sufficient funds to carry on in the post-war period but not the figures that refuted them, even when the figures came from official sources or from the reluctant lips of the industry witnesses themselves.

The most sensational development of the hearings was an estimate by Under Secretary of War Robert P. Patterson that by the end of next year corporations engaged in profitable war work would have accumulated the equivalent of a post-war reserve of more than $42 billion. This is more than the entire national income in 1932, the last year of the Hoover Administration. It is more than the national debt at the outbreak of the war—the debt that the New Deal had incurred to keep the nation going and to feed hungry mouths and that business was screaming would ruin the country. Yet hardly a newspaper mentioned the figure. Most newspapers carried long stories about renegotiation but found no room for Patterson's startling statement.

Actually the Under Secretary's estimate was conservative. He obtained it by adding the following figures, which represent sums that will be available to the prosperous corporations by the end of next year at the present rate of profits: $2 billion in post-war refunds from excess-profits taxes; $22¼ billion in undistributed profits retained by the corporations out of their war business after the payment of all taxes and dividends during the years 1941-44; $5 billion in new plants and equipment paid for by the companies out of their war business, in addition to profits; $13 billion in excess-profits taxes available for refunds to the corporations if their profits should fall below normal in the two succeeding years.

Treasury figures show that Patterson's figure of $13 billion available for post-war refunds from war taxes was a gross underestimate. The amount, at the present rate of accumulation, will be $26 billion. This $26 billion constitutes a virtual guaranty of normal profits and makes the demand for additional post-war reserves sound a little hollow. Thus revised, the figures given above, most of them representing war profits, add up to more than $55 billion instead of Patterson's more conservative $42 billion.

Over and above this huge sum, the corporations have acquired other potential wealth from the war. The government has built for them, for war production, more than $14 billion worth of plants and machinery. Many of these plants will have great value after the war. The companies have options on them, and will probably be able to buy them for much less than their cost. In some cases the government will have to take the prices offered by the companies or junk the plants. The total of post-war reserves and possible collateral benefits derived from the war is therefore about $70 billion—in addition to the profits enjoyed by stockholders during the war and the swollen salaries paid to corporation officials.

Patterson emphasized these swollen salaries again and again. He said that increases in corporation salaries from $5,000 to $50,000 were a "very common thing." "We find salaries going up from $5,000 and $10,000 to $100,000," he said, "and the men who get them think they are worth it. But I say the soldiers are serving for $50 a month. If that be demagoguery, make the most of it. I don't think we need to allow such salaries. A man has to be a whale of a good man to be worth that much."

Randolph Paul, general counsel of the Treasury, told the committee an almost equally sensational story without breaking into the headlines. Paul reported that the corporations in war work were making this year the unheard-of profit of $8.7 billion after all taxes were paid. Since some companies losing money were included, profits of the money makers would be over $10 billion. This figure, only slightly higher than that put out by the conservative Department of Commerce, is more than double what the corporations were making before the war, more than they would have made in the fabulous year of 1929 if they had been forgiven all federal taxes, and far more than they made in the best year of the last war.

Corporation profits, after taxes, were estimated by Paul at $24 billion for the three years 1941, 1942, and 1943. This compares with about $4 billion for 1939, the last year of peace in Europe. His figures disclosed how corporations are able to realize such huge profits in the face of a 90 per cent excess-profits tax. They do it by pushing up profits faster than taxes, so that their taxes—normal as well as war taxes—are passed on to the government and the public in the sale of their products. This year they will have pushed their profits before taxes up to the record-breaking peak of $22 billion, or four times what they were in 1939. That is the measure of what corporations have done to raise the cost of living through inflation. Profits of some corporations have multiplied ten, twenty, even one hundred times.

Several of industry's witnesses before the committee frankly admitted that they were passing on their taxes to the government by raising their bids on war contracts to cover their income and excess-profits taxes. They seemed surprised that anyone should think they were going to pay income taxes out of profits. Some of the Republicans on the committee agreed that this was a preposterous idea.

Paul's figures also showed how corporations have concealed their vast war profits—so that even their stockholders don't realize how much they are making—by pursuing a conservative dividend policy. Corporations dividends are running only slightly higher than in 1939 and are actually lower than in 1936 and 1937. Only about half the profits are being paid out in dividends; undistributed profits for 1941-43, inclusive, are estimated at almost $12 billion. This, however, is a deceptively low figure since it includes the companies losing money. The profit-making corporations will have accumulated $16 billion in the three years. The Securities and Exchange Commission recently reported that United States corporations have $33 billion in quick, liquid assets.

From the standpoint of the public this conservative dividend policy is wise because it helps to control inflation and provide post-war reserves. It is still wiser from the standpoint of the companies: it fools the public, and if the profits are distributed after the war instead of now, they may be subject to lower individual income taxes.

The contention of Patterson and Paul that war contractors are making too much was fully substantiated by the testimony of the big business men who are administering the renegotiation law. The Office of Price Administration has recently provided similar evidence on the profits of consumer industries. Its studies have shown that meat packers and manufacturers of hosiery for women have multiplied their profits many times while they have been complaining about price ceilings and the grade labeling that makes ceilings effective.

Industry failed to make a case for repeal of the renegotiation law. Although its stories of poverty were sympathetically received by the Republicans on the committee and by one or two of the Democrats, every witness who was forced by more skeptical committee members to compare his war with his peace-time profits revealed that he was making many times what he did before other men began to give their lives for their country. The committee turned down the repeal demand but is still considering amendments that might gut the law. The evidence, however, indicated that, instead of being weakened, the law should if possible be strengthened, because even a 90 per cent tax cannot recover excessive profits if corporations are allowed to make too much before the taxes are applied. For the same reason, price control needs to be much stiffer.

The facts about war profits revealed at the hearings are of even greater value in connection with the tax problems now confronting Congress. Congressmen are talking as if it were impossible to raise the $12 billion the Administration needs to finance the war without taking it from the pockets of men and women who have not enough to live on decently. The figures presented by Paul and Patterson indicate that several of those billions could be taken from the corporations without starving anyone—even the much-talked-about widows and orphans who live on their dividends.

Although the excess-profits rate is already 90 per cent, there is room for higher rates on normal corporate profits. The Treasury last year wanted 50 or 55 per cent, but Congress refused to go above 40 per cent, and wrote a top limit of 80 per cent on the taxes that could be applied to a corporation, regardless of how excessive its profits might be. The post-war refund should be applied to normal taxes instead of excess-profits taxes. The companies which face trouble after the war are the ones which have not shared in the fat war profits. All the benefits so far have been for the profiteers. Corporations which have had excessive profits during the war should not be the only ones to be allowed post-war refunds.

But aside from raising rates, there are other ways to tighten up the taxes on corporations. Many of them have found wide loopholes in the tax laws through which they can squeeze their excessive profits without sharing them with the government. One of these loopholes is the formula for computing excess profits, which the corporations virtually wrote themselves. It conveniently permits them to choose the easiest of two lenient methods. They can measure them either by their normal peace-time profits, no matter how excessive these may have been, or by their invested capital, in which they can include capital long since lost and almost forgotten.

The corporations are doing a lot of talking about the risks they take. But most workers and farmers would gladly pay more taxes in return for the guaranty—already provided for the war profiteers—of a normal profit for two years after the war.

ON OCTOBER 10 the Associated Press will send to its member papers a feature story to the effect that the remaining kings and royal houses of Europe have always opposed totalitarianism.

A HANDBILL urging the election of Edward A. Carey as mayor of Detroit explains the race riots thus: "The high prices charged by the Jewish merchants of Hastings and Antoine streets were responsible for the unrest we find amongst the colored people. . . . There is no reason why the mayor of a large city should confine himself to local affairs, if his ideas will benefit the nation at large."

BOTH THE OWI and the State Department have disclaimed jurisdiction over the broadcasts of the United Nations radio station in Algiers. In the resulting confusion supporters of Marshal Badoglio have twice used the station's microphones to present propaganda for the Marshal's regime.

He was released and told to leave the Delta and never return. Now, however, he is back—in jail at Clarksdale, Mississippi. He was arrested by the FBI in Florida on a charge of impersonating a federal officer. The uniform he wore when arrested consisted of army trousers and shirt of World War I vintage, without insignia.

ACCORDING TO the Wall Street Journal, General MacArthur's "garrison hat is in the ring" for the Republican Presidential nomination. In this connection political observers have noted a possible link between the general and the Midwestern groups who are promoting his candidacy in the person of Phil La Follette, now a lieutenant-colonel on his staff in Australia. La Follette, ex-governor of Wisconsin and founder of the short-lived National Progressives of America Party, was a leading isolationist until December 7, 1941. He applied for a commission December 8.

Poland and Russia

BY MARCIN RYLSKI

POLAND and the Soviet Union are the only United Nations with no official diplomatic ties. Following a procedure often observed in time of war, though never before between allies, the Polish government has asked the Australian minister to take charge of Polish interests in Russia. With the Soviet Union playing an increasingly important role in European affairs, Russo-Polish relations have become the dominant problem of Polish politics.

The leaders of the Polish left are in practical agreement with conservative Polish groups on this issue. Indeed, it is a question which transcends the boundaries of parties, as the Foreign Committee of the Polish Socialist Party in London openly acknowledged in a resolution adopted on June 30, 1943: "In the present conflict between Poland and the Soviet Union the attitude of all Polish groups is similar. Any assertion that there is a split between Polish democracy and Polish reaction on this matter represents the interference of foreign elements in Polish internal affairs—and we reject such interference resolutely."

The official policy of the leadership of the Polish labor movement and the Polish Peasant Party in London upholds the integrity of the Polish frontiers of 1939. It denies the Soviet thesis that the eastern portions of Poland, occupied in 1939 by the Red Army, belong to the Soviet Union as integral parts of the Ukrainian, White Russian, and Lithuanian Soviet Republics.

The Soviet and the Polish governments have stated their respective positions many times. It is undeniable that the territories in question—especially if some rectifications of boundaries are made—have Ukrainian and White Russian majorities, the Poles constituting an important minority. But the Polish boundaries established by the peace treaty signed at Riga in 1921, ending the Polish-Russian war, aroused no debate for eighteen years. The Polish government wants to reestablish those boundaries. The Soviet government, however, invoking the right of nations to self-determination, demands that the Ukrainians and White Russians who suffered under Polish rule be allowed to join the Ukrainian and White Russian Soviet Republics. It bases its case on plebiscites conducted in these regions in October, 1939—plebiscites not recognized by the Polish and other Allied governments.

That either government can prevail upon the other to yield is more than doubtful. The Soviet Union, elated by its military victories and inspired by a growing nationalism, will not abandon its program voluntarily. Since this is so, the logical course for Polish groups which make the reestablishment of the frontiers of 1939 their basic claim is to seek the aid of external forces capable of coercing Russia. Official Polish policy is therefore trying to win the support of the Anglo-Saxon allies for its program. It represents Russia's demands on Poland as part of a larger desire to dominate all Europe and sections of Asia. Poland is the test case, it affirms, and any concessions to Stalin on this question, any attempt to "appease" him, would only cause him to formulate new demands.

All Polish plans for the post-war organization of Europe, particularly of Central-Eastern Europe, have the same starting point: Poland is always conceived of as it was in 1939, with the military force of any federation made up of Poland and its neighbors unalterably opposed to the Soviets. Official Polish policy is based on the consolidation of the United Nations alliance, under Anglo-American leadership, without or even against Russia. It expects that Russia will emerge from the war in a seriously weakened condition, and that it will be obliged, in order to obtain foreign help, to make certain political concessions, among them the recognition of the Polish claims. Another hope—which appears rather fantastic at the present moment—is that the Allies will enter Poland before the Russians and restore Poland to its boundaries of 1939 under the direction of the Polish government in London, and that Russia will then have to accept the fait accompli.

The Russian issue is considered so all-important by the Foreign Committee of the Polish Socialist Party—and the majority of other Polish political groups in London and the United States agree—that in the above-mentioned resolution of June 30 "all those who on this fundamental question have a different opinion" are declared to have "placed themselves outside the Polish Socialist Party." The declaration applies particularly to a group of Polish democrats and Socialists in the United States whose outstanding representative is Oscar Lange, professor of economics at the University of Chicago. With twenty-nine other well-known Polish democrats Professor Lange signed an "Appeal to Reason" opposing the policy of the Polish government in exile. Among the signers were Julian Tuwim, the modern Polish poet; Arthur Szyk, the cartoonist and painter; Professor Karpinski of the University of Michigan; Dr. Ossowski, president of the American Slav Congress of Michigan; Jerzy Splawa Neyman of the University of California; S. Z. Stachowicz, former officer of the Polish army; and many Polish-American political and union leaders.

On August 6 the London Tribune published a letter from Edward Puhacz, who spoke for a group of Polish émigrés in Great Britain. This group, the letter said, were "greatly perturbed" by the anti-democratic policy of the Polish government in exile, a policy which they believed to be "detrimental to the interests of Poland and the war effort." The writer cited the scarcity of volunteers for the Polish army as indicative of the lack of confidence in the present government. "In 1918, 28,800 Poles from North America volunteered for the Polish army formed on French soil; the corresponding figure for this war is 600. As against this, 17.5 per cent of the volunteers for the United States army are of Polish nationality. In Great Britain, of 1,900 Poles subject to call, only 140 responded to the notice of the Polish consul general; the rest chose the British armed forces."

In the view of these democratic "oppositional" groups, close cooperation and friendship with the Soviet Union are prerequisites to the restoration and maintenance of Polish national independence, in fact, to Polish national existence. Situated between Germany and Russia, Poland cannot fight against both. The Polish nation can win freedom from Germany only with the help of the Russian army. There is no basic antagonism between the interests of Russia and Poland, just as there are no irreconcilable differences between Russia and the Anglo-Saxon powers. The reconstruction of Poland is part of the general reconstruction of Europe, which demands the sincere collaboration of all the United Nations. Poland's interest lies in strengthening the cooperation of the United States, Great Britain, and Soviet Russia, not in playing upon their differences, as the Polish government in London does.

Responsibility for the Polish-Russian crisis, according to the "opposition," rests primarily with the Polish government in exile. Under the pressure of reactionary elements in the emigration, it has abandoned the policy of collaboration with Russia inaugurated by the late General Sikorski and adopted an outspoken anti-Russian line. "The activities of the press, of the information services, and of the diplomatic representatives of the government in exile have thwarted General Sikorski's personal efforts," writes Professor Lange. "Having signed an agreement and an alliance with the Soviet government, General Sikorski was unable to deliver the goods."

As for the eastern boundaries of Poland, the democratic opposition believes that the question should be settled amicably with the Soviet Union in a way that would safeguard the interests of the Ukrainians and White Russians as well as those of the Polish and Jewish minorities living in the disputed territories. The essential condition of a settlement is that no populations be kept within the boundaries of a Polish state against their will. Thus the democratic principle of self-determination is opposed to the legalistic formula of the Polish government, which bases its demand on the Riga treaty. Since the Ukrainian and White Russian populations were, in the main, dissatisfied with Polish rule, this position implies the renunciation of territories with a non-Polish majority. Rectifications of frontiers are considered desirable and possible, but they can be accomplished only if the foundation has been laid for harmonious Polish-Russian relations, similar to those between Czechoslovakia and the Soviet Union. The "opposition" favors rapprochement with Czechoslovakia and accuses the Polish government of having aroused antagonism between the two Slav nations.

Besides New York and London the Polish political emigration has a third center in Moscow. The Union of Polish Patriots organized there a few months ago by elements from various political camps—its leaders include a few Polish Communists—takes a position on Poland's foreign policy similar to that of the oppositional democratic groups in this country. Its ideological declaration states that while Poland wishes to unite all Polish territory within the Polish state, it does not want one square inch of Ukrainian or White Russian land.

The factor that must determine Polish-Russian relations and therefore the future of Poland is not the feelings and ideas of Polish refugees in Great Britain, the United States, or Soviet Russia, of Polish-Americans, or even of the Polish government in exile or the leaders of pre-war parties, but the attitude of the Polish people in their own land. Unfortunately, it is very difficult to obtain exact information about this. There is no open political life in occupied Poland, no elections or Gallup polls. The sentiments of the Polish people are actively expressed only in the heroic and unconquerable underground, which has carried on the fight for liberation for more than four years. The Polish government in exile has frequently declared that its policy is supported by the illegal movement in Poland, that there is complete agreement between the political leaders in London and their friends in Poland. But certain underground organizations in Poland reject the policy of the Polish government and hold a position similar to that of the opposition. Like the Polish emigration, the Polish underground is divided, and bitter discussions, even fights, have occurred between the representatives of the various groups. No one can say who represents the majority of the population. Attempts to hide this division by asserting the complete unanimity of the Poles or by maintaining that the opponents of official policy are agents of foreign powers will not change the situation. The Poles of the Kosciuszko Division in the Soviet Union, like others who oppose the foreign policy of the Polish government, are just as genuine Poles as their compatriots in the Polish army in Great Britain and the Middle East, or the elements supporting the Polish government in exile.

Political opinion in Poland is not fixed. It is in process of developing and is slowly moving toward expression. The attitude of the Polish masses is being forged by the struggle for liberation from the German oppressor. At the moment of victory they will perceive the paths open to them and make their choice. This choice will decide the future of Poland.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

SOME time will pass before we know what actually took place on the Russian front in these past weeks. Were the Germans defeated again and again in a gigantic series of battles? Or did they voluntarily carry out a just as gigantic continuous retreat—and if so, why?

Meanwhile one fact is certain: all during this time the situation has been described to the German public in a way that is without precedent. It has never been said that the retreat would soon be stopped; not even the hope that it would be has ever been expressed. It has never been suggested that somewhere the terrain might offer a chance of digging in. In fact, any consideration of whether the troops might soon be able to make a halt has been rigorously excluded. As the front drew nearer to the Dnieper, the newspapers and radios of the whole world discussed whether the Germans would take their stand behind it. Not so the German newspapers and radios. The defensive possibilities of the wide river have not been mentioned. German propaganda has spoken of the awful losses of the Russians, but for weeks it has suppressed every reference to a conceivable end of the retreat. The conclusion is unavoidable that the German leadership during all this time has looked forward to a long unbroken withdrawal as an absolute certainty.

Since July the Free German Committee in Moscow—in conjunction lately with the affiliated Generals' and Officers' Committee—has been addressing Germans in the Reich by radio. What does it say to them? An authoritative analysis of all the material broadcast up to the middle of September was recently undertaken. Its results are interesting.

Thirty-six per cent of the propaganda items can be described as mere generalities: Germans were told that they and the Reich would be saved; that the new Germany would be "free, independent, united, a juster and better place." The rest were only slightly more specific. Items addressed to labor were the most numerous: 11 per cent guaranteed the eight-hour day, adequate social security, and the like; 9 per cent promised the destruction of the big trusts. The next largest number were directed to middle-class listeners: 5 per cent proclaimed that the working class should not impose its special interests on the rest of the population; 6 per cent guaranteed the restoration of legal justice.

Numerous other topics made sporadic appearances. References to each of the following formed about 3 per cent of the material—a democratic government, a true national government, an "honorable ending" of the war, freedom of religion, protection for the "seduced" members of the Nazi Party. Among the items in the 2 per cent group the most important were freedom of press and speech, restoration of property to its rightful owners, equality before the law, a genuine German culture, and retention of their jobs by civil servants. About 1 per cent of the material was devoted to freedom of trade, freedom of assembly, continuation of the German armed forces, punishment of the war criminals and of guilty Nazis.

"Freiburg Youth," cried Kreisleiter Fritsch at a meeting on September 11, "you are assembled to pledge loyalty to the Führer. German youth must set a historic example at this time, when treachery is rearing its head. And we do not refer merely to the conduct of Victor Emmanuel and Badoglio but also to that of traitors now appearing in various guises among our own people."

"The saboteurs of morale at home," said the Gauleiter of Weser-Ems on September 9, "may in the future meditate behind bars whether it is right to deceive millions of decent, industrious Germans with false reports and unscrupulous gossip."

These remarks strike the tone of a campaign that is being carried on through meetings held all over Germany. And the same emphasis is found in an increasing flood of newspaper articles. But the phrase "meditate behind bars" is an understatement. There is a rising tide of death sentences and executions for "spreading mendacious reports," for "having tried to undermine the confidence of a young woman by malevolent lies and exaggerations," and for similar offenses.

Still worse things, however, must be going on without interference from the law or the courts. For in an arresting article that appeared in the newspapers in mid-September State Secretary Rothenberger of the Ministry of Justice admitted that even the courts and judges were not functioning satisfactorily. "It is no secret," he said, "that the German judiciary has not succeeded in winning the confidence of the Führer and the party." Therefore the judiciary has had to be shoved somewhat into the background. The State Secretary found this justifiable and natural: "The present outcry about lawlessness, arbitrary methods, legal insecurity, etc., is due to a lack of understanding of the political situation."

Reflection

Looking in time's long mirror
What image do you see?
One holding a golden basin
For the hands of authority.
We are haunted by the Roman
Face, ominous and tired,
As by the womanish gesture
Of one who has desired
To be free of choice: a burden
Too heavy for old men.
The image in the mirror
Reveals itself again.
The silent governor washes
One hand with the other hand.
The soldiers wait in silence,
And humble as the sand.
We stare on that repeated
Scene till our eyeballs ache.
Will a sandstorm rise? Will the mirror
Crack? Will the image break?

BABETTE DEUTSCH

On the Creative Imagination

BY ROLFE HUMPHRIES

THE common belief is that the artist's imagination is a hectic gift, not a constant presence; that it comes and goes, in unpredictable ways, and that, when it is gone, it leaves its sometime host in a wretched and barren state, with nothing to do but wait, pray, and suffer, until its return. This belief, I think, is false; the truth is that for those blessed, or cursed, with its possession, imagination is always there, and always working. It is always working; but it works in two different ways; and in one of these two ways it also works doubly, either forward or backward, outward or inward, directly or in reverse.

To begin with, the imagination can work passively—taking in, not giving out; receiving, storing, assimilating, combining, preparing to distribute, sensations and impressions. The period may be likened to that in which a battery is charging. It is not a dead period, though the longer it lasts, the more it may seem so, and to submit to the process requires great understanding and patience. It may be as prolonged as Jacob's bondage for Rachel, and the energy acquired during a long time may be discharged in a very short one, in a brief and almost unbelievable storm of brightness, like that in which Rilke wrote down the Duinese elegies and the Sonnets to Orpheus.

The converse of this state occurs when the stored-up current of energy is actively discharged directly and outward in valid and viable works of art. But the flow of creative imagination can operate, also, in the reverse direction; and its operation, under these circumstances, is much less clearly understood. I am not too sure of the right terminology for the metaphor, but I suggest that reversed polarity may describe this discharge of energy in the wrong direction, inward, not outward; toward, rather than away from, the individual: the stream backs up, instead of flowing normally. The creative imagination then becomes subjective rather than objective; egocentric rather than ecstatic (Shelley said that poetry was the opposite of egotism); fantastic rather than real; secretive rather than given to communication. This may, if we are simple-minded enough, if our genius is sufficiently comic, result in a harmless and happy state, as described, for example, by James Thurber in "The Secret Life of Walter Mitty." But for one beatific neurosis, there are a thousand—the figure is inexact—malevolent and destructive ones. More often than not, the artist's tragic sense of life combines with his critical standards to inhibit wishful-thinking fantasies; he is more apt to err in the direction of anxiety, doubt, despair, apprehension, and dread. This tragic sense of life, which might create great characters and heroic action if the current were going the right way, now, with it flowing inward, fails into pathetic fantasies, with their author always in the role and poses of the helpless victim. Hinc illae lacrimae—of jealousy, hatred, suspicion, worry, self-pity; we are imposed on, we are persecuted, or we are guilty. And the worst of it is that while the imagination is always working, it works, now, with such power, its artistry is so subtle, that the subject, never suspecting its presence, is convinced, first, that his imagination has left him for good—or evil—and, second, that the fantasies he is creating are entirely actual and real. Theologians, describing this state, might say that Satan has taken your soul from God; clearly, you are not in a state of grace, or even in a position to believe that a state of grace is possible.

Now there are men—"autists" would describe them better than "artists"—through whom this current can flow with little resistance; it goes through them, and they deflect it enough to get it flowing circular wise, so that it emerges in an apparently outward direction. They have not, however, produced works of art—though they may think they have—but, in most cases, masterpieces of self-expression, more or less unconscious. (These men are usually great haters of technical excellence; they claim that its study inhibits their "inspiration.") It is extraordinary, the extent to which these masterpieces are mistaken, by critics, for works of art—the confusion would still exist, I think, even if it were not confounded by the commodity value of these performances. (What review of literature, what weekly book supplement, for example, is not really a trade journal?) Some of the admiration for this work is legitimate in that it is directed, not to the product, but to the manifest energy; but this energy is controlling, not controlled by, its host; it is compulsive, not compelled. Still, however little health there is in it, we are impressed, and cry out: Deus, ecce Deus! But the god is Dionysus, not Apollo. (And, by the way, how wise were the Greeks in making the latter lord not only of art but also of healing!) Most of the poems of Robinson Jeffers, the plays of Eugene O'Neill, the novels—or is it novel?—of Thomas Wolfe, belong, I think, in this category. And below this level we can proceed all the way down from the third-rate autobiographical novels, the weird and howling music, the fetal and fecal surrealist paintings, to the murder-per-page detective stories, the pornography of the comic strips, and the genteel verses that people are always writing to the Sunday Times to inquire about.

As distinguished from these we have the minor artists. Of them the worst that may be said is that they are deficient in energy. I do not think this is true; they possess, rather, to an almost hypersensitive degree, scrupulous and fastidious critical taste. They can make the distinction between fantasy and art; is this what people were trying to say, in their vague, romantic way, a hundred or so years ago, when they condemned fancy and exalted imagination? The minor artists know that stuff that comes too easy is never any good. They are constantly striving for technical improvement, and readily draw down on their heads the ire and ignorance of those who say they are more concerned with form than with content. A lie, of course, for which, if there is any just God, a lot of damned souls will fry in hell forever. These minor artists, also, know better than to repeat themselves. Their production, while scant, is of consistently high quality. Their work is durable. The penalty they must pay is that of enforced silence; and of enduring, in their personal lives, the backing-up, the reversed polarity, of the creative current. The struggles of a Housman or a Hopkins testify to the agony of spirit they must abide. Whether they can learn to control the current, to reverse its direction, is problematical. It might be possible: Rilke hinted at the possession of a secret when he said that the moment of inspiration must not be waited for, but must be summoned and seized; but he was most discreet as to how it might be summoned, and that, perhaps, is something everyone has to find out for himself. The beginning of wisdom, for this kind of artist, might be to understand, in these periods of difficulty and trouble, what is happening, and that his sufferings testify not to the absence but to the presence of his genius. The inane never suffer. Your Furies are your well-wishers, if you will face them and hang on to them in all their protean forms, and not let them harry you down the nights and down the years.

It must not be supposed that the great artist suffers less from devious phantoms and horrid apparitions; on the contrary. His sensitivity is so exquisite, his capacity for experience so tremendous, that his sufferings must be almost godlike—Can ye drink of the cup that I drink of? But the great artist, though even he may not be able to command the current to flow as he wills, can take it, and he can use it, greatly. The autists, under compulsion, may do more; the minor artists, under restriction, may do as well, if not as much: the great artist combines quality and quantity and transcends both. His tragic sense of life comes out with gaiety transfiguring all that dread; he is profound but never gloomy. From the middle road of our life, from the dark wood, Dante came through the Inferno to the high vision of the love that moves the sun and other stars. Inferna tetigit possit ut supera assequi. The personal, with the great artist, becomes the universal.

Two Revolutions in Plowing

THE AMERICAN LAND: ITS HISTORY AND ITS USES. By William R. Van Dersal. Oxford University Press. $3.75.

PLOWMAN'S FOLLY. By Edward H. Faulkner. The University of Oklahoma Press. $2.

THE first of these books makes record of the fact that the straight furrow is out of date in American agriculture. The second prophesies a complete abolition of the sort of plow which, on the official seal of our Department of Agriculture, has typified the march of white agriculture in this land.

History, Dr. Van Dersal says, may be read on the face of the land in the changing forms of fields and crops. In the recent widespread swing from straight furrows on rectangular fields to "a broad and subtle handling of slope and soil, sweeping curves and winding terraces, and fields fitted at long last to the rounded rolling contours of the land," he sees a revolution in our basic farm practices under way. Thomas Jefferson advocated this method of "horizontal plowing" as a means of making each furrow a small dam or terrace to halt running water and refresh the crop. And the Sage of Monticello, viewing his own acres, long ago, added that "nothing exceeds in beauty" the design of the contoured fields.

Contour tillage did not catch on at the time, but another of Jefferson's agricultural notions—a turning plow, with a twisted mold-board mathematically calculated to turn the furrow completely over with the least draft and strain—did catch on, mightily. Lecturing recently at the Cosmos Club in Washington, M. L. Wilson, national director of agricultural extension, produced the specifications and a model of the Jefferson moldboard to show how nearly exactly it was the plow in front of the shock of corn on the department's seal today.

I thought of this, driving south through Virginia last month. In a summer dry and hot beyond that of any year since 1817, when Jefferson was alive, I could not help noticing, as Faulkner notes, that the untilled roadside plants were flourishing whereas the "cultivated" fields beyond looked baked out, burned out, farmed out; bleak, thin. An engineer named Arthur Mason observed the same difference between the native grass rims of the Illinois Central right of way and plowed corn land beyond, early in this century. It is something every farmer will have noticed, and every agricultural college worker. But it took this maverick ex-county agent, Faulkner, of Ohio, to see what constant turning of the topsoil, and neat burial of all organic residue from six to ten inches down, can do toward thinning the soil and killing its productivity.

It is plainly, as he argues, against nature. You see nothing like it in woodland or in native meadows. There the organic residue is worked in from the top into the topsoil, and the soil tends to be absorptive of rain, mellow and friable. Erosion is not, as Faulkner says it is, completely stopped by native cover, or by imitating native cover with "trashy" surface manipulation of crop residues. There must have been some erosion under undisturbed native cover to make the primitive Missouri River muddy and to mold all the configurations of our land. But under natural conditions, probably, accelerated erosion is so diminished by natural cover that man can adjust himself to the change and never feel the difference in a lifetime. That seldom is true of plowed land.

In presenting his experiments and arguments for disk-harrowing rather than for moldboard preparation of the seedbed Faulkner persuades me, at least, that his method, wherever it can be used, would greatly decrease field erosion and probably build land up in fertility even as it is being cropped. No book I recall in thirty years of agricultural reading has aroused such a furor; and this rejoices me. It happens I knew this Faulkner when he had just begun his war against our sainted moldboard plow, twenty years ago. It seemed to me to stand to reason that the moldboard plow is a blunt instrument of major surgery, turning and rending a living body, soil, once a year, or once every two or three years. It stands to reason that a healthy soil cannot go through that many major operations without becoming devitalized. I do not believe, as Faulkner does, that by doing away with this major operation we can entirely dispense with commercial fertilizers, insecticides, and the plague of weeds. But the methods he indicates will certainly make less inevitable our present practice of thinning soil down to subsoil; grinding, whacking, and washing the humus out of it; then using the thinned and deadened residue as a sort of feeding trough for mineral powders, hauled in and spread on the wasting earth to nourish plants.

Dr. Van Dersal's book is urbanely and pleasantly written. It is as full of astonishing information as an old-time farmers' almanac. Mr. Faulkner's briefer work is contentious, opinionated, mocking, and not a little grim. Small wonder. The orthodox agriculturists who now dismiss or belittle his findings as those of a man who did not have the government and all its vast agricultural experimental funds behind him are at one with those who forced Faulkner out of professional agricultural work, to pay for his own experiments by selling insurance, for a while. Mr. Faulkner is sharp in what he has to say but never pompous or rude.

Those who would follow him have quite a fight ahead. I have just been looking through the latest issue of the Southern Planter, published in Richmond. Three of the advertisements show farmers plowing straight furrows right up the hillside in the old calamitous way. And in a clubby war-time morale-builder paid for by the Oliver Chilled Plow Company, behold this bent old farmer practically crying over his faithful steel sodbuster, addressing it as "Ollie," and declaring: "I like and respect you for the kind of plowing you do. When those Raydex bases of yours turn over the soil, there's no big air space underneath and the trash is buried deep underground. They didn't name you Plow Master for nothing."

War Criminals

THE DAY OF RECKONING. By Max Radin. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.75.

GOVERNMENTS of the United Nations have pledged the prosecution of war criminals; recently the American Bar Association declared that the "trial of war criminals should have as its primary purpose the vindication of the rule of law"; and former President Hoover and Hugh Gibson warn that "a muddled conception of international law must not be used as a shield to protect people from punishment for their crimes."

But international law so far has not settled the problem under what law and in which courts war criminals can be tried. Article 228 of the Versailles treaty authorized the Allies to bring violators of the laws and customs of war before military tribunals. Later the International Law Association elaborated a Statute for an International Court of Criminal Justice, but nothing came of this suggestion. Professor Radin's imagination has created an Extraordinary Tribunal, presided over by an Irish colonel. This tribunal tries Hitler and six of his gang leaders in a courtroom in Luxembourg for the murder of one Frenchman, one Czechoslovak, and one Russian victim. After the proceedings, in which the defendants remain mum and the counsel for the defense talks a lot of nonsense, the prisoners are duly sentenced to death. They are executed by the administration of cyanide gas because hanging would obviously be too good for them. We are told that the tribunal "claims powers that override the textbook doctrines of international law" and is bound only by "reason and justice."

But this is exactly what the Nazis did, except that they called their "reason and justice" Volksempfinden, or racial perception. Mr. Radin's tribunal even refuses to recognize the "rule against ex post facto laws" as the Magna Charta of criminals. The author is apparently unaware that it was not "one of their [that is, Nazi] criminologists" who coined this phrase but Professor Franz von Liszt, a great and international-minded scholar who was anxious to stress the importance of law as the safeguard of personal liberty to which even criminals have been entitled since the great legal revolution of the eighteenth century fought by Voltaire, Beccaria, and Montesquieu.

Professor Radin emphasizes the point that the charge against the defendants is not a political crime or a violation of international law but murder pure and simple. If so, since the crimes have been committed in France, Czechoslovakia, and Russia, there is no reason why the Allied military authorities should not hand the defendants over to the competent courts in those countries. In trying Nazi criminals those courts are not likely to be unduly lenient.

Even more unsatisfactory than the solution of the jurisdictional problem is the suggestion that while the criminals should be held responsible symbolically for three token murders, "other agents . . . of an inferior class" shall go free, leaving other crimes unpunished. If law has been, indeed, restored, justice must not pick one or another of the criminals but must prosecute all the principals and accessories. It is true Hitler can be executed only once, but that is exactly why the question arises whether legal proceedings are really an adequate way of dealing with all the monstrous horrors, savageries, and cruelties which the Nazis have perpetrated.

For lack of a more appropriate expression we may metaphorically term these atrocities crimes calling for punishment. But to take this term in its technical sense would result in the misrepresentation of legal principles which are much too important to human society to be discredited by their misuse for the sake of expediency. Any student of the history of laws knows that punishment is sublimated revenge, but retribution is still its essential element, designed to satisfy the more or less subconscious craving of the victim and of the public for revenge. Is it conceivable that after four years of this dreadful nightmare the relatives of the thousands of victims of the Nazi terror would feel their sense of justice satisfied by the reckoning which Professor Radin suggests?

There is no need to brood over this dilemma. The people of Germany and of all the Nazi-ridden countries are likely to find a more practical and more satisfactory solution than those legalistic niceties of which the American journalists who attend the imaginary trial make fun. Addressing the audience, the Minister of Justice of Luxembourg states that "the members of the tribunal are too distinguished to be asked to play a role in a comedy." Yet they do. This tragicomedy will at best gratify those business men who are scared to death by the inevitable revolution in the Axis countries which might defer the return to "normalcy."

RUSTEM VAMBERY

Fiction in Review

IN WRITING last week about Eudora Welty's latest volume of short stories I said that somewhere between Chekhov and Katherine Mansfield the short story had got off its trolley, and I suggested that it was Miss Mansfield who was in large part responsible for the exaggerated subjectivity which has so variously corrupted modern short fiction. The line of descent from Miss Mansfield to Miss Welty may not always be easy to trace: the family resemblance is more a matter of the carriage of the head than of feature for feature. But in a writer like Sylvia Townsend Warner the connection can be seen more readily. Miss Warner is less talented perhaps, and less ambitious, than Miss Welty, but she is an accomplished practitioner of her craft and more typical of her literary generation. Twenty-eight of her stories, many of them familiar from having appeared in the New Yorker, have been gathered in "A Garland of Straw" (Viking, $2.50). They are an interesting sampling of the thin brew of sensibility which has been so largely our nourishment in English and American short fiction since Miss Mansfield separated the flesh from the bone of Chekhov.

I use the word sensibility in its frankly pejorative connotation; obviously, sensibility under control is as necessary to a writer as an ear to a musician. But just as, in the case of Miss Welty, a too great subjectivity manifests itself in too great a preoccupation with fine prose, in Miss Warner a too great subjectivity manifests itself in an overdependence upon her private and special awarenesses. This is what I mean by sensibility, the delusion that an author's fugitive insights and sensitivities and symbolical observations will carry, in a piece of fiction, the full weight with which they are charged in the writer's own experience. They never do. Actually, they reduce the stature of a story to the size of the smallest elements that compose it—and this despite the fact that there is always implicit, in over-subjective writing, an author's emotion of superiority to his environment and his fellowman. I seem to recall that too many of Miss Mansfield's stories were stories of pity; although she would always have wished to project her sensibility into a larger realm of meaning, she never succeeded, even in her most objective efforts, in raising her stories out of the diary-like context in which they were conceived. The first modern writer to look for the whole of salvation in her pride of perception, Katherine Mansfield perpetuated a mood for the short story from which we have to turn back to Chekhov to remember that there is nothing in the story form itself which demands the substitution of the fragmentary and the allusive for the broadly conceived and fully stated.

Sylvia Townsend Warner lives in a more politically conscious world than Miss Mansfield. Many of her stories are concerned with politics, war, and "issues"; one has the impression, however, that the bigger the issue the smaller and more personal the symbol by which Miss Warner communicates her indignation, and that the cause itself is actually secondary to the triumphant play of Miss Warner's creativity about it. For instance, a story called Apprentice, in intent one of the serious stories in "A Garland of Straw," deals with the way Nazism can corrupt people. Apprentice is set in occupied Poland and is the story of a little girl who lives under the protection of a German Gauleiter. In the midst of starvation Lili has plenty to eat, and she elaborates a wonderful game in which, standing above the public road, she dangles bits of food on a string for the starving passersby to jump for. But one young Polish boy resists her temptations, and Lili becomes maddened with the need to break his independent spirit. On a particularly cold day she dangles a cinnamon bun before the boy; he is so hungry that he jumps for it, and Lili jerks the string out of his reach just as the boy falls dead of cold and hunger. Thinking, "It must be really terrible to die like that," Lili pulls up the bun and eats it.

Well, a story like this, it seems to me, defeats its purpose. Primarily concerned to assert the rightness of her own feelings, Miss Warner luxuriates in her scorn of the child Lili; in consequence, Lili becomes an incredible little monster instead of a credible little human being. And in consequence of Lili's monstrosity, Miss Warner's whole indictment of Nazism exposes itself as a contrivance.

Of course, not all Miss Warner's stories show such a flagrant discrepancy between purpose and method. Some are merely sketches or anecdotes (The Trumpet Shall Sound, To Cool the Air); some are frankly fragmentary (Rainbow Villa, Setteragic On). But the least of them mingles with the most ambitious without the reader being aware of a disturbing difference in kind because, having a common point of departure in sensibility, they all sacrifice permanent meaningfulness to the fleeting triumphs and self-justifications of the creative moment. Although Miss Warner is willing to be far more humanly fallible than Katherine Mansfield would ever have wished to be, and although her prevailing temper is neither ecstatic nor pitying but acidulous, her stories are unmistakably fledglings from "The Dove's Nest."

I have used Miss Warner as an instance of one of the major faults of a whole literary school; in fairness I should also point out that she has a liveliness and flavor which put her in a class quite apart from most of the writers represented in such a collection as Martha Foley's "The Best American Short Stories, 1943" (Houghton Mifflin, $2.75). Miss Foley, still flogging the dead horse of the popular-magazine story over whose grave she should long ago have said her requiescat, illustrates a more "living form of tale-telling" with selections from Vicki Baum, Kay Boyle, Rachel Field, Jesse Stuart, and other such bringers of life to fiction. True, she also includes a typical story by Eudora Welty (Asphodel) and a typical and good story by Delmore Schwartz (An Argument in 1934), which certainly belong in a volume of this kind—even though I very much dislike the Eudora Welty story—and she reprints John Cheever's The Pleasures of Solitude, a very small piece which nevertheless has enough quality and meaning to bear several readings. Perhaps, in other words, no editor could have done better with the available material. But I could wish that Miss Foley were herself less satisfied with it.

"The Night of the Summer Solstice and Other Stories of the Russian War" (Holt, $2.50) is Mark Van Doren's selection of seven contemporary Soviet authors in representative short fiction dealing with war themes. I suppose it would be hard to find a volume of stories farther removed from the subjectivism I have been describing in American and English fiction; in fact, these reports of the fighting in Russia are so unmarked by the personalities of their individual authors that any one of them might have been written by the author of any other. But although there may be a momentary relief in such impersonality, it is only for the moment: then we realize that excess in the direction of self-effacement is just as unfruitful as excess in the direction of self-expression. These stories do record the misery and courage of the Russian struggle, but, at least aesthetically, they belong in the category of Soviet poster art rather than in the great tradition of the Russian short story.

ART

SOMETHING of the harmony of the original white square of canvas should be restored in the finished painting. But harmony a thousand times more intense, because it is the result of the successful resolution of a difficult struggle. The simplest way almost of accounting for a great work of art is to say that it is a thing possessing simultaneously the maximum of diversity and the maximum of unity possible to that diversity. For lack of the first the new painting by Mondrian called "New York Boogie Woogie," now on view at the Museum of Modern Art with several other new acquisitions, is, for all its sudden originality, something a little less than a masterpiece. The checkered lines of orange squares produce a staccato rhythm—signifying jazz—too easily contained by the square pattern and white ground of the picture. At hardly any point does the rhythm threaten to break out of and unbalance this pattern enough to justify the latter's final triumph. There is resolution, but of an easy struggle.

"New York Boogie Woogie" is a radical step forward in Mondrian's evolution, which since his arrival in this country and to this point has been concerned mainly with the widening of his color spectrum. Now not only have new and for the first time slightly impure colors been introduced, but the hitherto immutable elements of Mondrian's space composition have begun to break up: the straight black, almost incised, lines into parti-colored chains of squares, and the great dominating rectangles into smaller rectangles and squares of contrasting colors. The artist has not yet possessed himself fully of these new configurations, not yet rendered them controllable to his total purpose, but the gamble is well worth taking. Unless the artist die to the successes of his old work he cannot live in his new. Repetition is death. One more thing: the picture at hand suffers from the absence of that very neat and precise mechanical execution that used always to characterize a Mondrian painting. It is either a failure of manual dexterity, a deliberate effort to be a little more fluid, or simply the impression left by the weak yellow and the purple that appear in a Mondrian painting for almost the first time. The picture has a floating, wavering, somehow awkward quality; the color wanders off in directions that I am sure belie the artist's intent. Yet "New York Boogie Woogie" is a remarkable accomplishment, a failure worthy only of a great artist, and its acquisition was more than justified; it was mandatory.

Of the other acquisitions the Matta painting is slightly untypical, has an almost valid surface charm, and is certainly better than those iridescent burlesque-house decorations, style of 1930, he usually paints, which are little more, really, than the comic strips of abstract art. Again, the painting by Masson is one of his better recent ones: turgid and dense, the tone hot but subdued. It has, however, an unpleasant pretentiousness about it. I don't think Masson will ever again turn out work comparable to that he did in the twenties.

The presence of the picture by the Mexican Tamayo evidences, along with that of the Matta and Masson, the extreme sensitivity of the museum to trade winds on Fifty-seventh Street. The museum shows taste in that when it buys the work of inferior artists it at least chooses their best work—untrue here only in the case of Tamayo—but this does not atone for its masochistic fondness for the social and other epigones of the School of Paris.

DANCE

KATHERINE DUNHAM is an anthropologist-dancer who went to Hollywood, but her current program at the Martin Beck Theater suggests the sequence in reverse. Her "tropical revue" is high-toned hot-stuff, and it goes over big with an audience that gets a kick out of sex brought into the parlor by a dancer who is obviously a lady.

For her dances Miss Dunham has used primitive and folk material from the Pacific, the Caribbean, and North and South America. Now there are three ways in which such material can be presented in the theater: one is to recreate it in as authentic and precise a manner as possible; another is to point up its qualities with appropriate garnishings and accents; a third way is to use it creatively so that the essence of the material is revealed in a complex work of art. To use the first method successfully, utmost fidelity to the original is necessary; for the second the same fidelity is required plus good taste and artistic skill; for the third a high degree of creative ability is essential, such as is revealed, for example, in Nijinska's compelling choreography for Strawinsky's "Les Noces," in which Russian folk themes and customs are developed and harmonized into a major work of art. This type of creative utilization of folk material is never achieved in the Dunham "tropical revue," although it is several times attempted. Nor is the first method, that of faithful reproduction of the original, used. The program relies, for the most part, on the second method, folk material garnished, and very much so. Moreover, the garnishings are frequently inappropriate and lack inherent connection with the material.

The most ambitious and least successful number on the program is the "Rites de Passage" based on rituals of fertility, male puberty, and death. Here, according to the program note, the attempt was made to "capture in abstraction the emotional body of any primitive community and to project this intense, even fearful personal experience, under the important change in status and the reaction of the society through this period." Although the tasteful costumes and simple, beautifully posed opening tableau set the stage for a moving performance, the lack of restraint in the movement, the superimposition of banal routines, and the failure to permit the material to determine its own form produce an opposite result. I liked best the "Bahiana" and "Lady with a Cigar," two fresh, unpretentious pieces that have sparkle and pace—perfect revue numbers.

Miss Dunham and her company are all excellent dancers and they are gorgeously costumed. Outstanding in the group are Sylvilla Fort, Laverne French, Roger Chardieno, and Lavinia Williams. The musical accompaniment leaves much to be desired. At times it is just passable and at other times, as in "Rites de Passage," it is very poor indeed.

VIRGINIA MISHNUN

RECORDS

ROSE BAMPTON began her career with a rich and powerful contralto voice which she later converted into a soprano—with consequences that are to be heard on Victor's September record (11-8466, $1) of Or sai chi l'onore and Non mi dir from "Don Giovanni." In the quiet opening section of Non mi dir and much of the subsequent fast and florid section, which employ the lower range of her voice, it is agreeable but colorless and breathily unconcentrated; in the climactic high notes of this aria and in the highly placed declamatory phrases of Or sai chi l'onore the voice becomes compressed into a thin shriek. In addition, neither in its agreeable low range nor in its shrieky high range is the voice used with the dramatically expressive inflection which this music requires—the inflection which makes the music so powerful and affecting when Souez sings it in the Glyndebourne Festival recording: as Miss Bampton delivers these great pieces of declamation they are merely pieces of vocalization. And the orchestral comment, which adds its power to that of the singing in the Glyndebourne performance, is perfunctory in style and barely audible on the Bampton record.

Victor's September list also includes Telemann's "Don Quixote" Suite for string orchestra, played by the Arthur Fiedler Sinfonietta (Set 945, $2.50). The performance is adequate and is well recorded except for occasional harshness in the sound of the violins. But the music has little illustrative significance and only slight musical interest: the most that can be said of the sections that are not dull is that they are pleasant. The work is one that might rate rehearsal and a performance or two as a brief novelty on a concert program, but—even in normal times—would not rate permanence on records and the expenditure on orchestra, engineers, plant, labor, and materials involved in recording; and in the present period of shortages of materials, plant, and labor the expenditure is even more questionable.

This may be said also of Beethoven's so-called "Jena" Symphony, of which a good performance by Werner Janssen with the Janssen Symphony of Los Angeles is recorded with marvelous beauty, clarity, and spaciousness of sound, though with occasional slight buzzes (Set 946, $3.50). The work was discovered in the form of manuscript parts—two with Beethoven's name—in the archives of an old concert society in Jena; if he wrote it he did so between 1787 and 1790—that is, between the ages of seventeen and twenty; if there is doubt of his authorship it is because the work not only is dull but hasn't the slightest resemblance to even the earliest of Beethoven's published works; and how little he himself thought of it—if he wrote it—can be inferred from the fact that he, who published everything he could, including some pretty feeble stuff, did not publish this symphony. I can, again, conceive of a conductor putting it on a program once as a curiosity, but not of a record company putting it on records. Mr. Charles O'Connell of Victor has stated "five broad basic reasons" that determine the choice of a work for recording: "First, established public demand. Second, musical importance of the work in question, either from a purely artistic point of view or from a historical viewpoint. Third, the particular ability of a given artist to perform the work. Fourth, our belief in the special appeal of the work . . . even though there is no appreciable demand. Finally, the work . . . [may incorporate] special ideas which we ourselves develop." The last reason is concerned with matters like the "Heart of the Symphony" and "Heart of the Concerto" volumes; it is the other reasons that concern us here; and whereas one or another of them might have given us recordings of those great performances of Mozart concertos by Schnabel with the New Friends of Music Orchestra that were not recorded, or of some of the finest of the unfamiliar Haydn symphonies played by the New Friends Orchestra that were left unrecorded, none of the reasons accounts for the recording of the "Jena" Symphony.

Moreover, the waste of scarce materials, plant, and labor on this work or on tripe like Dai-keong Lee's Prelude and Hula, performed by Kindler with the National Symphony (11-8452, $1), is harder to take when one opens the new Victor catalogue and notes some of the things that have been eliminated for the duration because of the wartime shortages—things like the volume of Schubert songs sung by Elisabeth Schumann, Schubert's Trio Opus 100, Mozart's Piano Concertos K. 450, 453, 459, Mozart's Quintets K. 515 and 593, several of his quartets, most of the volumes of Haydn quartets, many of Beethoven's quartets—and this while "The Heart of the Symphony" and "The Heart of the Concerto" are retained. Or when one goes into record stores for the Glyndebourne Festival recording of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and other things that are still in the catalogue, and finds that they might just as well be out of it.

It is only fair to add that Columbia too has wasted scarce materials, plant, and labor on things like Cowell's "Tales of Our Countryside," while it has eliminated some important works from its catalogue for the duration and others permanently and cannot keep dealers supplied with the works that the catalogue still lists.

Towards a Program for Jews

Is the American Jew in a position to create, out of his own crisis, an antitoxin to serve not alone all Israel but also Western man? Mr. Waldo Frank gives the emphatic answer YES. Beginning with the October issue, the CONTEMPORARY JEWISH RECORD will publish a challenging series of three articles on THE JEW IN OUR DAY by the distinguished novelist and critic.

I. The American Jew gives the keynote. Mr. Frank diagnoses the deeper aspects of the "Jewish Question," and analyses the Jew in his relation to Americanism and Judaism.

II. Democracy and the American Jew, the second article, discusses the position of the Jew in America in relation to world Jewry in terms of "One World," the Jew as Occidental, Postwar Europe and America, Palestine.

III. Towards a Program for Jews, the last of the series, moves in the sphere of practical morals — of Democracy and Religion. The author's concern is not only with the destruction of evil but with the creation of the good.

Soldiers and the Rights of Negroes

Dear Sirs: In something over a year of service among soldiers of varied background and education, I've observed some prevalent attitudes toward the Negro that surprised me and may be of some interest to others. The most striking thing I have observed is the strange intensity of the average soldier's preoccupation with the condition of the Negro minority. More discussions, heated arguments, and exchanges of experience developed about this topic than any other subject.

I could not avoid the feeling that a strong undercurrent of tension, seldom consciously understood even among the most alert and liberal, constantly brought the issue of this submerged group to the surface. Those raised to accept inequality felt the need to defend a system they couldn't whole-heartedly favor; those politically, morally, or environmentally alive to the contradiction of segregation and discrimination in a democracy, those who realize the dangers we face in seeking international comity with a record of national racism, the advocates, in short, of fuller rights and opportunities for the Negro, are on the offensive. The bigots seek refuge in dogmatism, a rosy version of the status quo, or a cautious gradualism.

It would seem that a crisis is approaching, that a vigilant minority is determined to support the Negro in his struggle for recognition, that a deeply ingrained prejudice supported by the economic, educational, and present social inferiority of the Negro is seeking to find a solution that will not disturb its complacence, though the vocal supporters of that prejudice dwindle in number if not in noise.

If these limited observations can be generally applied, is there not reason to suppose that efforts of the Negro to raise himself economically will receive increased support and tolerance after the war? Few still oppose the extension of equal educational chances for all Americans. Social recognition alone seems without sufficient widespread support and thus makes possible the occurrence of violent and prolonged resistance, likely to be intense if the advance is too rapid.

Service men are thinking of these problems and won't stop thinking of them when they return home. I do not believe they will bring home solutions, but at least they cannot have avoided a realization of the problem. If post-war adjustments in America provide better jobs and schools and homes and real hope for the Negro, our uneasy consciences may find constructive release. The alternative would seem to be paralyzing social conflict and the retarding of the nation's advance to the freedoms we are fighting for.

Note on Cripps

Dear Sirs: You will recall that in your issues of September 19 and September 26, 1942—just a year ago—you printed articles by me on Why Cripps Failed in which I quoted documents and authoritative statements to prove that Cripps's proposals were rejected because he originally offered India a national Cabinet government with the Viceroy serving in a capacity similar to that of the King of England, and then, under pressure, withdrew the offer. Interestingly enough, I have just come across the text of a speech which Sir Stafford Cripps, then not yet an official, delivered in the House of Commons on October 26, 1939, wherein he proposed exactly the same thing. He said, "The majority parties in the legislature should form a government, which the Viceroy would then appoint as his Executive Council. It is true that, technically and in accordance with the constitution, the Executive Council would not be a Cabinet, but there is no reason on earth why the [British] government should not give an understanding that the Viceroy would deal with that Executive Council, so appointed from the members of the majority of the Legislative Assembly, as if it were a Cabinet on all matters: that is to say, he would accept their advice as the Crown here accepts the advice of the Cabinet when duly tendered to it."

In October, 1939, the month when this speech was delivered, Cripps handed to Lord Halifax, then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, a scheme embodying this idea of an Indian Cabinet government with a Viceroy as non-executive sovereign. I was in London at the time and he showed it to me.

There is no doubt of course that this is exactly what he originally offered the Indian party representatives with whom he negotiated in New Delhi in March-April, 1942. LOUIS FISCHER

Not a "Steal"

Dear Sirs: Never in the many, many, many years I have been reading The Nation have I thought you unfair nor—I hasten to add—do I now. There are two sides to almost any question. There most certainly is another side to our request for an increase in the price of crude oil—other than that reflected in your issue of August 28.

Suppose the Brotherhoods asked for a wage increase and a committee composed of Mr. A, president of Morgan and Company, Mr. B, president of the National City Bank, and Mr. C, president of the First National Bank of Chicago, branded the request a "steal" and pointed out that fifteen of the leading railroads showed profits 20 per cent above those of last year, would The Nation say, "The committee is to be commended for its forthright report attacking the increase for the steal that it is"?

There are in the United States thousands upon thousands of independent oil producers. They produce millions of barrels of crude oil every year. The vast majority are very small operators, trying to pay for a home or a farm, raise and educate a family, pay a fair price to their employees, and discharge their obligations. Their only income is derived from the sale of their crude oil to the pipe-line company (no doubt one of the fifteen companies referred to in your editorial). The difference between what it cost the operator to find and produce this oil and what he received for it from the pipe-line company represents his profit or his salary or his wages—call it what you will—but no thinking person should deny that it cost the operator something to locate his oil. It is rare, indeed, for a man to drill one well and find oil. The number of dry holes drilled each year will bear this out. It is just as certain that it costs the operator a certain amount per barrel to produce his oil, and the operator is certainly entitled to a living. He knows, too, that every barrel produced means that much less under ground; so to continue in business he of necessity is trying to find new oil to replenish his reserve. That is all he has to sell—his oil. When his wells are depleted, he is through.

One of the first official acts of Leon Henderson was to freeze the price of crude oil. The net result of this is that the producer receives for his oil the same price he received in 1938. To make this clear, I as a producer of crude oil received for a barrel of oil in August, 1943, exactly what I received in August, 1938—five years ago.

I have never met Julius J. Luhrsen of the Brotherhoods, Boris Shishkin of the A. F. of L., or J. Raymond Walsh of the C. I. O., but I suppose they are men just about like me, with children and homes, and I suppose the wife tells them as she tells me that eggs are costing her 57 cents a dozen (they were 17 cents a dozen in August, 1938), and that potatoes and butter and everything else we eat cost much, much more than in 1938, and the clothes we and the children wear—in a nutshell, our dollar will not start to buy what it did in 1938. And I have an idea if any of the unions these gentlemen represent would ask for a wage increase on the ground they were receiving in 1943 the same scale they had in 1938, the request would receive a most sympathetic hearing, and it certainly should.

So we asked for a raise—under the circumstances a very normal procedure. We did not ask for a 35-cents-a-barrel raise; we asked that the price of crude oil be raised to the level of other basic commodities, whether it was 35 cents, 10 cents, or 75 cents a barrel. We asked for it purely on the basis I am discussing—parity. We attempted to show something so obvious it hardly seemed necessary—that costs of living and costs of doing business had increased greatly in five years, and that the price of our crude oil had not been permitted to rise correspondingly.

The phrase "to encourage more production" was foreign to us. We have no idea where it started or what it means. I squirm when I see it in print.

Our boys are fighting and dying, just like yours. We are doing everything we possibly can do to win this war, just like you, and we are trying to retain our homes and our business for our boys to come back to, just like you. We are just plain hard-working American citizens—thousands of us. Few of us had the benefit of a college education—many did not even go through high school—but we are trying to see that our children do.

We certainly had no intention of being parties to a "steal," and while of course I don't know Mr. Ickes, I can't find it in my heart to believe he would be a party to a "steal" either.

There are but three facts to ascertain: (a) the number of independent oil producers; (b) the portion of crude oil they produce; (c) have costs gone up in the past five years? Mr. Ickes, Petroleum Administrator for War, should certainly supply you with (a) and (b); fact (c) may be more difficult to secure. What the profit statements of fifteen large oil corporations have to do with the condition of thousands and thousands of small crude-oil producers scattered over some twenty states is hard for me to understand. Would it not be just as logical to say the cotton farmer in Louisiana was making lots of money, because the cotton mills in Boston were making huge profits?

As a reader and a subscriber of The Nation—not one who accidentally stumbled on the editorial—and in the spirit of fairness and justice, I am asking you to review our request for an increase in the price of crude oil—solely and purely on the basis of parity. You will find, I am sure, that we are asking only to be raised to the economic level of organized labor and organized industry, and you will also find we try to be honest and honorable in our thinking and in our living—just like you.

Problems of Young Children

Dear Sirs: The National Association for Nursery Education is holding its tenth biennial meeting in Boston, Massachusetts, October 22 to 25, with headquarters at the Hotel Statler. This will be a work-study conference on "The Community Serves the Child in War and Peace." Registration opens the morning of October 22, and the first general session will be held that evening on the topic "The World Picture and the Implications for Education." Subsequent sessions will consist of study groups which will discuss child-development problems based on actual case histories of various communities.

The problems of young children, intensified by present war conditions, can only be solved by persons interested in protecting and improving health, welfare, and education. Despite the curtailment of travel, it is hoped that, because of the vital need for coordinated planning and action, as many leaders in the field as possible will make an effort to participate.

Hard Life

Dear Sirs: Article of War 62 suggests that the good soldier not use "contemptuous or disrespectful words against . . . the Congress of the United States." After checking the record of the first session of the 78th, some of us feel that obedience to this order is one of the many aspects of life in war time that Congress has not made easy.

The Shape of Things

ON HIS RETURN FROM HIS TOUR OF THE battlefronts, Senator Lodge declared "that the whole character of the Pacific war would change if the United States had access to the Pacific coastal area of Russia." He added that for "reasons of security" he would not say what this would mean in terms of American lives spared, but in the secret (sic) session of the Senate he quoted Generals MacArthur and Chennault as asserting that a million American casualties would be prevented by the use of Siberian bases. We do not know whether these officers were correctly reported: Senator Brewster, who was on the same trip, said he had not heard any such figures mentioned. But in any case Mr. Lodge plumbed the depths of irresponsibility when he tossed off this statement. He has been in the Senate long enough to know it would inevitably escape from that notoriously leaky chamber. And now that it has been thrown to the headlines, how many parents and wives will think: but for the Russians my boy, my man, might have been saved? Loose statements of this sort almost always out-distance objective examinations which expose their falsity. It is little use now to ask whether we are in a position to supply and defend these bases. The Japanese are much nearer to Siberia than we are and the brunt of the task of keeping them out would fall on the Red Army. Is Mr. Lodge keeping under his hat information about Soviet strength in the Far East which leads him to suppose that Japan would not dare to move across the Manchurian border? And has he estimated what the use of these bases by us would mean in terms of Russian lives lost?

DID YOU KNOW THAT THE UNITED STATES government has had "a supreme and firm purpose to have no relations with any government, such as that of Vichy, which would give the slightest encouragement to Hitler, either directly or indirectly"? We would not have suspected the existence of this policy but for the publication by the State Department last week of six diplomatic documents covering the last half of 1940. One of these is a memorandum by Secretary of State Hull in which is recounted the lecture administered by that official to M. Gaston Henry-Haye. The Vichy Ambassador was not only advised of our forthright position as recounted above but was also given to understand that appeasement, like crime, does not pay. "I said that Laval may think that he can appease Mr. Hitler," Hull reports, "just as others heretofore have imagined that they could appease him," but that our government knew better and would "take no chances." M. Henry-Haye may have misunderstood the Secretary, or perhaps the Ambassador's cables to Pétain were garbled in transmission, or maybe the Marshal himself was garbled. In any event it is one of the ironies of history that following Mr. Hull's warning the Vichy government proceeded to throw itself, body and soul, at the feet of the Führer, and that Mr. Hull, appearing to forget all about this government's "supreme and firm purpose," not only maintained relations with the men of Vichy but roundly damned their French opponents. And if all this should be considered water over the dam, might it not be asked whether the present government of Spain, with its Blue Legion running alongside the Reichswehr on the eastern front, is not giving "the slightest encouragement to Hitler, either directly or indirectly"?

A PLAN FOR INCREASING THE TEMPO OF Allied offensive action to a point where decisive blows could be struck this year is contained in a brilliant report on war shipping just released by the Kilgore committee. The committee points out that the success of the shipbuilding drive and the cut in submarine sinkings have combined to give the United States 3,000,000 more tons of shipping than entered into our military planning for 1943. This is sufficient shipping to equip and supply an additional million and a half troops in the European theater. Millions of additional tons could be released, the committee found, by a more intelligent and coordinated use of shipping. Great waste was found, for example, in the division of our existing merchant fleet into two sections, one operated directly by the army and navy and the other under the War Shipping Administration. The report urges that the entire merchant fleet be placed under the supervision of the WSA. Because of the understocking of warehouses at the principal ports it was found that many ships could not be loaded to capacity. Considerable inefficiency was noted in the system of competitive hiring at the piers. The committee found no mechanism on the East Coast whereby a surplus of men at one pier could be temporarily or permanently shifted to another pier. Nor is there any central direction or control over the allocation of piers, lighters, tugboats, heavy lifting equipment, or railroad facilities.

BY A MAJORITY DECISION THE FEDERAL District Court has enjoined the Associated Press from continuing to enforce "in their present form" its by-laws regulating the admission of new members. Moreover, the judgment enjoins the performance of the agency's exclusive contract with the Canadian Press and the enforcement of its restrictive by-laws forbidding members to communicate "spontaneous" news to non-members until such time as it makes more liberal provision for the admission of new applicants. The way is thus left open for the A. P. to "adopt substitutes which will restrict admission, provided that members in the same 'field' as the applicant shall not have power to impose, or dispense with, any conditions upon his admission, and that the by-laws shall affirmatively declare that the effect of admission upon the ability of an applicant to compete with members in the same 'field' shall not be taken into consideration in passing on his application." Thus the court, in effect, upholds the government's case that the A. P. has contrived to hamper competition in the newspaper business to an extent contrary to the public interest. We expect in the near future to publish a fuller analysis of this important decision. Meanwhile we should like, if we may do so without disrespect, to congratulate the court particularly on that part of its decision which deals with the defendant's charge that the suit imperiled freedom of the press. This very aged red herring is relegated to the garbage pail by the emphatic declaration that "the mere fact that a person is engaged in publishing does not exempt him from ordinary municipal law, so long as he remains unfettered in his own selection of what to publish."

"RETREAT WITH ROOSEVELT" IS NOT THE kind of slogan that will rally labor and liberal forces to the budding campaign for a fourth term. This would seem to be self-evident, but it had to be said by Philip Murray at the convention of the United Automobile Workers and it will no doubt have to be said again and again. Because, however much the Administration has cajoled, appeased, and yielded to its right-wing support at the expense of the left, it has always been able to trade on the sad and eloquent fact that the latter had no practical alternative and could therefore be expected to string along and like it. The tories, on the other hand, some from the South and others from the machines of the North, could be counted on to make trouble at the party convention if they were not conciliated. And if they were successful, where would labor find itself? These arguments are cogent enough to have forced some labor groups and leaders into line already, more than a year ahead of the election. But they are not fool-proof. Roosevelt is at least as essential to Cox, Dies, and Hague as he is to the C. I. O. Even Wheeler went along with him in 1940, though it poisoned his system to do it. We see no point in coming out for or against the President at this time. We see plenty of point in discussing issues, putting the spotlight on Congressional records, and laying down the conditions for supporting candidates when the time is ripe. This is exactly what Murray advised the auto workers and they were wise enough to accept his counsel. They have put the Administration on notice that a union with a membership of 1,000,000 will "find it impossible to mobilize" strength for a fourth-term campaign "if the present Democratic policy of appeasement of the foes of progress and labor continues." This is the sort of language that will be understood in Washington.

ON THE EVE OF THE DOUBLE-TENTH, CHINA'S Independence Day, the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization took steps to right an ancient wrong by approving and sending to the floor a bill to repeal the Chinese Exclusion Act. The bill is expected to pass the House within a fortnight. While the action of the House committee was sudden, it represented the culmination of a drive almost unprecedented in American legislative history. Scores of organizations representing business, labor, and the churches in all parts of the country had adopted resolutions and sent in petitions demanding Congressional action. California and the Far Western states took the lead in urging that the discrimination against our gallant ally be removed at this time as a tribute to China's seven years of resistance to Japanese aggression. On the floor of the House only one man, Representative Rankin of Mississippi, rose to challenge the committee's decision. In reply Majority Leader McCormack ably summed up the case for repeal when he declared that the admission of 105 Chinese a year under the quota would, "in addition to being an act of justice on our part, distinctly be in the best interests of our country."

THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER SEEMS to be losing its grip. Up to now the wildest charges put forward by Colonel McCormick in his crusade to keep Uncle Sam from being swallowed by the British lion have sounded as if he himself believed them or at least expected his readers to take them seriously. But his latest campaign, purporting to show that Rhodes Scholars, including the author of the Fulbright resolution, are banded together in a "secret society" which is conspiring to "overthrow the republic" and extend British rule throughout the world, sounds as if the Chicago sage had taken to burlesquing himself. It may be good yellow journalism at that, and no one has ever denied that McCormick as journalist is good and yellow. . . . The spectacle of the week is the sight of Republicans going up in flames because Eleanor Roosevelt told a joke about them in a newsreel. Unlike the endless stories these outraged gentlemen have invented about the President's wife in the past decade her joke was funny, not obscene.

Choices at Moscow

CORRESPONDENTS and news analysts are busy piecing together imaginary agenda for the coming three-power conference in Moscow. And the results of their efforts are appalling. Put together they make up a program that would keep the negotiators around the green-baize table till well past Christmas. Here are just a few of the items: (1) a second front—when? where? (2) the Siberian bases; (3) the political administration of reconquered territories—AMG versus the new Mediterranean commission, military versus civilian control, democratic groups versus subverted fascists; (4) a postwar system of collective security or a new balance of power; (5) the future of Germany—the Free Germany Committee, shall Germany keep its army? (6) Yugoslavia—Partisans or Mihailovich, Peter or the Anti-Fascist Council; (7) France—the role of the Committee of Liberation after France is liberated; (8) political alliances with lesser powers; (9) boundaries—Poland, Bessarabia, the Baltic states; (10) food relief—who shall administer it and for what ends?

Poor Mr. Hull, who can wonder that he has hesitated to plunge into this maelstrom? Even if the conference were to be held in the Wardman Park Hotel instead of the Kremlin, he would have reason enough to wish to dodge the knobby and threatening problems that face the three Foreign Ministers. How wistfully he must look back to the days when reciprocal trade treaties could be his chief preoccupation.

But there is no dodging those problems, and they can't be conjured out of existence. They can be met successfully only by men with a clear purpose, and courage, and some understanding of the human realities that lie just below the level of diplomatic maneuver. Perhaps it will help Mr. Hull if we print two sentences from a speech made by Sir Stafford Cripps the other day at a meeting of women war workers. "Men and women," he said, "forced to live in poverty, insecurity, and squalor can never form the basis of a peace-loving world. . . . No system based on injustice between one section of people in the world and another can possibly be stable." And that of course is the heart of the whole complex of problems that must be dealt with by the representatives of Russia and Britain and the United States.

They may succeed in patching up the holes in their war-time alliances and agree on the outlines of a postwar plan of European security. They may even settle boundaries. But the arrangements will be as evanescent as sky-writing unless they are founded on a system of democratic states in Europe. Russia realizes that and has consistently thrown its support to the active anti-fascist groups in every country. The United States has consistently followed the opposite course, supporting every reactionary element which could possibly be counted on the Allied side, and some—like the Franco regime—which were ostensibly neutral but actually pro-Nazi. The British, as usual, have been consistently inconsistent; placating Russia one day and America the next; keeping Franco on their pay roll but backing De Gaulle against Vichy—and then backing Giraud against De Gaulle; supporting Mihailovich until it became evident that only the Partisans were interested in fighting the Nazis. The Foreign Office has shown no better understanding than the State Department of the necessary basis for a decent order in Europe. But it is much more clever. It has burned no bridges; its roads of diplomatic retreat are all open. Mr. Eden can adopt any line he pleases in Moscow, and a good many things he has said recently indicate that he is prepared to accept as many democratic decisions as Britain's relations with the United States permit.

When Mr. Hull goes to Moscow he will have to choose. He can either throw the mighty material power and the political prestige of the United States behind a democratic Europe or he can stick to the State Department line. It would be harder for him than for Mr. Eden to find the road back to a decent foreign policy. But the Moscow meeting does offer him a chance to repent without too plainly acknowledging past errors. If he fails to do so, then the great decisions for Europe's future will undoubtedly be taken without the help—and against the desires—of America. For while our voice is loud in the councils of the United Nations, it will not hereafter necessarily dominate the room. The Russian armies, pushing toward the old borders of Poland and Rumania in the south and the Baltic states in the north, are achieving more than a victory over their enemy. They are altering the balance of diplomatic power among the Allies. What Russia wants, it is in a position to demand. And Britain, though it is prepared to sacrifice a great deal for American friendship, may conclude that the stability of the Continent necessitates a close and continuing relationship with the Soviet Union.

Whoever represents this country at Moscow must make one of the decisive choices of our history.

Oil: Prices and Profits

THE price of crude oil is the subject of a controversy which has now been raging for many months. The oil industry and Petroleum Administrator Ickes believe that an upward revision is essential in order to stimulate additional exploration and the sinking of new wells. The OPA and representatives of consumers, including the trade unions, disagree, arguing that the increase would add to the cost of living and fatten oil company profits without a guarantee that exploration would be extended.

A few weeks ago, in an editorial paragraph, we supported this second view. Subsequently, our statements were challenged with great courtesy by a Texas reader whose letter we published last week and, in a very different manner, by Secretary Ickes in correspondence with the editors which was not offered for publication.

We must admit that the offending paragraph dealt with a complicated subject in too summary a manner and was unfortunately worded. Citing a report of the Labor Policy Committee of the OPA, we used the expression "steal" in a way which Mr. Ickes construed as a reflection on him. Needless to say, this was far from our intention. We sometimes quarrel with Mr. Ickes's views; we have never doubted his honesty.

Our correspondent, Mr. Neville G. Penrose, objected to the word "steal" for another reason. He put the case for the small independent producer of crude, who, he wrote, is receiving no more for his oil than in 1938. Thus, while the price of almost everything he has to buy has risen steeply, he is getting only the same return as in a pre-war slump year. Mr. Penrose believes that the independent operators base their demand solely on this argument. They disclaim any responsibility for the suggestion that higher prices are required as an incentive to greater production and exploration. This, however, is the main thesis of the Petroleum Administration for War and the spokesmen of the big oil companies, which would be the chief beneficiaries of a price increase.

Whatever hardships are being suffered by the small independents, there can be no claim that the big fellows are being unfairly squeezed at present. With their control of wells, refineries, pipe-lines, and distribution outlets they take a profit at each stage. Moreover, they are now operating more or less at capacity, whereas in 1938 production was being restricted. They are thus in a position to cut overhead costs per unit to an extent which probably compensates for the rise in other costs. In any case, the profits, after taxes, of 15 leading companies are well ahead of last year.

This matter cannot be settled by appeal to hard cases, for the government cannot undertake to remedy all wrongs; it must strike the balance of public advantage. That leaves the question of expediency. It is true that we are at present taking more oil out of the ground than is currently added to proved reserves. Is a special incentive then needed to maintain and extend oil reserves, and if so, is a rise in price the least objectionable and costly stimulus? No doubt, if we were at peace the forces of supply and demand would operate to increase oil prices under similar circumstances. But, in the interests of preventing inflation, we are now thwarting the laws of supply and demand in all directions. Do the oil operators claim that they have an exceptional case? So do the farmers and the coal-miners. If the line is to be held, price increases must be disallowed unless it can be proved that there is no alternative method of maintaining production. In this case the OPA has outlined a plan for subsidizing the sinking of new wells on lines similar to the scheme operating to bring out marginal ores in the copper industry. The oil men, like the farmers, object to subsidies on principle—at least, while they have a sellers' market. They assert that the OPA's plan is costly, inefficient, and unduly complicated. For our part, however, we remain unconvinced that they have made good their claim to half-a-billion dollars—at the lowest estimate—of the consumers' money.

The Tax Crisis

THE revolt of the House Ways and Means Committee against the Treasury's tax program has created what is potentially the most serious home-front crisis since the beginning of the war. For unless Congress adopts a tax program that at least approximates the Treasury's in size and impact, the entire economic-stabilization program must inevitably collapse. It is clear that neither Congress nor the public is awake to the gravity of the situation. The success of the OPA in bringing about a slight decline in the cost of living during the past few months has diverted attention from the threat of inflation. But neither the OPA's efforts nor the WLB's rigid enforcement of the hold-the-line order with respect to wages has completely checked the rise in the total volume of spending power. Employment is still increasing; people are working longer hours; business profits are tremendous. As a result, the surplus of spending power has grown to a point where only drastic taxes can head off catastrophe.

If the Treasury's program is to be criticized, it is on the grounds of inadequacy. In January, it will be recalled, the President asked for $16 billion in additional revenue as a brake on inflation. For political reasons this demand was subsequently scaled down to $12 billion, and the Treasury's program provides for only $10.6 billion. The insufficiency of this sum may be seen in Secretary Morgenthau's own figures. During the current fiscal year the total income of the American people is expected to reach $152 billion. Because of war-time restrictions not more than $89 billion of this vast amount can be used for the purchase of goods and services at present prices. After deduction of taxes and war-bond purchases, a surplus of approximately $25 billion will be left. If this reservoir of excess spending power is not siphoned off into the Treasury by taxes or by some other method, it will either break the existing price ceilings or be diverted into illegal black-market channels.

This situation has not developed suddenly. It has constituted a potential danger for more than a year. The American people already have much more money in their pockets and bank accounts than can be used to buy goods. Yet we have not been inundated by inflation. Since we have escaped thus far, the question may be asked why it is necessary to have an all-out tax bill at this time. The failure of Morgenthau, Vinson, and other Administration spokesmen to answer this question probably accounts in part for the unfavorable reception given to the Treasury's tax proposals. The principal reason why we have been able to hold the line against inflation during recent months is the fact that people have not been spending all of their money. They have not been spending it partly because there are not enough goods to buy but also because all the talk about higher taxes has frightened them into saving their money. It so happens that taxes are peculiarly suited to fighting inflation because they make people feel poor. A man who has invested $1,000 in war bonds justifiably considers himself well off. If he pays the same amount in additional taxes, he will feel poverty-stricken and cut his expenditures to the bone. The present talk of a ten-billion-dollar tax bill for next year is helping to hold back inflation; but if Congress pares down the proposals substantially, the change in psychology will soon be manifest in a splurge of spending in the pre-Christmas season.

Fully as dangerous as the campaign of powerful groups to reduce the size of the tax bill are the efforts to shift its impact from the middle- and upper-income groups to the low-income groups. Mr. Morgenthau's proposals are noteworthy in that they would place little if any additional burden on persons with incomes of $2,000 or less. Since this is the group which has the least margin of safety against higher food costs and other deprivations of war, it is imperative that they be protected, if only for the sake of preserving war-time health and morale. But a concerted and open drive has been launched to scuttle the proposals for higher income-tax rates, based on capacity to pay, in favor of a sales tax or some other levy that would fall chiefly on the lower brackets. To that end numerous newspaper editorials have shown great glee in quoting Secretary Morgenthau to the effect that four-fifths of the national income is received by families with less than $5,000 a year. It is, of course, true that the tax program proposed by the Treasury falls proportionately more heavily upon the upper fifth than upon the lower four-fifths. But what is practically never pointed out is that the small fraction of the population in the over-$5,000 income group probably has more than half of the excess spending power which threatens to bring about inflation, while practically all of it is to be found in the pockets of the over-$2,000 group primarily affected by the Treasury's proposals. A tax that fell primarily on the low-income groups would not tap this surplus and thus would be practically valueless as an anti-inflationary measure. Unless Congress takes serious account of these elementary economic facts, it will do irreparable damage to the structure of our war-time economy.

Senators and the Peace

BY BLAIR BOLLES

Washington, October 5

IS THE United States about to acquire a foreign policy? The prospects are now good that the Senate will soon begin to consider, in the slow Senate way, the adoption of a resolution embodying the Senate's views on American participation in world affairs after the war's end. First a subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee will decide how to frame the question. Then the committee will decide whether to act on it. At last the Senate itself will be permitted to debate about foreign policy and to register its opinion on whether the war that engages us has any purpose beyond the simple one of killing Germans and Japs and erasing Hitler and Tojo.

This halting advance toward one of the great decisions of the twentieth century is not likely to be completed by the time the Foreign Secretaries of the United States, Great Britain, and the Soviet Union hold their conference, perhaps not even by the time Franklin Roosevelt, Joseph Stalin, and Winston Churchill meet. But the announcement by Senator Tom Connally, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, that a subcommittee will meet and draft a resolution on foreign policy should suggest to our allies that the United States is finally preparing to face the facts of global life. How squarely the Senate will face them will depend on how strongly various Senators with passionate opinons influence the final form of the resolution. If Senator La Follette of Wisconsin and Senator Vandenberg of Michigan, both members of the subcommittee, have their way, it may be as empty as the Fulbright resolution passed by the House. Vandenberg is ready to defend American "sovereignty," and "sovereignty" and "constitutional rights" were the rocks on which the Versailles treaty was wrecked in Washington. If Senator Thomas of Utah, also a member of the subcommittee, outweighs Vandenberg and La Follette, the resolution may be as strong and meaningful as the Ball-Burton-Hatch-Hill formula proposed last spring.

Eight men sit on the subcommittee. George of Georgia is an unknown factor; he will probably vote for some sort of action without the lethal "sovereignty" proviso. White of Maine is counted on to advocate a firm and extensive internationalism. Gillette of Iowa is a straddler who likes internationalism in theory but apparently suspects it in fact. Barkley of Kentucky will vote for vigorous action. As majority leader of the Senate, he will carry the ball for the Roosevelt Administration in the forthcoming debate as Senator Hitchcock carried it twenty-four years ago for Wilson in the fight on the Versailles treaty—and probably with more success. After a talk with President Roosevelt on September 29 Barkley made it plain that the President wants action. His job is to carry out White House wishes.

Tom Connally, the subcommittee's and the committee's chairman, will be the key figure in the proceedings. A committee chairman has great strength in the Senate, and Connally is an old hand. He has given his friends to understand that he knows he faces an opportunity which can preserve him for history. Until the end of September he seemed afraid to seize the opportunity. Now he is ready to act. Whether he has any convictions on international questions is beside the point. He wants to be the center of the debate. He has pride in his position and pride in the Senate. Out of the first he throttled the Ball-Burton-Hatch-Hill resolution, because the authors introduced it without consulting him. Out of the second he shelved the Fulbright resolution. Connally and the Senate intend to write their own declaration of foreign policy.

The full committee presents a more difficult hurdle. On it sit the two framers of the 1937 neutrality legislation, Bennett Clark and Gerald Nye, who believe today as they believed six years ago that the United States is part of the moon, not the earth. La Follette and Vandenberg want a weak resolution. Hiram Johnson of California has never renounced the views that put him among the "irreconcilables" in 1919 and 1920. Shipstead of Minnesota is an isolationist. The one Republican thought to favor action among the committee's seven is White of Maine, who could swing the decision of the subcommittee. However, two other Republicans, Capper of Kansas and Davis of Pennsylvania, might think it wise to go along.

Numerically the group for action has the greater strength. Among its members are Wagner of New York, Elbert Thomas, Murray of Montana, Pepper of Florida, and Green of Rhode Island. Even Reynolds of North Carolina has led his colleagues to think he favors a strong resolution. The friends of action count on Connally and hope for George. They are confident of McClellan of Arkansas and Guffey of Pennsylvania and sure of Leader Barkley. They think they may persuade Tunnell of Delaware. One man stands out as the great catch for either side—Carter Glass. This ancient has a prestige which is considered valuable by both the Vandenberg and the Thomas faction. Nobody knows as yet where Carter Glass stands.

After a visit to Senate offices one feels that the subcommittee and the committee will not be permitted to delay too long in bringing a resolution to the floor. Its final form will be determined by the judgment of the whole Senate and the pressure of public opinion rather than by the views of the chosen few who sit on the Foreign Relations Committee. The very fact that the subcommittee is to meet testifies to the strength of outside Senators. Ball of Minnesota dropped a strong hint that unless the committee took up the question he would begin to hammer on the matter from the floor. For all his injured pride, Connally had to admit that the Senate could not be the only American institution to keep silent on foreign policy.

The House had adopted the Fulbright resolution. The Republican Party had registered its views in the Mackinac resolutions. The isolationist New York Daily News and the Saturday Evening Post had both granted in recent editorials that the trend was toward internationalism and that it must be recognized. It was plain that America's war aims as defined by President Roosevelt could be fulfilled only by a clear-cut policy for American political action in the international field.

Other men not on the Foreign Relations Committee are as impatient as Ball. There are the three coauthors of his resolution—Carl Hatch, Lister Hill, Harold H. Burton. There are Truman of Missouri, Maybank of South Carolina, and Ferguson of Michigan, a Republican but with a different planetary outlook from Vandenberg. These Senators can be counted on not only to prod the Foreign Relations Committee to bring in its resolution but to put up a hard fight on the floor to strengthen that resolution if it turns out to be weak.

Senator Barkley

Senator Connally's announcement that the subcommittee is to get down to business has undoubtedly disquieted Secretary Hull. Hull and Connally were both members of the House and supporters of Wilson in 1919 when the Versailles treaty was before the Senate. They remember that the long debate that preceded the vote on the treaty served to kill it. Since debate was fatal to international action twenty-four years ago, it might be fatal today. Therefore both Connally and Hull have tried to pospone debate on the subject until the last possible moment.

Hull's stand on this point contributed to the ousting of Sumner Welles as Under Secretary of State. Welles, a practical diplomat, concluded a year or so ago that the United States would be handicapped in political discussions with our allies so long as the allies did not know to what degree they could rely on the United States to abide by the Administration's commitments in international matters. The rejection of the Versailles treaty had bred distrust. Welles himself had learned from that event that a President is wise to let the Senate act first and to be guided in his foreign-policy moves by what the Senate has done. In the matter of the treaty Wilson acted on his own initiative and then asked the Senate to uphold him. The question of who moves first is vital. The Senate can be counted on to assert itself, now as in 1919.

Senator Vandenberg

Welles, then, thought it essential for Congress to act so that the Administration could present a clear-cut policy to the country and to the world. Understanding Senate pride, he believed the Senate should act first in Congress. Last winter, while Hull was absent from Washington, Welles conferred with Ball, Burton, Hatch, and Hill, approved their resolution, and advocated its presentation to the Senate. When the incident was reported to Hull he became angry. He had allowed Welles to dominate international political thought in the State Department for seven years, but he would not stand for Welles's taking a hand in Congressional politics.

With some success Hull preached to the White House the wisdom of cautious avoidance of debate. Last winter the President saw the four sponsors of the B2-H2 resolution and told them he would like some sort of guidance from the Senate, but he has steadfastly declined to make any direct suggestions to Congress that it should take the lead in foreign policy. During his first years in the White House Roosevelt was content to let Congress make all the first moves. Congress defined American foreign policy in the pre-war years by its neutrality acts. But in 1939 Roosevelt began to take the initiative—not as Wilson had taken it, by presenting Congress with a fact for approval, but by publicly stating to Congress the foreign-policy needs of the hour.

Thus in May, 1939, President Roosevelt, through letters signed by Hull, requested the late Chairman Pittman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and Chairman Bloom of the House Foreign Affairs Committee to introduce legislation modifying the neutrality law. And in 1940 he announced at a press conference that he favored a policy of lend-lease in dealing with Great Britain. Lend-lease marked the final break with the philosophy of the neutrality acts. The bill which became the Lend-Lease Act was written at the Treasury. Lend-lease represents a period of boldness on the part of the President—a wise boldness, because he proposed and let the Senate dispose. The Senate, confident that the founders of the Republic intended it to be the arbiter of foreign policy, will let no President go freely on his way in foreign affairs.

However, the present attitude of the Senate toward the White House on the issue of foreign policy is scarcely comparable to its attitude at the close of the First World War. The key figure in the fight over the Versailles treaty was Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, who happened to be chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. Lodge warned on December 21, 1918, before the Treaty of Versailles was written, that "the Senate has a way of rejecting treaties." As early as January 22, 1917, he had spoken against the idea of a League of Nations. He was predisposed to vote against a treaty containing the League Covenant and against a treaty approved by a President who, in his opinion, had committed the United States to major international obligations without regard to the Senate's wishes.

Today no Senator of Lodge's stature stands in the way of a strong resolution clearing the path toward the goal which Lodge loathed—political participation in international affairs by the United States. The Foreign Relations Committee today is Democratic. Its chairman will support the Administration. Vandenberg, Wheeler, Taft, Nye, and the other oppositionists lack the power and prestige that Lodge commanded. But there is one lesson to be drawn from the debate over the Versailles treaty. Not all who voted against it did so to preserve our isolation. Some honestly thought that the treaty gave undeserved advantages to Britain and France. They feared that the United States would be abandoning isolation simply for the benefit of those European allies. Many Senators who believe in internationalism today dislike the idea of an Anglo-American alliance because they see in such a limited internationalism greater advantage for Britain than for the United States. They want global collective security or nothing.

The statements of three Senators just returned from a trip around the world indicate that in the coming debate the major emphasis may be laid not on the simple proposition whether or not we shall plunge into world politics, but on how far we will go to defend our established position in the world. Senators Mead of New York, Russell of Georgia, and Brewster of Maine, speaking at a Washington press conference, stressed their concern lest the United States fail to obtain post-war rights to air bases outside the Western Hemisphere built by us during the war and its proper share of oil rights in the Middle East. The question, How imperialist shall we be? may overshadow the question, How isolationist shall we be?

President Roosevelt discarded Mr. Hull's timid view about the danger of debate the same day that Senator Connally announced the subcommittee would begin its work. The President told Senator Barkley he wanted something done, although he still is silent in public. Mr. Hull, however, if he is in this country, will surely appear before the committee while it is considering its resolution, and his opinion will have weight, for Congress holds itself apart from the critics of the State Department. The Senate approved without a hearing the appointment of Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., as Under Secretary of State, and the House and Senate Appropriations committees ask only routine questions when State Department supply bills are before them. The Capitol regards the State Department as a safe institution. It has not raised the question whether the department as it is at present constituted can successfully administer a firm foreign policy.

Failure by the Senate to act now would have not only long-range effects on the post-war world but immediate repercussions of an unfortunate sort. It would nurture the idea in British and Russian official minds that it is folly to plan a foreign policy based on active cooperation with America. In his last attempt to explain his committee's inaction—only a few days before he announced it would act—Senator Connally made a show of suspicion of Russia's course in foreign affairs. Let's wait until we know what Russia plans before we make any decisions, he said. He failed to see that Moscow would plan one thing if it thought the United States would participate in a system of collective security after the war and another thing if it thought the United States would stay aloof.

The United States has succeeded to Russia's role as a "riddle wrapped in a mystery inside an enigma." The New York Times recently carried a story from James E. Reston in London describing the bewilderment of British officials about American policy and the sterilizing effect this bewilderment has on British policy. There is danger that Britain and Russia will turn politically from the United States during the war unless the Senate acts, and acts with some speed. If a breach is allowed to occur between this country and its two chief allies, a subsequent Senate resolution will hardly be enough to heal it.

Strategy for Victory

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

A FEW years ago blueprints for winning the European war had an air of unreality, coming as they did at a time when the immediate problem was staving off defeat. Most of them greatly underestimated the difficulty of the task ahead, the length of time required, and the forces needed. With the conceit too common among Americans they also overlooked our allies. Yet had either Russia or England been knocked out, it would have been impossible for us to win the European phase of World War II.

Today the situation is very different. In Europe, after a year of repeated German defeats, we hold the initiative in every sector. The strategy of victory has become an urgent question, and it is likely that since the Quebec conference our planning has been substantially completed. Rehearsals are over, the players have their cues, and the curtain is about to go up on the last act.

That the only problem remaining is "when" is mainly due to our victory in the struggle at sea. When the blitzkrieg failed to achieve a decision in 1939-41, the European war was changed to one of attrition. In such a conflict Germany, even with the resources of most of Europe at its disposal, was far outmatched in potential strength. Barring complete military success in Russia, its only chance was to prevent the full application of American military power. Given a fairly stable Russian front, the crucial struggle of the war has been that between the German subsurface raiders with their airplane auxiliaries and the Allied surface navies and merchant fleets. Had Germany won this battle, it would very probably have also won the war. Even a partial victory would have assured it nothing worse than a negotiated peace.

A few figures speak very clearly of Germany's failure to win this crucial struggle. In the period between January 1 and the end of August, the Germans, according to their own figures, sank a total of 3,770,000 tons of shipping, or an average of 470,000 tons a month. These figures are excessive by probably 40 per cent—in July our figures for the ships lost in the invasion of Sicily were around 80,000 tons as compared to German claims of 500,000. In the North Atlantic, as Churchill recently pointed out, the defeat of the U-boat has been almost complete.

Yet even if the German figures were to be accepted, it would still be clear that we had won the shipping battle. For during the same eight months American shipyards turned out approximately 12,500,000 tons of merchantmen. And the reopening of the Mediterranean in the latter part of that period was expected to work an economy in the use of shipping equivalent to 4,000,000 tons. Meanwhile British and Canadian yards have also been turning out ships, probably in the amount of at least 2,000,000 tons, though official figures have not been released. The gross gain of Allied shipping up to the end of August has therefore been in the neighborhood of 18,000,000 tons; the net gain at least 14,000,000. Not all this tonnage, of course, is immediately available for an attack on Europe, since the strengthening of India, increased supplies to Russia, and the support of somewhat larger Mediterranean armies have added to the demands on it. These, however, are not major diversions. If the opening of a full-scale land front in Western Europe requires a shipping pool of from 10,000,000 to 17,000,000 tons, as has been estimated, it is obvious that the most difficult problem of invasion, that of supply, is almost if not entirely solved. With a huge shipping pool already on hand and growing at the rate of over a million tons a month, "second-front" talk has at last reached a thoroughly practical stage.

A change in the picture is, to be sure, possible. The immunity of merchant ships in the North Atlantic has been due solely to the superiority of today's anti-submarine weapons. For three months the Germans have been groping for a tactical answer and are now once more challenging Allied sea control. But it is an eleventh-hour challenge. Our backlog of shipping has become so great that the Germans would need the help of a miracle to overcome it.

To meet the new situation German strategy has been completely altered. The Nazi retreat in Russia has not been entirely forced by the strength of the Russian attack and the fear of heavy losses. The Germans have sustained a clear defeat but by no means as great a one as their geographical withdrawal would indicate. They have, in fact, conducted an essential and extremely difficult operation with considerable success. Strong points have been held up to the last moment necessary to cover retreats, and there have been no losses of man-power comparable to those of last winter.

The original purpose was to buy time with distance, to organize defenses along shorter and more easily held lines, and by thus saving man-power and compelling the Russians to construct new transport lines and detach more men for line-of-supply duties, to bring the numerical strength of the opposing armies more nearly to equality. Whether the advantages thus gained can be held or not is very questionable. Russian pursuit has been extremely persistent, and the Red Army has gained an offensive momentum which even natural barriers, longer transport lines, and muddy terrain may not easily stop. Moreover, the maneuver area through which the Germans can retreat before reaching the homeland, though still vast, has been materially reduced.

The Italian invasion, meanwhile, is proceeding as rapidly as can be expected. Neither side succeeded in fully exploiting the opportunities presented by the American landing at Salerno. However, the occupation of Sardinia and Corsica is of tremendous importance. From these islands fighter coverage can be provided for a landing at almost any point on the western Italian and southern French coasts. The German retreat can thus be continually threatened. With strong flanking bases, secure lines of supply, high-quality troops and able leaders, and the invaluable support of naval and air power, the United Nations in Italy clearly hold a winning hand. At the same time by sending in Rommel and several divisions of new troops the Germans have shown that they intend to delay our progress as long as they can.

The simultaneous strengthening of their garrisons in the Balkans has caused a further strain on German manpower. Some of these new troops were detached from the Russian front, where the German strength is reported to have been reduced to between 180 and 195 divisions. Others come from Northern and Western Europe. The transfer of these troops, said to number 25 divisions, greatly increases the risks in Russia and other areas.

The relative inactivity of Allied air power during late September and early October may be partly due to weather conditions, but it is probable that planes and crews are being conserved for a major blow. This could be either an intensified bombardment program or, what is more likely, the long-desired attack across the English Channel. In any event German targets will be hit far more heavily than ever before. It is now clear, however, that the "air-power-alone" school has lost out.

This brief review makes it plain that the sound though cautious strategy of the United Nations has carried us to the point where the final all-out assault upon Germany can be expected in the near future—by spring at the very latest, possibly this year. Shipping is nearly if not entirely adequate. The bases to the south, needed for a closer assault, are being acquired by conquest, and renewed Russian attack from the east is sure to follow the reconstruction of transportation lines. Germany's hold on the Balkans is at best shaky. Production is being badly affected by the bombardments. Superior sea and air strength is ours at every point on the map. Yet strong German armies remain, and their will to fight has not been noticeably diminished.

The war has at last progressed to the point where speculations regarding its length are not entirely guesswork. Barring an unlikely collapse of enemy morale, the "peace-by-Christmas" prophets will prove as wrong as have the Maginot Line, blockade, psychological-warfare, and air-power-only optimists in the past. On the other hand, the predictions of some of our army officers that the European land struggle will be not only hard but long seem to this writer to be unduly pessimistic. Any nation as badly strained as is Germany is in no position to bear the weight of a second major land front. If our invasion comes soon, the period between summer and late fall of 1944 should see the end of the European phase of the present war.

10 Years Ago in "The Nation"

IN THE FOOTHILL DISTRICTS of Bavaria and Württemberg we saw boys—none of them more than fifteen years old—parading in review with wooden spears on their shoulders, and children of six practicing the throwing of hand grenades, crawling on their stomachs as to a trench attack. Despite the contention of Walter Lippmann or any other erudite authority that Hitler's May peace address was sincere and "the authentic voice of a great people," no one who looks beyond the barrier of censorship and deceit in Germany can doubt that one of the major premises of the Nazi movement is intense preparation for a war of aggression.—RICHARD NEUBERGER, October 4, 1933.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S public-works program is under fire, and the barrage is descending chiefly on the head of Administrator Harold L. Ickes.—October 4, 1933.

THE PRESIDENT of the Pennsylvania Railroad has "reduced" his salary to $60,000 a year. If now the NRA would issue a decree "reducing" the pay of everyone else in the country to the same amount, prosperity would emerge from around the corner at a gallop.—October 11, 1933.

IT WOULD BE an act of poetic justice if the severest members of the critical tribe could be herded into a common hall and there, without having their knives taken away from them, ordered to agree on a program of national recovery. What a group that would be! Among others it would include the Mellons, the Communists, Henry Ford, some of the editors of The Nation and the New Republic, the Chicago Tribune, the Daily Worker, the New York Herald Tribune, Norman Thomas, the Alabama soft-coal operators, and the directors of the American Iron and Steel Institute. I hazard the guess that no program would ever emerge and that the survivors would be few in number.—PAUL Y. ANDERSON, October 11, 1933.

THAT MUCH of Chancellor Hitler's speech explaining why Germany was withdrawing from the League of Nations and the Disarmament Conference can be granted him: a bad war was ended by a bad peace, and Europe learned nothing from either. . . . But to dissociate Germany summarily from the only existing attempt to improve matters is the work of an insane and dangerous egotist.—October 25, 1933.

Britain Between the Acts

II. WALES AT WAR

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

I SPENT a day and two nights in and around Cardiff and a day in the Rhondda Valley and Swansea. To stay so short a time was an injustice to South Wales, and I left planning to go back. I never did; nobody on a trip like mine goes back to any place, for the time he has in the next place is also too short. And so it goes until he leaves the country altogether, grumbling about the things he didn't have a chance to see and do.

Perhaps I would have planned to stay longer in South Wales if I'd known what it was like. I had never visited Wales before. It may sound incredible to traveled and intelligent Nation readers, but I didn't realize that Welsh people commonly and without affectation speak Welsh to one another. It is as strange a language on the ear as it is to look at in print. Behind it are customs and habits and a manner of looking at things that are no more English than are the local characteristics of Normandy or Denmark. And always with these Welsh ways are English ways and the English speech, and you could spend a lifetime, not two days, sorting them out and trying to understand the unity and the separateness of these British peoples.

Just before I left London for Cardiff I saw Jim Griffiths, Labor M. P. for Llanelly and former head of the South Wales Miners' Federation. He said, "I'm going to the States soon and when I get there I'm going to walk right up to John L. Lewis and tell him exactly what I think of him—in Welsh."

"He won't understand a word of it," I said. "You'd better say it in plain English."

"He'll understand," said Griffiths, "or if not, his old mother will. She'll not have forgotten her native tongue."

Griffiths is in the United States now. Perhaps he's had that talk with Lewis—or his mother. If so, I'd love to have heard it.

THE WELSH NATION

Jim Griffiths obviously believed his strong feelings could be better and more strongly put in Welsh. But for all that, he's not Welsh enough to suit some of his countrymen. One man I talked to in Cardiff shook his head over Griffiths. "He's an able fellow but he's losing support down here," he said.

"Why? Isn't he as good an M. P. as he was a union leader?"

"I suppose he's good at both jobs," said the Welshman a little grudgingly. "His trouble is that he's more Labor than he is Welsh. He doesn't represent the national feeling, and that feeling's growing every day. No member from South Wales who ignores it can long hold his influence with his constituents."

Several Welshmen talked to me about nationalism in Wales and assured me it was "important." The war had increased it. Welsh nationalists don't want a separate state like Eire, but they do want more local autonomy. They want a Secretary of State for Wales. They want recognition of Wales as a national entity. It sounds a little fantastic in these days when small states are coming to look more and more like common nuisances and nationalism is the chief world menace. But Welsh national feeling is probably a harmless derivative of the old poison. Certainly the loyalty of these people and their contribution to the total effort of the country are conspicuous elements in their local pride: indeed, their whole attitude is just another illustration of the diversity in unity that strikes you at every crossroads in the island.

The boy who ran the lift in my hotel in Cardiff asked me where I was going. "Over into the Rhondda Valley," I told him.

"That's wonderful," he said. "I'd give a lot to see those valleys."

"Why don't you go? It's not more than an hour away."

"I'd never dare. I'm English. Those people wouldn't want me there. I don't know their language. I'd be a foreigner to them."

Though he seemed a dull boy, and a solemn one, I could scarcely believe he wasn't joking. "That's surely silly," I said. "They're British, like you. I'm going and I'm a foreigner—a real foreigner; I'm American."

"Oh, that's different. They'll welcome an American visitor. But not me. They would wonder what I was doing there. I think they'd make trouble for me."

It was all very vague, the ancient uneasiness of the stranger in a strange land. "Those valleys"—not five hours by decent train from London!

In spite of this sense of national difference, I don't expect Jim Griffiths to lose his job. His devotion to labor may hurt the feelings of my nationalist friend, but it won't alienate the workers who are his chief constituents. Blood isn't thicker than class feeling in the factories and pits of South Wales, of that I'm sure. Besides, Griffiths evidently speaks Welsh by choice—even to John L. Lewis.

BURLINGAME

WOMEN AT WORK

I talked to some of those workers and to a few of their leaders and friends. Labor in South Wales is supposed to be very left, but today, with every available man and woman at work, you find a political mixture as varied as anywhere else. The war plants have even sucked in the women from the distant mining valleys—women who never worked outside their homes before. They are carrying the bulk of the work in the factories and are getting good wages. Some say their new earning power will go to the heads of the women workers, that they'll refuse to quit when the men come back from the front. Others believe the women will go back home filled with new and dangerous desires: they have learned the satisfaction of feeling money of their own in their overall pockets; they know that earning a wage is not an art reserved for men. "After this they won't take kindly to the role of household drudge with no right to more than board and keep," said one man, and I wasn't sure whether he said it with alarm or approval. "Many of these women workers, even unskilled girls, can make more money than a miner makes after a lifetime in the pits. People don't realize what this means. It's a social revolution, nothing less, especially in a region like this where women never worked before. Yes, and a domestic revolution, too, in many cases."

But I think the speaker exaggerated. I can't see either sex war or social revolution coming out of the drafting of women into industry. The factory workers of South Wales work terribly hard for long hours; the average in the factories I visited varied from fifty-three and one-half to fifty-eight and one-half a week. Thousands of women spend two or three hours getting from their homes in the valleys to the plants. They come on foot, by bus, and by train. When they reach home at night, you can imagine how much time and energy are left for housework or family life. These women take comparatively little interest in their unions or in the plant production committees; how could they? They often become highly skilled in one process but don't bother to learn anything more. Their psychology is that of temporary workers. So the managers and shop stewards told me.

To a somewhat less degree this is the situation and the attitude of the women war workers all over Great Britain. I talked to a woman trade-union official in Manchester. She was deeply involved in a dispute over equal pay, and she brought along an intelligent young woman shop steward who was helping conduct the negotiations in her plant. Both said that the majority of the women, particularly the older ones and the married women, will be glad to get out of industry after the war. They like the pay, and many of them enjoy—and have learned for the first time to enjoy—the sociability of factory work: gossip with their fellow-workers in the canteen, trips to and from work in buses or trains, even the sense of doing a job in common with other people. But most of them look upon themselves not primarily as factory workers but as women who have been called out of their homes to do a job in an emergency. And they want to go back when the war is over. The younger, unmarried ones will probably stick—or try to. Whether they succeed or not will depend on the capacity of industry to hold production to a level that will provide work not only for the women but for the men they have replaced. Not a very likely prospect. The most the women union officials I talked with hope for is a keener interest in working conditions and labor politics among women as a whole, based on their war-time experience.

GRIEVANCES, WAR, AND JOHN L. LEWIS

Several of the plants I visited in the neighborhood of Cardiff had been completely converted for war production. They were small plants set up in the thirties to absorb labor in that deeply depressed area. Because of their newness and recent retooling, they were all neat, bright, mechanized to the last jig. Women workers outnumbered the men in every factory but one, and that was being enlarged to take in more workers, who would, of course, be women. The managements seemed progressive, proud of their plants, and on good terms with the workers. They encouraged the joint production committees and treated their suggestions with respect.

I talked to a member of one of the production committees. He was a middle-aged worker, responsible, a solid union man. He assured me that the spirit in the plant was good and everybody was "satisfied." He had survived the blitz in a district very hard hit, and he kept referring to that experience to explain the attitude of the workers. He insisted that they all felt their share in the war. One of the machines they were making was used in bombers and absolutely essential. "Those planes couldn't fly without it," he said. Like almost every worker I talked to in South Wales, he asked me to explain John L. Lewis, of whom he deeply disapproved. But he told me with equal earnestness that he and all his fellows sympathize with the American miners. They believe—this was repeated by the labor people in other parts of the country—that Lewis is using the genuine grievances of the miners to forward his own ambitions, while the Administration is taking out on the miners its resentment at Lewis's tactics. They know well enough that more coal must be mined; the effort to draft 40,000 men and boys for work in the pits in Britain provides dramatic proof that a shortage exists. But they can't see why the American miners shouldn't get more pay, or at least a guaranteed work week, and if the government refuses, they consider a strike the only way out. Through a curious bit of reasoning, they justify such action by pointing to America's physical remoteness from the struggle. "We are an island," remarked my friend of the production committee, "and we are one kind of people, not like you Americans." (This was a Welshman speaking, by the way.) "We faced destruction after France fell; we all know that if we'd been conquered, the workers' movement would have been the first thing wiped out. But you can't expect Americans to feel the same way." This not very original argument was repeated to me so often, in words so nearly identical, that I decided it must have a solid basis in working-class psychology. The American miners, I think, have become a symbol in Britain, not of irresponsibility or indifference to duty, but of aggressive, independent labor action; they are keeping alive the militant spirit which British labor, willingly or reluctantly, has largely repressed for the duration; they represent the worker's desires rather than his war-time conscience.

Since I left, strikes have been boiling up in some of the British coal fields, too. There are plenty of excellent grievances there as here. The men are "frozen" in their jobs; wages, as I have said above, are fixed at less than the going rate in other war industries; while some of the mines have been mechanized, the majority are old and poorly equipped. The proposal to draft sixteen-year-old boys into the pits had to be abandoned. It aroused bitter protest among miners and horrified the general public, especially the upper classes. The present scheme provides that eighteen-year-olds called up for service may choose either the army or the pits. Few people believe that the requisite man-power can be recruited in this way. But the shortage of workers increases the demand for better conditions in the mines, and it will be astonishing if trouble does not develop.

Arthur Horner, the able president of the South Wales Miners' Federation, is a Communist. With great frankness he described the trials of a left labor leader forced by his conscience and the party line to hold the miners to their jobs despite bad conditions in the pits and better chances in the war plants nearby. The more militant the leader the harder for him to maintain his prestige and influence by preaching a policy of self-denial. Instead of conducting a fight for decent conditions, he must convince the workers that they should not fight at all—until Hitler is disposed of. Horner says it can be done. He says that careful explanations, repeated every day, together with efforts to win legitimate gains for the union through negotiation and public pressure, have succeeded in both holding the confidence of the workers and preventing strikes.

But it is a job that will grow harder with every month that passes. And after a day in the Rhondda Valley I wondered how long the arguments of Arthur Horner and even the bitter logic of the war itself would satisfy the desires of the miners for a life less dangerous and grim, with better pay and more time to climb out of the scarred and dreary valleys to the green hills above them.

MILLIONS OF DOLLARS' worth of enemy-owned property will soon be offered for sale to American industry by the Alien Property Custodian. Business circles expect bargain-basement prices.

A CHAIN of eight small hotels in Detroit has agreed to refund several thousand dollars in overcharges under OPA rent regulations. It has also agreed to discontinue a special extra charge of 75 cents on guests who have visitors after midnight.

MAN-POWER NOTE: The Washington Review of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States says, "There is a belief in some government quarters that unnecessary hoarding of labor by war manufacturers should be stopped."

WITH A PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION coming up, the army is wondering how to present political news to the soldiers. The generals fear that politicians on each side will say that the other side is being favored. To divert such criticism, they have asked the three major news services to provide a daily round-up of unbiased political news for army papers. The Associated Press has declined the invitation, on the ground that it doesn't want to take the responsibility; the decisions of the United Press and the International News Service cannot be ascertained.

HOW TO STOP WARS: From the Madison, Wisconsin, Capital Times: "Speaking on 'Interior Decoration as Home Morale,' Miss Colnik said that it was women's job to make themselves and their homes so interesting and so attractive that the men of the world, including those of other countries, would be completely satisfied and happy at home. 'Women can stop wars as simply as that,' she maintained."

FESTUNG EUROPA: A French underground paper says a number of trade unionists who won personal concessions from the Nazis by denouncing labor leaders to the Gestapo are now trying to bring about the release of those who are still alive. . . . The People's Museum at Bygdöy, near Oslo, has been turned into a warehouse for ammunition. . . . The Colonels Rule in Argentina

BY MANUEL SEOANE

Santiago, Chile, October 4

THE Argentine situation, although certain diplomatic agencies and press correspondents would like us to believe otherwise, grows more serious day by day. The coup d'état which elevated Ramirez to the Presidency was only the culmination of persistent reactionary efforts. The leaders had nothing new to offer. Most of them had supported the military revolt of General Justo, which ten years before had interrupted the constitutional evolution of the country. The colonels behind Ramirez were known as reactionaries and Germanophiles. But when they discovered, to their consternation, that Hitler was losing the war, they began to think of the predicament in which the country would find itself with respect to Brazil when the war was over. No help could be expected from a defeated Germany. Arms and supplies could be obtained only from the United States.

The program of the colonels was a curious mixture of fascist ideals and promised reforms, bedecked with protestations of the most ardent Catholicism. Its aims were, first, "to establish order in the country," and, second, to break with the Axis—if Hitler continued to lose, and if there was no other way to secure the military means to match Brazil.

The first purpose has been carried out with undeniable zeal, but the break with the Axis is still remote. The colonels needed time for such a heroic decision; one does not lightly go against one's own feelings. Then, before they were ready, the diplomatic correspondence between Secretary Hull and Admiral Storni made any action the colonels intended to take look ridiculous. After that their one concern was to appear "firm." Counsels of moderation from conservative leaders were rejected. An editorial in La Prensa urging Argentina to join the democracies against Germany and Japan provoked the Nazi paper Pampero to demand that the editors of La Prensa be shot as traitors. Those who oppose breaking with the Axis now have the upper hand again. They count on Ramirez's reluctance to align himself with the Soviet Union as one of the United Nations and on his personal vanity, which would suffer sorely were anyone to think he had capitulated to North American pressure.

In the domestic sphere, however, Ramirez feels free to carry out his plans. Colonel Anaya, Minister of Education, Colonel Gilbert, Minister of the Interior, who is acting as Foreign Secretary in Storni's place, and Colonel Ramirez, head of the police, transformed into white knights, have inaugurated a crusade to purify the country. They are of that genus which believes that all national evils stem from the political activity of parties and the press, and that once such pernicious activity is suppressed happiness will reign.

The colonels dissolved Congress and suspended the political parties. Some day, they promise, the people will be allowed to express their will through elections. But they reserve the right to decide how the people shall vote. If the result is unsatisfactory, it will be nullified. "Never will I pass on power to bad people," said Ramirez recently. And he, of course, is the man to decide who is good and who is bad.

Nobody can deny that Ramirez was received joyfully. The abuses of the Castillo government had prepared the people to welcome anyone who would rid them of it. In some ways Ramirez got off to a good start. He forced landlords to reduce rents. He punished food racketeers. He decreed a general lowering of prices. He cleansed the civil service. After two years of ministerial corruption, any country enjoys a public purge.

But soon his true reactionary character asserted itself. No group with even a vaguely liberal program escaped "punishment": not the Unión Cívica Radical, which had a majority in the Chamber of Deputies, and which only fraudulent elections could have prevented from coming to power; nor the Partido Socialista, respected even by its enemies, which held a majority in the city of Buenos Aires; nor the Partido Democrático Progresista, which was particularly strong in the province of Santa Fé. These three parties had favored the cause of the United Nations from the beginning of the war.

The hardest treatment, of course, was reserved for the Communists, whose strength lay chiefly in the minds of the colonels. In the last elections they had received only 40,000 out of 800,000 votes and had not elected a single member to the House or Senate. Their sole prop was the newspaper La Hora in Buenos Aires. But Ramirez leaped upon them like a wildcat. He stopped their paper, suppressed all their units, and sent their leaders to his most unhealthy concentration camps, in Rio Gallegos and Neuquén.

The colonels also dissolved all organizations which had been collecting funds for the United Nations, beginning with the Committee for Aid to the Soviet Union. They suppressed the most powerful labor organization in the country, the Confederación General del Trabajo, and arrested its leaders. They imitated Nazi practice by burning the books of "Communist" authors, including Upton Sinclair and John Dos Passos.

One after another the provincial governments were taken over by the central power, and governors elected by the people were replaced by followers of Ramirez. The press was subjected to systematic persecution.

Supported by the high clergy, especially by the Spanish clergy who are linked with the Phalanx, Ramirez almost immediately entered the lists for morality. He introduced drastic measures to discipline the beautiful ladies of Argentina. He himself prepared a decree establishing the length of skirts and prohibiting the use of lipstick. Any book which might offend disappears from circulation.

The regime is strong. It has the support of the army. The inevitable defeat of the Axis has scarcely weakened Ramirez's determination to extend his influence outside the country. He seeks a kind of South American Holy Alliance of military dictatorships that would include Peru, Bolivia, Uruguay, Paraguay, Argentina, and Chile, dedicated to the fight against communism and against the influence of the United States. The colonels know that the Good Neighbor policy has sometimes lapsed and that the peoples of Latin America feel a certain pessimism about the democratic purpose of the United Nations. They know how to exploit the contradiction between the solemn pledges of the democracies and their flirtations with Ubico, Vargas, and company.

Yet there is only one ally for the democracies in Argentina—the Argentine people. And the democracies can rescue Argentina for the cause of inter-continental collaboration only by supporting the people. No policy designed to isolate Argentina, no threat of the increasing power of other South American states, will avail.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

GERMANY, like this country, was recently flooded with rumors about a separate peace between the Reich and Russia. It was not the first time such reports had circulated, but it was the first time they had spread to the troops on the eastern front. The effect they produced there is understandable. Many soldiers decided it was no longer worth while to put up a fight "when there would be peace in a few days." Things went so far, according to the Stockholm Aftontidningen of September 26, that the German army command was obliged to issue an order of the day denying the peace rumors. The Aftontidningen was even able to publish the text of the order, which was signed jointly by Field Marshals von Mannstein and von Kluge. It ran: "All rumors about a separate peace are untrue. The Führer will never make peace with the Soviets. It is pure madness to affirm that Himmler said that Germany was ready to negotiate with Russia. We appeal to the soldiers not to give up a single foot of ground without a fight. The soil we abandon now will be reconquered next spring."

It is worth mentioning here that for the German public Marshal von Mannstein—at present undoubtedly the outstanding German general—figures as the future Badoglio.

Up to the middle of September six million persons in Germany had been bombed out of their homes and obliged to find refuge in some kind of emergency dwelling. The Nazi newspaper Volkswohlfahrt revealed the figure in a consideration of the number of stoves that would be required to provide the necessary minimum of heat for the homeless. At least a million stoves, the paper reckoned, were needed, and so far there had been no indication of where they were to come from.

These figures enable us to understand what all foreign observers have affirmed—that in the minds of Germans the air war overshadows all other military and political events and perspectives. The destruction of morale caused by it is tremendous and progressive. Gunnar T. Pihl, who was the best of the Swedish correspondents and for that reason was expelled from Germany at the end of last August, is now able to relate some incidents he could not write about from Berlin. He was present, for example, when Goebbels inspected a block of houses in Berlin that had been destroyed by the March 1 raid. The crowd on the street "watched him sourly"; then suddenly someone broke out with the old slogan, Wir danken unsrem Führer (We thank our Führer). "Soon all the spectators were shouting the words in chorus, and Goebbels was literally put to flight." From many sources comes word of a pointed witticism that the Berliners are repeating: the ruins of the bombed buildings, they say, are "the foundations of the Fourth Reich."

An epidemic of suicides, the Aftonbladet of September 23 reports, has broken out among the troops and officials of the German occupation in Norway. One of the most dramatic was that of a soldier who shot himself on the street in front of a restaurant in Oslo. In all cases the reason has turned out to be the news that the man's wife and child had been killed in an air raid back home.

A popular French expression has found its way to Germany, Débrouillez-vous—literally, Extricate yourself, but in the sense of extricate yourself by any trick that will work, without considering anybody but yourself. The German troops in France have learned the word and, shortening it to DB, use it constantly. Through them it has reached the Reich, where it expresses perfectly the attitude of the people. "We are DB" means, "We are interested only in our own affairs." After four years of war the German state of mind is categorically DB.

BOOKS and the ARTS

MR. ELIOT'S KIPLING

BY LIONEL TRILLING

KIPLING, I suppose, belongs irrevocably to our past, and Edmund Wilson's essay of two years ago calling attention to the "Kipling that nobody read" and T. S. Eliot's present apologia for Kipling's verse* are less likely to make readers revise their opinions than to revive their memories. But these memories, when revived, will be strong, for if Kipling belongs to our past he belongs there very firmly, fixed deep in childhood feeling. And especially for liberals of a certain age he must always be an interesting figure, for he had an effect upon us in that obscure and important part of our minds where literary feeling and political attitude meet, an effect so much the greater because it was so early experienced; and then for many of us our rejection of him was our first literary-political decision.

My own relation to Kipling was intense and, I think, typical. I began, properly enough, with "The Jungle Book." It was my first independently and avidly read book, my first literary discovery, all the more wonderful because I had come upon it in an adult "set," one of the ten green volumes of the Century edition that used to be found in many homes. I had been caught by the pictures of the children and the animals. Illustrations have become unfashionable and so has the "set," and that is a blow to the literary education of the young, who are reassured by pictures and who, once they have been lured to an author, remain loyal to him until they have read him by the yard.

The satisfactions of "The Jungle Book" and its sequel were immense and innumerable. I suppose a boy's vestigial animal-totemism was pleased; there were the marvelous but credible abilities of Mowgli, the lesser but still enviable ones of Toomai; there were the deadly enmities and the grandiose revenges, strangely and tragically real; and it was a world peopled by wonderful parents, not only Mother Wolf and Father Wolf but Bagheera, Baloo, Hathi, and the dreadful but decent Kaa, a whole council of benign and dangerous strength and wisdom. And then there was the fascination of the Pack and its Law—it is not too much to say that a boy had thus his first introduction to a generalized notion of society. It was a notion charged with feeling. The Law was mysterious, firm, certain, noble, in every way admirable beyond any rule of home or school.

Mixed up with this feeling about the Pack and the Law and perfectly expressing it was Kipling's gnomic language both in prose and in verse—for you could not entirely skip the verse that interlarded the prose, and so you were led to trust yourself to "The Barrack Room Ballads" at a time when you would trust no other poetry. That gnomic quality of Kipling's, that knowing allusiveness which later was to seem fake and vulgar, was, when first experienced, a delightful thing. It made one an initiate of literature, a Past Master; by understanding Kipling's ellipses and allusions you partook of what was Kipling's own special delight, the joy of being "in." Max Beerbohm has satirized Kipling's fawning admiration for the man in uniform, for the man with the know-how and the technical slang, his yearning to be admitted to any professional arcanum. It is a boy's emotion—he lusts for the exclusive circle, the sect with the password; and he profoundly admires the secret-laden people who run the world, the uniformed and overalled people, majestic in their occupation, superb in their preoccupation, the dour motorman and the thoughtful plumber. To this emotion, developed not much beyond a boy's, Kipling was addicted all his life, and eventually it made him silly and a bore. But a boy reading Kipling could turn this feeling to literary account, for Kipling's manner was an invitation to him to be "in" on literature: it made him a snob of the esoteric Mystery of the Word.

"Craft" and "craftily" were words that Kipling loved (no doubt they were connected with his deep Masonic attachment), and when he used them he intended all their several meanings at once—shrewdness, a special technique, a special secret technique communicated by some master of it, and the bond that one user of the technique would feel with another. This feeling about the Craft, the Mystery, grew on Kipling and colored his politics and even his cosmological feelings quite for the worse. But to a boy it suggested a boy's notion of adult responsibility, and by bringing a glamor to all the professions it suggested the virtue of disinterestedness. If one ever fell in love with the cult of art, it was not because one had been proselytized by some adult Frenchman but because one had absorbed Kipling's creedal utterances about art and had read "The Light That Failed" literally to pieces.

These things we must be sure to put into the balance when we make up our account with Kipling—these and a few more. To a middle-class boy he gave a literary sanction for the admiration of the illiterate parts of humanity. He was the first to suggest what may be called the anthropological view—the perception that another man's idea of virtue and honor may be different from one's own but quite to be respected: we must remember this when we condemn his mindless imperialism. In "Kim" (Mr. Eliot is right in calling it his best book) he established the value of things a boy was not likely to find approved anywhere else—the rank, greasy, over-rich things, the life that was valuable outside the middle-class notions of success and gentility, the virtues of peace and contemplation; for Kipling's unconscious, artistic Indian knowledge was always better—as many have said—than his conscious, political, English ideas. And then a boy in a large New York high school could find a blessed release from the school's offensive pieties about "service" in the scornful individualism of "Stalky & Co."

But it was with "Stalky & Co." that the spell was broken and, significantly enough, by H. G. Wells. In his "Outline of History" Wells connected the doings of Stalky, McTurk, and Beetle with British imperialism, and he characterized both in a way that made one see how much callousness, arrogance, and brutality one had been willing to accept. From then on the disenchantment grew. The Wellsian liberalism took hold, and Shaw offered a new romance of wit and intellect. Kipling ceased to be the hero of life and literature, became the villain, and then nothing more than a dim symbol, though a natural gratitude kept green the memory of the pleasure he had given.

If this is indeed typical of the experience of many, an understanding of the reciprocal influence of Kipling and the Shaw-Wells liberalism is essential to the understanding of both Kipling and liberalism. And it is essential to the understanding of Mr. Eliot's essay on Kipling, which is not so much an essay in literature as in politics—in politics where it is involved with sentiment, assumptions, and sensibilities. Mr. Eliot does not admit this, and his obscuring of his intention perhaps explains why his essay is simply tiresome. This is not a thing I should ever have thought I would say about an essay of Mr. Eliot's, however wrong-headed, but then Mr. Eliot has never before been verbose in evasion.

The literary point that Mr. Eliot makes is that Kipling must be judged not as a writer of poetry but as a writer of verse, and that as a writer of verse he is admirable. There follow definitions of a certain ingenuity, but the distinction is nothing more than the old inadequate one—I believe that Mr. Eliot himself has specifically refused it—which Matthew Arnold advanced in writing about Dryden and Pope. I fail to see the usefulness of the distinction, I can even see critical danger in it; and when Mr. Eliot says that Kipling's verse sometimes becomes poetry it seems to me that poetry is merely an honorific word used to denote verse of a particular intensity. Nowadays, it is true, we are not enough aware of the pleasures of verse of a low intensity; Crabbe, Cowper, and Scott are rejected because they are not Donne or Hopkins or Mr. Eliot himself; and I should have welcomed Mr. Eliot's speaking out in a general way in support of this admirable and, as I think, necessary tradition. Had he done so, Kipling would not have appeared preeminent above certain other poets, but much would have had to be said in praise of Kipling. In two evenings or even in a single very long one you can read through the bulky Inclusive Edition of his verse on which Mr. Eliot's selection is based and be neither wearied—because you will not have been involved—nor uninterested—because Kipling was a man of great gifts. You will have moments of admiration and even wish that Mr. Eliot had included certain poems he has left out. You will be frequently angry at the truculence and sometimes amused (who but Kipling would have written a brag about English understatement? Carlyle on Silence is nothing to this), but when you have done you will be more inclined to pity than condemn: the constant iteration of the bravado will have been illuminated by a few poems which touch on the fear and horror which Mr. Wilson deals with at length and which Mr. Eliot refers to: you feel that the ramparts of empire are being built against the mind's threat to itself.

Mr. Eliot's literary point about Kipling is too small for the éclat with which he brings it forward. We look for proportion to be restored by his handling of Kipling's politics, but we are disappointed. Mr. Eliot's inadequacy with Kipling's politics is a literary fault, for Kipling's politics are not a matter of formulations but of tone, overtone, emphasis, and color, none of which Mr. Eliot notices. He is at pains, for example, to deny that Kipling was a fascist: a tory, he says, is a very different thing, a tory considers fascism the last debasement of democracy. This is either disingenuous or obtuse. A tory, to be sure, is not a fascist, and speaking for myself, some of my best friends are tories—but it is just because Dr. Johnson, Burke, and Walter Scott are different from Kipling that they are admirable and instructive. Their monarchical and feudal ideals led them to large and often noble perceptions. Kipling is not like them, he is not generous and manly; he has none of their mind. His ideals left him mean; his toryism had often—though not always—a lower-middle-class snarl of defeated gentility in it, and it is this rather than his love of authority that might suggest an affinity with fascism. His ideal of loyalty depends upon the admission of inferiority: one suspects that his notion of the perfect relationship is that of man and dog. His imperialism is reprehensible not because it is imperialism—which in the abstract may be a defensible system—but because he was too small of mind to conceive anything but a puny and mindless imperialism. In short, Kipling is unloved and unlovable, not by reason of his beliefs, but by reason of the temperament that gave them literary expression. Of this temperament Mr. Eliot seems quite unaware.

It is not extravagant to say that Kipling's aberrations have been one of liberalism's major misfortunes. John Stuart Mill urged all liberals to study the conservative Coleridge, remarking that we should pray to have enemies who make us worthy of ourselves. Kipling was an enemy who had the opposite effect. For example, it seems to me that the strength of toryism at its best lies in its descent from an administrative tradition, while the weakness of liberalism is likely to be a fogginess about administration: Kipling's sympathy was always with the administrator, never with the legislator; this is foolish but it is not the most reprehensible error in the world, and it is a prejudice that in the hands of an intelligent man might serve to make clear to the man of principle, to the liberal, what the difficulties of governing really are. And this is what Kipling set out to do, but he so charged his demonstration with hatred and contempt, with rancor and caste feeling, that he could not be believed. His extravagance sprang from his opinion of the liberal intellectual; the liberal intellectual responded by hating everything that Kipling loved

We must make no mistake about it—Kipling was an honest man and he loved the national virtues. But I suppose no man ever did more harm to the national virtues than Kipling did. He mixed them up with swagger and swank, with bullying, ruthlessness, and self-righteousness, and he set them against intellect. He made them stink in the nostrils of youth. I remember that in my own undergraduate days we used specifically to exclude physical courage from among the virtues—we were exaggerating the point of a joke of Shaw's—and up to the war I had a yearly struggle with undergraduates over Wordsworth's "Happy Warrior" (which, incidentally, is the respectable father of the profligate "If"): it seemed too moral and "manly," they said, and once when I remarked that John Wordsworth had apparently been just such a man as his brother had described and told them about his courageous and dutiful death at sea, they said flatly that they were not impressed. This was not what they really thought, but the ideas of courage and duty had been steeped for them in the Kipling vat and they rejected the ideas with the color. And in England this response seems to have gone even farther. The interesting and touching phenomenon of the cult of Richard Hillary (see Arthur Koestler's article, The Birth of a Myth, in Horizon for April, 1943) is the effort of the English young men to find the national virtues without the Kipling touch, to be soldiers without being idiots, to have emotions about their nation without music-hall facility, to know and resist their enemies without self-glorification.

If proof were ever needed of the practical importance of literature, it is here in this spectacle of a poet making impossible the virtues he prized, and rightly prized. And of this Mr. Eliot remains curiously unaware, giving us a Kipling of unexceptionable temperament, defending his toryism and imperialism as if he were discussing Burke or Fitzjames Stephen.

Mr. Eliot speaks of "the fascination of exploring a mind so different from my own," and certainly the difference between the two minds is the quietly dramatic point of his elaborate public appearance with Kipling. But we are tempted—and perhaps Mr. Eliot wishes us to be tempted—to question the difference and look for the similarity. And poetically the affinity is not so impossible as it seems. Mr. Eliot speaks of the public intention and the music-hall tradition of Kipling's verse, and whoever has heard a record of Mr. Eliot reading "The Waste Land" will have been struck by how much that poem is publicly intended, shaped not so much for the study as for the theater—or at least the pulpit and the altar—by how much, in the full dialect rendition of the cockney passages, it is even shaped for the music hall, by how open the poet's voice makes the music we are inclined to think secretive. Then it is significant that among the dominant themes of both Kipling and Mr. Eliot is the fear of a nameless psychological horror and despair. Politically they share the headlong and angry reliance on administration and authority. They have the same sense of being beset and betrayed by the ignoble mob: Kipling invented and elaborated the figure of the "Pict," the dark, little, hating man who in other guises plays so important a part in Mr. Eliot's poetry, who stimulates in them both the same pathos of xenophobia, one manifestation of which is an open and reasoned anti-Semitism. (Mr. Eliot, it is true, would not descend to the snippy, persecuted anti-Semitism of ironic good manners which, in The Waster, leads Kipling to write "etc." when the rhyme requires "Jew"; but Mr. Eliot must have been at some trouble to procure this poem for his selection, for it is not included in the Inclusive Edition.)

It has sometimes seemed to me that one of the serious weaknesses of liberalism is its obtuse literary sensibility—its doctrinaire suspicion of literature's variety and subtlety, its inability to accept perceptions apart from rejected formulations, its dislike of the strange and unexpected, its sneaking admiration of the solidly dull, and perhaps above all its inability to be aware of the meaning of style, of the implications of the tone of an utterance. A critic like Mr. Eliot has always seemed useful exactly because, being free from the liberal prepossessions—though certainly not free from other political conditions of taste—he could challenge the liberal sensibility. His Kipling venture suggests that we may not be able to rely on him farther for this challenge, not because he has found merit in Kipling—it is there—but because his judgment is so without illumination, leaving us with nothing more than the possibility of reflecting on how deep, how obscure, and how bitterly combative are the motives of literary judgment.

A Novelist's Faith

A CERTAIN MEASURE. By Ellen Glasgow. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

THE United States, like all other civilized countries, has produced an enormous number of novelists—that is to say, persons who have written and published not one novel or two but many. The most obvious way to classify them is to make a division into the good and the bad; but this is not the only way, and it is not always or for all purposes the most significant way. Another very useful classification which may cut across the obvious one is made if we separate those who have from those who have not practiced their craft under the control of the assumption that novel writing is a unique art, with aims as well as methods peculiar to it. The latter may write for money, fun, or fame. They may also write to attack or defend some moral or political or social cause. But novel writing is for them one of the ways of achieving ends which may be also achieved in other ways. The former write novels to accomplish something which they feel would not be accomplished at all if novels were not written. It is not a question of art for art's sake—whatever that may mean. The novels may be written not for art's sake but in order, to take a phrase from the book at present under review, "to increase our understanding of life and heighten our consciousness." But the novelist, on this assumption, has a unique way of doing both these things.

Obviously one of Ellen Glasgow's claims to distinction is that she belongs to the rather small company of Americans who have persistently written novels on this assumption. The subtitle of the present volume—"An Interpretation of Prose Fiction"—is somewhat misleading. Actually it is not a treatise on the art of prose fiction but a collection of individual prefaces for an edition of her own novels. But because she has consistently been a certain kind of novelist these prefaces almost inevitably do become a defense of that general conception of the novelist's art to which she has been steadfastly loyal. For that reason also they give a meaning to her career.

Leave out of account the controlling faith, take what the merely hard-boiled would declare "the facts in the case," and that career might become the occasion for obvious irony. Here

The LOCUSTS

A novel by OTTO SCHRAG

THIS great novel is the story of America and the builders of America — farmers to whom "land was land" whether in the Ukraine or in Kansas; men who had been prospectors or gamblers or cowhands; and the women — the farm wives and the school teacher and the dance hall girl — who had come with them to face an unknowable future. But especially it is the story of Jeremiah the preacher and the Enemy — the great plague of locusts against which he pitted his faith. $3.00

Two Distinguished Latin-American Novels

THE Golden Serpent

By CÍRO ALEGRIA

Author of Broad and Alien is the World

THIS second novel by the Latin-American prize novel winner is a wild, flavorful story of the cholos who live along the river Marañon in Peru, the Golden Serpent. "His reader yields to the prevailing magic and wanders along contentedly through tales of Lucinda's abduction, the watch for the blue puma, the priest who said mass wholesale instead of retail and got stoned for it. And always the river sounds in his ears, as a primitive people adapt their skills and philosophies to the rough demands of their life." — N. Y. is a woman who began as a rebel against the genteel tradition and who ends, as rebels so often do, protesting against the rebelliousness of a new generation. As a young beginner she was convinced that Southern novelists did not tell the truth about Southern society. As the result of her early efforts one old lady told her sadly that if she had Miss Glasgow's talents she would devote them to proving that the South had been right; an elderly relative declared, "It is incredible that a well-brought-up Southern girl should even know what a bastard is"; a publisher suggested that she should try her hand at an "optimistic" novel. A little less than half a century later she is complaining that realism has often "degenerated into literary ruffianism" and that "nowadays, American novels are filled with illegitimate offspring, and New York is overcrowded with vociferous young radicals, just escaped from the South."

Now if she were actually saying no more than that while one bastard is necessary, too many of them—literal or figurative—are shocking, she would merely be furnishing an example to support the often-advanced proposition that all generations are alike in that each is convinced its elders did not go far enough and its younger contemporaries are going too far. But Miss Glasgow is interesting because she makes a good case for her contention that the essential difference is not merely a matter of far enough and too far. Though she can refer humorously to those present-day "Southern realists who are enjoying the more profitable disfavor of the present," and can protest that "the multitude of half-wits, and whole idiots, and nymphomaniacs, and paranoiacs, and rakehells in general that populate the modern literary South could flourish nowhere but in the weird pages of melodrama," what she is most importantly contending is that "the republic of letters" has "surrendered unconditionally to the amateur"—and by the amateur she means the novelist who may seek sensation on the one hand or earnestly propagate some moral or political doctrine on the other, who may even empty, with what he hopes is scientific objectivity, his notebooks into his novels, but who is not, in her sense, a novelist at all because he is not a writer who feels that novel writing is the result of a unique activity in the course of which reality as the individual sees it is recreated in a form from which his own deepest feeling toward it and judgment of it will emerge.

A review offers no opportunity to debate the validity of judgments implied or of aesthetic principles laid down. It does, however, permit the statement that Miss Glasgow's pages afford admirable occasion for such debate, as well as an admirable account of her own attitudes toward life and art. A large part of her work has been concerned with people living with a dying tradition, one which, in the novelist's opinion, both should and inevitably must die. Yet there is nothing in which she has believed more firmly than in the necessity of a tradition to a good life. Speaking of one of her novels she says: "My major theme is the conflict of human beings with human nature, of civilization with biology. In this constant warfare tragedy lies not in defeat but in surrender." Perhaps the fact that it was her fate to develop in a society where the only definable tradition was one already doomed to death is in part responsible for the evolution of her own dominant mood, which she describes thus: "Although a kind of cheerful pessimism, lightly turning into ironic amusement, has hardened to fortitude, both my sympathy and my resentment are still as easily aroused as they ever were in the past. I have never lost the old irrational sense that, by some sinister fate, I had become in part responsible for the evils of a world which, like the Shropshire Lad, I had never made."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Yankee Dick Whittington

CONNECTICUT YANKEE: AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY. By Wilbur L. Cross. Yale University Press. $5.

THE subject and author of this book is peculiarly a Connecticut institution, in some degree a product of nature but mainly a work of art. During his own lifetime, partly with the help of communal composition but certainly not without his own complicity, Wilbur Cross has become a legend in which Connecticut people of all classes and political parties feel a sense of proprietorship. He is not, therefore, entirely his own man, nor is the story of his life exclusively a private concern. Now that he comes to write that story, completing it on his eighty-first birthday, he is free to show of what materials the institution was built, he can discriminate between the Wahrheit and the Dichtung of the legend, but any effort on his part to destroy the legend or weaken the institution would certainly be resented and would probably fail.

One of the first things to be said in praise of this autobiography is, therefore, that it is written with a feeling of responsibility in the execution of the public trust. To the thousands who know Governor Cross in person and to the many thousands more who think they know a good deal about him, "Connecticut Yankee" will bring few surprises. During the many months in which the book has been awaited they have expected from him a shrewd, canny, humorous tale, packed with exact information and kindly innuendo, fighting with a sword of wit behind a shield of assumed simplicity. They have expected the story of an extraordinarily full and various life told by a mind still young, unwearied by faithful attendance upon thousands of committees, unsoured by thousands of campaign speeches. Just that is what is now laid before them. The legend is authenticated and the institution is secure.

The title "Connecticut Yankee," or rather the clear sharp idea those words convey, suffuses the book as a drop of ink does a gallon of water. One guesses that when once he had found this almost perfect title the author resolved to write up to it, to exemplify it fully, and to include as little as possible that did not come under that rubric. Now shrewdness comes under it, but not the deeper kinds of wisdom. Eager activity of many sorts is included, but not reflection. From a Connecticut Yankee, as commonly understood, we expect the fruits of an outward and worldly success. They are here. What we do not expect from him, or get from this book, is the depth, the quiet, the peace that come, perhaps, only from the experience of failure. In the career of this Yankee Dick Whittington, which began in an obscure village and culminated in four terms as Governor of Connecticut, failure seems to have been left out.

On an early page of his book Governor Cross wonders, somewhat vaguely, which one of his ancestors reaching back into earliest Puritan times has contributed most to his own characteristics. Judging from his account of these people, one would select his great-grandfather Peter Cross, a small farmer and peddler of earthenware, "a convivial companion who loved a jest and a good story whether he told it himself or heard it told by another." With those words for guide one can paint an imaginary portrait not unlike the one that Connecticut has now in mind of "Uncle Toby" himself. It is the picture of a man who easily turned his hands and wits to various tasks, saw his fellow clearly through laughing eyes, took nothing—even himself—too seriously, and by dint of having a thoroughly good time in life helped many others to a better time than they could have had without him. Peter Cross's "bump of veneration," to use a phrase of his times, was probably not prominent. Religion meant less to him than to his forbears. One guesses that he watched his fellow-men narrowly on the road, in church, and at the counter of the general store, thus accumulating a considerable knowledge of human nature. He too might have said: "There is very little difference between tricks of horses and tricks of men."

As though recognizing some of these likenesses, Governor Cross regrets that he was not named after this great-grandfather instead of the Methodist leader Wilbur Fiske. "What a wonderful name that would have been for me," he exclaims, "on entering a public career! 'Peter Cross the Governor of Connecticut!' It would have been good for thousands of votes."

A remark such as this, quoted out of context, may suggest to uninformed persons a doubt whether the man who made it, or the book in which it appears, can have any serious importance. Similar doubts have occurred even in Connecticut. They were expressed, chiefly by Republicans, when Wilbur Cross devoted most of his speech at a dinner celebrating his first victory at the polls to a jocose diatribe against the custom of taking baths. His campaign speeches contained a good many references to his rural boyhood, to the "little old red schoolhouse" where he began his literary career, and to the country store in which as a child he took his first lessons in politics and human nature. His Republican critics disliked all this not for its apparent frivolity but because it was rosy, delightful, and wonderfully successful in getting votes.

During his first campaign Wilbur Cross had to face the sneers that commonly greet the new-come "scholar in politics." But "the dear old gentleman down at Yale," as the late J. Henry Roraback rather insolently called him, turned out to be so different from the harmless dry-as-dust which "the boys" had expected that they soon promoted him to the exalted rank of "that old son-of-a-bitch"—a sobriquet which may well have pleased him more than any of his academic titles. When spoken with a smile it can of course convey the fondest masculine affection, and even when ground out between gritted teeth it suggests a respect seldom paid by "the boys" to college professors.

No one will complain that there is anything frivolous in the handling of former political opponents to be found in "Connecticut Yankee." They are not denounced, to be sure, or vilified. Far worse than that, they are quoted—usually without comment. The things they did in the effort to thwart and hamstring one whom they regarded as an intruder upon a Republican domain are simply set down, for the record. It seems probable, therefore, that certain names which posterity would never otherwise have heard will be preserved like flies in amber.

Governor Cross devotes one quarter of his book to the years of his youth, another quarter to his long service as teacher, author, editor, and administrative officer at Yale, and all the second half to the political career which he began at an age, to use his own words, at "which most men are dead." The permanent value of "Connecticut Yankee" lies, no doubt, in its close and fairly minute record of his four terms in office as Governor of Connecticut. Herein it has no rival, if only for the reason that no other such expert man of letters in America has ever had his chance to observe and record the political scene from just such a point of vantage. The combination of opportunity and ability is unique.

"Connecticut Yankee" is a book to be remembered, also, for the example it gives of a purpose tenaciously held and finally accomplished after a long series of disappointments. For six years Governor Cross planned and worked for certain quite necessary reforms in the administrative structure of the state government, but was balked of his hopes at every turn. During his last two years in office, however, he finally secured more than he had hoped for; so that he left the governorship far stronger and more respected than it had been at any time in a hundred years. A fact which he does not record in his book is that he left it with honor, with the praise even of those who had once thought themselves his enemies, and with the affection of all who know him.

NEW POEMS, 1943: AN ANTHOLOGY OF BRITISH AND AMERICAN VERSE. Edited by Oscar Williams. Howell, Soskin, and Company. $2.75.

OSCAR WILLIAMS, in compiling his book of "New Poems, 1943," has been extraordinarily successful in achieving what he set out to do, if that was, as I take it, to present the most interesting poems written within the year in the English language. Occasionally he has gone beyond this limit of time: Allen Tate's "More Sonnets at Christmas," which celebrate the last occurrence of that holiday, are preceded by the earlier and now well-known "Sonnets at Christmas," written ten years ago. Though I recognize several other poems from having seen them before, there are, so far as I am able to discern, none, with the exception I have noted, which has not been done in an awareness of a world at war. A considerable number of the poems are here published for the first time. The volume is made up in large part from the work of established poets whose worth has been approved by their contemporaries, but there is also a generous selection from young poets whose talents as yet exceed their reputations. The range, among Americans, is from Robert Frost, who was born in 1875, to Dunstan Thompson, who did not see the light of day until 1918; among the British, from Edith Sitwell and Herbert Read, who have long been known in this country, to Alex Comfort, who at twenty-three years of age makes here his first appearance in an American volume.

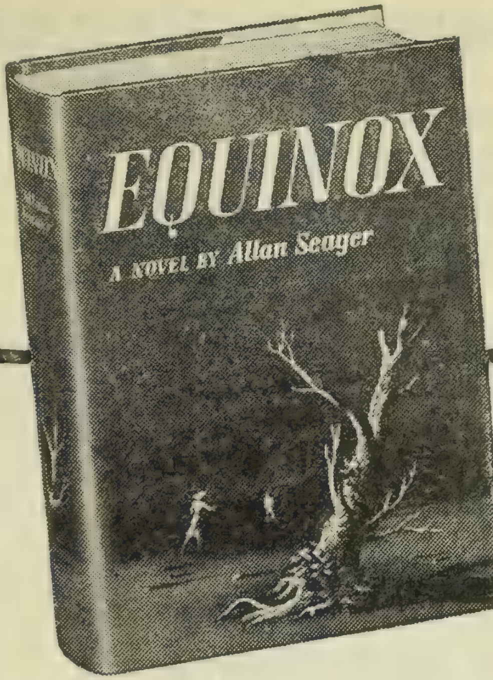
The choice, then, is wide; and Mr. Williams's taste seems to me sufficiently sound to allow the volume to be taken as indicative of the present state of the poetic mind. Statements on dust-covers are notoriously untrustworthy, since they are designed, not to describe a book, but to sell it. In this instance, however, I may be permitted to start with the publisher's blurb, which declares that the poems included in the anthology have been chosen because they deal with realities and then goes on to say that the book is essentially one of war poetry. The editor is then quoted: "It is the work of poets who have intensely felt the fact of war."

The standard of the book is high, because most of the poets represented do deal with their own realities. And that they have intensely felt the fact of war may be assumed, since no one could well live in the world today and avoid either fact or feeling. But it is remarkable, considering the wide range of the anthologist's choice, how little war poetry he has managed to get between his covers. The blurb at least makes it clear that whatever he found is here. But it is quite as clear from the pages that, however intensely his contributors may have felt as men and women, as poets they have for the most part neither cared nor dared to write as if the war were their main concern. They are like Dante's angel, who, opening the gate on that portion of hell where the violent are, looked as though he were moved by quite other cares than those around him.

Very early in the book—the poets are arranged alphabetically by name—amid the scattered brilliance of George Barker's phrases, there is a reference to the Austrian corporal "At whose word once, from Europe to the sky, Suddenly everyone everywhere began to die." But it is a phrase among a hundred others. William Empson asks to be told again "about Europe and her pains." But we have gone one-third of the way through the three hundred pages before, in David Gascoyne's A Wartime Dawn, there is a clear mention of a specific event, the invasion of Norway, and even here futile battles off a bitter coast are merely numbered among the circumstances of a return from the blankness of sleep to the consciousness of one more day of a world at war. The first poems by an Englishman unmistakably devoted to the war are C. Day Lewis's Word Over All and Reconciliation; the first by an American is Marianne Moore's In Distrust of Merits, which seems to me much the best poem about the war yet written in this country. And yet, when I expressed this opinion to Miss Moore recently, her response was that she had been relieved, at the outbreak of hostilities, to know that she would not be required to write a war poem.

At this point we are halfway through the anthology, and what I have said about the first half is not invalidated by the second, in which there are only two outstanding poems which I am quite sure have the present war for their central theme: Allen Tate's Ode to Our Young Proconsuls of the Air and Jubilo. And even then I am uncertain about the second. The war certainly provided the occasion for the poem, but the center of interest is perhaps rather in the disarray of a world which has been able to find no release save in the outrage and carnage of overwhelming war.

How are we to explain this reluctance of poets who are



Clifton Fadiman in The New Yorker says: "Full of extraordinary scenes and characters, rendered with an extraordinary intensity. 'Equinox' has a bitter-aloes flavor quite unlike anything you're apt to have encountered in fiction of late. Better try it."

The New York Herald-Tribune Books says: "'Equinox' is a remarkable novel in candor, depth, and richness. The situation of Mary and her father is drawn with both dignity and delicacy. This book marks Allan Seager as a novelist of importance."

The New York Times Book Review says: "In this intelligent novel a father-daughter relationship ties together a series of sketches and portraits, some brilliantly good, all intensely readable. This relationship is conceived with the greatest insight and honesty."

The Book-of-the-Month Club News says: "Anyone who enjoys mental shudders will find them aplenty in Allan Seager's psychological problem novel. The story is told with brilliance, subtlety, and sophistication."

John Chamberlain in Harper's Magazine says: "Tragic situations are handled with such sympathy and human understanding, and told by such a master storyteller, that the book assumes real stature and importance."

among the most serious of our time to bring the war into the foreground of their thought? The more serious they are the more they would seem to be determined to use the gifts with which they have been endowed, the talents they have trained, to discover some other issue from the disorder of the times than the destructive one which the world of action, willingly or not, has desperately accepted. Of course, when a man's country is in danger, he will do what he can to defend it. But he will do this as a man, because it is the part of a man. As a poet, he has other responsibilities and other compulsions. He wants a principle of coherence and asks of his thought, which provides none, only that he might address it as Donne once did his God, "Thou hast contracted thine immensity, and shut thyselfe within Syllables and accepted a Name from us."

Then, too, being under the compulsion to tell the truth, the poet is bound to be wary of any knowledge he has not won in his own right. Most of the poets here represented have been, for one reason or another, excluded from combat, and those who are of an age and condition to do the fighting are still too taken up with their own brief youth, whose brevity now becomes especially poignant, to have assimilated their military experience. Miss Moore's poem succeeds because, while by no means unaware of those who are "fighting in deserts and caves, one by one, in battalions and squadrons," she finds the heart of her matter in her own responsibility for their having to fight. "There never was a war that was not inward." And it is because she has essentially restricted herself to this inward war, which she knows as no one else does, that she has written a poem profoundly personal and at every point precise.

It may be, too, that the poets neglect war because the theme is to them outworn. When peace was proclaimed after the last war, the poets had no ease, and between the laying down and the taking up of arms, they took it as their responsibility to tell of a world which was like Trimalchio's Sybil, who, when the little boys questioned her in her cage, wanted only to die. It was twenty-one years ago that T. S. Eliot, with that curious genius of his for taking over passages from other writers and resetting them so that they acquire quite another meaning than the author intended and take on in the reader's eye a new glint and brilliance, seized on those lines from the "Satyricon" and placing them before "The Waste Land" gave them a tragic import. In Petronius the passage has a comic intent, for the Sybil is brought in to point up Trimalchio's ignorance and boastfulness. Yet the meaning which Mr. Eliot found there must always have been in the words. What was, by the time he used them, a learned reference became, beyond any other one phrase, an expression of his own and a generation's disease. Mr. Eliot's desperation, he has been careful to tell us, was his own affair. Nevertheless, what he said about the world was recognized by anyone who could read poetry as true. One might escape his conclusions, which were singularly inconclusive, and reject his solutions, which solved none but his personal problems; but one could escape his premises only at the risk of rejecting the truth. The poetic situation is still very much what he found it; at bottom, it has not greatly changed since Baudelaire. To write now of war, when for so long nothing has promised peace, would be to write of events which, though the accompanying heroism and devastation exceed anything that could have been imagined, have already occurred in the imagination. Their moral import has already been set down. JOHN PEALE BISHOP

Mr. Crawford Explains

REPORT ON NORTH AFRICA. By Kenneth G. Crawford. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

UNTIL November of 1942 the author of this little volume was among the most vigorous critics of the conduct of our foreign affairs to be found in the Washington press corps. In that month Allied troops landed in North Africa, and Mr. Crawford decided instantly and with complete finality that this heartening event proved he had been wrong and the Administration right. He wrote in PM that the entire Vichy policy was to be judged by the extent to which North African politicians fell in with the Allied plans. It was with this orientation that he set sail the following March—four months after the event and more than two months after the assassination of Darlan—for a ninety-day visit to the scene of the first great political controversy of this war.

Crawford's journey has left him convinced of the correctness of American policy in North Africa, but I think his report would prove an exceedingly frail reed should the Administration choose to lean upon it. Of its 206 short pages, something like two-thirds are given over to incidents of the journey, descriptions of the country, and snatches of local history—all colorful, incidentally, and pleasantly written. The political analysis is confined to something like 70 pages, and it is anything but substantial.

Crawford soon found that "opinion about the morality and effectiveness of the American diplomacy that made way for our November 8 landings was as sharply divided and not much better informed on the terrace of the Aletti [his hotel in Algiers] than in the Senate dining-room at the Capitol in Washington." Accordingly he tried "to reconstruct by talking with principals still on the scene." Since his informants, apart from a few prisoners in the Sahara labor camps, were either the executors of American policy or the Frenchmen with whom they collaborated, the report emerges as a painfully uncritical acceptance of the official case.

Out of personal regard for the author, whose record as a liberal and as a journalist entitles him to a respectful hearing, I wish I could report that he has at least argued a good case. But he hasn't. He is obviously not at home in the web of foreign politics, and this part of his book is filled with contradictions, inaccuracies, and one-sided testimony. He makes the point that De Gaulle's London Committee could not have been used in connection with the invasion because it had compromised itself in the eyes of the French people by collaborating with Communists. ("The people of France have not forgotten that the Communists played the role of traitor before and during the German invasion.") But if the French of North Africa could not endure the Communists for having sabotaged the war effort up to the moment Russia was invaded, how can it be argued that North African sentiment compelled us to deal with Darlan, Peyrouton, Boisson, and others who, going far beyond sabotage, had completely identified themselves with the interests of the enemy?

Crawford a little later admits the existence of the widespread De Gaullist sentiment which subsequently showed itself in North Africa, but he explains it hostilely as "French nationalism . . . reasserting itself," with De Gaulle "as an opponent of American and British interference in matters of French political concern." We favor French nationalism, it appears, when it is exemplified by such ultra-national factionalists as Darlan and Weygand, but fight it when its leading exponent commands popular support ranging from Royalist to Communist. Of the Anglo-American interference which De Gaulle is accused of opposing, Crawford unwittingly cites repeated instances: "It required threats of public denunciation to persuade De Gaulle to put his signature to an innocuous statement . . ." (Crawford doesn't tell us that De Gaulle wanted to make the statement meaningful instead of innocuous); "it was decided [by Churchill and Roosevelt] that De Gaulle should not be permitted to push Giraud aside . . ."; "The President and the Prime Minister agreed that the French army . . . should not be turned over to De Gaulle," etc.

There is not a good word in the book for the Frenchman who did after all rally his countrymen to the side of the British in the days when England itself seemed doomed, but there are tolerance, understanding, and the benefit of every doubt for men who in those same days busied themselves fitting France into the New Order. "Pétain approved of the American invasion but couldn't say so publicly." "Noguès is a more complicated human than his American publicity has made him out." Lemaigre-Dubreuil, "one of the most useful" of a group of "bankers and industrialists whom the Nazis thought they had taken into camp," was so harshly treated by the pro-De Gaulle press of America that he "joined the Gaullists because he considered such affiliation the best way of expressing his anti-American sentiments." Make what you can of that! Spanish Loyalist prisoners were in fact compelled to do forced labor on the trans-Sahara railway, but conditions were not so bad as they had been painted, the liberals back home were in too much of a hurry for the liquidation of the camps, and the directors of the Compagnie Méditerranée-Niger, in charge of the project, had "an almost fanatical faith in their enterprise," which, Crawford explains, "mitigated any self-reproach for their employment practices." Crawford admits, incidentally, that our army would have been glad to use some of the Spanish prisoners "but had been prevented from enlisting them by diplomatic considerations" when General Franco protested.

General Giraud, despite his complete failure in the role for which he was cast by the Allied leaders, emerges from this report without a flaw. Crawford accepts in every detail the official story of his escape and adds that he was recommended to President Roosevelt, via Robert Murphy, by "certain Frenchmen," unnamed. There is no word here about the famous letter which Giraud addressed from his Königstein prison to Pétain, in which salient features of the Nazi system were highly recommended for France. Crawford feels that "slander against Giraud went to fantastic lengths in some liberal publications," and he cites as an example the confusing of Giraud with General Gouraud, who was reported to have plotted with the Nazis. Crawford surely knows that this error appeared not in one of the "liberal publications," but in the Saturday Evening Post, though it was later picked up by Edgar Mowrer of the New York Post, who made it the basis for an inquiry. The mistake, incidentally, was made by the same Demaree Bess whom Crawford singles out as a journalist who "did much to clear up confusion" about political events in North Africa.

More serious than such inaccuracies, and the book's undeniably partial approach, is its bewildering lack of focus. In a Foreword designed to "orient" the report Crawford writes that "the African campaign changed the political character of the war." The President then and there "abandoned any pretense of leading a world revolution," and "our basic war policy, it became apparent, was one of military expedience and power politics rather than reform and welfare politics." This sounds at first like the words of those liberal critics whom Crawford now acidly berates. But whereas Crawford himself would once have considered them a serious indictment, he now regards them as an indorsement. "Success," he writes, "won us more admirers in North Africa than food or kindness. It will be the same elsewhere." And if we have confused the European underground by our deal with Darlan, what of it?—"it was not the first element of confusion injected into this war." If this shallow cynicism is really Crawford's position—and I find that hard to believe—he is entitled to it. But then why write a book to defend our policy? Our troops landed in Africa; so the policy was obviously right. By the same token Hirohito's troops landed in the Philippines, thereby proving that the code of the Samurai has much to recommend it. The Jewish Dickens

THE WORLD OF SHOLOM ALEICHEM. By Maurice Samuel. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

THE Russo-Polish Pale, the last or latest metropolis of the Diaspora, accounts more than anything else for what the West now knows as the Jew. Its liveliest memorial was created by one of the few great folk writers whose names and personalities are a matter of historical record. Sholom Aleichem (né Rabinovitch) was an "emancipated" Jew, acquainted with Western culture and with one foot already outside the ghetto. This distance, perhaps, was a necessity to his writing.

The intrinsic interest of its subject sustains Mr. Samuel's book, which deals with what Sholom Aleichem wrote about rather than with the writing itself. But Mr. Samuel himself writes with a too evenly diffused warmth and blurs everything. In any case it is hard to talk in English about the virtues of Sholom Aleichem's work. The verbal wit, liveliness, and Elizabethan fluidity of Yiddish do not survive translation, nor does the shop talk of Talmudic scholarship—something a Jew got in his bones without ever having read the Talmud. The contexts are difficult to render unto Gentiles, and unless it is understood how the contexts are being wrenched, much of the humor fails to come through.

Inevitably, Sholom Aleichem is called the Jewish Dickens. Such parallels are objectionable on principle, but this one does provide some illumination. Like Dickens's humor, that of Sholom Aleichem is comic and verbal and depends less on situation than on character, local color, and dialect. Personages are comic because they do not take a sufficiently pessimistic or resigned view of themselves and of their condition, or because they handle too colloquially the big, pompous truths of life. This is of the essence of most humor about the poor. Sholom Aleichem's humor sometimes comes close to farce but never actually reaches it, for the absurd is too near at hand in the reality that is imitated. I think that Sholom Aleichem goes deeper than Dickens. His humor can take control of and intensify a tragic situation; it deals really with what is a tragic situation in the main. But to show the disparity between the Jew's visions of heaven, space, security, and wealth on the one hand and his cramped and precarious confinement on the other was no job for the tragic muse unmasked. And then the ghetto was not quite what it seems. The Jew there was not nearly so middle-class as he has since become in Brooklyn and as he became in Germany. He managed to produce a real folk life in the tenements and back alleys and even the suburbs. Many of Sholom Aleichem's characters take the fact that they are Jews for granted, and this great favor was allowed them nowhere else on earth than in certain communities of the Pale, where Jews performed all the functions of society and were not penned within an economic caste.

The ghetto taught the Jew to keep his eye on the main thing, the main thing in any interest, not only his own. Therefore his impatience with etiquette. The poor everywhere are impatient with etiquette, if not decorum, but none so much as the Jews. For them the only etiquette impervious to ridicule is that of ideas. Why deny that man lives by cruel competition in this particular world? Nor is there any valid reason to curb the extravagances of one's temperament. It is no wonder that the best literature the ghetto has produced in recent times is humorous and that its folk life can be defined as peculiar to a people who live in the constant presence or under the perpetual threat of the joke. The ghetto Jew may have been retarded in many respects, but in this he was the most advanced of all human beings—"Oriental" perhaps in his poverty and in the denseness of the atmosphere in which he lived but not in his realism and in his abhorrence of hypocrisy. (The last thing the Jew is, is tricky, and the last thing he thinks of is his front to the world. The ostentatious Jew—that great myth of the Anglo-Saxon world—is ostentatious only about his wealth, and unlike maharajahs and Vanderbilts, makes no other claim by his ostentation than that of wealth. And when he loses it he does not bother to keep the lace curtains hanging in the front parlor.)

There is another reason why the Jews live on such close terms with humor. In the last two thousand years they have been unable to play any striking role as a whole people, with the result that history has not presented them with fresh infusions of glory and dignity from above to act as sedatives upon their critical sense. The persecutions they endure, because these involve fundamentally meaningless suffering, relevant only to the persecutors themselves, neither sharpen their sense of tragedy nor dry up their wit. The effect is the opposite. True, the Jews have acquired a phenomenal capacity for suffering, but pure, irrelevant suffering in itself—no less than the competitive life of the ghetto—has made them only the more impatient with all the devices by which the necessary cruelties of existence are dignified and sublimated. They have learned that the best or at least the safest way to protect oneself against what for Jews would be insupportable otherwise is humor.

The Jew's almost quixotic insistence upon directness in relations and his unwillingness to allow himself or anyone else to be identified by or with his function or position in society is succinctly illustrated by Sholom Aleichem's story of the old Jewess who refuses to pay her fare to the conductor of a trolley car because he happens also to be the young son of a neighbor, whom she has known since he was a baby. It strikes her as ridiculous beyond words to enter into such a formal relationship with him as would be denoted by paying him fare. Aside from the fact that it is to her own interest not to pay the fare, she doesn't—for his own sake—want him to make a fool of himself.

Sholom Aleichem's characters are unsatisfied by their emotions; they insist on worrying them into ideas and on posing them so that they best catch the gleam of logic's rhetoric. "I will extol Thee, my God, O King (what good would it do me if I didn't?)" Tevyeh, the wagon-driver, prays. He is full of pleading and submission, there is no question about his piety, and he has at that moment permitted himself a glance at the wretched panorama of his life; but he cannot defend his feelings from the examining and comparing intellect. It is this that the Nazis profess to complain of most in the Jews.

Capitalism, in the sense that capital is the most valuable form of wealth, was nothing new to the ghetto, as we all know. The Jew has been a capitalist more or less ever since the beginning of the Diaspora or whenever it was he rid himself of the instinctive reliance upon ponderous or immobile possessions. It has always been the speculative, commercial, pre-industrial aspect of capitalism, not the exploitation of other people's labor through the possession of their tools, that has attracted the Jews. Nevertheless, though speculation may have built the ghetto, it was the first—in its more modern forms—to violate its privacy and breach it to the outside world. It is responsible for that most typical phenomenon of recent Jewish life, the Luftmensch, the man who lives in, by, and on air, the fixer, the promoter, the go-between, the man who always has a deal on hand and never a vocation, the visionary whose dreams are full of calculation and the grossest actualities, the practical man who suffers from pathological optimism—a malady without which many Jews would be unable to go on being Jews. Sholom Aleichem hints, I believe, at the Jew's weariness of this sort of thing. He is tired whether he knows it or not of the adventures of capitalism, bored by them; he understands capitalism too well and has begun to have a sense of guilt about it—not that the Jews in particular are the ones responsible or that all Jews are capitalists, but that most Jews grow up to be entrepreneurs by culture and psychological habit. Now one part of them yearns for a new order, while another turns backward to Zionism and a pastoral life that is nothing but a literary reminiscence. In the wretchedness and beyond the humor of Sholom Aleichem's world both hopes begin to stir. The Jews like cities, gregarious life, and the fluidities of commerce; they still like them but at the same time they yearn to stop liking them. Security lies in another direction.

Yet the Jews in a way relish their fate, as in a way everyone does. For they still are chosen, chosen at least to be always confronted by or to confront the alternate finalities of the human lot. Think: they have been and still are the most particularist people on earth; yet they have been accused of making it their particular mission to destroy particularity, to internationalize, to create the brotherhood of man. They are accused of self-seeking; yet they produced the supreme example of the gratuitous and disinterested man who is not an ascetic. They are supposed to be materialists; yet none have been so foolhardy in exposing themselves for an idea. And at the same time they are stubborn, they go on manifesting vitality, swarm, pullulate, enjoy, and multiply; yet they were the first to distinguish between the wholesome and the unwholesome and to find fertility rites an abomination—perhaps because they have always been more convinced than anybody else of the essential dignity of man. This may explain why they are so ready, as in Sholom Aleichem's case, to submit themselves to the attrition of humor. CLEMENT GREENBERG

OF THE new fall novels I have so far read, the most impressive is Paul Hughes's "Retreat from Rostov" (Random House, $2.75). It is a first novel and falls short of being the major work it could have been, but it is remarkable if only because its author, a radio and newspaperman of twenty-seven who has never been outside his native state of Oklahoma, instead of crawling into his own shell and snuggling the world in after him, set himself the imposing task of recreating in fiction one of the crucial engagements of the Russian war. In addition to news reports, Mr. Hughes had only ambition to work with, but he remembered there had been novelists before him, and he frankly went to school to the author of that other Russian war story "War and Peace." From Tolstoy he learned not only a possible Russian background but what a novel should be and a method of narrative—how to handle time and space, how to use people over a large canvas, the virtues of an efficient unstylish prose; he also learned the uses of an in- and yet above-the-battle point of vantage. This is not to say that "Retreat from Rostov" is a second-hand version of "War and Peace," any more than Tolstoy's Austerlitz, say, is a second-hand version of Stendhal's Waterloo. Nor do I mean to indicate that Mr. Hughes is even remotely in a class with his master: unhappily, in fact, his apprenticeship to Tolstoy proves, once again, that it takes more than a great teacher to make a great pupil. But it also proves that the pupil with the grace and wisdom to seek instruction in the proper places is at least that far in advance of the pupil too arrogant to be taught. In the welter of current fiction whose chief boast seems to be that art needs no masters, "Retreat from Rostov" is a rare phenomenon, a novel that consciously sets out to learn from the past and take its stand in the best literary tradition.

In a way the hero of "Retreat from Rostov" is Rostov itself. Mr. Hughes's novel is an account of the thirty-four-day battle to capture, and hold, this key city on the Don. His sympathies are overwhelmingly pro-Russian of course, but he knows the value of telling both sides of a story, even in fiction, and moves his narrative back and forth between the Russian and German armies, from colonels to privates and cooks, from the women's corps which follows the Nazi army to the guerrillas who make the occupation of Rostov, once captured, impossible: he would wish to throw the full weight of his creative powers into the characters he despises as well as into the characters he loves. But unfortunately the creation of character, as opposed to the attitude toward character, is something no writer can learn from the greatest teacher; here he must fall back on his own resources, and Mr. Hughes's are weak. Whether because of immaturity or inexperience, he is unable to give people their final living quality; as types (though they are not types), the characters in "Retreat from Rostov" have a sort of basic validity, but they lack emotional dimension, and we are never very much concerned for their fate.

Obviously once we know the facts of an author's life it becomes all too easy to find evidences of them in his work. For instance, I have the strong impression that Mr. Hughes needs a wider experience of people than the circumstances of his life have afforded him. This is not to imply that only a cosmopolitan can write a good novel, but simply that Mr. Hughes needs to know more of human possibility than he has yet learned. All the memorable characters in fiction, lovable or not lovable, veer toward caricature in the perhaps paradoxical sense that they have been recognized by their authors to be as extravagantly strange and wonderful as human beings really are—the characters in "War and Peace" are an example—but I would guess that Mr. Hughes hesitates to "exaggerate" people because he doesn't trust himself to make the generalizations implicit in this kind of caricature. The exception in his book is the pair of Nazi friends, Baum and Schroeder, who, precisely because they are extravagantly conceived, are the most completely created and convincing of all his characters. Much more typical is his pair of foreign correspondents who are so excruciatingly "normal," even fashionable, that for purposes of evoking emotion they might just as well not exist. Of course, if you will, Mr. Hughes should be able to substitute imagination for experience; perhaps the born writer of fiction should be able to create a whole gallery of living portraits with no more than his own self to draw on. But the modern novel being what it is—such a poor little affair at best—for the moment it is enough that a writer have the taste and vision to know what a work of fiction can be, something bigger than his own small individuality, to greet him, if not as a born writer, then as a really promising talent.

Never having read "How Green Was My Valley," I am unable to compare Richard Llewellyn's new novel, "None but the Lonely Heart" (Macmillan Company, $2.75), to its very successful predecessor. By its author's reputation, however, and quite on its own, I found it a disappointing book, full of genuine pathos and technical virtuosity but at the same time forced in its sentiment and over-elaborate in its writing. It is the story of Ernie Mott, a pimply cockney youth who, having lost his none too satisfying job as artist's apprentice, drifts rather unnaturally into gangsterism; I say unnaturally because Ernie's domestic timidity and his artist's brand of sensitiveness no more seem to jibe with his recklessness as a gangster than his Ma's brand of earthy morality jibes with her secret thievery. Mr. Llewellyn is at great pains to imply society's responsibility for Ernie's loneliness and degeneration, and the nice element in his study is his true respect for the boy's feelings, though I find it a bit excessive that the pronominal Ernie is capitalized throughout the book, as if He were God. The worst part of "None but the Lonely Heart" is the section, suggestive of Robert Nathan in a macabre mood, which describes the haunt of a certain lunatic character named Henry; and the whole gangster setup is pretty much Hollywood.

A much more direct and bare indictment of society than Mr. Llewellyn's cockney novel is Bucklin Moon's novel, "The Darker Brother" (Doubleday, Doran, $2.50). Mr. Moon's biography of a charming little colored boy, born in Florida, whose mother brings him North to taste the joys of equality is not in any sense a great novel about Negroes—that is yet to be written; but it is a decent and effective one, and at least in its opening chapters a gifted one; the early scene at the railroad tracks is excellent. It is even a courageous book in its frank statement of the Negro's relation to the army and the war, and I regret that Mr. Moon took the sting out of his frightening truth by his last few pages of flag-waving. But the trouble with a novel like "The Darker Brother," as with even the best propaganda novels, is that it is read and taken to heart only by people who already know and have taken to heart; for its limited audience, it can only be an exacerbation of uneasiness and guilt, issuing in little of practical good.

Despite its praiseworthy plea for visas for refugees, which comes a bit late after all, Laura Z. Hobson's "The Trespassers" (Simon and Schuster, $2.75) is an inept and rather tasteless book. Miss Hobson's novel is woven of two threads with hardly a tangling acquaintance with each other—the story of a New York career woman and her sterile-today, downcast-father-tomorrow lover, and the story of a Viennese psychoanalyst who is trying to get his family out of Nazi Europe. The relation between these two stories is hinted at in Miss Hobson's title, "The Trespassers" being presumably her ironic name for the baby who is not allowed to be born and the Austrian exiles who are not allowed to find refuge, but novelistically speaking, their chief connection is in the amount of time the heroine spends filling out applications for visas and in the fact that the analyst is there waiting, his wife conveniently dead, when Miss Hobson's career woman is ready for a better man than her selfish lover.

Twelve Poets of Latin America

TWELVE SPANISH AMERICAN POETS. An Anthology
Edited by H. R. Hays. Yale University Press. $3.50.

THE publication of this new anthology should bring cheer to the hearts of those who love Latin American poetry and want it to reach a wider audience on this side of the Rio Grande. Not that the book itself is of such supernal quality, but because it bears evidence of having learned from its predecessor's mistakes. Last year Dudley Fitts's omnibus volume, like a traveler doing the grand tour of South America by air in two weeks, covered much and discovered little. Now H. R. Hays, contributor of notes and a few translations to that earlier volume, takes a second trip. This time he covers less ground, looks more closely at what is in front of him, and lays a basis for the beginning of understanding on the part of his reader.

If some of the outstanding values in this new volume are prosaic, they are no less important. First of all, the book deals with a reasonable number of poets—not ninety-six, as in Mr. Fitts's volume, but a mere twelve—enough to give variety, and not too many to grasp at once. Second, it chooses its twelve for understandable reasons, and arranges their work (original and in translation) according to a plan—the "dozen leading poets have been selected in order to give the reader a bird's-eye view of contemporary Spanish American poetry." There are, the editor declares, many other poets as good, or nearly so, but these twelve "represent the most important contemporary trends." "A fair sampling of each poet's work" is included, and the poems "have been chosen to give an idea of the writers' development."

Add to these excellences a preface which sets poetry in its proper place in the panorama of South American culture and an account of the various influences, native and foreign, which make that poetry what it is today, and you have a competent guide to further exploration.

Like most guides, this one walks a steady pace with but little soaring. Its twelve starred contemporary poets are by and large those one would expect to find—Pablo Neruda and Vicente Huidobro of Chile, Nicolás Guillen and Eugenio Florit of Peru, José Gorostiza of Mexico, Jorge Luis Borges of Argentina, Jorge Carrera Andrade of Ecuador, Cesar Vallejo of Peru. These are "musts" in any anthology of poetry to the south. To find them here represented with six or eight poems apiece—all newly translated since the Fitts volume appeared—is to meet new evidence of their many-sided skills.

Of the other four, Ramón López Velarde of Mexico, who died in 1921, is a somewhat neglected genius whom the editor admires more than did his contemporaries. Pablo de Rokha of Chile is an intemperate experimentalist. Luis Carlos López of Colombia is a satirist. Jacinto Fombona Chocano is one of two poets in this book—Cesar Vallejo, who immortalized Spain's agony, is the other—whose poems as chosen show an awareness of the effect of war.

As for the translations, it cannot be said too many times that poetry is the major literary form in Latin America, and a minor one here. If it were otherwise, we might ask for better translations. As it is, those Mr. Hays has made are simple, in the main accurate, sometimes beautiful. Perhaps it is better for the cause of mutual appreciation that they should leave the average reader wishing he knew Spanish better so that he might read the poems in the original. Men have learned a language for lesser reasons. MILDRED ADAMS

MUSIC

AT ONE time it is "La Mer," at another "Ibéria" that seems to me Debussy's finest orchestral work; the truth is that of the works of his that are played these two are the greatest in amplitude and complexity of form and substance, in range and power and richness of musico-pictorial suggestion, and are the high points to which Debussy carries the individual processes of his style—his impressionistic pointillisme of thematic substance and instrumental color, and his orchestral polyphony. In "La Mer" it is the pointillisme that I find so exciting; in "Ibéria" it is the polyphony—the polyphony which is to be heard at an early stage in the closing pages of "L'Après-midi d'un faune" producing a new breath-taking harmonic subtlety with each forward step of the voices, and which in "Ibéria" attains its greatest density and produces its greatest richness of harmonic complexity and subtlety. I would say, moreover, that they are the most difficult works for an orchestra to play and for a conductor to make sense of: only Toscanini, in my experience, has succeeded in integrating all the bits of figuration and color and all the nuances of pace in "La Mer" into a coherent and magnificent form in sound; but on the other hand I do not feel that even he achieves this final integration of the complex detail of "Ibéria," marvelous as his performance is in other ways.

"Ibéria," you may be surprised to learn, is one of the set of three "Images" —the other two being "Gigues" and "Rondes de printemps," which are never performed. You are not to infer that they are—like "Sirènes," the third of Debussy's "Nocturnes"—not worth performing: conductors, even the ones who have reputations for being adventurous, follow beaten paths and leave a great deal of the finest music by Haydn, Mozart, Berlioz, and other composers unplayed. Constant Lambert, in his book "Music Ho!", speaks of the orchestral "Images" as the "culmination of Debussy's style," the final "synthesis of the various elements in music that Debussy had, in his earlier days, examined and developed separately" in the process of "complete self-realization." And so the announcement that Howard Barlow was going to play all three with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony at a recent Sunday afternoon broadcast induced me to give up a marvelously beautiful day in the country in order that I might hear the performance from a first-rate radio. As it turned out I made the sacrifice for nothing, since it was impossible to get any dependable idea of the unfamiliar works from the blurred outlines and textures that reached my ears. From previous experience of Barlow's work I am sure that the blurring was initially in performances themselves; but I suspect that it was made worse by inefficiency in the broadcasting.

I suspect this because of what happened in the middle movement of Mozart's Piano Concerto K. 467—that movement after which one always hears the audience take a deep breath. Its impact is produced by the long cantilena of the piano moving calmly over agitated triplets and powerful plucked bass-notes from the orchestra; the effect depends on the piano's calm cantilena being kept clear above all the orchestral agitation down below; and in this broadcast performance the effect was destroyed by microphone placement or whatever else it was that caused the orchestra to blanket the piano, which at times could barely be heard and at times could not be heard at all. The little that I did hear of Casadesus's playing in this movement had none of the inflection with which Schnabel makes the cantilena itself breath-taking in the Victor set; and in the other movements, where it could be heard clearly, Casadesus's playing had the Czerny-exercise quality of French pianists' performance of Mozart.

One other point about the broadcast: The announcer informed the radio audience that it was about to hear Debussy's "Images" for orchestra, comprising "Gigues," "Ibéria," and "Rondes de printemps"; but he did not inform the audience that "Ibéria" itself comprised three movements, of which the second led directly into the third. The result was that most listeners, who must have been sufficiently baffled by the sounds that reached their ears, were further bewildered when they heard the second and third movements of "Ibéria" under the impression that they were "Rondes de printemps" and then heard another unidentified piece of music—the real "Rondes de printemps."

When, a few weeks ago, I finished describing how badly Serkin's performance of Beethoven's Sonata Opus 27 No. 2 was recorded, I did not add: "Needless to say, the Times reviewer pronounced the recording excellent," because when I looked in the Times the review had not yet appeared. It was a good thing that I waited, for it prevented a serious injustice to the Times reviewer: when the review did appear it pronounced the recording not "excellent" but merely "admirable." After this I don't dare to anticipate the cheery word which the recording will get from the New Yorker reviewer, who has a kindly pat on the head impartially for the best and for the worst.

Art Note

MY MEMORY played tricks when I discussed last week the new Mondrian at the Museum of Modern Art. The painting has no orange, purple, or impure colors. Seeing it again, I discovered that it was the gray which Mondrian uses here in a new way for him that made me remember his scarlet and two shades of blue as purple and impure, and the yellow as orange. But I have the feeling that this after-effect legitimately belongs to one's first sight of the painting The picture improves tremendously on a second view, and perhaps after an aging of six months or so it will seem completely successful.

The Shape of Things

SUCH ARE THE VAGARIES OF AMERICAN party politics that the Republicans are now in process of deciding whether to offer themselves in 1944 as a conservative check on the Administration or as the liberal opposition. From their conduct in Congress and in most of the Republican press it is reasonable to say that up to now they have grudgingly gone along with the President on foreign policy—and even admired his State Department—but found his domestic policies a plague imported straight from Moscow. Wendell Willkie thinks this approach to 1944 will prove fatal, and in his St. Louis speech, generally regarded as the opening gun of the campaign, he has taken exactly the opposite tack. He endorses a good many of the domestic social changes instituted under Roosevelt and in some respects he would carry them even farther. But the foreign policies of the Administration he condemns as "a black record" of failure. Its penchant for secrecy, he points out, its lack of confidence in the people, left the country ignorant of the need for both a bold policy of international cooperation and "a great armed force which would have stopped those marauders in their tracks." There can be no doubt that on this score at least Mr. Willkie has caught the Administration neatly on the flank, and if its elevation of "expediency" to the level of national policy can be set down as a political handicap, the country and the world will be the healthier for it. But if President Roosevelt feels obliged to kick his many liberal supporters at frequent intervals in order to keep the reactionary Democrats in line, what would Mr. Willkie have to do to his handful of liberals for the sake of appeasing a party machine long dedicated to toryism?

IN THE VIEW OF THE SOVIET GOVERNMENT as reflected in Pravda, official organ of the Russian Communist Party, joint military action must be given top priority on the agenda of the Moscow three-power conference. There is nothing surprising or alarming about this demand; nor is it inconsistent with the primarily political nature of the conference. Political and military strategy cannot be kept in separate compartments and there is no gainsaying Pravda's contention that "joint action to accelerate Hitler's defeat is an indispensable condition for the solution of all problems of post-war collaboration between the U. S. S. R., Britain, and the United States for the establishment of a firm peace." It is indispensable because the mutual confidence which must precede cooperation cannot be established while Russia harbors a suspicion that the invasion of Western Europe is being delayed by political considerations. It will be the first task of Mr. Hull and Mr. Eden to try to eradicate this suspicion. At the same time the Soviet government can also contribute to the creation of confidence, and it must be admitted that Pravda's dictum that "the Soviet borders cannot be a subject of discussion any more than the borders of the United States" is not helpful. After all, the enlargement of Soviet territory to include the Baltic states and eastern Poland is a direct consequence of the present war. If the Soviets insist that this is a matter of security and solely their own affair, the United States and Britain will be encouraged to provide for their security in a similar manner.

* * *

OBVIOUSLY RUSSIA'S BOUNDARIES WOULD BE no proper subject of discussion if the United States were planning to play a lone hand after the war. The resolution reported by the Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee is probably timed to convince Premier Stalin that we harbor no such fantastic thought. Otherwise it is difficult to understand why after seven months of thought eight Senatorial experts should emerge at this moment with a formula so obviously underdone. Expected to be thinner than the Ball-Burton-Hatch-Hill proposal, the subcommittee's resolution is even weaker than the unexciting Fulbright measure. It would favor this country's joining with other "sovereign" states in establishing and maintaining an "international authority with power to prevent aggression and to preserve the peace of the world." "Sovereign" in isolationist jargon is a word which may be used almost interchangeably with "irresponsible," and we wish there were just a hint as to the nature of the "power" to be invoked by the international authority. But Senator Connally solemnly assures us that this "is the best possible action that could be secured," since "unity and harmony are vital if the Senate is to pass a resolution by a substantial majority." The plain truth is that neither the Senate leadership nor the Administration has been eager to get down to cases. Intimidated by a handful of Senators, they have preferred to tiptoe around the crucial issue of the century lest the Nyes and the Wheelers exercise their privilege of insulting our allies in the course of debate. But the Nyes cannot be placated. Better to challenge them now and beat them than to have them permanently lying in ambush.

THE SMASHING RAID ON RABAUL, THE MAIN Japanese base in the southwest Pacific, is one of the fruits of the painfully won jungle victories of General MacArthur's forces. The capture of Lae and Salamaua in New Guinea, the consolidation of the allied positions in the central Solomons, and the occupation of the Woodlark and Trobriand islands exposed Rabaul to attacks from three directions. General MacArthur was thus able to concentrate his full air strength on this major objective, as he had previously done at Wewak, and to achieve a victory which, it is claimed, establishes definite allied mastery in the air over the Solomons Sea and adjacent islands. It does not follow, however, as a UP correspondent at MacArthur's headquarters has suggested, that this success is "calculated to make sponsors of alternative strategies reconsider the claims of the southwest Pacific for a prominent role in the offensive against Japan." It is difficult to see how an offensive in this area, even with much bigger forces than are now available, can pursue any other tactics than the "island-hopping" which General MacArthur has himself condemned. True, he is credited with a plan for moving an invasion force by sea and air direct to the southern Philippines—a distance of 1,650 miles from New Guinea. This would involve sending a huge armada through a maze of narrow waters and past numerous islands in enemy occupation. Such a strategic conception fails to recognize, it seems to us, that the key to the defeat of Japan is not the capture of outposts or the reconquest of lost territories; it is the severance of its jugular vein, the destruction of its fleet. Our naval strength in the central Pacific is probably now equal to this task and recent moves in that arena suggest that Admiral Nimitz is maneuvering to force the Japanese to give battle.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST WANTS TO know whether "some of our anti-fascists" would "rather lick Hull than the Axis." For our part, the answer is as simple as the question is dishonest, to wit, No. What follows? That we should keep quiet and have absolute faith in our policy-makers. But where does this leave the editors of the Post, who have been known to say some sweepingly unlovely things about the President of the United States, in war as well as in peace? Does it mean that they would rather lick Roosevelt than win the war? We hardly think so. In any event we won't raise the issue if in return the Post's editors will spend a week in sackcloth for the most distorted piece of copy to appear outside the paranoiac press in many a month. Here is a brace of samples: "The State Department is supposed to be up to some underhanded business, but when it turns out that the business is the unconditional surrender of Italy there are no apologies from the left wing"; and "had the United States been invaded instead of France, the statesmen of our Allies would be 'appeasers' and 'cynical conspirators' [in the eyes of the liberals] unless they plumped for Earl Browder." Once and for all, we do not oppose taking a surrender from the devil himself, or even from Hitler. What we do oppose is the theory at a criminal who turns state's evidence is entitled to ount the bench. The reference to Browder implies a elief that the rescuers of a defeated America would ther have to collaborate with fascist turncoats or work ith Communists. We can't speak for the editors of the aturday Evening Post, but wouldn't there be millions of ther Americans who could be dealt with just as demo-ats? That's all we ask in the case of Europe.

Global Gossip

WE ARE not among those who deplore any criticism between allies. Disagreements are inevitable the course of any great joint undertaking, and frank peaking is far preferable to the accumulation of sup-ressed grievances, leading to eventual eruptions of bad emper. But if criticisms of one ally by another are to be ealthy they ought to be factual and without malice.

Of the five Senators whose variegated reports of their ourney round the world in sixty days have started so uch controversy, we think we can acquit three as free rom malice. Senators Mead and Russell have been stalwart supporters of the Administration, and Senator Brewter of Maine has fought the isolationists in his own arty. Senators Lodge and Chandler are horses of another olor. About the former we had something to say last veek, and we need only add that the New York Daily News in a laudatory editorial credits him with the ambiion to repeat his grandfather's "triumph" in 1919. Mr. Chandler made himself into a military expert a few months ago and set out to revise our global strategy. He as now elected to grind the McCormick-Patterson-Hearst xis, and his rhetoric is wholly unrelated to facts.

It is disappointing, however, to find that his three more responsible colleagues should not have been more careful both in checking their data and in their manner of presenting it. Take the question of air bases, for instance. Senator Brewster, after complaining that the British and other allies had given us no permanent rights in the airfields we have built abroad for war purposes, said: "There isn't a spot outside this hemisphere where we can land after this war." This suggests that the British have rejected some proposal we had made, though, in fact, this question is involved in negotiations now in progress concerning the basis on which international civil aviation shall be controlled after the war. There is no reason to suppose that the British would reject the general principle of reciprocity permitting American planes to use bases in their territory to the extent we permit British planes to use bases under our control. The traveling Senators, however, do not appear to have considered an arrangement of this nature. The implication of their statements is rather that these bases should be at our disposal unconditionally. That this suggestion might appear to the British and other of our allies as an effort to use lend-lease to secure a post-war air monopoly does not seem to have occurred to them.

Another statement by the Senators was that "the U. S. A., which possesses only 2 per cent of the world's petroleum reserves, is supplying 65 per cent of the oil used for the war." This implies again a British hold-out, but relevant facts which the Senators did not trouble to acquire or report tell a different story. Before the war the United States supplied 60 per cent of the world's oil consumption, and since then important foreign fields have fallen into enemy hands. Oil reserves are not much use for war purposes unless the necessary equipment can be made available. The capacity of refineries in the Near East and India combined is less than 7 per cent of those in the Western Hemisphere. Are we willing to knock down some of our newly constructed high-octane gasoline plants for shipment to British-controlled fields? We doubt that such a proposal would be popular with the oil corporations.

If as a consequence of the debate on the Senators' report a wider real knowledge of the situations on which they commented can be made known, it may be, as Mr. Roosevelt suggested, that more good than harm will result. The difficulty is that corrections and amplifications seldom catch up with an original misleading statement. The global gossip which the Senators brought home has received the publicity and has sunk into the public consciousness, where it serves as a culture in which the bacterial poisons distributed by the America Firsters thrive. The danger now is not isolationism as such, for only a dwindling minority believe that America can withdraw from the world again. But a growing inclination toward internationalism could be perverted into a nationalist imperialism. That is the objective toward which the men of malice are steering. The men of good-will should not play into their hands.

Absolution for Franco

IT WOULD be nice to think that Archbishop Spellman's contribution to last week's Collier's was nothing more than a personal report from a traveling son to his father. If it were that and only that, its blatant inaccuracies and its open support of Franco's regime would be unimportant. But at a moment like this, their political nature is evident. Such letters would not appear at all if they did not seem useful to the makers of policy. The Archbishop undertook his trip "to see the war-zone chaplains" with the blessing and consent of the President. His report is published just at the time when Salazar has opened Portugal's island bases to Britain and at the start of an intensive allied propaganda offensive in Spain. Under such circumstances the Archbishop's letters and his visits to Franco and the Vatican become political acts of first-rate significance.

His comments must be examined and answered. And we hope that Collier's, which has printed much able and honest reporting from every fighting front, will at least publish a correction of a story it should never have accepted in the first place. If it fails to do so, its reputation will be seriously damaged among informed Americans.

The easiest way to answer Spellman is to cite errors rather than marshal arguments. We shall do so in order of their appearance, not of their importance.

> The Ambassador [Mr. Hayes] and I drove to the "University City" and saw the tremendous damage caused by the civil war. . . . It is amazing and depressing to see the damage wrought by the violence of battle in which fifty thousand people perished in the city of Madrid.

In his amazement and depression the Archbishop ignores the fact—as he does throughout the article—that the damage and death were the result of a struggle launched by fascist rebels attempting to overthrow the legitimate, elected government of Spain.

> Generalissimo Franco is in the middle of all. Some are favorable to him, some opposed; some partly favorable, some partly opposed. Most of the people whom I met in Madrid are supporters of Franco.

Of the last item we can be quite sure. But if he had escaped from his clerical or fascist hosts, the Archbishop could also have met in Madrid many Catholics who were not and are not supporters of Franco; he might even have met some of the relatives of the Catholic priests, mostly Basques, who were killed by Franco's police and soldiers. During the war and even after it, the influential French Catholic newspaper, L'Aube, regularly published lists giving the full names of all the Catholic priests who had been executed or imprisoned by Franco, so Archbishop Spellman could easily check the reports of interested persons in Spain.

> A word equivocally used in Spain and America is "Loyalist." The term is very impressive. Anyone would instinctively give sympathy and support to a group claiming to be "Loyalists." However, other Spaniards do not call them "Loyalists." They call them "Communists." It was this group of Loyalists or Communists that assumed power in Spain at the time when King Alfonso XIII fled.

This is one of the most blatant pieces of misinformation in the whole article. The Loyalists were called Loyalists because they were loyal to the elected government of Spain. They were called Communists by Franco's rebels and by reactionaries and fascists in other countries. But quite aside from labels, it was not "this group of Communists or Loyalists" that "assumed" power when Alfonso abdicated. The Monarchy was overthrown and the Republic proclaimed as the result of democratic elections on April 12, 1931. The provisional government was headed by the conservative Republican, Senor Niceto Alcala Zamora, who had served as minister in various cabinets under King Alfonso.

The president of the Republic following Zamora was Manuel Azaña—hardly a Communist.

> General Franco's supporters maintain that the general would have assumed control over Spain if international legionnaires had not come to the aid of the Loyalists. Then Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy sent help to Franco.

Franco did assume control over Spain. But sequence of events has been exactly reversed in the two sentences above. Germany and Italy sent help to Franco at the very start of the rebellion, long before the appearance of the International Brigade or any other material aid on the Loyalist side.

> In Madrid alone, they (the Republican-Loyalist-Communist coalition) killed seven hundred priests; eleven Spanish bishops throughout the country perished.

For centuries the church in Spain has been one of the most powerful political and economic forces on the side of reaction. Popular resentment against the clergy resulted in many acts of lawlessness at the start of the civil war; and while the Archbishop's figures may be questioned, many priests were undoubtedly killed, in Madrid and elsewhere. It is true, too, that in the days following Franco's violent attack on the government innocent people were shot. That is one of the most horrible aspects of civil war. Franco might have thought about it before he started the rebellion. But if this story is to be told again, should not a strictly accurate reporter even mention the thousands of civilians slaughtered in the Rebel zone by Franco's troops and Franco's police and by the Moors? Should he not recall Badajoz? Spellman comments on the "thousands of Spaniards" cast into prison when Franco finally took power in 1939. But this casual reference throws an even more glaring light on his omission of the horrors perpetrated by Franco during the war itself, and the execution of thousands of prisoners since the war ended.

> My impressions of him [Franco] are in accordance with his reputation as a very sincere, serious, and intelligent man. . . . Whatever criticism had been made of General Franco . . . I cannot doubt that he is a man loyal to his God, devoted to his country's welfare, and definitely willing to sacrifice himself in any capacity and to any extent for Spain.

Presumably willingness to sacrifice himself accounts for Franco's ready acceptance of the role of Axis stooge which he filled without flinching as long as Hitler's enterprises were relatively solvent. As for the Archbishop's conviction of his sincerity, loyalty to God, and so forth, it should be laid side by side with Franco's record, first as a fascist rebel and second as a fascist terrorist.

Archbishop Spellman admits that he has not written all his thoughts or described all he saw. For example he mentions the fact that he and Franco chatted about a great variety of political subjects and "even ventured a few thoughts about the future." He excuses his reticence by quoting Cardinal Gaspari's remark, when he declined to write his memoirs: "The interesting things I cannot tell, and the things which I can tell are not interesting." The things the Archbishop willingly tells are interesting enough to make one wonder about the things he has deliberately suppressed.

But today, when fascists are being rapidly renovated and turned into Allies, the job the American cleric has done on Franco is not to be despised. He has given him public absolution for his sins. He has drawn a veil of vague and unctuous piety over the ugly truth of the regime in Spain. Is this what the President wanted?

Traitors Cannot Lead

BY RANDOLFO PACCIARDI

IN HIS speech to the House of Commons, Prime Minister Churchill, after defending the King of Italy and his Minister Badoglio, exhorted Italian anti-fascists to gather round this government and to postpone the resolution of political questions until the end of the war. Mr. Berle, Assistant Secretary of State, has made the same recommendation in the name of the President.

Meanwhile the United Nations have accepted the King of Italy and his government as co-belligerents. In declaring war on Germany Badoglio assumed responsibility for submitting his government to the judgment of the Italian people after the Nazis had been expelled from Italy. And America, England, and the Soviet Union, in their official pronouncement, took their share of responsibility. "The three governments," they stated, "acknowledge the Italian government's pledge to submit to the will of the Italian people after the Germans have been driven from Italy, and it is understood that nothing can detract from the absolute and untrammeled right of the people of Italy by constitutional means to decide on the democratic form of government they will eventually have."

The English government has already publicly affirmed that the colonial empire of Italy is lost, but as far as the national territory of Italy is concerned, the Allies have refused any responsibility whatsoever. In other words, "co-belligerency" does not imply that Italy can escape the consequences of the war and of the surrender. There was merely a vague hint that these consequences might be softened in the measure that the Allies are aided by Italian arms.

The Allies recognize a legal government in Italy, that of Marshal Badoglio, who derives his authority from the King. We still do not know whether AMG will be abolished in every part of Italy as a result of the recognition of the Italian government.

The Italians have been called upon to fight as if their help was to be regarded as atonement for their sins rather than cooperation. Any hopes for the future are based on uncertainty. Their only certainty is that of fighting on the orders of a despised and corrupt regime, the first cause of all their misfortunes.

In comparison to King Victor and Badoglio, Pétain and Darlan were angels. They were allies that surrendered to the enemy. It was weak and wrong. But they warned the English before they laid down their arms. They signed an armistice saving all that could be saved. They ordered the fleet scuttled rather than have it fall into the hands of the Germans. Darlan then turned to the Allies when he saw a hope of victory on that side.

The King of Italy first betrayed the Italian people, violating his oath, then called Mussolini into power. After the assassination of Matteoti, he repulsed all demands to get rid of the dictator. In his name, thousands were imprisoned and exiled. He declared war on Abyssinia, putting himself on the pinnacle of emperorship. He signed the alliance with Germany. He sent his son Umberto to command the troops that gave France "the stab in the back." Only when the fortunes of war took a turn for the worst did he betray Hitler and rally to the side of the winners.

Badoglio accepted the title of Duke of Addis Ababa. He was the head of the general staff in Mussolini's government. He signed all military agreements with Hitler's generals. He led Italy's army to its surrender and dishonor. Now he changes colors not for the nation's interest but for the sake of a dynasty of which he is a slave and an instrument.

Is it possible that these people, these institutions, these flags represent the symbols and ideals of a nation that wants to rise again from the abyss of misery and martyrdom? Is it possible that these are the most useful and most trustworthy in the great fight for national liberation?

They tell us that the Italian people will have the "untrammeled right" to choose their own form of government. By constitutional means! What constitution? Evidently the Italian constitution of 1848, already betrayed by the King. But the Italian constitution is a monarchial constitution. To instal a democratic republic in Italy after the war it will be necessary either to elect a constitutional assembly or have a revolution. But to elect a constitutional assembly it is first necessary to suspend the King's functions, as AMG did in Sicily.

Morally and politically the new regime offers to the future liberty of the Italian people fewer guaranties and poorer hopes than the AMG does.

We anti-fascist Italians want to fight the Germans. If we are given no other choice than to fight the Nazis and fascists under the flag of Savoy, it means that the democratic powers have deliberately renounced Italian anti-fascists as their allies. Yet they are the only ones who can arouse the whole of Italy against the Germans.

For two years now I have been trying to enter the "war against fascism" with several thousand volunteers. All my attempts have so far been repulsed.

Britain Between the Acts

III. WORKERS ON THE CLYDE

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

HUNTING shop stewards in Glasgow is a sport calling for patience and a good guide. It doesn't require any particular skill, for shop stewards are not shy creatures; but they seem to have no fixed habitat. Willie is a wonderful guide; no one knows better the ways of shop stewards or where to locate them. But even Willie couldn't produce one on order. It took a whole afternoon, cruising about the streets along the Clydebank, to flush two suitable specimens.

Nowhere else on earth, I suppose, is so much industrial activity packed into so small a space of river and shore. On one side of the river is the city; the hills are on the other; between is a forest of cranes, masts, gun turrets, funnels, scaffolding, and tall factory chimneys. That forest is the Clydebank. The narrow river is a highway jammed with traffic. Patrols guard the gate to every dock and shipyard.

The concentration of human effort is as great as that of material. The shipyards and factories—with very few exceptions—work all day and all night. The length of shifts varies with the kind of work done. But the pressure on labor is terrific, and I heard no complaints. Nor did I hear the least grumble over the weary hours spent, after work and before, standing in queues waiting for buses or trains to and from the plants and in other queues outside the shops waiting to buy the daily ration of greens and groceries. It's a tough life in Glasgow as in every industrial town. But the only complaints made in my presence were occasioned not by too much work but by a sudden reduction of hours in one of the big munition plants.

I wanted to get as close as I could to the feeling of the Clydeside workers. They suffered more than most during the depression, when the plants and yards were as silent and dead as they are now roaring with activity. Today the men are drawing good pay and working overtime, but they haven't forgotten the years of idleness. ("Idleset," they call it in Glasgow, and, strangely, I found no Englishman who had even heard the word.) Like the rest of British labor they are wholly committed to the war; but the conflicts of interest and emotion that assail them in these days of change are very acute.

One of the best quick ways to find out what workers anywhere are thinking is to talk to the shop stewards. For these men—or occasionally women—directly represent the workers inside the plants. They handle grievances and deal with the management; far more than any union officials they know the minds of their fellow-workers. Many of them, by reason of their ability and standing, are also elected to the joint production committees. A shop steward who happens also to serve on a production committee is a man who knows his plant through and through.

WILLIE'S BROTHER

I drove down to the Clydebank with Sheila Mackay, local officer of the Ministry of Information. She had been in New York last year and lunched with The Nation staff. And she knew what I wanted. We were to meet her friend Willie and a shop-steward friend of his at a certain street corner near a certain bridge. Willie was there with another young man, but it wasn't the shop steward. "Heaven knows where he's strayed," said Willie. "He'd on his best Sunday clothes for a visit with Miss Kirchwey. But I fear he's mistaken the place and gone on into Glasgow." "Shall we drive back to town and look for him?" asked Miss Mackay. "No use," said Willie. "More likely he'll show up here later on. What you'd better do is drive around a bit and see things and then come back. I'll stay and keep an eye out for him. This young fellow is my brother; he'll go along with you and you can ask him questions. He works in the —— shipyard."

I wouldn't have missed Willie's brother. He is amiable and attractive, with bright red hair and a bright pink face. And he served as a useful reminder that even on the banks of the Clyde—as in Kansas City or Detroit—young workers may be more concerned with the sporting page and girls than with the deeper problems of the working class. He stoutly disavowed any political opinions or any interest in politics; but he told us how easy and pleasant it is, on Sunday, to get out of Glasgow into the beautiful Lowland hills. He said he had recently been laid off by one of the big munitions plants "for good and sufficient reasons" and had been shifted to unskilled work in a shipyard building invasion barges. It was a job that anybody could do, even a woman, and his skill, he assured us, was being definitely wasted. He didn't care particularly, but he thought the government, if it knew its business, would end his deferment and put him in the army.

His friends, said Willie's brother, were not much concerned with politics either. They want to win the war, and after the war they want their jobs to keep on. Any government that sees to that will look all right to them. But they don't think "old Winston" can keep the plants running. Who can? I asked. A Labor government? He shrugged his shoulders. He seemed a little bored with all this talk; and anyhow it was time now to go back and see whether that shop steward had turned up. He looked rather anxiously at his watch.

"Shall we drive you back with us?" asked Miss Mackay. Willie's brother grinned. "I'd prefer it if you'd set me down at my club. It's not a step out of your way." Following his directions, we drove up to the closed door of a nearby pub. "It'll be opening in another two minutes," he said happily. One could understand his sudden interest in getting us back to Willie on time.

We drove to the appointed meeting place by the "canawl bridge," and there stood Willie with a man at his side. "He's not the one," said Willie, "but he's another one. Happen I'll find the original candidate later on."

"VERRA LEFT"

The shop steward in hand was a good substitute. He worked in a gun factory, but he'd been a shipyard worker and many other things in the course of his life. He was lean and hard-bitten; his eyes were cynical. He'd been in the labor movement all his working years—an active fighter and, I'm sure, a tough one. "What's the mood of the workers?" I asked him. I was still under the spell of the beer-and-skittles philosophy of Willie's brother. "Well, we're known as reds," he said. "And everybody who's anything around here is left—verra left. That's a fact. But at the same time there's a lot of fellows—and a lot of the new women workers in the factories—that take no interest in politics or the labor movement. You have to remember one thing—and it's a thing people are apt to overlook. The workers here, and all about Glasgow, have jobs for the first time in years. The depression never lifted on the Clydebank—not until the war came. Many of the younger fellows had never worked in their lives." He underlined the words with his voice. "This time is the best time they've known. We have to have a world war, it seems, to make life worth living in these parts. You can see what this does to the men. They'll be satisfied with what they have as long as they have it. But wait," he said, "wait till the jobs begin to slip out from under."

I asked him about the political position of the workers who were active in the movement. He said that while few of them, relatively, were Communist Party members, they saw little hope in the old parties and leaders. "This is a time of waiting," he said. "The party truce and the war itself have put a damper on politics. But don't imagine it will last. The workers here and all over Britain pin great hopes on Russia. Even the least political among them. If the government turned against Russia, then these men would wake up. It was the Clydebank that stopped the shipments of arms to Kolchak in 1920. They'd do that again if there was need after this war. They'd do the same if the government tried to prevent revolution in Spain. They've seen what came of letting the fascists take power there, and they won't stand for another piece of 'non-intervention' of the same sort."

I felt somewhat dubious of this line of prophecy, but later, when I'd talked to other labor men in other parts of the country, my doubts largely disappeared. There wasn't a single one who failed to discuss foreign developments, either criticizing the government's policy directly or criticizing the Prime Minister for following the lead of the United States. It is hard for an American, accustomed to the detached attitude of labor in this country, to realize how close the workers of Britain feel to the fate of their brothers on the Continent.

The shop steward answered a question that revealed my doubt. "You have to remember that this is not the time for action. We're still fighting the bloody war. But that doesn't stop men talking about how things are going. And I tell you the active unionists, the workers who know what this war is about, they follow what's happening in Europe. They're suspecting a big sell-out of the common people all over Europe. And the countries they are watching are Russia and Spain. They have a special strong feeling about those two countries; they've come to be a kind of test. I hope you won't run away with the idea that it's only Communists that feel like this, for that's not the case. It's the general attitude. And you can look for trouble if the government tries to sell out Spain or Russia again."

"But if the workers don't trust any of the parties or their own leaders, who's to organize the feeling you speak of—how will it be put to work?"

"Don't worry about that. Trouble breeds its own leaders. After the last war the same thing happened. It was the shop stewards that provided leadership when the trades unions and the Labor Party failed the men. They'll do it again if necessary. They or others.

"And it's not only an emotional issue like Russia or revolution in Europe that could rouse the workers. There are plenty of likely chances of trouble right here—issues that touch their daily lives very close. If they're idle after the war orders stop, then they'll begin to think about who's running the country. Already we're getting hints of what's to come."

The shop steward pulled out of his pocket the report of a production-committee meeting at his plant. He was a member of the committee. The plant was changing from two twelve-hour shifts to two eight-hour shifts, and several hundred workers had been laid off. There had been overproduction of certain kinds of guns; so the management claimed at the meeting. He was dubious; you never knew if they were giving the real reasons. It might be that or it might be a shortage of shipping or a lack of raw materials. Anyhow, if the reason was actually overproduction, the workers' representatives on the committee argued that they should be making other things—other arms, or if arms were not needed, they should begin to shift over to peace-time production. "God knows, we need everything in this battered, worn-down country," said the shop steward.

But what really disturbed him was the light this incident threw on the role of the joint production committee in his plant. During most of the period of rising production, when the problem was to get more guns out of every hour, every machine, and every worker, the committee seemed to play a real part. The management took it seriously. It discussed labor and time-saving techniques; it considered ideas contributed by the employees. And it helped to make the workers understand the war itself and their part in it. Certainly the existence of the committee had made for better relations between the management and labor; and he himself had felt at one stage that it might, as Sir Stafford Cripps always said, become a step in the direction of plant democracy, a way of drawing labor into the actual process of management. But gradually he'd come to doubt the value of the production committees, except as a war-time measure, to be scrapped when the need for war goods ended. And now he was profoundly disillusioned with them, and so, he said, were the other labor members of the committee in his plant. "They're a speed-up device; that's all they are," he said. "When it comes to other problems, we have no power. No power whatsoever. They don't even bother to tell us what's going on."

We left the shop steward on the corner where we found him. And then, driving through a certain street, Willie caught sight of his friend, the "original candidate." He was coming out of a meeting-hall near a church. We picked him up and then set Willie down at his favorite pub. He had done his duty by us, and now he too was ready to knock off.

THE WORKERS AND "WINSTON"

Shop steward number 2 was less cynical than the first one but very cool and realistic. I won't repeat all he said, for most of it was the same as what the other man had told me. He too said the workers supported the government as a war government. "But we all know Winston is a reactionary and an imperialist. You have to back him now but you'll have to sack him after." The Labor ministers have done a good enough job, but it remains to be seen whether they'll remember they're Labor men when the war ends. He thought they'd "never give up their jobs."

He liked to argue with Willie and the other fellows about communism and the war and what would come after it. Many of them expected a collapse, but he was inclined to think that business would try to keep production going and prevent the blow-up that's sure to come if millions are thrown out of work. They'll have to pay high to do it, but "they may figure if they can spend £13,000,000 a day for the war and still make money, they can pay a fraction of that to hold power after the war." But on the other hand they might boggle at continued high taxes and government controls and huge expenditures on public works and social insurance. If that happens, there will be trouble. "The one thing the workers in this country will not stand for again is another spell of idleness and the dole." Willie's friend, like the first shop steward, said that the war, with all its hardships and losses, had been the best period hundreds of thousands of workers had ever known. Both predicted "trouble" if mass unemployment returned. Neither knew what form the trouble would take or what parties or men would assume direction. Both expressed distrust of the present leaders of the Labor Party and the Trades Union Congress.

I talked to many other men and women in and around Glasgow, and even those whose views differed most strongly from those of the two men quoted in this article agreed that in the main their report of the attitude of the average worker on the Clyde was accurate.

[In a fourth article, to appear next week, Miss Kirchwey will describe her visit to one of the great airplane-engine plants.]

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE SIGNS OF WAR in Europe continue to increase in number and magnitude. The impression that there is some secret arrangement between France and Russia continues to gain ground. The Prussians are constructing tremendous ironclad forts or gunboats for the protection of the Rhine.—October 1, 1868.

OF PERHAPS MORE IMPORTANCE than the political news from abroad is the news from Scotland in regard to the new "road-steamers." . . . Why should not men keep their own locomotive and engineer, as men now keep horses and coachmen? We may soon be able to laugh at the railroad corporations and the expected velocipedestrians, especially if Ericsson succeeds in his scheme for turning the sun into fuel for steam engines, and we are made independent of coal.—October 1, 1868.

THERE IS AN INSTITUTION widely spread throughout Russia, and of a distant, unknown antiquity, which is in a certain sense the prototype of all the cooperative associations which have of late years sprung up in Western Europe. This is the artel, . . . a society of artisans, porters, drivers, clerks, village workmen, etc., formed for the purpose of maintaining a common treasury, and generally of keeping a common table and lodging, very often for common work, or at least to receive work, through the common guaranty of the whole society for the honesty of each individual member. That such an institution should have immemorially existed in Russia shows, on one hand, the simple conditions of life in that country and the comparatively limited wants of its people, and, on the other, the practical mind of that people, which in the very earliest times succeeded in finding the true remedy, which the workmen of the West have been so many years vainly seeking, against accidents of trade, and the true method of developing the working class.—October 8, 1868.

ON TODAY WEEK, at Pine Bluff, in Arkansas, the deputy sheriff of Drew County, a Republican, was tied to a Negro and both were killed at one shot. "A carpetbag deputy slain in Arkansas," the World says. . . . In the Carolinas there are two partisan murders reported as having occurred within the week. On the afternoon of Friday, in broad daylight, a colored Senator standing on the platform of a railroad car, in Abbeville district, was killed by three men who coolly rode up to the train and shot him. "The murderers were not recognized." In the same district a white member of the House of Representatives was killed by a disguised party. . . . He was what is called a "scallawag"—being a native Southerner, and not Democratic in his political opinions.—October 22, 1868.

"LITTLE WOMEN; or, Meg, Jo, Beth, and Amy." By Louisa M. Alcott. Illustrated by May Alcott. . . . Miss Alcott's new juvenile is an agreeable little story which is not only very well adapted to the readers for whom it is especially intended but may also be read with pleasure by older people.—October 22, 1868.

Financing America's Future

III. "NOTHING TO FEAR BUT FEAR"*

BY STUART CHASE

THE SEVEN FEARS

AMONG the forces which have hitherto prevented an economy of plenty from steadily delivering the goods in peace time are seven great fears. Few of us are free from them, though old people suffer more than young people, well-to-do people more than poor people. These fears are mostly in abeyance now, but they may come back to haunt us after Demobilization Day.

Each of the fears is, or has been, legitimate. But when they fill our minds, they paralyze any positive action. If they were filling our minds now, we could not fight the war. If they fill our minds after the war, we cannot win the peace. We shall be too frightened to act decisively. We shall shut our eyes and hope for normalcy to save us, though normalcy is as dead as Warren Gamaliel Harding.

Here is a list of the seven fears, together with some answers to them. They have been in the back of my mind all the time I have been writing these articles.

1. The Fear of Inflation. Many citizens, especially those on fixed salaries and incomes, are afraid that government underwriting of employment in peace time will result in runaway prices that will reduce their scale of living, wipe out their insurance policies, render their savings valueless. They are haunted by the picture of the terrible German inflation of 1923.

If the government recklessly printed money to put the unemployed to work at tasks which created no new wealth, and kept on doing it, this fear would be realized. Kings and rulers have caused inflation thus in the past. But our knowledge of the dollar circuit now makes it clear that there can be no general inflation until full employment is reached. Meanwhile the war is teaching governments how to control inflation at the level of full employment. Shall we discard this knowledge and permit inflation to have its head—if indeed inflation rather than deflation is the immediate post-war danger? I cannot believe we are going to be as unrealistic as that. I doubt that those citizens who would like to scrap all war controls on D-Day are going to press their demands very hard when they realize what a resulting inflation might do to their own pocket-books.

2. The Fear of a Crushing National Debt. People know that when their personal debts grow large enough they are forced into bankruptcy. They identify the public debt with their own, and lie awake nights worrying about national bankruptcy. Right now they are too busy worrying about ration books and boys abroad to give much attention to the public debt, but many of them look forward to worrying about it when they have the time.

This fear is largely groundless. Great nations do not go bankrupt in the way a person or business does, for the debt they owe is to themselves. The chief dangers in a mounting debt are two: it may pump too many dollars into the system and thus stimulate inflation; it may cause trouble in the internal distribution of income by favoring the upper brackets against the lower. It is possible to control both dangers by a vigorous and well-planned use of taxes. If the price level is kept under control, the public debt can be a great reservoir for public investment.

3. The Fear of Bureaucracy. If the government becomes responsible for full employment and social security, many citizens are afraid that a huge permanent staff of office holders will come to regiment us day and night, and gradually destroy our liberties. They fear the thin entering wedge which will bring complete government ownership. Once we start on this road, they are afraid that the end is Moscow.

This fear is perfectly legitimate. But people tend to make an absolute of it, as if they lived in a timeless world, not the actual world of 1943 to 1950. It is up to us to evolve a compensatory economy which will reduce the bureaucracy, regimentation, and restraints on liberties from which we are already suffering in the war—a post-war economy with controls at the minimum consistent with full employment. The alternatives, I suspect, are those "rigid state controls at every point" which Sir George Schuster warned against.

If you fear Bureaucracy in the abstract, with a capital B, do not forget that the Telephone Company and the Pennsylvania Railroad, for example, have problems in bureaucracy very similar to those of the Post Office Department. It is impossible to operate any large modern organization without bureaus, clerks, and officials.

4. The Fear of Paternalism. If government embarks on a welfare economy, it is feared that citizens will be so coddled and spoon-fed that they will lose their character and initiative. They will become soft and lazy, easy prey to tougher nations.

* Based on a chapter from the author's forthcoming report to the Twentieth Century Fund, to be published this fall under the title, "Where's the Money Coming From? Problems of Post-War Finance."

The Germans have a comprehensive system of social security which goes back to Bismarck. Yet German soldiers are said to be tough. New Zealanders also have had a welfare economy for many years. They were found to be even tougher than the Nazis when they helped to rush Rommel out of Egypt. I have never seen convincing evidence that putting an economic base under the community weakens moral fiber, and I could cite plenty of evidence that the lack of it does. Modern slums are notorious breeding grounds for disease, degeneracy, and crime. There would, of course, be danger in giving handouts to the able-bodied without requiring useful work from them. A program for full employment will have to be specifically designed to balance rights against duties.

5. The Fear of the End of Progress. This is a very common fear in America, though not so much so in other countries. If the state collects taxes and savings for public works and welfare, what will be left for venture capital, and for the man who wants to build a better mousetrap? Invention will die out. That progress which has been the hallmark of America will come to an end. We shall be reduced to one dead level.

If Congress has the wisdom to adopt incentive taxation, or something like it, this fear can probably be laid at rest. No more powerful device for promoting venture capital has ever been mapped. It would virtually force us to scour the country for mousetrap makers. The chief thing that worries me about it is that such gentlemen are not to be found behind every bush, now that most of our inventing is done in large corporation laboratories. But the tax equally stimulates investing in research; so if we do not get so much progress as we desire from inventors in attics and cellars, we may get it from the Bell Laboratories.

This fear, though a standard subject at business men's banquets, seems to me largely a myth. Material progress is not so much a function of freedom to invest as it is a function of a dynamic society. The Germans, man for man, are probably as good scientists and inventors as we are; yet their economy is and has been far from free. Furthermore, the fact that invention has been subsidized in great research organizations makes material progress inevitable unless those organizations are broken up. Nobody to my knowledge has ever proposed to do this.

6. The Fear That "What You Gain, I Lose." "If our initial impulses," said T. Troward,* "proceed from the belief that things are so limited that our gain can only come from someone else's loss, then we have here the root of envy, hatred, and fear." The concept revolves around a fixed production—the idea that there is only so much output, or so much money. If somebody gets more of either, inevitably the rest of us get less. If the government spends money on public works, there is less to be spent on private works. The more taxes are taken to put the unemployed to work the poorer we taxpayers must be. It is this fear which primarily motivates the economy bloc in Congress. Senator Byrd's remark comes to mind: "Cut government spending to the bone and then take the bone."

Many radicals and labor leaders hold a smilar concept, but upside down. The more the rich spend for luxuries the more miserable the budgets of the poor. But it is not the spending of the rich which does the damage, as we have seen, so much as their uninvested saving.

The idea of a fixed, limited product is very ancient and runs deep. It corresponded with the facts until Watt invented the steam engine. In handicraft societies progress is normally so slow that total output is limited, and the more corn the baron takes the less remains for the villager. Since the Industrial Revolution, with its use of inanimate energy, output per capita has multiplied many times. Our chief economic troubles in recent years have stemmed from surpluses rather than from shortages. Somewhere there is doubtless a limit to the potential output of modern industry, but we have never reached it in peace time.

The fear is expressed by both parties in most quarrels about wages. Managers are afraid that if labor gets more, stockholders will get less. Labor leaders are afraid that high profits mean low wages. Yet as early as 1920 Henry Ford began to preach and to practice the efficacy of high wages. Many business men followed him in theory if not in practice. Low wages mean a low level of mass buying power, and low profits for business men as a group.

Thinking in terms of the whole community puts a completely different face on the matter. The more wages people get the more they will spend, and the greater the business man's sales. Ford broke this fear by realizing that the better the wages he paid the more automobiles he could sell. True, the principle will not necessarily work for one company alone, but it will work when all companies practice it together—up to the point of full use of the national resources.

Output now in the war is a conclusive answer to this fear. By releasing physical and financial machinery from cautious commercial habits, we are going to have a tonnage of goods in 1943 probably twice that of 1938. The first ceilings we are likely to hit in war production will be due to a highly abnormal demand for special materials and to the shortage of man-power. In times of depression the fear of financial limitations has an especially unfortunate effect. By believing that money is limited and that we cannot afford to put men to work, we have held output far below capacity and thrown away the potential labor of the unemployed.

* Bulletin of the Economic Reform Club of London, 1941.

Despite its ancient and honorable origin I sometimes think that this is the cruelest fear to which modern men can be enslaved. It was sound enough in 1800, but it has no relation to the technological and financial facts of the modern world. When the unemployed go to work, they gain and the rest of us gain too. Only when the economy is at maximum capacity has this fear any theoretical validity. But at maximum capacity we should be so deluged with goods that the fear would be unlikely to arise. It is a product of the age of scarcity.

7. The Fear of the Masses. Many well-to-do citizens are deeply disturbed about the effects of any proposed welfare program on the mass of the people. It is felt that the masses are not to be trusted. Unless they have the threat of starvation hanging over them they will not work. A special and dramatic case of this fear is seen in the South, where nearly every advance of the Negro is opposed because it is believed to threaten "white supremacy."

Modern biology has a complete answer to this fear in its demonstration that there are no inferior classes. "Inferior" or handicapped individuals are found in all classes. But perhaps the decisive answer is found in the trend of history. Is a world revolution going on or is it not? I believe that it is. The "masses" can no longer be kept in their traditional place; they are on the march. Those who really cherish democracy are glad to see them marching. Those who dislike democracy will continue to be afraid. I have no arguments to give them, and no consolation to offer.

These seven great fears, in whole or in part, are the brakes that may hold back full employment when the war ends. No valid physical or financial reasons are now discernible on the horizon to hold it back. Balanced against these fears will be the terrible demand for work and for security from the men of the armed services and the men and women of the war industries.

Discussion of how to finance the peace should perhaps be devoted primarily to overcoming fear. It would thus fall under the head of psychology rather than economics. I am only an amateur psychologist, but I know at least where the real difficulty lies.

THE GREAT HOPES

More logical than the fears are the hopes of the post-war world. Here we stand on firmer ground. Here we say yea, rather than nay, and have the confidence to take positive action. Confidence is the key. One can name a score of men competent to find all the money we need to achieve full employment. The techniques are already forged or in process of forging. They know how to go about the task if we, the voters, will let them do it. There are men and organizations competent to administer social-security programs and public-works programs. There are men who know how to count the unemployed, how to design and collect taxation, and keep the national debt from getting out of hand. Are we going to let them do these things? Or shall we turn the economy over to trembling men, who are determined to do nothing? This is my major fear, but it does not often assail me. I believe too strongly in the common sense of my fellow-citizens.

There is another, profounder reason which makes hope more logical than fear. Our economic troubles have been due to abundance, not to scarcity. Abundance, in the sense of capacity to produce, will be enormously advanced in America by the war. I find it difficult to be filled with gloom because we can produce so much. If another Ice Age were moving south, if the Black Death were upon us, if our crops were losing their vitamins to a dread new virus, I should be gloomy. But when the promise is for more and more material abundance, I refuse to succumb to more than temporary qualms. True, we have relied on disasters in the past to absorb our gigantic production. Now I believe we are compelled to face the problem and find a better answer.

A century hence, says John Maynard Keynes, there will be no economic problem, even as there is today no problem of enough air to breathe. I believe him, and I might even lop fifty years from his estimate. Peter Drucker has already laid a wreath on the tomb of "economic man." He believes that the financial calculus of profit and loss is ceasing to be a mainspring for human behavior. The classic figure of economic man was a product of scarcity, when pennies had to be watched and there was not enough to go around. He is increasingly out of his element in an economy of abundance.

It seems to me that the world is not only in a global war but in the midst of a convulsive transition period, where human beings conditioned to scarcity are trying to adjust themselves to the technological facts of plenty. When the adjustment is made, they may look back on their worries and fears as one looks back on a bleak day in childhood, and wonder why they were so upset.

How long the transition will take is impossible to foretell, but there is no doubt that the war is quickening it by opening our minds to change—military, political, and economic. Look at the speed with which types of arms are supplanted: the rising power of the land-based bombing plane, the decline of the battleship. And so with financial fears and fixed ideas. They too can be changed or supplanted.

Where does the money come from? It comes from the work of the people and the work of their machines. The war is forcing this lesson upon us. We may have learned it by Demobilization Day.

[This is the concluding article of Mr. Chase's series on the problems of post-war finance.]

Let the People Talk!

BY RALPH C. ROPER

A MAJOR weakness in our government is the absence of an accurate and adequate way to ascertain the popular will between elections. Using the spoken and the printed word, leaders can talk freely and fully to the people, but the people have no effective way of talking back. Only at election times can the voters register their views, and even then, as a rule, not on separate issues.

War problems will not wait for elections. Nor will peace problems. Since an accurate and adequate understanding of the sovereign will can now be gained no oftener than every two or four years, domestic issues must suffer from neglect. The founding fathers knew this. And so the town meeting was devised. Jefferson said it was "the wisest invention ever devised by the wit of man for the perfect exercise of self-government and for its preservation." But the town meeting had its limitations. As in the days of Aristotle, it could function only within "the range of an orator's voice." As our country's domain expanded and our problems became country-wide, simple, direct democracy had to give way to representative democracy.

Unfortunately, perhaps, we have known and experienced nothing else for more than a century and a half. It is so common among us that it has become cheap. Representative democracy, when it was first proposed by Thomas Paine (January 10, 1776), was neither common nor cheap. When he boldly urged the transfer of sovereignty to the people and the calling of a constitutional convention four years before any other leader had dared to do so, and outlined the fundamentals of our Constitution, the colonists looked upon his ideas as an entirely "new system of politics."

Democracy is government by discussion—discussion by the people. Listening does not satisfy the people. They are becoming impatient to talk. But to enable the people to regain their sovereign right to discuss their common problems together, and then inform their representatives of their sovereign will, new machinery must be devised. Many who have watched the workings of the Multiple Group Forum plan are convinced that this is the required device, that a country-wide system of thousands of people's forums would actually revitalize representative democracy. Dr. John Haynes Holmes has said of this plan: "It is a splendid extension of the democratic principle—altogether the most effective and fruitful extension I have ever seen. The spectacle of our group of seventy or more persons gathering week after week, under able leadership, to listen to experts and then to discuss on their own initiative and in the friendliest cooperative spirit the problems involved, and finally to report to one another their findings on the evidence and argument presented, has been indeed a thing to lift the heart, especially in these days when the democratic principle is under such heavy attack. I know that democracy is sound and good, for I have seen it work in this Multiple Group Forum plan."

Eight years' use of the plan in various communities has demonstrated that it is a practical remedy for the greatest weakness in our government. It permits every man and woman in an audience, no matter how large, to have three minutes in which to discuss a question and vote on it. The plan is simple and easily carried out. The audience is seated in groups of ten, around small tables, with a leader at each table who is democratically chosen. The questions are also democratically chosen—not dictated from above. They are so worded that they may be answered by yes or no. Usually, there are two speakers, likewise democratically selected. They speak in bouts of twenty minutes, then five minutes, each, one for the affirmative and one for the negative. Information and discussion, not debate, are expected. The speakers give facts and clarify issues. When they are through, the audience takes over the more important part of the meeting. For half an hour the participants at each table discuss the subject. The Multiple Group Forum thus permits conservatives, liberals, and radicals, face to face and elbow to elbow, to talk over together their common problems—economic, social, and political; local, state, and national.

Multiple Group Forums are democratically financed. In the center of each table is an ordinary soup plate. After discussion by the audience the chairman calls for the usual "music." The ensuing clatter of nickels, dimes, quarters, and half-dollars is the guaranty of independent discussion at subsequent meetings.

The third period of the program is devoted to reports by the table leaders. Each leader is given two minutes in which to report the vote of his table and summarize briefly the main points brought out in the discussions. At the end of the meeting the chairman, who has been chosen by the forum, announces to the audience the total vote upon the subject discussed.

I am often asked: "How do you prevent the "packing" of meetings? How are speakers selected? Table leaders?

A Multiple Group Forum is formed the easy, simple way, as informally as possible. A group of interested persons meet. They may come from existing clubs, discussion groups, forums, schools, churches, farmer groups, labor unions, women's clubs, men's clubs, business groups, and other organizations. They select a steering committee, and give to it such powers as they wish to delegate. A date is fixed, a question is chosen, and speakers are selected. The forum is held. In most cases the success of the first session is enough to insure others.

The steering committee is usually given authority to select subjects and speakers, but it often calls for suggestions from the audience. And the power of control remains always in the audience. Table leaders find themselves and are found. I have known table leaders to be chosen informally by unanimous voice. Changes of leaders come about in the same way.

As to packing a meeting, the best answer is that in the eight years the plan has operated in various communities packing has never happened, so far as I know. The procedure is so inherently democratic and simple that no one ever thinks of packing a meeting. That can happen only when control is from above or outside. At one meeting that I recall there were five speakers—Republican, Democrat, Laborite, Socialist, and Communist; every speaker had his say, and the audience had its say, without the least confusion or disturbance.

There is one unfortunate fact: conservatives do not as a rule take to the idea of discussion by the people so readily as do liberals and radicals. This was evidenced when invitations were extended to all former candidates for the Presidency—Herbert Hoover, James M. Cox, John W. Davis, Alfred E. Smith, Alfred M. Landon, and Norman Thomas—to cooperate in the promotion of a country-wide system of Multiple Group Forums. Only Mr. Thomas accepted.

Some people have objected to the Multiple Group Forum plan and its extension over the country because there are already in existence countless public forums of one kind or another. They overlook the fact that these forums do not permit audiences to take over the discussions. The large forum, says Nelson Antrim Crawford, editor-in-chief of the Household Magazine (Topeka, Kansas), which has a two-million circulation, largely in small rural communities, has so "degenerated" that it merely permits the audience to ask questions and the speakers to show how wittily they can reply; the chairmen of such forums often warn audiences against starting any arguments. If these forums are to function in the interest of the people, Mr. Crawford concludes, they must let anyone with an idea, good or bad, have his say.

I should like to see thousands of Multiple Group Forums all over the country simultaneously discussing the same questions. They could then count their votes and report them to national headquarters, where they could be tabulated, analyzed, and published. Such democratic machinery would provide a barometer of public opinion the like of which is not now available. Had this plan been in use when the League of Nations issue was pending, the world might not be at war today.

Sir Norman Angell's book "Let the People Know" should have as its corollary, "Let the People Talk!"

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Issues at Moscow

BY RALPH BATES

MANY liberals who have taken an active part in the campaign against the Metternichean peace projected by the Western allies have not yet realized that in the critical areas of Europe the U. S. S. R. is practicing the kind of foreign policy they have wanted America to practice. When their lack of understanding is not due to the lingering fogs of 1939 it can be attributed, I believe, to a failure to explore to its depths the accepted truth that the war is a revolutionary war. By that is meant that the immediate struggle for national liberation must necessarily awaken not merely the old forces of democracy but new ones, which will eventually seek to create a healthier society. This fact provides the test of a foreign policy. If it aids the people of Europe in their daily struggle against the Nazi forces of occupation, giving the clearest guaranties that the time-servers, the traitors, and the old implicated futilitarians will not be preferred to the men who fight now, if it shows eagerness to collaborate with the institutions which the people create for themselves as weapons, then that policy is democratic. For these new institutions represent solvent Europe. They are its flesh and blood, its very bone.

To put the problem in its true light the now manifest logic of past events must be described with brutal clarity. The urgency with which the Foreign Office and the State Department now address themselves to Moscow is due to their realization that they have misunderstood the time-table of Europe—and not only the time-table but the weight of the forces engaged. It cannot be doubted that our diplomats once thought that Russia would be so exhausted that Stalin could easily be persuaded to accept the Metternichean solutions which seemed to them the only safe means of adjustment to the Soviets' continued existence. The tremendous Soviet victories, however, indicating that the U. S. S. R. will be the most powerful force in continental Europe, have caused them to think again.

Both the second front and the political future of Europe will be discussed at Moscow. There are bound to be sharp differences of opinion, though Stalin has declared more than once that differences of social structure in the Allied countries need not prevent a solution. If one is reached, it will certainly be through compromise.

The characteristics of Soviet policy can be seen from the case of Yugoslavia. Nation readers are familiar with Yugoslav developments, but certain basic facts must be recalled here. The reactionary royal government in exile would neither organize the people for struggle nor wage war with its existing forces. When the Partisan movement began to attain real proportions, Mihailovich began civil war against them, in collusion with the Axis. As a consequence he became alienated from the people, while the Partisans and the civilian committees which directed them assumed the real and very democratic control of one-third of the country. All this is now generally admitted. What is not so well known is that the Partisans originally proposed to cooperate with Mihailovich, and recognized the royal government in London as the highest Yugoslav authority. They were driven to a contrary course by that government's rejection of democracy. In short, what has happened in Yugoslavia is an illustration of the truth stated in my first paragraph.

When I wrote my first article on the Yugoslav problem for The Nation (November 28, 1942) I was charged by one indignant reader with bad faith and with playing the Communist game. Many liberals then shared the belief that the Partisan movement, now officially recognized by London and the French Committee of National Liberation, was a Russian or at least a Communist Party creation, intended to serve Russian interests alone. It is true that the Communist Party of Yugoslavia did play a major role in bringing about this national rebirth, and that the U. S. S. R. was at first the only power to give resolute moral and practical support to the movement. Notwithstanding this, the Yugoslav Communists today are associated with five other political parties in directing what is the first democratic Yugoslav regime in many long years.

With these facts in mind, let us turn to the greatest problem of the war, the future of Germany. Here is found the gravest risk of conflict between the Anglo-American bloc and the U. S. S. R. The organization of a Free Germany Committee in London, closely following the political lead of the Moscow group—with which it is in contact—may indicate that London is preparing for a realistic discussion. All Mr. Churchill's utterances on this point, however, have been reactionary, though not more so than those of certain so-called liberals. Dismemberment, the amputation of Prussia, more or less permanent policing by a so-called international force, the maintenance of a hermaphrodite state—these proposals are substitutes for the German revolution which the Metternichs hope to frustrate. So great is the confusion that the last British Labor Party convention passed a disgraceful resolution on Germany, one wholly consistent with the views of Vansittart. Fortunately the Trades Union Congress has rejected a similar resolution by an overwhelming majority.

The program of the Free Germany Committee in Moscow and the political warfare based upon it leave no doubt as to the way in which the U. S. S. R. will use its tremendous influence. It will do all it legitimately can to aid Germans to establish a strong democratic state, able to defend its institutions against any new assault by German reaction; able, too, to recreate a healthy social life. There is no question of socialism or communism. The realists in Moscow, as well as the old Socialist and Communist vanguard in the German factories, know that a social revolution like that of October, 1917, would be prevented by London and Washington.

Criticism of the Soviet position is summed up in the contention, put forward and then abandoned by Edgar Ansel Mowrer, that the Soviet Union is determined to keep a powerful German army in existence at all costs, while the Anglo-American bloc is determined utterly to disarm the German nation. This view is refuted by a recent article in War and the Working Class which states that the Russians desire a purge of all the German warmakers, including the militarists, the Nazi Party leaders and functionaries, and the industrialists who supported Hitler's war aims. The entire social basis of German militarism must go. Nor do we need to rely exclusively on the Russian journal.

The thing to consider is what kind of Germany would result from a civil war waged around the Moscow committee's directives. For instance, the committee urges the German people to force immediate suspension of all hostilities and immediate withdrawal within German frontiers. One might suppose, to listen to the alarmists, that such a proposal would eventually be accepted as a matter of course by the Nazis or their militarist successors. Yet during the First World War this classical demand for the abandonment of conquests was a point around which the whole fight for German democracy developed. It will be so again. The mobilization of revolutionary forces around such a demand, if successful, will itself shatter the reactionary formations.

The nation that could consent to retreat and cease fighting would be not merely a beaten country but a purged one, in process of political, and to some extent social, change. Mr. Churchill, substituting a geographical term for a social description, has called for the amputation of Prussia. He is willing to risk the emergence of a new pan-Germanism in order to isolate the military class. The Russians believe that in the struggle for peace and the abandonment of conquest the majority of the old Junker generals will almost certainly be swept away. Field Marshal von Paulus, one notes, does not subscribe to "Free Germany."

Again, certain persons have thrown up their hands in astonishment because the German soldiers are asked to keep a firm grasp of their rifles, yet not to turn them against their own officers. It is difficult not to be scornful of the haphazard thinking and bad history on which this criticism is based. In 1917 there was no general Bolshevik insistence upon a liquidation of the officers. Many officers, indeed, sat upon the soldiers' committees and in the soviets, as Social Revolutionary delegates. When the officers attempted to prevent the establishment of the committees and to put down peace agitation, the Communists certainly recommended the use of the rifle. That is what the German committee proposes now. I quote the actual words of the manifesto, underlining the key phrase: "You have weapons in your hands. Hold on to them! Under the leadership of those commanders who recognize their responsibility and move together with you against Hitler, boldly clear the path leading your country to peace." Evidently something has to be cleared out of the way. There is at least the Waffen S. S , the Gestapo in arms, at present between three-quarters of a million and a million strong. That being so, the simple tactic of "voting for peace with one's legs" will not serve as it did in czarist Russia. The German democrat has no chance of walking home to take his place on a revolutionary committee. Hard civil war within the army must come first. Nor can it be waged by ill-organized militias against the disciplined and superbly equipped S. S. Corps, but only by a new patriot army formed, for technical reasons, as far as possible out of intact units. Surely the reason for the difference between the Russians of 1917 and the Germans of 1943 is clear enough.

Manifestly the Soviets believe—as who does not?—that it is the fear of a peace of liquidation which keeps the German soldier fighting. The Free Germany Committee seeks to wipe out this fear and to utilize partiotism for the purposes of the democratic revolution. Criticism of its efforts arises from failure to bear in mind the axiom that every revolutionary effort must take into account the objective circumstances of the epoch.

Finally it should be noted that the crucial passage in the German committee's manifesto defines the limits laid down by Soviet statecraft. If the German people do not revolt, "Hitler will be overthrown only by the force of the coalition armies. But this will signify the end of our national independence and of our existence as a state, the dismemberment of our fatherland. And we shall have only ourselves to blame afterward." In the absence of effective revolution, that is to say, the Soviet Union will not clash with the Anglo-American bloc in order to frustrate the dismemberment demanded by Mr. Churchill.

One other criticism of the Moscow committee's doctrine has been made. Soviet readiness to work with German officers is held to hinder the opposition to the Badoglio regime. Again, the objective conditions of the Italian revolution must be considered in relation to the Soviets' position. The U. S. S. R. knows that the policy announced by Mr. Churchill in his speech of September 21 must be regarded as a basic conception, not to be opposed in headlong fashion. It knows that it cannot lead or create an Italian revolutionary opposition to Badoglio and the king. At best it can support the demands of such an opposition should it come into existence. However, Moscow did not shirk conflict with the Anglo-American group. It invited itself into the debate, just as it took part in the controversies of the Non-Intervention Committee during the Spanish war. And its stern criticism of the AMG suggests that it intends to urge greater democracy in our treatment of reconquered areas. If this is so, then the fear expressed above is baseless.

It is frivolous to object, as it has been objected, that the Soviets' active sympathy with democratic movements is merely a matter of self-defense. It is a matter of self-defense, of course, and we should be grateful that at least one power feels that it has nothing to fear from popular governments. The U. S. S. R. will discuss the future of European democracy with us along lines that are clear enough. In the stress of negotiations it may be forced to surrender something of value. How much depends to a considerable extent on the democratic movements in Britain and America. If there is no drawing together of the three powers, the future will be black indeed.

[The controversial questions raised by Mr. Bates will be taken up from other points of view in later issues.]

Behind the Enemy Line

By ARGUS

FOR some weeks now every German soldier going home from the front on furlough has received from his sergeant a printed paper, labeled OKW No. 227, August, 1943, containing instructions of a curious nature.

First, the soldier is warned that he will find conditions at home far from pleasant; he should not, however, think they are worse than they are. He will perceive that food is often hard to obtain, but he must not forget that rations are sufficient. He may see cities devastated by air raids and perhaps find his family living in emergency quarters; yet the actual number of devastated cities is small—the same ones are bombed again and again. He will run across grumblers and shirkers who spread "false rumors" and "wild stories," but they are an unimportant minority unworthy of notice.

Secondly, the soldier is called on to make his presence have a tonic effect on the community. It is his duty to take to the people at home "some of our strength, our will, our vision, and our confidence." "During the first months of the war the Fatherland breathed its strength and faith into the soldier on leave. Today the roles are reversed, and it is the soldier who must bring to the home front the moral stimulant it needs." There follows a recapitulation—for the soldier to repeat at home—of all the facts that "enable us to hold our heads high as far as the military situation is concerned."

Thirdly, the soldier is asked not to unsettle his comrades, on his return to the front, with gloomy stories about conditions at home. If he has found certain things bad, he should tell his commanding officer, who "will take up the matter with the proper authorities." He should especially avoid exciting his companions with "wild stories" about the bombings. "Every one of us must be careful not to make that mistake."

No comment on these instructions is needed. But one thing may be pointed out: the author of them was obviously addressing men whose morale is considered intact. Distribution of the paper shows that the German army command believes the front-line troops to be in general completely reliable.

The Zurich Volksrecht of October 2 contains a collection of stories about typical happenings in Germany. The first is one of an increasing number now current about the Nazi who seeks witnesses of his good behavior:

> A high Nazi official [says the paper's informant] lives in the same house as my grocer. The official's wife, my grocer tells me, recently said to him, "You can testify that my husband always behaved correctly and never harmed anybody. He never did anything even to you, who have always been a prominent Social Democrat."

Another is about the Nazi who tries to make it appear that he has never been one:

> One morning the treasurer of the Nazi Charity League called on a friend of mine to ask for a contribution. "Good morning," he began, not using the customary "Heil Hitler." My friend asked him if that was the new party greeting. The man replied that he had never been a party member and wanted to have nothing to do with the party; he was collecting money only for the sake of the charities. And he left with an "Auf Wiedersehen." My friend knows, however, that the man is in fact a member of the party. He is simply running to cover.

The widespread belief that Hitler will meet Mussolini's fate is illustrated by the following reported conversation:

> After the collapse of fascism in Italy I talked with a non-commissioned officer in East Prussia. In a voice full of conviction he said to me, "The same thing is bound to happen here. Everything is in readiness. I have precise information." His words impressed me all the more because he was a complete stranger to me.

Charles Beard's Political Testament

THE REPUBLIC: CONVERSATIONS ON FUNDAMENTALS. By Charles A. Beard. The Viking Press. $3.

IT IS not often that a book appears bearing unmistakable signs that it is destined to become a classic in its field. These imaginary dialogues which Charles Beard conducts with lively and intelligent interlocutors constitute such a book. It is a political testament, full of wisdom, set down with patience, buoyed up with a spirit of cheerful skepticism, and marred only by a caution which betrays it into ambiguity on a key point. Above all, it is an inspiring course in the fundamental issues of government and democracy. No intelligent person will find political science dull after reading it, whether he agrees with Beard or not. It should revolutionize the teaching of American government both on the college and the adult-education level.

These conversations are given in twenty-one chapters which begin with an analysis of the opening words of the Preamble to the Constitution, "We, the People," and conclude with "the Fate and Fortunes of Our Republic." As Beard goes from phrase to phrase, from provision to provision in the Constitution, he brings into play a dry humor and common-sense realism which dissolve the mists of rhetoric that usually attend discussions of the Constitution. As exercises in popular semantics these dialogues are excellent.

But let no one who knows the early Beard imagine that he has translated everything into the language of economic determinism. Although he has a sure grip on the economic facts of our day and never loses sight of them, he has traveled a long way from the standpoint of "An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution," whose remarkable and unanswerable findings were forced into too narrow a framework of motivation. Beard recognizes more explicitly than ever before that we cannot simply construe economic motives from economic conditions. Indeed, if anything, he goes to the other extreme and makes of the Federalist a kind of philosophical manual of perennial issues in political science without sufficient reference to the economic conditions of the period. He does not deny, of course, that political ideas were originally creatures or servants of interests. But he insists, and rightly, that by molding the outlook, hopes, and language habits of several generations of Americans, ideas enter into the making of history and to some extent influence the form and direction taken by present-day interests. History, for Beard, is not a blind working out of economic interests in conflict with each other but "the interplay of ideas and interests in the time-stream."

Of more topical interest than Beard's ideas on man, history, and causality, which receive only peripheral treatment, are his views on the social and political issues of our time. True to his own theory of why we continually reinterpret the past, Beard's reconstruction of the spirit and meaning of the Constitution is pointed toward a program of action for our own troubled era. On some of these issues, particularly the important problem of the economic underwriting of constitutional democracy, Beard is curiously reticent. He contents himself with exposing inadequacies in the proposals of spokesmen of capital, management, and labor to assure full employment and a rising standard of living for the community. His healthy reminder, here as elsewhere, that we don't know as much as we think we do is a corrective to dogmatism, but it is coupled with an over-caution that suggests that we do not even know enough to make a beginning. On foreign policy this spirit of caution is in evidence too, strongly buttressed with pertinent historical analogies. Like Dr. and Mrs. Smythe, his imaginary companions in dialogue, Beard rejects the appellation of "isolationist." He thinks of himself only as "an American whose strongest affections are centered here." Naturally he believes in the vigorous prosecution of the war but refuses to be swept away by the floods of loose talk about the nature of the post-war world and of the agencies which will be intrusted with the enforcement of peace. "Those who condemn nationalism and announce a merging of the Republic in a world solidarity may well profit from a long and minute study of the way in which American solidarity came about, not overlooking the long civil war required to seal our Union." These considerations are well worth pondering, particularly by those who believe we should commit ourselves to enforce peace no matter what kind of peace is established, and who place their faith in alliances and federations while they profess theories which locate the chief causes of war in domestic areas beyond international control. Beard does not favor withdrawal from world affairs. But instead of blind wholesale commitments in advance to ambiguous principles he urges piecemeal collaboration on practical issues.

On the home front Beard appears to be an untamed advocate of the New Deal and makes short shrift of those who urge constitutional objections to the policy of government intervention. Very impressive is the way he wrests the Constitution out of the hands of standpatters and reactionaries. He asserts that without altering a line in the document it can become the instrument of the most far-reaching social reforms. But for all his trust in the New Deal, Beard distrusts New Dealers, partly because they lack constitutional understanding and partly because they are subject to the same frailties as other human beings. This reflects not cynicism about human beings but wisdom in the ways of the political world, and awareness that the unintended consequences of what we do are often more fateful than our immediate successes.

An emphasis so marked as to border on a change in political outlook is now apparent in Beard's thought. Constitutional piety is called in as midwife of social reform, and unhistorical reason with its bold logical plans is turned out of doors. Abetted by a little intelligence, constitutional piety guarantees a new birth of freedom and welfare without Caesarean operations. In a sense, Beard has turned Savigny and the historical school inside out. Historical-mindedness is now become an indispensable aid to progressive legislation: arguments and proposals may be "historically true, if utterly unreasonable."

This accent on constitutionalism reaches its climax in Beard's defense of the power of the Supreme Court to declare void any acts of Congress which curtail personal liberties. The abrogation of the veto power of the courts, which ironically enough was a historical usurpation, he deems "undesirable and dangerous." I am in hearty accord with Beard's desire to protect minorities from discriminatory legislation. But to intrust that protection to the Supreme Court seems to me to be demonstrably unreasonable, whether reason is taken as a historical or a logical category. It is a misreading of American history, as Beard's own writings testify, to regard the Supreme Court as a reliable or consistent defender of minority rights and civil liberties. By and large it has used its power of judicial review, under the noble banner of minority rights, to bolster property rights imperiled by the advance of social legislation. So long as the court is not stripped of its power of judicial veto, there is nothing to prevent one justice, or all nine, when the chances of time and personality are well mated, from interpreting the amendments to the Constitution as a charter of established social privilege. Nor is it without significance that the state of personal and civil liberty in England, where laws are made without benefit of judicial review, is certainly not less healthy than it is here. If this is unhistorical, the fact that minorities have suffered more at the hands of other minorities than of majorities is not.

Charles Beard's position on this and related matters seems to me to grow out of his cloudy distinction between a constitutional government and a democratic one. The latter is defined simply in terms of majority rule; the former is one which limits the power both of officials and majorities by guaranteeing the human rights of individuals. Since rule by majority may be oppressive and degenerate into an elective despotism, democracy is distinguished from constitutional government. In the light of these definitions Beard considers the United States a constitutional rather than democratic republic. A second glance at these definitions will show that they are inadequate for the case in hand. Beard himself admits that in the United States rights of persons and property may be—and have been—destroyed by amendment. True, this requires, as he points out, an "extraordinary" majority. But what is sacred about 75 per cent or 99 per cent? Can't an extraordinary majority be just as tyrannical as an ordinary one? If a constitutional government is one in which "fundamental rights [are] reserved to the people," who determines what rights are fundamental, and who reserves them? Unless it is ultimately the majority or its elected representatives, constitutional government must be non-democratic.

Morally, rule by majority, ordinary or extraordinary, a minority, a Supreme Court, a despot may be benevolent or malevolent. Our choice between them is based upon the quality of their fruits, of which welfare is only one. All that Beard seems to me to want to say is this: fruits that are forced or plucked too hastily are likely to be bitter; a wise democracy is one in which the majority lays down rules for itself to proceed cautiously. As a rule caution is a good rule. But ometimes a democracy must act quickly and boldly, as none

Believing in racial equality isn't enough!

Understanding it—and understanding the basis of present inequalities—is the least we can do.

The "Negro question" confronts every one of us, whatever the color of our skin. A solution can be reached only if each of us—personally and individually—understands this urgent problem, its roots, its development, its possibilities of solution.

In Edwin Embree's new book, "Brown Americans," you will find a complete and fascinating account of Negroes in America, their history from the first arrival of a slave ship to present outbreaks of racial violence. It's an account of the past and the present that points the way to future progress.

Here is a vital, human story of the men, white and dark, who have worked for Negro freedom and education. Here is a picture of a tenth of this nation—living, working, hoping in a foreign society, yet a society with which they must get along, with which they must merge if they are to survive. $2.75

For twelve years Edwin Embree's earlier book, "Brown America," has been accepted by Negroes and white Americans as a standard work on the status of the Negro. Mr. Embree's new volume is not a "revised edition." It is a completely fresh survey of a problem that has assumed international importance.

knows better than Beard, the historian. To repent at leisure one must at least survive!

Granted, then, that on a particular occasion democracy may trench upon certain claims and desires that are precious to us. We cannot therefore impugn the validity of the democratic process unless we are prepared to defend the doctrine of absolute natural rights or the principle of aristocratic rule. Beard, happily, is prepared to do neither one nor the other. "If for decency, progress, order, and liberty in the community and the nation, we cannot rely upon the character, sentiments, allegiances, and moral habits of the people, upon what, in heaven's name, can we rely?" Well said! But here speaks the democrat, not the pious constitutionalist who in the course of history has answered: the king, the church, the nobility, the party, the Supreme Court. The majority may be foolish and wicked, but if a democracy be defined and practiced in terms of freely given consent, the wise and virtuous minority has at least a talking chance before it decides to yield out of prudence or fight out of principle.

Charles Beard is a great American democrat. It would be a pity if his words were twisted to make him appear a Hamiltonian pur sang. SIDNEY HOOK

Hamilton Rowan

THE DESIRE TO PLEASE. By Harold Nicolson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

AT THE age of eight Harold Nicolson was stupefied on being told by a schoolboy friend that his grandfather had been hanged. His mother, however, corrected this statement. "It was only your great-great-grandfather," she said, "and he wasn't really hanged; he escaped just in time." His name was Hamilton Rowan. "He was a rebel," his mother added. "We do not talk about him much." Now, after nearly fifty years, Harold Nicolson has published a biography of his fantastic ancestor—a beautifully written document so packed with history, humor, political intrigue, personal anecdote, suspense, and, not least, with wisdom, that its two hundred pages take as long to read and digest as would several novels of the size and quality of "Gone with the Wind."

Archibald Hamilton Rowan, whose character no novelist would ever dare attempt to create, was born in London in 1751. His father, "Old Baldie," was "a muddle-headed, untidy, raffish sort of man" who inherited Killyleagh Castle in County Down and whose mistress "began life as a housemaid" and ended it as a blaspheming old drunkard. "Old Baldie's" wife was a mean, snobbish bully of an English Protestant, who persuaded her father to make a will by which her son, because she suspected him of having "inherited an undisciplined soul," should succeed to her family's large fortune only on condition that he assume the name of Rowan, take a degree at Oxford or Cambridge, and refrain from visiting Ireland before the age of twenty-five. Her son did take the name of Rowan, and he did take a degree at Cambridge—where he threw his tutor in the river and received a commission in the Huntingdon Militia; but he more than once "sneaked clandestinely to Killyleagh" before the appointed date.

Three years, in fact, before that date Hamilton Rowan—whose figure was so colossal that "it might have served as a model for Hercules"—had visited not only Ireland, Holland, and the United States—whence he returned with "a raccoon, an opossum, and a young bear"—but also France, where Marie Antoinette was so impressed by the gigantic seigneur anglois that she sent him a ring. Hamilton Rowan remained in France eleven years. Why his great-great-grandfather chose to retire to the Continent at the age of twenty-two, Nicolson has no idea. In Paris, in spite of the fact that the French and British governments were then at war and he was an officer, Rowan spent his days rowing up and down the Seine in a Thames wherry. Nicolson also has no idea why, after four years in France, Rowan began to adopt an anti-English attitude—an attitude that was to govern, and almost deprive him of, his life. A clue to the puzzle why this rich, magnificent-looking Englishman should turn against his native land and devote his long career to passionate defense of Ireland's wrongs would seem to lie in his relation to his mother, whom he could never have liked, who bullied him, who for him no doubt symbolized England, who despised the Irish and tried to prevent her son from visiting Ireland, thereby bestowing upon that country "the glamor of a forbidden home." Another reason for Rowan's defense of the oppressed might be traced to the probability of his possessing a bad conscience over his own great wealth and extravagance.

Rowan committed his first subversive act when, at the age of twenty-six, he succeeded in obtaining an audience in Paris with Benjamin Franklin, whose acquaintance he then proceeded to use in order "to enlist Englishmen in the American forces for the purpose of fighting against their own country." Seven years later Rowan and his Irish wife decided to leave France and settle in Ireland. "The Irish," writes Nicolson—without too much malice—"do not want anyone to wish them well; they want everyone to wish their enemies ill." Hamilton Rowan spent the next fifty years planning, violently, indiscreetly, always illogically—in short, Irishwise—innumerable ills for Ireland's oldest enemy. In this pursuit Rowan suffered imprisonment in Ireland, jail fever in France, exile and extreme poverty in Germany and then in the United States, where he became "a printer and dyer of calicoes" on the banks of the Delaware. Nevertheless, this enigmatic rebel, constantly courting violent death, "died quietly" in his adopted country "in the eighty-fourth year of his age."

Hamilton Rowan fell into the maelstrom of Irish politics by joining, in the company of Wolfe Tone and Napper Tandy, the Society of United Irishmen—from whose "inner ring" of 126 no fewer than 34 died on the gallows. He was first arrested in Scotland, and then, for the distribution of revolutionary pamphlets in Dublin, sentenced to two years in Newgate. Three months later, disguised as a cowherd, he was smuggled out to France in a rowboat. Thereafter he was accused of inciting the French government "to invade his Kingdom of Ireland with ships and armed men." Legend has it that immediately after his escape Rowan was idiotic enough to visit his home. There, by amazing presence of mind, he is said to have escaped death by hurling his hat out of a window and concealing himself in a closet. Nicolson first learned of this legend in James Joyce's "Portrait of the Artist," where Stephen Daedalus wonders "from which window Hamilton Rowan had thrown his hat upon the Ha Ha." To check up on this, Nicolson visited Joyce in Paris, and his description of this meeting—in a room in which I have watched the blind genius moving and talking precisely as here described—is not only one of the best passages in this fascinating book but also proof of its author's uncanny eye for detail, his strict adherence to fact. The conversation that ensued between the two writers, however, was of so unexpected a nature that it was only when Nicolson had regained the street that he remembered why he had come.

On Underestimating Japan

JAPAN FIGHTS FOR ASIA. By John Goette. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

AMONG the correspondents who have served in China, none has had the opportunity to know the Japanese better than John Goette, veteran International News representative in Peking. Mr. Goette was attached to the Japanese army for five years, traveling with the invading forces in many parts of China and enjoying unparalleled contacts with the Japanese military leaders. On the basis of his experience Mr. Goette is gravely concerned lest America underestimate Japan's bid for dominance of Asia. His book is an impassioned plea that we take time to understand the nature of Japan's strength and the permanence of its threat to world peace.

Numerous incidents are related to show the toughness, the loyalty, and the fighting qualities of the individual Japanese soldier. Behind this dogged and almost superhuman devotion to duty lies not so much a lust for war as a unity of purpose that is without parallel in any other nation. The Japanese soldier who is wounded in battle is assured of every care that modern science can provide. If he is killed in action, his name is revered by a grateful people. Moreover, the Japanese army is a veteran army. In its six years' war in China it has gained experience which has already proved invaluable in its war against the West. And although the navy has had no such experience, it has been carefully schooled for years for the inevitable attack on the United States and Britain. Contrary to the usual American opinion, both branches of the service are competently led by men who are capable of daring and initiative in carrying out the grandiose plans of the heads of the government.

Mr. Goette lays great stress on Japan's ability to transform its conquered territories into political and economic assets of immeasurable worth. He goes beyond any other contemporary writer not only in accepting the sincerity of Japan's "Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity" policy but in crediting its results. More than a half-million Japanese civilians have moved into occupied China within the past few years. These immigrants are well established; they are making the occupation pay dividends financially; and they are rapidly building an economic domain which greatly strengthens the Japanese capacity to withstand the military pressure of the United Nations. At the same time the Japanese have undoubtedly enjoyed some measure of success in their elaborate and Wise and genial, an autobiography marked by humor dry as a hickory nut —and just as tasty.

Connecticut Yankee

By WILBUR L. CROSS

The statesman-scholar known as "Uncle Toby"

"THE subject and author of this book is peculiarly a Connecticut institution, in some degree a product of nature but mainly a work of art. During his own lifetime he has become a legend in which Connecticut people of all classes and political parties feel a sense of proprietorship, nor is the story of his life exclusively a private concern . . . a shrewd, canny, humorous tale, packed with great information and kindly innuendo, fighting with a sword of wit behind a shield of assumed simplicity . . . an extraordinarily full and various life told by a mind still young . . . a book to be remembered." —Odell Shepard, in The Nation.

"ONE of the prime source books of American democracy. For this is, by heck! the real thing, a full and truthful report by a man who maintained peace with himself and the world while he kept everlastingly busy doing what he wanted to do."—Harry Morgan Ayres, N. Y. Times Book Review.

expensive program for indoctrinating the peoples of the occupied territories with Japanese concepts. Although their propaganda efforts are frequently clumsy, the Japanese make up in zeal and persistence for their inability to see through other people's eyes.

While there is clearly less danger in overemphasizing the enemy's assets than in underestimating them, most readers will regret that Mr. Goette gives little space to Japan's liabilities. Presumably because his experiences were limited largely to the Asiatic mainland, he does not discuss such questions as the basic weaknesses in Japan's agriculture, the shortage of shipping, and the insuperable problems of war production. Nor does he consider Japan's vulnerability to air attacks. But since most of these points have been overstressed in current writing on Japan, his book offers a healthy corrective. MAXWELL S. STEWART

Nomini Hall

JOURNAL AND LETTERS OF PHILIP VICKERS FITHIAN. Edited with an Introduction by Hunter Dickinson Farish. Colonial Williamsburg, Inc. $4.

CUSTOMARILY the Tidewater planters imported their household tutors, along with their furniture and plate and china, from Britain; but just before the outbreak of the Revolution they began to seek instructors for their children in the divinity schools of the North. Philip Fithian was twenty-six years old and a recent graduate of Princeton when in 1773 he came to the Northern Neck of Virginia to serve as tutor at Nomini Hall, the plantation home of the Honorable Robert Carter. It was an entirely new world in which the young man from New Jersey found himself, and at first the Virginians, with their formal, courtly manners and their enormous appetite for life, seemed wonderfully strange. In many ways their behavior was as shocking as his Presbyterian elders had warned him that it would be. Their favorite clergyman—whose sermons never interrupted their social chats in the churchyard for longer than twenty minutes—was also one of the colony's most persistent tipplers and reckless gamblers; the tiniest girls could talk as constantly and knowingly of silk and chintzes and Paris net as their fathers and young brothers did of shooting and boat racing and dogs and horses; the lessons of Mr. Christian, the dancing master who made the rounds of the great plantations, always took precedence over Mr. Fithian's carefully prepared exercises in Greek and arithmetic. Yet during the two years that he lived as an intimate member of their household Fithian grew as fond of the Carters—and of their neighbors, the Fauntleroys, Washingtons, and Lees—as they did of him. He recorded with admiration the skill with which "sensible, judicious" Mr. Carter managed the multiple activities of his 60,000 acres and the efficiency with which "prudent, always cheerful" Mrs. Carter supervised the manifold tasks connected with maintaining a "great house." He wrote with genuine affection and a warm and endearing humor of his seven "lovely charges"—the "volatile" fun-loving teen-age boys, and the "merry, winning" little girls. He was particularly impressed by the unfailing kindness of these children to their colored servants and was constantly amused by the serious manner in which they imitated their duties in their own play. They were forever busy at make-believe weaving, spinning, sweeping, and scrubbing, and pretending to be pregnant women by "stuffing rags and other Lumber below their Apron Strings."

Great things were happening in America during the two years that young Fithian lived at Nomini Hall, and he duly noted the "tumult" that news out of Boston and Philadelphia occasioned in the colony. When war finally broke out, he enlisted as a chaplain and died of dysentery and exposure after the Battle of White Plains. He was one of the very first of many young Calvinists from the North who during the interval between their graduation and ordination served as tutors in the South and formed an attachment for the families with whom they lived that was not weakened even by the sectional bitterness that led up to the Civil War. It is fortunate that the Williamsburg Restoration Historical Studies have made available the diary and letters that he wrote at Nomini Hall. They give a fresh, human, and altogether charming picture of plantation life on the eve of the Revolution.

GRACE ADAMS

DRAMA

ONE TOUCH OF VENUS" (Imperial Theater) has so many touches of talent that it is exhilarating in spite of its flaws. For one thing the story, slight as it is, has a point. It also has one character. This is the good-looking American boy, a rising young barber, who is stuffed with the sentiments of popular songs and the American dream of settling down and raising a family in Ozone Heights. By accident he brings Venus into life, circa 1943, when he slips a newly paid for engagement ring on the finger of a statue of the goddess in a chi-chi modern art gallery. Venus "eliminates" the barber's fiancee by the old magic device of causing her to vanish—which provides enough complications to keep the piece going. It goes very well through the first act, which ends in a fine blaze of costume and song. The second act is a bit of an anti-climax. The dénouement is played out too fast, and this fault is accentuated by the circumstance that not until Act II do the authors really get down to characterizing the barber. The characterization is amusing and telling and should have been incorporated in Act I.

Needless to say, Venus finds that she wouldn't like Ozone Heights and takes her leave, but has the kindness to provide a substitute, an all-American girl who looks just like herself.

The story, as anyone can see, gives scope to contemporary fashions in attitudes and expression. Modern art contributes to the decoration and the fun. Freud takes a deep bow early in the proceedings when Mary Martin, exquisite in her own right and made more so by the clothes of Mainbocher, utters the unexquisite observation that love is not the sound of a dying violin but the twang of a bed-spring. Later on the psychiatrist has his moment, at psychiatry's expense.

Agnes de Mille's particular American blend of ballet and "modern" and musical-comedy dancing also fits nicely into this mélange. Neither of her two numbers can compare with "Rodeo," but they are good medicine for red-blooded Americans who think they don't like ballet. And the supple humor of Sono Osato is a wonderfully effective antidote for an old and silly prejudice.

Kurt Weill's tunes are pleasant but not very distinctive. They seem to me to fall between the stools of American and European popular songs. And Ogden Nash's rhymes too often put weights rather than wings on his lyrics. Still, several of them are effective, given the setting and presentation.

The performances are good throughout, though John Boles is a bit heavy and persists in singing a popular song as if it were an operatic aria. Kenny Baker is extremely well cast as the barber. Paula Laurence "louses up songs," as she calls it, in a most engaging way and otherwise makes the best of a rather sketchy part. As for Mary Martin, she is lovely, gay, impudent, and intelligent.

"One Touch of Venus" has a New Yorker flavor—diluted but definite—and most of the collaborators hail from the borders of Bohemia where smartness parleys with talent and allows it scope so long as it observes the rather fierce conventions of smartness. Here both smartness and talent parley with Broadway. Broadway is skeptical—Variety notes the dearth of jokes and says the piece is "slanted to connoisseurs." But the drought on Dream Street has been so long drawn out that the gag-and-soda audiences I complained about last time may even take to the fairly dry red wine of Perelman, Nash, De Mille, and Weill.

"SAHARA." Humphrey Bogart and several less high-salaried but no less talented soldiers, stranded at an oasis, hold off and then capture a full Nazi battalion. Anyone who can make that believable, even for so long as you watch it, knows how to make a good war melodrama. "Sahara" is the best one since "Bataan." Cinematically it is better. It borrows, chiefly from the English, a sort of light-alloy modification of realism which makes the traditional Hollywood idiom seem as obsolete as a minuet.

"A Lady Takes a Chance" is not the new kind of realistic sex comedy it might have been, but once in a while it's on the edge. Too often both ends of Jean Arthur are played against the middle; but John Wayne suggests how sensational he might be in a sufficiently evil story about a Reno gigolo. Besides the unusually frank erotic undertones there are some good harsh street and rodeo shots, a fine small hotel, and a saloon scene which gets down the crowded, deafening glamor which unforeseen daylight drunkenness can have, better than I have ever seen it filmed before.

"Hostages," made from Stefan Heym's novel, lacks the cinematic edge, detail, and inventiveness which the story could have afforded, but at worst it is competent, politically focused, and fairly exciting. William Bendix, though he mugs, is a valuable surprise. He evidently understands—as nobody else in Hollywood seems to—the almost beyond-death detachment which is at the center of everything a deeply political man does.

"Corvette K-225" is an unusually decent and unpretentious—but not very interesting—semi-documentary about Corvette K-225. Some of it, made in Canada and on the North Atlantic, is fresh and pretty to see; even genuinely moving. The more violent stuff, though well-contrived, is strictly studio, and suffers by comparison.

"True to Life" is a rather crass and moderately amusing comedy about two soap-opera laureates (Dick Powell and Franchot Tone) who deceive and exploit a (far from true-to-life) Queensboro family, for "material." There is some fair radio-ribbing, and I liked Victor Moore and some daft gadgets derived from old Buster Keaton comedies. Mary Martin, I notice with some alarm, is playing Jean Arthur—a tendency which even Miss Arthur must learn to curb.

"Lassie Come Home" is a dog story which I had hardly expected to enjoy, and cannot be sure who will and who won't. I did, though. Those who made it seem to have had a pretty fair sense of the square naivete which most good stories for children have, or affect; they also manipulate some surprisingly acute emotions out of the head dog. Whether from private remembrance or from the show, I got several reverberations of that strangely pure, half-magical tone which certain books, regardless of their other qualities, have for many children.

"Thousands Cheer" is a thoroughly routine musical distinguished only by Gene Kelly with nothing to use his talents on, a terrible piece of trash by Shostakovich, and the unpleasant sight of José Iturbi proving he is a real guy by playing the sort of boogie-woogie anyone ought to be able to learn through a correspondence course.

"Sweet Rosie O'Grady" has some fairly pretty color and sets (1880), a few glimpses of Betty Grable's façade, and the power to remind you that the right director and author could make wonderful use of her.

"Wintertime," Sonja Henie's ten-thousandth baked alaska, proves that skating musicals do not have to be half as boring as they usually are; also that that fact is of no great importance.

"Thank Your Lucky Stars" is the loudest and most vulgar of the current musicals. It is also the most fun, if you are amused when show people kid their own idiom, and if you find a cruel-compassionate sort of interest in watching amateurs like Bette Davis do what they can with a song. JAMES AGEE

ART

ALEXANDER CALDER: Sculpture, Constructions, Jewelry, Toys, and Drawings. At the Museum of Modern Art until November 28. GIORGIO DE CHIRICO: Early Paintings. At Art of This Century Gallery until November 6.

Calder's accomplishment is the invention of a new microcosm of art. Its flora and fauna are made of wire, sheet metal, piping, glass, wood, and anything else tangible. Its plants can be conceived of as those objects with leaves of metal, its animals those with flanged and bolted haunches, its geology the involutions of wire, string, and pellets, while its machines are really machines—motor-driven—with no purpose other than the dance of their own movements. The modality of this world is linear, two-dimensional in spirit if not in fact, an inheritor of painting. Here also the mischievous word of E. E. Cummings's poetry is made flesh. Calder's art is always called gay and exuberant, and it is. But more seems to be wanted. This particular world lacks history. Lots of things go on in it but nothing happens; for its laws have no necessity and are not sufficiently determined by a driving purpose working itself out variously and progressively in fulfilment of the will or inherent nature of its creator. Its creatures differ as much in design and scale as can be wanted, but they all have the same personalities. Calder's chief asset is felicity: so few of his objects lack it; but felicity exhausts their content—as is most obvious in the larger pieces. It becomes plain then that the fundamental aesthetic concept setting Calder in motion is good taste—a good taste already established by others, since his shapes and especially his color stem entirely from the works of Picasso, Miró, and Arp. Good taste has its advantages, and Calder is one of our best artists. I do not think that he is in the same class as David Smith, who works in a similar medium and derives from the same ancestry, but he comes next.

Chirico is an inventor, too, not of a world but of an atmosphere and décor. A stereopticon view of a desolation clean-swept and orderly, haunted, abandoned, Graeco-Italian, etc., etc. Ichabod the glory has departed, leaving elegiac and lyric shadows in the late October sun. Not crumbling matter but the absence of people—more, the absence of animal life—signifies decay, or the embalmed immobility of their partial presence in rooms cluttered with geometrical paraphernalia. Those who lament the degeneration of Chirico's art into its present state of buff torsos, whitewashed horses, and chalk drapery would be less dismayed if they looked more searchingly. Aside from atmosphere explicitly denoted as such, the originality of these early Chiricos (1911 to 1917) lies only in the neat bisection and rebisection of space—a parody of Renaissance composition—and in the declamatory contrasts of dark and light, the light being expressed by color unusually flat with respect to the deliberately academic black of the modeling and shading. But the color is stale Florentine sugar, and the texture of the painting superficial and lifeless. Perhaps this came in part of the artist's desire to paint in the spirit of his theme; if so, he overdid it. The alla prima thinness expresses the defeatism of Chirico's art itself more poignantly than it does the defeat of the world conjured up by its means. His art is a literary feat sustained for only a moment's view. Then it dies—or goes on to survive best in black and white. Let me except "The Rose Tower" from the last; it is notable for its flesh pink no less than for the placing of its horizon lines, used so well to evoke melancholy.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

MUSIC

THE fact that Massine should create a ballet at all seems always to be a trial to Mr. John Martin's august patience and an occasion for his disdainful witticisms. It seems to me that Massine has established his right to create ballets, and that one can say of "Mademoiselle Angot," newly produced by the Ballet Theater, only that it is one of his failures. Massine himself—with his authoritative presence, his style, his get-up, his comic powers—provides a few exciting moments; the rest is just a hubbub which communicates nothing. What is unfortunate is that with Massine in "Mademoiselle Angot" he is out of "Capriccio Espagnol," and that Lazovsky has been withdrawn also; for without the presence and style of the one and the incandescent rhythmical agility of the other the finale of this ballet is far from the brilliant spectacle it was last year (and I have seldom witnessed music and dancing as wide apart as they were in the recent performance I saw). The other ballets on the program, "Pillar of Fire" and "Pas de Quatre," are still beautifully done (the performances of the music of these two were only normally ragged).

In this connection I might mention that the war, in bringing changes to newspaper staffs, has given New York a first-rate dance critic: Mr. Edwin Denby, who now writes for the Herald Tribune. I have made the point a number of times that the important thing in criticism is not the critic's final verdict that something is good or bad but his reasons for the verdict, in which we get the illuminating insights—when he has them—that are his value to us. Mr. Denby has an eye that sees; and looking at anything through this eye is an excitingly illuminating experience—the more so for the seriousness and the warm intensity that his writing communicates.

Again I must be glad that I did not anticipate the New Yorker reviewer's comment on the way Serkin's performance of Beethoven's Sonata Opus 27 No. 2 is recorded. I can recall no past horror for which he did not have a cheery word; but the present recording of the Serkin performance seems to have provoked him beyond endurance: "The piano recording, as such, isn't as clean as it could be, however."

Readers have inquired from time to time whether I intended to discuss some of the important books of the year. I do; and I regret the time it is taking me to write what I have to say about them. All criticism begins with an experience and ends with a formulation of one's response to the experience (though there is, of course, also the large amount of journalistic writing which uses words to conceal what they betray—the fact that the writer has had no experience from what he has heard or seen or read, and no response to it). And the book review —in which one must digest someone else's train of thought in order to fit it into a train of thought of one's own that both restates and evaluates it—is the form of critical writing which I happen to find the most difficult, and which takes me the most time to do. I read Dorian's "History of Music in Performance," Maisel's "Charles T. Griffes," Beecham's "Mingled Chime," Panassié's "The Real Jazz" months ago; and I expect to write about them before long.

Stokowski's "Music for All of Us" I will not discuss: after twenty-five years' observation of the Stokowski performance in action and word I cannot bring myself even to read it. I might suspect the story in broadcasting circles that Stokowski's knob-twiddling took his broadcasts off the air until he was given a dummy control panel to play with, if I had not heard myself in the recent Victor recording of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony how his knob-twiddling took parts of the music off the records; after this, and after some of his atrocious Columbia recordings, I have no interest in Stokowski's dabblings in science. But if you want to know what he has to say in his book about the physical basis of music, here is the summary of his ideas in the review in the Times's Sunday book section: "When he gets around to the physical side of music Mr. Stokowski writes more illuminatingly than most musicians. For his is a bold, far-ranging, searching mind. Not content merely to study and conduct symphonies, he has gone to the roots of his art. He has made himself an expert on the science of sound. More than any other major conductor in this country he knows the science of acoustics and the possibilities of the new fields being opened by scientists. . . . Many other writers have set down their views. But Mr. Stokowski covers the field with a fresh, broad point of view. He tries to state his position as simply as he can, but he does not write down, as many expositors of music for the layman are inclined to do. He respects not only his art but his audience." And if you are interested in knowing the ideas behind Stokowski's butcheries of music in performance, "when Mr. Stokowski discourses on music structure he employs a wide and varied frame of reference. As a conductor he had to cover many epochs, schools, and nations. As a student he has concerned himself with the musical expression of all parts of the world—not merely the Occident, on which our musical culture is based, but the Orient, the South and Central American countries, and the remote cultures which have been carried down, at least partly, to our own time by such groups as the Indians of the Americas." That tells you everything.

Letters to the Editors

Soldiers and Democracy

Dear Sirs: I was glad to find, in your issues of the past month, letters criticizing the lack of any concrete, specific, unified attempt to educate the soldiers on the meaning of this war with fascism. I have been in the army since before Pearl Harbor; in those days the rare gabfests not concerned with girls turned to the "over the hill in October" theme. Today there is a desperate longing for some miraculous sudden end to the war, and then home and happiness forever after—no more problems, issues, struggles. And the lack of any serious training in democracy—instead of so many wasted hours of too much close-order drill, or policing up, inspection, etc.—is reflected in the talk of many soldiers who, quite simply, would quit the army tomorrow if they could get away with it. "But the Japs, the Nazis?" you ask—and they either remain sullenly silent or shrug the question off with "Aw, they won't come over."

The P. X. (Post Exchange) reading matter consists chiefly of superman books, comics, and, believe it or not, true-romance magazines. The splendid army theaters are mostly wasted with a constant parade of slick Hollywood thrillers or tenth-rate musicals. The few training films of "orientation" I have seen are too general, too vague; fascism is not concretely explained in terms of personal slavery, physical and spiritual. The Special Service officers seem incapable of anything but promoting games or sponsoring some puerile, hashed-up USO vaudeville. Any writing about the army stresses always the gags, the wisecrack angle. Is it any wonder the barracks teem either with crude sex jokes or with anti-Semitic, anti-Negro, anti-anything-really-progressive talk?

In over two years in the army I have seen equipment become plentiful, superb, beautifully designed for its specific task; I have seen training become more and more realistic. But I have not seen any attempt whatsoever—despite the Special Orientation Course (on paper)—to take this unparalleled opportunity of teaching the farm boy and the slum boy, the Southerner and the Northerner, gathered together in one vast army, that the world extends beyond the comics and the crooner, and that democracy must be fought for after the last bomb is dropped.

Keep writing, shouting, yelling to all you can reach the sad truth that most American soldiers will fight without really knowing what all the shooting's for. ENGINEER

Mr. Ernst Again

Dear Sirs: I don't want to prolong this endeavor to get at the facts, but since I have spent a good portion of my life fighting for civil liberties I do want this little correction of the record left by X X X and Mr. Stone.

Your anonymous X X X indicted jointly the FBI and the Civil Service Commission, indicating that the two organizations had asked various questions without specifying which asked which. I think it is less than fair to do that kind of writing. Surely the questions were not made up out of the head of the author. Surely it would have been easy for Mr. Stone, in looking over the author's files, to state categorically which questions were asked by the FBI and which by the Civil Service Commission. The author and Mr. Stone have declined to do so. This casts doubt on the entire indictment. But now, if you please, the editorial crime is compounded. Mr. Stone, carelessly and without looking at the record, refers to two court cases as being evidence of FBI violation of civil liberties, of which one had nothing whatsoever to do with the FBI and involved an entirely separate and independent branch of the government—to wit, the Alcohol Tax Bureau agents. It's pretty serious when a recognized Washington correspondent indicts the wrong bureau. MORRIS L. ERNST

New York, September 29

—and Mr. Stone

Dear Sirs: Ernst is right about the cases; the federal agents in one of them were Alcohol Tax Unit men, not FBI men. The two cases were linked by the court, and I was wrong. However, Ernst is wrong in saying, as he did in his original letter, "I am writing to let you know that I have yet to hear of a single proved case of violation of the basic civil liberties [by the FBI]. This is close to a miracle." For the other case, the one involving the Mine, Mill, and Smelters Workers' Union, the Anderson case, was one in which the Supreme Court not only rebuked the FBI for violating basic civil liberties but threw out a conviction on that ground. To paraphrase Ernst, "It's pretty serious when a recognized champion of civil liberties overlooks an important Supreme Court decision upholding civil liberties against federal agents, in one case agents of the FBI." Ernst will find the decision discussed in a Nation editorial printed last March 20. I would also refer him to an editorial in The Nation for March 23, 1940, discussing the FBI's Gestapo-style raids on Loyalist sympathizers in Detroit.

The answer on the FBI and Civil Service Commission questions is that both organizations have on their lists of investigators too many political ignoramuses, nurtured on the Hearst-Patterson-McCormick press, and both have asked the same kind of stupid question. No government employee is willing to risk his neck by questioning these men closely and then naming names to a liberal publication for transmission to the FBI via its defenders. I don't blame them. I. F. STONE

Incentive Pay

Dear Sirs: Official Washington hollers about a shortage of men. Nonsense. The "Plancor" projects are filled with make-work jobs tying up thousands of men.

Plancor is the term applied to a war project for which the government supplies the funds. The private corporation operates the plant; the products go to the government; the ownership of the plant will be decided after the war. For example Plancor 860 is a magnesium plant west of Lake Charles, Louisiana. Plancor 360 is the Butadiene refinery at Rose Bluff, Louisiana. Another is the Goodyear rubber concern near Pasadena, Texas. The total number of such war-plant projects is now in the high hundreds. Such projects as the Houston Shipyards, under the control of the United States Maritime Commission, though not called Plancors, are similarly organized.

The contract between the Houston Shipbuilding Corporation and the local painters' union prohibits the use of wide paint brushes in this shipyard where I work, although at Galveston, in a shipyard also owned by the Todd Drydock and Repair Corporation, wide brushes are used. The local union has made its own terms. Spray guns are used only on small articles of hardware which are later attached to the boat—pulley blocks, davits, cleats. No spray guns are used to paint hulls or girders or decks. Let the soldiers wait while workers make money!

Let nobody suppose that the criticisms of general lethargy are unfair, that such delays are inevitable. There is in practice in a few projects a plan which eliminates all this friction between labor and management. The constructive answer to be given all those who try to excuse delay is incentive pay. Incentive pay is the practice of employee participation, as a group, in group efficiency. Even such a person as Wilson, president of General Electric, has admitted that his company could not compete successfully with those companies that used the plan. Were incentive pay to be practiced in all war production, production would double and some phases might increase sixfold.

Why Shrink from the "League"?

Dear Sirs: Please explain to your readers the strange and absurd attitude of our statesmen and editors toward the League of Nations. Secretary Hull, in his recent address to the nation, referred to the International Court of Justice, which perhaps needs some remodeling, and fully recognized the inescapable necessity of world cooperation to maintain and enforce peace. Why, in the name of common sense, shrink from mentioning the League and its available machinery? Why not discuss candidly the inadequacies of that machinery and suggest amendments of the Covenant designed to render the League more effective than it proved to be at critical junctures; indeed, effective enough to deter gangsters from aggressive and predatory attacks upon foreign countries?

Mr. Churchill, in his Harvard address, spoke of the sad failure of the League and admitted the responsibility of America and European powers for that failure. But the blunders, now clearly perceived, can be avoided in the future. Revitalize the League, provide for the prompt use by its members of overwhelming force against a would-be aggressor, repeal the rule of unanimity as a condition of any action by the League, and you have the collective security now seen to be essential if war is really to be outlawed. Here, then, is the line of least resistance. Why do not the sincere friends of collective security and peace urge this eminently practical course? Why are they palsied by the uncritical talk of the "failure" of the League?

By the way, our own unrealistic and sentimental liberals, who rejected the League because of the horrendous element of compulsion it envisaged, might now put on sackcloth and ashes and advocate more compulsion rather than less in anti-war and security covenants. Sincerity and honesty dictate such confession of sin and conversion to sanity and rationality.

Please, Nation editors, open your columns to a discussion of the objections, if there are any worthy of consideration, to the revitalization of the League and complete restoration of the agencies it established and maintained. If the objections are shallow and fallacious, then come out boldly for the League and discourage the continued use of misty and obscure references to world cooperation and world organization in the interest of permanent peace.

Teachers and Wages

Dear Sirs: The letter of Edgar B. Wesley in your issue of August 28 stirred my fighting blood when he advocated higher salaries for teachers. I have in mind salaries for teachers in rural schools in the Midwest. Let me tell a story.

Something like six or more years ago I attended a district convention of the first district of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union held in the chapel of the University of South Dakota at Vermillion. The president of the university had been requested to give an address, which was expected to be on cooperation but turned out to be on education, a subject on which he was better prepared to speak.

His speech was a very able one; it included an appeal for higher salaries for teachers. At its conclusion a young farmer sitting near me said if farmers had better prices for their produce they could pay better salaries to teachers. I raised a hand for permission to ask a question: granted. "In our two-room village school we have a teacher who is enthusiastic about teaching temperance. A sixth-grade boy once said in my hearing that the teacher had told his class that she 'personally knew Democrats who drank beer.' " I could say no more till the roar of laughter from that crowd of farmers had died away; even the president laughed till his face was red, his eyes filled with tears. Then I asked how big a salary that teacher should receive; he answered, "Doubtless there are many teachers who would be overpaid at nothing a month."

He was right; I recall the young woman from a nearby big city of Iowa called to fill a vacancy in one of our leading rural schools who had not one thing on her desk when I visited her school but a copy of the Red Book magazine; when I remonstrated she explained there was an excellent article on physiology in the back. I suggested she could find all such material she could use in her textbooks. By an accident she was forced to resign, and her place was taken by a leading pupil of our own county-seat high school, the only replacement available.

We need professional teachers, not "high-school kids"—girls who are earning money for attractive clothes and make-up until they can marry or young men who are stopping off a year to earn money for further study in a chosen line. All honor to the young girls who are doing fine work in the schoolroom, whose enthusiasm and devotion I can never forget.

I cannot be lacking in sympathy for teachers since I was called to teach young children at fifteen years of age, salary $12, back in the '70's. In the later '80's and '90's I envied the teachers getting $40, for as farm wife and mother I sold eggs as low as four cents a dozen, June butter, seven to eight cents. Before the deflation of 1920 the larger schools in our county were paying $165—$165 for nine-month terms. Wages did not fall much below that till the great depression.

I have no theories to offer; I have long been out of school work; I do understand the importance and truth of Mr. Wesley's position regarding the teaching of history and civics, the latter including principles as well as mere forms of government.

The Shape of Things

THE RED ARMY'S SUCCESSFUL BREACHING of the Dnieper line is a convincing demonstration both of its tremendous élan and of brilliant organization and leadership. When the Germans retired on this line in good order they took up a defensive position which, as Donald W. Mitchell points out on another page, they had every incentive to hold. And they had reason to expect a pause enabling them to catch their breaths if only because the Russians, after advancing rapidly over a huge area of twice-scorched earth, might reasonably have been expected to spend many weeks in improving their communications before resuming the offensive. However, after a very brief lull, the Germans found themselves being hit, and hit hard, in many different parts of the line. Russian bridgeheads established on both sides of Kiev suggested that the recapture of that great city was a primary objective. But then came a furious attack on Melitopol, near the Sea of Azov, which was captured after many days of terrific fighting, accompanied by the driving of a wedge deep into the enemy lines north and east of the great Dnieper dam. As a result the one German line of retreat from the Crimea is endangered and a Russian victory comparable to Stalingrad in the making.

ON HIS RETURN TO ITALY AFTER MANY years of exile, Count Sforza declared that he had come back as a private citizen whose only interest was in helping to win the war against Germany. Until that goal was reached he would not, he said, proclaim for any party nor would he join the Badoglio or any other government not chosen by the Italian people. It seems probable that he will have great difficulty in adhering to this self-denying course. Strong pressures, we expect, will be used to persuade him to lend his prestige to the Badoglio government, which badly needs some respectable liberal trimmings. There have even been suggestions that he might be appointed Prime Minister and Badoglio relegated to the position of War Minister or Commander-in-Chief. If he resists these pressures—and we would expect him to unless he is given full power to choose his associates in the government—he is likely to be drawn toward the Partito d'Azione (Action Party) which, uniting a large number of democratic groups, is claiming him as its leader. Although the Anglo-American authorities appear to believe that Italy can remain a political vacuum until the war is over it is obvious that, even if the present regime is accepted as a military expedient, preparation must be made for the promised day when Italians can once again choose their own government.

POLITICAL DISCUSSION AND AGITATION IN Italy was growing even before the fall of Mussolini but it had to stay underground. If the Badoglio government attempts to suppress it it will continue underground. Will the Allied Military Mission, which is the de facto power behind the throne, then sanction the use of Gestapo-like methods to stamp it out? The issue may be brought to a head by the arrest of three prominent liberals in Apulia for issuing a clandestine newspaper. Since the only authorized journal is the official government sheet, no other method of disseminating their views was open to them. According to Herbert L. Matthews, the New York Times correspondent, neither the Badoglio government nor the Allied Military Mission is eager to accept responsibility for this action, which is laid at the door of a local authority. But obviously this kind of excuse will hold water only if the men are immediately released. As we cannot believe that the Allies will, in fact, permit freedom of discussion to be fought by terror, they will be compelled to insist either that the Badoglio government turn a blind eye to "illegal" political activities or that it remove a curb which cannot be enforced or defended.

THE ARGENTINE COLONELS WHO, AS MANUEL Seoane pointed out in The Nation of October 16, are the power behind the Ramirez regime, appear to be as profoundly stupid as they are reactionary. If they had seized the opportunity, when they overthrew the Castillo government, to join with the United Nations they could have pursued their program of domestic fascism with no questions asked. After all, neither the State Department nor the British Foreign Office has been unduly fussy about the democratic credentials of nations which elected to fight the Axis. Even if Argentina's part in the war had been little more than nominal, it would probably have obtained the arms which its military so eagerly desire to give it equality with Brazil. But the Colonels were emotionally tied to the Axis and had no desire to hasten the break. So the government attempted to get a promise of arms from Washington without committing itself. The result was a snub which made it impossible for Ramirez to end the neutrality policy without appearing to yield to United States pressure and so "losing face." The Cabinet split on the issue, and the proponents of adherence to the United Nations resigned. Colonel Alberto Gilbert, who is said to have given a pledge that there would be no break with the Axis so long as he was in the Cabinet, has been promoted from Minister of the Interior to Minister of Foreign Affairs, and a notorious anti-Semite has been made Minister of Justice. These moves have not strengthened the government's prestige, and public criticism is growing bolder despite stringent censorship and concentration camps. A manifesto signed by 150 leading citizens has called for "effective democracy" and "loyal fulfilment of international obligations." All signatories holding public positions have been dismissed, but this revengeful step has only led to new protests and increased agitation.

ONCE MORE THE PRESIDENT HAS TAKEN THE helm at a critical moment. As in the gloomy days of last June when the farm bloc was riding high in Congress, he has served notice that the present price line must be held and has presented a vigorous defense for subsidies as the most effective way of holding it. As the President has pointed out, the farmers have been getting subsidies for a decade, and no one has suffered any of the dire consequences predicted by the farm-bloc leaders. The recent action of the House Banking Committee terminating most subsidies on December 31, if upheld in Congress, would destroy all possibility of maintaining the present OPA ceilings and intensify labor's growing discontent. In an effort to hold off labor's demands until he has won his subsidy fight, the President held a long conference last week with the leaders of the A. F. of L., the C. I. O., and the railway brotherhoods. Taking account of criticism which has been leveled at the cost-of-living index prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, Mr. Roosevelt agreed to have a committee appointed to check its adequacy; he did not, however, consent to a revision of the Little Steel formula under present conditions. The President has shown statesmanship in his initial efforts to stave off disaster, but he will need the support of every patriotic citizen if he is once more to be successful.

VICE-PRESIDENT WALLACE APPARENTLY PUT his finger on an extremely sore point when he denounced railway and transportation monopolies in his recent speech at Dallas. Railway spokesmen and conservative newspapers have gone to great lengths to describe the charges as "old stuff" that have been "answered time after time." Their replies have, however, scarcely touched Mr. Wallace's main allegations, which were: (1) that discriminatory rates are keeping the South and West in a colonial status; (2) that newer forms of transportation are being brought under monopoly control; and (3) that monopolistic conditions in transportation are fostering monopolies in industry. On the question of rates, Mr. Wallace advanced a number of specific examples to show how Southern and Western industry is handicapped in competition with similar industries in the North and East. The railways do not deny the accuracy of Wallace's figures; they seek refuge in the fact that all rates must be reviewed by the Interstate Commerce Commission—a body which has seldom distinguished itself by zeal or independence in dealing with this admittedly thorny question. Many of Mr. Wallace's hearers could probably have contributed from first-hand experience supplementary data to prove his final contention regarding the effectiveness of transportation in fostering other monopolies. For nearly every Texan is aware of the decisive role of the railways in the struggle between the great oil companies and the independents. Politically, the speech was an extraordinarily astute one —a fitting answer to those who have been trying to count Mr. Wallace out for 1944.

FOES OF THE FEDERAL-AID-TO-EDUCATION bill succeeded in frustrating ten years of effort to equalize educational opportunity in the United States by a last-minute trick of unusually knavish character. Until the last two hours of debate it seemed certain that the bill providing $300,000,000 annually to pay increased salaries for teachers and otherwise strengthen education in the poorer states by federal assistance would be enacted with the support of the Southern Democrats whose states would be the chief beneficiaries. But Senator Langer, with the urgent backing of Senator Taft—chief opponent of the bill—threw the Senate into confusion by introducing an amendment forbidding racial discrimination in the administration not only of the federal funds but also of the state funds they would supplement. Senator Langer insisted that his amendment was essential for the protection of Negro rights and had the backing of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Actually, the N.A.A.C.P. had sent a telegram to the Senate opposing such an amendment, but the maneuver succeeded. Enough Senators favoring equal rights for Negroes joined the opponents of the bill to pass the amendment forty to thirty-seven. Thereupon the Southern Democrats joined with the bill's foes to scuttle the measure altogether. Incidentally, Senator Taft, who was chiefly responsible for the amendment that would have throttled all control by the states over their educational funds was chairman of the committee which drafted the states' rights declaration at the recent Mackinac Island conference. Senator Taft's assertion that "no one can claim that the amount of money Ohio spends on students is not sufficient for an adequate education" is also interesting in view of the fact that all four of Taft's sons were sent out of the state to receive their education in private schools.

FOR TWENTY YEARS CZECHOSLOVAKIA served as a citadel of enlightenment in an area bristling with reaction and aggressive nationalism. For five years Czechoslovakia has been a symbol of implacable resistance. Betrayed by its friends and overrun by the enemy, the Czech nation has neither yielded to despair nor accepted the terms of the conqueror. It has fought back within its own borders, in the armies of its allies, in its own courageous heart. The Czechs are an admirable people, and on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Czechoslovak Republic they deserve not only homage but a pledge of atonement by the whole democratic world.

A SENATE investigation into lend-lease which was really anxious to get at the facts might prove very useful. It could help to make the public better informed about the objectives of the lend-lease agreements with our allies and give some much-needed publicity to the intangible as well as the tangible returns which it is bringing us. It could inquire judicially into many rumors that now pervade and poison the atmosphere of Washington. Have shipments of goods been used for purposes which do not contribute to the war effort? Have our deliveries matched our commitments? Have materials or equipment been held back to satisfy private interests in this country? Has there been waste, inefficiency, or corruption in the administration of lend-lease? Such matters are the legitimate province of the legislative watchdog, provided its inquiries are carried out in a judicial, responsible, and generous spirit.

But who can hope that an investigation in which Senator Gerald P. Nye appears scheduled to play a leading part will be imbued with such a spirit? Nye has been opposed to lend-lease from the beginning, and he has repeatedly made it clear that, while he grudgingly accepts the fact that we are at war with Germany and Japan, his personal battle is against Britain and Russia.

Moreover, the investigation has been launched under cover of carping criticism and unworthy suspicion. Its original author was Senator Hugh Butler of Nebraska, who has expressed his own sentiments about lend-lease by calling it "the most colossal dole of all time." It has of course had the support of Senator Burton K. Wheeler, who prejudged the issue by declaring, "The giving away of taxpayers' money lavishly to every Tom, Dick, and Harry who wants it and asks for it is little less than criminal."

Another source of inspiration was the recent statement by Senator Allen J. Ellender of Louisiana, who sought to prove statistically that "we have been the sucker in the nth degree." Even if his figures had been accurate, they were wholly irrelevant, for in making comparisons between American war expenditures and debts and those of our allies he failed to take into account differences in population, resources, or national wealth. One of his complaints, for instance, was that American lend-lease expenditure of $1,250,000,000 monthly totaled on an annual basis only $3,000,000,000 less than the whole British yearly war bill. In this case he seems to have confused appropriations with actual expenditures, for total United States lend-lease shipments to all recipients up to June 30 of this year amounted to only $4,262,468,000.

In any case lend-lease cannot be discussed in bookkeeping terms except on the premises of the "iso-nationalists." Their basic assumption is that this war is not our war but a struggle we are waging solely for the sake of foreign nations who are certain to prove ungrateful. The fact that Britain and Russia held off the enemy and gave us time to prepare means nothing to them. Only dollars and cents count.

Is it not time these cash-register views were vigorously repudiated? Is it not time that this picture of Uncle Sam as a noble and naive philanthropist turning out his pockets for the sake of swindling bums was scrapped? Let us remember the parable of the widow's mite. When America has contributed to the common cause as great a proportion of its resources as have its allies, when its standard of living has been reduced in the same degree as theirs, when its sacrifice of lives is on a similar scale —then it will be time enough to cast up accounts.

G.O.P. Tax Policy

THE danger of a complete home-front débâcle in the vital struggle against inflation must be regarded as imminent as a result of the open revolt of House and Senate Republicans against any tax program that is at all adequate. If we hold to the military analogy, the action of the Republicans can only be described as desertion under fire. In its eagerness to find a political issue that would embarrass the Democrats in 1944, the Republican Party appears to have thrown aside not only caution but all consideration for the well-being of the American people. Not content with having endangered the entire price-control mechanism by advocating higher prices for farmers while opposing subsidies, the Congressional Republicans would now abandon the key to anti-inflation defenses—the reabsorption of excess buying power through taxation.

We need not repeat at this time the basic economic reasons why higher taxes are essential. Secretary Morgenthau and Director of Economic Stabilization Vinson have described the threat of inflation to the Ways and Means Committee of the House as clearly as it is humanly possible to do so. The President has repeatedly warned Congress that all other anti-inflation measures must fail if taxes are not increased. We cannot believe that the Republican leadership is so dim of understanding that it is unable to follow the simple arithmetical calculations that point inescapably to inflation if the excess consumer buying power is not absorbed. Yet in a minority statement issued by Representative Knutson of Minnesota, the Republicans oppose a further tax increase on the ground that it would bring about a liquidation of the middle class and would be "inflationary." Such an increase, they declare, would "inevitably lead to a demand for higher wages to meet the increased tax burden."

At first glance this statement is just plausible enough to make it an effective, if thoroughly dishonest, piece of demagoguery. It is dishonest because Secretary Morgenthau presented the committee with figures showing that the American public, chiefly the middle class, will have roughly $42 billion in excess spending power left after taxes and after buying all the goods that can be produced in war time. The figures check closely with estimates made by competent non-partisan agencies. Even more patently dishonest is the argument that higher taxes will cause demands for higher wages. The essence of the Treasury's tax proposals lay in the fact that they did not increase the burden on the wage-earners in the lowest bracket—those earning $2,000 a year and under. Instead, the principal burden would fall on those with incomes ranging between $5,000 and $25,000 a year—which is precisely the group that possesses the bulk of the $42 billion excess spending power. When Mr. Knutson referred to the possibility of increased taxes leading to demands for higher wages, he doubtless had in mind the sharp warning of President Murray of the C. I. O. that labor would insist on a wage rise to offset the impact of a sales tax. This merely bears out our contention that the sales tax is peculiarly ineffective as an anti-inflation weapon because it fails to tap the real sources of excess income while placing a heavy burden on those least able to bear it.

The Republican demand that the President drop his war duties and "forthwith proceed to set governmental finances in order by effecting needed economies . . . which would obviate the necessity for . . . taxes" is not meant to be taken too seriously. It is always good politics to call for economy just before an election, particularly if it is known that such economies cannot be achieved by the party in power. We sympathize of course with the desire to eliminate all unnecessary waste in the war effort. But the practical possibilities of reducing expenditures at this time, regardless of administration, are insignificant as compared with the need for mopping up the surplus spending power which is already in people's pockets. This basic fact must be grasped not only by members of Congress but by the people back home.

The Moscow Conference

TWO months ago an experienced European statesman in London said to me: "First a second front. After that the other problems will be easy to solve. Without that nothing can be solved." He scouted the notion that second-front talk was primarily for propaganda or bargaining purposes. "The demand for a second front is a demand that the Western powers fight Hitler as totally and fiercely as Russia is doing. It is what it appears at face value."

"But what is the use," I asked, "of pressing a demand when you know the answer? Stalin had been kept informed of Allied military plans. If a second front has been decided upon for this autumn, it will happen without any further pressure. If it is not scheduled, it will not happen. So the demand must be either propaganda or rhetoric. And Russian diplomacy doesn't go in for rhetoric. It seems to me that the Russians are reminding the world, deliberately and for the record, that they have carried the major load for two years. That record will be useful when an accounting comes."

"No," he said, "I assure you the thing is both more and less simple than that. The Russians are suspicious to begin with. They never for one hour forget that the Western powers hoped to divert Hitler's aggression against them. They are under no illusions about the sentiments they inspire in important quarters in your great country. They suspect that even now Britain and the United States are not unwilling to let Russian blood flow —to defeat Hitler as far as possible by Russian arms. In any case they think both nations are too slow, too fearful of risk, more anxious to save the lives of their own troops than to end the war quickly. And it infuriates them to have Sicily held up in the press as a 'second front.' They look upon Allied operations there as a small side-show made possible by their overwhelming offensive in the East. One Russian officer here in London said a rather brutal thing the other day. But it's graphic. He said, 'Allied tanks in Sicily are fueled with the blood of Russian soldiers.' The agony of Russia, its ten million dead, its razed towns and factories, must be taken into account when you try to analyze the demand for a second front.

"But the idea I wanted to give you," he said, "is that a front in Western Europe—a major offensive against Hitler—has become for Russia a profound test of Allied capacity and good faith. If it happens, Stalin will be ready to sit down at a table with the rest of them. Until it happens—well, he may agree to a conference, but it will be for one purpose; to demand a second front."

When these words were spoken, the Quebec conference was still going on and the British press was demanding a three-power meeting without further delay. Now the foreign ministers of the three nations are conferring, and the first item on the Russian agenda laid before the first session of the Moscow conference was, we are told, the question of a second front. According to Anne O'Hare McCormick, this subject was, in fact, dealt with ahead of those proposed by the other delegates.

Was a new promise made by Messrs. Hull and Eden and accepted, in spite of past disappointments, by Mr. Molotoff? If so, then the other pressing problems stand a better chance of satisfactory solution. For the Russians will approach them with confidence instead of suspicion and resentment. The first of these is the political problem that faces the great powers in the liberated countries of Europe. The second, firmly linked to it, is the problem of organizing security. If Russia follows its own interests, and its own lead, it will insist upon new methods of dealing with the internal political situation in each country. With admirable consistency, the Soviet Government has given encouragement and, where possible, open support to the most vigorous anti-Axis elements all over Europe. Where the United States and Britain have signally failed to use the underground movements, particularly in the satellite and Axis countries, Russia has reached in and worked with them. The tactic of attempting to subvert and use Axis supporters has never appealed to the Russians. They see their national security best protected by a Europe in which popular governments predominate. They fear, and with good reason, a continent ruled by Francos and Pétains. Just once has the Soviet government deviated from its support of the democratic forces: when it joined with Britain and America in accepting as a co-belligerent the present Italian regime. Whether this move was an overture to its Allies on the eve of the conference, or whether Stalin believes that military ends will be served by the agreement with Badoglio, one cannot say. But in view of the record of the Soviet Union, it seems safe to assume that even while Stalin formally acquiesces in the status quo, he is helping prepare the way for its ultimate collapse.

In any case the hope of a workable system of collective security in Europe waits upon the overthrow of the reactionary centers of power—whether they derive their authority from Hitler or from the invading Allies. This Russia knows. But it is hard to believe that Mr. Hull, who has strongly and even intemperately defended every act of the State Department in these matters, will be able to meet the more realistic desires of his Russian colleagues.

If he fails to do so, the conference might as well adjourn. For even the most unqualified agreements for postwar cooperation will collapse in the face of a Europe which feels itself betrayed by the very powers that promised its liberation. No Badoglio governments will survive an Allied victory unless Allied arms are used to defend them. And a security system erected on foundations shaken with revolt and civil war is not worth concocting.

With the Senate still haggling over the vague clauses of the Connally resolution, Mr. Hull is in no position to commit this country to any definite program of collective action. At most he can express the views of the Administration. Perhaps this is not as unfortunate as it appears on the surface. Much ground will have to be cleared, the accumulated trash of appeasement and reaction will have to be gathered up and thrown away, before collective security can amount to anything more than a pious wish. And Europe is fed up with America's pious wishes. F. K.

Diary of the Future

BY VERNON BARTLETT

1. Vacuum in Germany

THIS diary is a rash attempt to write history before it has happened. After the collapse of Germany there will be many opportunities for my less friendly readers to write in to tell me that my forecasts have been disproved. It will be easy to be wise after the event—as I put down these words I have no idea when or where the Allied attack will be made. But in recording these imaginary events from the moment of the collapse of Germany I have tried to avoid anything so sensational as to be improbable. The happenings are depressing; so they will be, unless we in the great democracies prove worthy of our system of government. They constitute a cautionary tale.

Tomorrow always comes. We are preparing for it, making it, by every one of our actions today. The United States prepared for Pearl Harbor by its rejection of the League of Nations. Great Britain prepared for Dunkirk by its excuses in Geneva for Japan's attack on Manchuria in 1931 and 1932. Men in every country who talked glibly about "freedom" and "democracy" prepared for fascism by their selfish and lazy interpretation of those words. I cannot do better than quote a sentence by Philip Gribble: "Today is yesterday's effect and tomorrow's cause, and not merely yesterday's future and tomorrow's history."

June 30. Gerald Barry, editor of the News Chronicle, rang me up at three this morning. Willy Forrest, cabling from G. H. Q., has confirmed a midnight report from Berne that the German army in southern Austria has surrendered. The B. B. C. 7 a. m. news merely announced that the Allied forces had crossed the Loibl Pass and two other passes over the Karawanken Alps and had captured Klagenfurt. In other sectors there is tough German resistance.

A day of wild rumors. The Cabinet met twice. It appears that the Allies are hesitating to announce the news, for they don't yet know how much attention to pay to this army surrender and whether it has taken place in agreement with the German Supreme Command. The Prime Minister's car was stopped by a large crowd in Whitehall and he stood on the running-board, gave the V sign for victory, and promised that there would be good news within the next forty-eight hours.

Stayed late at the office. Reports from all over the place about serious rioting in Vienna, with the police refusing to fire on the crowds.

July 1. The 7 a. m. news bulletin contained a special announcement urging everybody to listen to the 1 p. m. news, when the Prime Minister would broadcast. Secret session of the House of Commons, at which we were given the contents of this broadcast. Allied troops are advancing into Austria and are meeting with no resistance. One German corps commander and five divisional commanders have surrendered. No news has been received from German G. H. Q., but Dr. Goebbels broadcast an impassioned appeal to workers and civil servants to carry on. There must not be another "stab in the back," he urged, and added that the German armies were still fighting successfully except in Austria, where some units, consisting of cowards and traitors, had surrendered.

The P. M.'s broadcast insisted that the German surrender was to be expected within a few hours; that when it came, it must be unconditional; that the armies of the United Nations would march victoriously through Berlin; that work must go on in our factories and offices with greater energy than ever; that the time was drawing near when we should have the opportunity of showing our gratitude to the United States by hastening the defeat of its principal enemy, Japan; and that we must not forget the humiliations we had suffered in Hongkong, Malaya, Burma, and Singapore.

The appeal to go back to work was not very successful. All traffic had to be diverted this evening from the Piccadilly district. Rain helped to prevent much in the way of rowdyism, but I saw a good many men in Allied uniforms being carried across Leicester Square.

July 2. Apparently there's some dispute as to whether we should march into Germany as soon as we can or whether we should try to delay things until there's been a good deal of the inevitable blood-letting, both inside Germany and in the occupied countries. Hundreds or thousands of Nazis and dozens or hundreds of Quislings will be murdered by the people they have oppressed, and we don't want to interfere except, perhaps, to take into custody the more notorious war criminals. Even in their case, if some of them were to be shot by their own compatriots we should be relieved of a very difficult problem. But if troops are on the spot, they must almost inevitably maintain order. Therefore the British Cabinet is supposed to want days or even weeks to elapse before our men march into Berlin, and the generals are supposed to want to march there without delay. There is talk of a not very satisfactory compromise—small detachments will take over government offices and so on, but will remain as inconspicuous as possible, especially when there's any shooting going on. This seems weak and undignified, but it's thought to be the most sensible solution.

July 3. The end is very near. Revolts in France, Poland, and other occupied countries. According to Swiss reports, the German soldiers in many French towns did nothing to stop the rioting. In Paris there has been some shooting. In Brussels many Germans, still in uniform, tried to join up with a Flemish procession marching along the Rue de la Loi carrying anti-German banners. A "Free Belgian" broadcasting station, using the wave length of the regular Brussels station, suddenly began broadcasting tonight. It stated that all Germans had disappeared from the streets, and that the German military governor had appealed to the burgomaster for protection. That nasty little Rexist leader, Léon Degrelle, has been shot, but the wound is not serious. No hospital in Brussels wanted to take him in.

A meeting of the United Nations governments established in London was called at St. James's Palace to discuss the distribution of supplies in Europe. Eden in the chair. Each government naturally very anxious to have the distribution in its own hands, in order to increase its chance of remaining in power. All this, of course, has been argued out before, and the British and American delegates—especially the latter—were not at all enthusiastic. They argued that speed and efficiency were for the time being more important than politics. Am told the meeting was very noisy. The Soviet ambassador supported Anglo-American opposition to the smaller powers but left the impression that he did so because his government wished to help leaders of the resistance movements in the occupied countries rather than the governments in exile.

July 4. The situation inside Germany seems to be chaotic. In places, especially on the eastern front, the army is still fighting vigorously, but Allied troops have taken over Vienna and armored cars are reported to have advanced up the Danube as far as Linz. The civil administration is crumbling. Something very like the Soldiers' and Workers' Councils of the last few days of the last war have been established in Hamburg and various cities of the Ruhr. Our aircraft have been on very widespread sweeps over Germany and have met with practically no antiaircraft fire. Dropped millions of leaflets telling the people to stop the war.

July 5. Fourteen solid hours of debate in the House of Commons, and, even so, many of us never had a chance to put forward our own particular solutions of the problems of peace. The Prime Minister, of course, had a terrific welcome, and nobody protested when people in the public gallery broke all the rules by clapping and cheering. He even looked up and with a broad grin on his face waved his bundle of papers at them.

In the early part of his speech, when he was talking about the way the support of Parliament had given the government strength throughout the difficult years since that day in 1940 when it had been promised toil, blood, tears, and sweat, I thought he was going to break down. But he turned quickly to practical matters. He warned us that we must not expect an immediate relaxation of food or other restrictions, and that some rationed foods might even have to be cut down for the time being, since the needs of the occupied countries of Europe would be so urgent. Then he announced that some categories of married men with families—especially those with long service—and key men for peace-time industries would at once be demobilized. There was so much discussion of this in the debate, so much rejoicing about it, that inevitably many Americans will conclude that we aren't sufficiently determined to play our full part in defeating Japan.

July 6. German divisions surrendering all over the place. Brigadier Geoffrey Neville, who has had to tell the press a good many depressing things at his daily conferences at the Ministry of Information during the last few years, let himself go this morning. Said that the prisoners now numbered well over a quarter of a million. The Russians are making great progress in their northern and central sectors.

Still no word from the German Supreme Command or from Hitler. Not even an appeal to go on fighting. The Swedish legation has a dispatch that none of the really important generals will make himself hated by asking for and accepting our terms. Also that crowds have been marching down the Wilhelmstrasse in Berlin yelling for peace.

July 7. Allied troops are in Munich and Frankfurt. Millions of leaflets have been dropped in Berlin warning the people that the Allies will be there within a few days, promising them that they will not be harmed if they obey our orders at once, but threatening death to anybody who is subsequently convicted of aiding any Nazi, of the rank of Gauleiter upward, to escape. Saw Bill Shirer in Fleet Street. He is just off to Munich for the Columbia Broadcasting System.

July 8. The Munich and Frankfurt jobs were done by air-borne divisions. A bunch of men were also landed at Salzburg, and advanced on Hitler's home just outside Berchtesgaden. They met with no resistance of any kind, but they found the famous bronze doors of Hitler's hideout closed and were compelled to blow them up. The whole villa was empty. In Hitler's large study papers were scattered over the floor, and many had been burnt in the stove.

An awkward article in the Daily Worker saying that the Anglo-American desire to get to Berlin as soon as possible is due above all to the desire to get there before the Russians.

July 9. Hitler is dead. He was apparently flying to Spain or South America, and something must have gone wrong with the aircraft. It tried to land at Cologne, but the airfield was being so heavily plastered by American bombers that the pilot turned back and made a forced landing in a large field near Bochum. Although Hitler had shaved off his moustache, he was recognized by some of the workers who came to the rescue. They grabbed him, shot the pilot who tried to defend him, and after a short debate dragged him off to their works and threw him into a great caldron of molten metal. Not very nice, but quite nice enough for a man who has brought unparalleled misery to the world.

There's a sense of relief that he has been dealt with by his own people. It saves the business of a trial in which a mean criminal might have become a national martyr. Another Swedish report is that Göring has committed suicide in front of the memorial to his first wife at Karinhall. Many thousands of war criminals are to be sent to Sachsenhausen and other concentration camps, but I hear tonight that the former inhabitants are not automatically to be set at liberty. They are to be held by the orders of AMG. Why? Apparently they might not be "politically safe." This is not by any means the only indication of reaction. The Daily Worker published this morning an angry and obviously inspired article claiming that the Soviet government has not been consulted about the conditions of the occupation of Germany. The Russians, who have their own bunch of "Free Germans," even less representative than our own, are reported to be advancing at great speed westward into Poland. People in London are greatly worried lest there should be incidents between them and the provisional Polish government, which is getting ready to fly back to Warsaw.

July 11. Excellent broadcast from Bill Shirer in Munich, relayed by the British Broadcasting Corporation. He described the taking over of official buildings. Crowds had been apathetic or, in some cases, welcoming. When the flags of the United Nations were hoisted over the building where Hitler, Mussolini, Chamberlain, and Daladier had signed the Munich agreement to dismember Czechoslovakia, one man shouted "Heil Hitler!" and was lynched by the crowd before Allied soldiers could reach him. In the working-class districts some red flags appeared, and Shirer described how he saw some youths chalking up the letters K. P. D. (German Communist Party) on the walls of the royal palace.

He mentioned the complications caused by the fact that we have no United Nations flag. There seems to be no agreement as to which flag is to be hoisted first, how many of them are to be flown, and how room is to be found for the flags of all the United Nations. Besides, one flag would help to show the Germans how they have united the world against them.

July 12. Goebbels has been arrested in Frankfurt. He had given a "pep talk" there a few hours before the air-borne division arrived, and was taken by surprise. The head porter at the hotel wanted to give him up to the Allies and suggested to other members of the staff that they should lock him in his rooms. One waiter told some officers with Goebbels, who shot the head porter out of hand. This so enraged other members of the hotel personnel that two of them followed Goebbels to a private house where he hoped to hide for a few days and others went to warn British officers. The house was surrounded, and Goebbels was captured without the firing of a single shot.

July 14. The Czechoslovak government is back in Prague. President Benes arrived by air and drove in an open car through the Vaclavske Namesti and across the Charles Bridge to the Hradschin Castle. Extraordinary scenes of enthusiasm. I believe the Norwegians, with King Haakon, are now somewhere in their own country, but the moment has not yet arrived for them to come out into the open. Went round to see the Belgian Minister of Information and gained the impression that they are on the point of leaving. He told me that there has been a lot of shooting in Antwerp, and that the Germans have set up machine-guns all the way down the Place de Meir.

There won't be an all-inclusive Allied military occupation of Germany. It will be almost entirely an Anglo-American job, as the European Allies will need their national contingents in their own countries, at least during the first few weeks. At the most, there will be one or two "token" contingents.

Disquieting dispatches from Washington in the morning's papers. There was a very angry debate yesterday in the House of Representatives, organized by the same old group of diehards and isolationists. The Prime Minister's speech in the House of Commons is being interpreted, very unfairly, as an indication that the British are going to slacken off in their efforts against Japan. Geoffrey Parsons has sent a long dispatch to the Herald Tribune explaining how natural it is that we in Britain should rejoice that the danger of German bombs has been removed, but he fears the influence of the strong German groups in America. Ed Murrow of the C. B. S. says the British government's decision to demobilize certain groups from the army has created the worst possible impression in America, although the Administration in Washington knew of the plan in advance and approved of it, especially in view of the fact that we are now expected to increase our production in order to help in sending urgent supplies to Europe. It is said that the Cabinet is very worried by the violence of this attack in Congress, which is attributed only in part to the old desire to use anti-British or any other prejudice as a stick with which to beat the President.

July 15. The Prime Minister was asked in the House of Commons about peace negotiations. He said that he was in consultation with Washington and Moscow and that a preliminary conference would be held as soon as possible. He could not yet say when and where, which is fairly obvious since Germany still has not surrendered. He made it clear that the final peace would not be negotiated for a long time anyhow—presumably after the defeat of the Japanese.

Heard another broadcast by Bill Shirer. There seems to be a kind of vacuum in Germany—nobody, in uniform or out of it, takes any responsibility. Some people had expected that the German General Staff would ask for terms without delay in order to avoid serious fighting on German soil. But it now looks as though the generals weren't going to do anything so definite. Like old soldiers in the song, they simply fade away. In some sectors there's still stiff fighting in progress, but in others our motorized divisions advance as they please. If it goes on like this, the problem of establishing order again is going to be very difficult. Shirer pointed out that after the last war twenty-five Americans were able to organize the distribution of a million meals a day, but to do that the civil administration must still be working efficiently. It isn't, at any rate in Munich, Augsburg, and other cities he has visited.

Hitler Fights for Time

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

IN THE American Civil War the tide turned in 1863 at Gettysburg and Vicksburg. But the South kept up a stubborn and terribly expensive struggle for nearly two more years, hoping that aid from some unforeseen source would prevent complete defeat or that its exhausted foe would give up the fight short of victory. Germany today is in the position of the South some eighty years ago. Stalingrad, Alamein, the Caucasus, Tunisia, Sicily, the air war and the U-boat losses have sapped its strength and made victory a forlorn hope. But the Nazis still command huge, well-disciplined land armies, can provide able leadership, and can counterattack with a good deal of force in many sectors. They can also hope that war weariness or division among their enemies will let them escape final defeat. Meanwhile, in the Nazis' attempt to hold the Dnieper line, in their improved defenses against air raids, and in their renewal of the U-boat struggle can be seen frantic efforts to prevent disaster.

Both in the air and at sea the Germans are now employing recently improved techniques. The latest torpedoes with their use of magnetic and acoustic principles and their larger load of explosives are a much more formidable weapon than those manufactured earlier in the war. From the limited information available regarding them it is clear that they inflict extremely heavy losses on convoys when used by large U-boat packs.

Nevertheless, at this stage the new weapon represents nothing more than a nuisance to the United Nations. Had it been used a year or even six months ago it might have altered the outcome of the war. But the U-boats' inability during the earlier months of 1943 to sink as many ships as were being built has enabled us to accumulate a huge pool of shipping for offensives in various parts of the globe. During the months of August and September 3,350,000 tons were added from our shipyards alone and losses were among the lowest of the year. To stop offensives in the near future the enemy's U-boats must not only destroy as much tonnage as is now being turned out but cut into the substantial backlog of shipping completed in previous months.

Entirely aside from the output of American yards, there is excellent reason to believe that this cannot be done. Anti-submarine measures have for some time been extremely effective. For fully five months the number of U-boats lost has exceeded the probable number of completions in spite of the fact that submarine activity has been at low ebb. Even Goebbels has admitted this unsatisfactory condition of affairs. While stories of deteriorating discipline and morale among U-boat crews have sometimes been planted by the Germans themselves, reports of such incidents from Swedish sources have been remarkably persistent of late. Since the situation is similar to that which brought a breakdown of morale among German submarine crews in the last war, it is quite likely that the reports are correct.

In the air war over Western Europe tactics are also in a state of flux. After a September lull large-scale bombing assaults have been resumed by both the R. A. F. and the A. A. F. American planes have recently played a larger role, and have been used to some extent in night as well as day operations. In proportion to the tonnage of bombs dropped, American precision work has probably done greater damage than the British type of attack. But American losses have also been proportionately greater. Against improved defense by fighter planes—whose production does not seem to have been affected—and heavier anti-aircraft fire the Fortress has not been able to maintain its earlier margin of safety, and even the use of escorting Thunderbolts has not prevented heavy casualties. The knocking out of important ball-bearing factories and the destruction of more than 100 German fighters in one raid is a valuable achievement, but the loss of sixty Fortresses with their well-trained crews, plus many of their escorts, is no light price to pay. Larger bombers now coming off the production lines and long-range escort planes may restore our earlier advantage in the air war.

Though strategic bombing has become more expensive, it is undoubtedly still highly profitable to the United Nations. In the first place, with our production centers out of range of German attack, we are able to mount a type of offensive to which the Nazis are unable to reply in kind. We can afford, if necessary, to take heavier losses than can Germany. In the second place, the offensive is clearly getting results. At least half a dozen of the forty or fifty main German war centers have been so battered that their industrial potential is about zero; others have been badly gutted and are operating in low gear. Because the German armies were initially so well supplied, some time must elapse before the results of strategic bombing are felt on the battlefield. Nevertheless, the effects of this attrition were seen both in Sicily, where the Nazis refused to evacuate soldiers who did not have their equipment, and in the futile July offensive in Russia. They will become increasingly visible from now on. Finally, the continued bombing has undermined the German people's morale; perhaps it has not lessened their courage or their will to hate, but it has revealed to the masses that in spite of years of sacrifice the war is being lost.

Important as are the decisions in the air and on the sea to the outcome of the European war, it is on land that the Nazis will probably have to be reduced to "unconditional surrender." And it is here that the Germans, though they have been defeated, are not yet beaten. The struggle now in progress for possession of the west bank of the Dnieper will provide the best single measure of how strong the German land armies really are. Short of the Vistula, the Dnieper offers the best defensive bulwark in Eastern Europe; it is a line which the Germans have every incentive to hold. If the Russians are able within the next few weeks to force this line completely, the Nazis' final military downfall in the east will be only a question of time.

On the other hand, Russian failure to break this line could well be only temporary. Though the distance the offensive has already covered testifies to a supply system of a very high order, a halt of several months to open new roads and bring up supplies could normally be expected. Later attacks in greater force, based on better supply lines, should be more successful. As long as Anglo-American threats of invasion, if not actual invading armies, tie down substantial German forces in the west, the Nazis' problem on the eastern front is to hold their own against a well-equipped, ably led enemy army, equal if not superior to theirs in quality and considerably more numerous. It is, in short, an insoluble problem.

In Western Europe the situation on land is even less clear than in Russia simply because the British and Americans hold so many weapons that are not being employed. In Italy the forces engaged have so far been comparatively small. German tactics have called for delay, infliction of casualties, and a thorough scorched-earth policy, but for an avoidance of a real test of strength. The threat of flanking attacks from the sea along the exposed coast is likely to prevent the Germans from committing themselves too heavily until the Po Valley is reached. Meanwhile large Allied forces in the Mediterranean theater are inactive. These include the French North African armies, the American Seventh Army, and doubtless other units. It is possible that these troops are being saved as reserves in anticipation of a showdown in northern Italy, or they may be sent into action in the Balkans, where the German position since Italy's defection has been extremely shaky. Similarly the Allies' greatly superior sea and air forces have not been exploited to the full in the conquest of Italy. Nor have the large armies based on Britain been utilized. With winter near and no aerial preparation for an invasion in any particular area yet under way, it becomes very doubtful whether the British and Americans will keep their promise of establishing a second front in 1943.

Britain Between the Acts

IV. THE NEW INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

I VISITED a good many war plants in Britain and talked not only to workers and their representatives but to managers and welfare officers. One of the most striking of the many curious conflicts of interests I ran into was that between new and traditional ways of doing things. British industry has been revolutionized by the war, and the effects, as always, have been both stimulating and upsetting. You find people resisting, with half their minds, processes and techniques they are applying with all their energies.

For the technical revolution produced by the war has brought more drastic changes to British than to American industry. The difference is one of mind as well as matter. Even before the war the typical American manufacturer had mechanized his plant as completely as invention and working capital permitted. He gauged his success by the up-to-date machines he had installed as well as by his profits. His ideal was a factory in which human labor had been supplanted by mechanical power, a factory in which men were used only as nursemaids to the rows of shining machines which turned out the product piece by piece and assembled it at the ends of the long conveyors. The British manufacturer was dominated by no such dream. In general he stuck to his old methods and old machines as long as they served him—that is, as long as he made a reasonable profit and got on moderately well with his workers. He mechanized reluctantly. He was slow to adopt efficiency techniques. In industry, as in other areas, a certain amount of muddling was looked upon as normal and reassuringly British.

It was the war with its double demand for planes and shells and guns and tanks and for men to handle them that jolted the British industrialist out of his accepted ways and drove him to "American methods" and, in many cases, to American machines. Everywhere one felt the effect of the change. It helped produce the deep uneasiness I found in the workers, especially the older men. It created a sort of resentment—however mixed with gratitude and admiration—toward the women workers. And the managers I talked with were as deeply divided as any other group. Some were whole-heartedly with the new order and ready to bend all traditional attitudes to fit its demands. A few obviously hated it, even while they recognized that this war could be won only by applying every available new method and tool. But many were divided within themselves, taking pride in the rapid adaptation of the old industrial structure, in the immense output so quickly achieved, in the beauty and power of the new machines, while at the same time resisting the disruption of established methods and relationships.

This mixed attitude is, I suspect, typical. You find it most persuasively presented in J. B. Priestley's new novel, "Daylight on Saturday." In my own limited experience it was summed up best in the manager of one of the great new war plants—a plant turning out bomber engines which are said to be the best in the world. But before I describe my visit to the plant I want to inject a few figures—because only if one has clearly in mind the immensity of the British effort and output, can one understand the equal immensity of the problems created.

First, it is necessary to remember that Britain is smaller than the state of Oregon and that its population includes 33,000,000 persons between fourteen and sixty-four years old—about one-third the number in the United States. After four years of war, 25,000,000 of these are in war service, labor or military. More than 90 per cent of all single women in Britain are fully employed on war jobs. The impression you get is that everyone is at work or in uniform. And the output of British war industry backs up the impression. A few figures on the production of aircraft will serve as illustration. While Britain last year built fewer training planes than the United States, it produced more than three-quarters of the number of heavy bombers America produced and 106 per cent of the number of pursuit planes. For a country 21 instead of 3,000 miles from the enemy front line, always besieged by sea and air, the record of Britain's essential industries is something to marvel at. It is in fact a record that could only have been achieved by a new industrial revolution.

Except for its English setting the —— plant could have been in Detroit or Cleveland. It stretched as far as you could see—row upon row of one-story slant-roofed sheds. It was built, fully equipped, and put into operation in a year—the first year of war. The speed seemed American, too; that, and the pride of the works manager when he told me about it. I saw pictures of the plant at every stage of its construction. You couldn't walk all the way through it in the time I had, so I skipped some of the processes. But I saw the raw-metal beginnings and the finished engines and many of the intervening stages. I saw machines marked with American company names and heard them praised by the workers who tended them. I saw women handling heavy machines and light ones, and machines that seemed to demand only mild supervision. I suffered the shattering roar of the engines undergoing all the tests of actual combat flying. I ate lunch in the executives' canteen with some of the managing staff, and I saw the huge canteen where the workers eat and talk and listen to lectures and entertainment.

It was terribly impressive, but I had to tell myself that it was British, not American; that before the war such a plant would have been a rarity instead of one of many; that it represented not merely bomber engines to be used to defeat Hitler, but also new ways of life for Britain.

The works manager began talking about this over the lunch table. He was telling the story I repeated briefly in my first cable to The Nation from London: how certain shop stewards, engaged in a dispute with the management over women's wages, had resigned from the Communist Party rather than follow the present party line and vote against a strike when the demand was refused. The situation seemed confusing and rather humorous to the executives at the table. They couldn't help welcoming the party's stand against strikes, and they had no objection to splits in the ranks of their radical workers. But when they found themselves lumped with the Communists as joint oppressors of labor they weren't quite sure how to take it. Said the works manager: "Why, that shop steward turned to me and said, 'As far as I can see, Joe Stalin's no better than you are!' "

The issue was equal pay for men and women doing the same jobs. After I had been around the plant and rejoined the manager in his office, the talk came back to that subject. Negotiations had been going on for weeks, a strike had been narrowly averted in spite of the legal prohibition against "absenteeism," and the issue had gone to a tribunal. "But it won't end there," the manager told me. "It will go to the Minister of Labor, and in the end it may call for Cabinet action. This issue is no local affair. It's being raised in other plants as well—everywhere. The future of this country is involved in the decision that will be reached." He was extremely serious about it, and I was puzzled.

I told him I had thought the whole question was controlled by a national schedule of rates and bonus payments and, in further detail, by agreement between the union and the employers' federation. The agreement provides for gradual increases in the pay of women employed in work previously performed by men, until, after thirty-two weeks, if they have proved themselves able to do the job "without additional supervision or assistance," they receive "the basic rate and national bonus appropriate to the male labor they replace." The manager explained how remote all this was from the human reality.

First, it was very difficult to determine whether a woman did or did not require more assistance than a man on the same job. Then, a great number of the processes were new. A woman might replace a man, but in thousands of cases that meant that new mechanisms were also employed. While labor was being diluted with women, the machines were being diluted, too. Her work would be dissimilar to that of the man whose place she filled. There was no exact basis of comparison. "Can't you compare it instead with the work done on the first machine down the line that is operated by a man?" I said. The manager wasn't interested in the question. He wasn't really interested in any narrow technical interpretation of schedules or agreements. He wanted to talk about the social system of Britain.

"The question is, who is responsible for the family?" he said. "Under age-old custom the man is. To upset that custom is to upset established social and personal relationships. It is to disrupt the life of this country."

I said: "Surely there are many occupations in England in which women and men get the same pay."

"Very few," said the manager. "It's exceptional. In any case it affects society very little unless it applies to factory workers. And in the past women did men's work in only a few trades. The question wasn't acute. Now with millions of untrained women flooding into industry the thing can't be treated lightly. I want to ask you: you are a woman, but do you believe a man, standing at one of these machines, should get the same pay as his eighteen-year-old daughter at the next one?"

"I'd rather see his eighteen-year-old daughter get the same pay as he."

The manager waved aside this frivolity. "It's unthinkable. It would make that home unhappy. The father, a man who very likely served a long apprenticeship, would resent being put on the same level with his daughter. And she would begin putting on airs and thinking she was as good as her father. Or, even worse, he might well decide that his responsibility for the support of his family was gone. In either case the domestic fabric would begin to fall apart."

"But how about the girl herself?" I said. "She's working and turning out as many parts as the man next to her, and he isn't her father as a rule, I imagine. What happens to her morale when—for one technical reason or another, or because the manager is worried about the social structure—she goes on getting 75 per cent of the pay earned by the man? Isn't that bound to make her resentful? Why develop skill and raise your output if in the end you won't get paid at the going rate for what you do?"

The manager admitted that this feeling was, in part, what had precipitated the dispute. "And the men backed the demand for equal pay, didn't they?" I asked. "The union put forward the demand," he said. "The individual worker may feel one way or another about it. But the union wants women scaled up to the men's level. They're afraid the men's wages will drop when the labor shortage ends—or that the men will lose their jobs permanently to the women."

"If that's true," I said, "the differentials you want to maintain are doomed anyhow, aren't they? Naturally, if the same work can be done at a lower rate by women, the pressure will be to bring all wages to that level. Then where will your family and your social structure be? Just where they would be if you upgraded the women—only the standard of living will be lower."

"It comes back to the machine in the end," said the manager. "It comes back to all this dilution. You say these unskilled girls are doing the same work as the men. Well, so they are, many of them. But why? Because we've added so many gadgets and jigs to these machines that a baby can run them. The women are doing the same work, yes, but it's work that would never be done this way under normal circumstances. So, in a sense, it's not the same. It's been organized to meet the limitations of unskilled workers—because plane engines had to be built fast and men had to be taken off their jobs and put in the armed forces."

"You mean, you would actually prefer a plant that did the job less efficiently? Would you advocate scrapping these machines after the war?"

He looked very serious. "They won't be scrapped, of course," he said. "But we could do with fewer gadgets and more skilled workers. That's certain."

The eighteen-year-old girl and her father are symbols. The hard fact behind them is the revolution that has overtaken British industry. Only a cynic could doubt that the manager's emotion was genuine. He wasn't worrying primarily about earnings, especially now, when excess profits are taxed 100 per cent. He was worrying about the way of life, from top to bottom, to which he had been accustomed. He was refusing to recognize the truth which merely happened to be illustrated at that particular moment by the issue of equal pay—the truth that technical advance has wiped out the skilled worker as the major factor in British industry. He will continue to be needed for particular functions: there are still jobs that the machine has not learned to do. But the number of those functions is relatively insignificant.

After the war, industry will be geared to an immense production turned out by unskilled workers and skilled machines. It can't scrap its mechanical improvements. To revert deliberately to less efficient and economical methods would be a counter-revolution carried through against all the dictates of self-interest. The alternative, however, is mass unemployment unless the ingenuity of business and the government can provide markets for the production of which industry is now capable. Even a decline to the normal pre-war level will throw many millions out of work.

Is it any wonder that the British factory owner or manager is a prey to conflicting emotions as he considers the revolution war has hurried toward its climax? The jigs and gadgets are wiping out, at one level or another, the human relationships he wants to preserve. The problems that lie ahead are insoluble by accustomed ways of doing or thinking. You cannot blame him if he resists the inevitable as long as possible.

The A. P. in a Cleft Stick

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

WITH one of the most misleading "leads" ever written for a newspaper story, the Associated Press on October 7 sought to turn defeat in the courts into victory in the headlines. By a two-to-one majority the Federal District Court in New York upheld the government's contention that the Associated Press had violated the anti-trust laws, and issued an injunction restraining it from enforcing certain by-laws and agreements until such time as it had taken measures to revise its constitution. Nevertheless, the A. P.'s story, which, according to the Guild Reporter, was edited and reedited by a swarm of executives and lawyers, began:

> The right of the Associated Press membership to pass upon the admission of applicants was upheld yesterday by a decision of the Federal District Court here. The court, however, directed that the by-laws of the Associated Press shall be changed to prevent a member in the same field (morning, evening, or Sunday in the same city) from presenting any bar to the election in such a field.

This presumably was how the news of what may prove to be a historic decision was received by millions of newspaper readers. The New York Times, however, adopted the precaution of printing in an adjoining column a report by the United Press which opened:

> A three-man federal court, by a two-to-one decision, yesterday enjoined the Associated Press from continuing to enforce "in their present form" its by-laws regulating the admission of members, but left the way open for the news organization to "adopt substitutes" that might bring the association into line with the law.

Any reader who, struck by the strange contrast between these two summaries of the same document, went on to study the actual text of the decision would have had little difficulty in concluding that the A. P. was guilty not only of smothering the court's opinion but of attempting to conceal the body. Actually "the right of the A. P.'s membership to pass upon the admission of applicants" was never at stake. What the Department of Justice was challenging when it launched the anti-trust suit was its right to exclude applicants solely on the ground that the competitive position of existing members might be adversely affected. For by restricting its membership on this basis the A. P., thanks to its outstanding position among news agencies and its practical monopoly of certain categories of news, is able to raise an almost insuperable barrier to new enterprise in the newspaper field. Thus an organization which claims to be merely a cooperative service club has become a powerful protective society for established newspapers.

In its defense the A. P. placed a great deal of emphasis on its efforts to maintain standards of objective and accurate reporting and claimed that the power to limit its membership was essential to the performance of its functions as guardian of newspaper ethics. Taking these protestations at their face value, the court has said in effect: We quite agree that in view of your responsibilities you cannot be asked to admit automatically any Tom, Dick, or Harry to your ranks. Obviously you are entitled to adopt rules which will set up objective criteria to test the character of those who seek to join you. We shall not attempt to say what conditions you ought to impose. But whatever rules you formulate, you must not make it possible for a member to blackball a newcomer, otherwise qualified, whose potential competition he fears. And consequently your rules must "affirmatively declare that the effect of admission upon the ability of an applicant to compete with members in the same 'field' shall not be taken into consideration in passing upon his application."

There are at present three ways in which a newspaper owner may enter the A. P.: (1) he may be elected by the board of directors provided he operates in a field where there is no existing membership; (2) if he is competng with one or more other members who refuse to waive heir protest rights he may be admitted by an affirmative rote of a majority of the "regular" members, after which ie must pay a premium to the members in the same 'field" in compensation for the dilution of their rights; 3) he may purchase the franchise of an existing mem- er. In the case of admission by methods 1 or 2 it s possible that the question of professional or moral ualifications may be raised, although it is clear that the lecisive factor is the competitive position of the appli- ant in relation to existing members. But anyone own- ng a big enough bank roll can buy his way in by the hird portal with no questions asked. If Al Capone were ble to persuade Colonel McCormick to sell him the hicago Tribune with its A. P. membership, it is diffi- ult to see what the other members could do about it.

Since the court rendered its decision the press of the ountry has been editorially mum, although at the time he Department of Justice filed suit nearly every A. P. aper in the country used up large areas of valuable white space explaining to its readers how wrong the ction was. Nor have the directors of the A. P. yet been ble to make up their minds about the next step. They ave merely announced that they are awaiting the actual 'form of judgment" before determining future pro- edure. I suspect that one reason for all this reticence s that the court has placed the A. P. in a cleft stick by ffering it an opportunity to live up to its professed deals. If it insists that the right of its membership to ass on the admission of applicants must include the ight to take potential competition into consideration, it onfesses an overriding interest in limiting competition nd protecting the property rights of its members. As ditor and Publisher admits in the course of an editorial riticism of the court's decision:

> An A. P. membership still has the definite asset value to newspapers . . . [which] would be destroyed, in our opinion, if the majority decision were upheld and the A. P. compelled by judge-made law to admit all comers with money in their pocket and average moral character. But that would not affect the character of the A. P. service, we believe, or make it less desirable, so long as it lived up to its traditional standards.

Is not this an admission that the asset value attached an A. P. membership derives not from the enjoyment the service itself but from the power to exclude com- etitors from its benefits?

We might, perhaps, compare the A. P. with a medie- l guild in its final and degenerate stage. Originally the uild was an organization designed to maintain ethical andards in a particular trade, and to that end it ad- itted only properly qualified persons with professional aining and good moral character. Gradually, however, e guild tended to become a closed corporation re- icting its members to a group of families and excluding even those who had served as apprentices and journeymen under its rules. And eventually the guilds, cut off from new blood and ideas, atrophied. The A. P. has a chance to avoid a similar fate if it conforms not merely with the letter of the federal-court decision but with its spirit. It could then become a genuine cooperative, using its power not to conserve privilege and frustrate enterprise but to elevate the moral and professional standards of democracy's most vital industry. Only in that way can freedom of the press be preserved, for no Bill of Rights can protect a freedom monopolized by a restricted group.

HOLDERS OF LIFE-INSURANCE POLICIES are getting literature these days from the Peoples Committee to Defend Life Insurance and Savings urging them to write their Congressmen in favor of a sales tax. Most of the officers and directors of this Peoples Committee are insurance executives, bank presidents, manufacturers, and retired gentlemen. A letter soliciting funds for more literature bears this postscript: "In view of the undoubted consequences of a further increase in corporation taxes, support of an alternative tax seems a proper expenditure of corporation funds. Corporation subscriptions are therefore in order and will be welcome."

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

The Liberation Front in Yugoslavia

BY LOUIS ADAMIC

A YEAR ago I began to receive bundles of memoranda, underground papers, clippings, and official documents from Balkan underground sources which revealed what was actually happening inside Yugoslavia. My Yugoslav friends and acquaintances living as exiles in New York had their own sources, and we exchanged information.

One of them, for instance, showed me a letter from a friend in Croatia, dated mid-May, 1942, and sent via Argentina, which chided him for having referred in a short-wave broadcast to "Mihailovich's heroic leadership of the Chetniks' great resistance against the Axis, which has aroused so profound an admiration in America." The writer, a well-known man in Yugoslavia and neither a Communist nor even an active Partisan, stated emphatically that Mihailovich was "not a positive factor in the day-to-day resistance of the various regions." Mihailovich's name, he said, figured importantly only in broadcasts from England and America; it was scarcely known in some sections of Yugoslavia; in many places where it was known people shuddered when they heard it, for Mihailovich was believed to be working with the Axis; and all the actual fighting—since October, 1941—against German, Italian, and Quisling forces was being carried on by the Partisans.

Reading the varied reports was like sitting in a dark projection-room in a Hollywood studio and looking at "rushes" of scenes without sequence in a great and awful film which was being shot by several directors. Piecing the material together became my chief preoccupation. And as the true picture slowly emerged from behind the blurred distortion of the Mihailovich legend, I began to see that the future belongs to the Partisans and their Liberation Front. I began to believe that from this movement would come some sort of political development which would constitute the decisive post-war factor in Yugoslavia—that is, if the great powers permitted the Serbian, Croatian, and Slovenian peoples to decide for themselves.

The whole Liberation Front movement has been indigenous, spontaneous. It is the uprising of a people. It is a fighting act of the common man. The Liberation Front drew its inspiration in part from Russia. This was so not only because the Red Army was doing most of the fighting and the tradition of the country was pan-Slavic; the cause of the majority of the people in Yugoslavia was emotionally, economically, geographically closer to Russia's than to that of any other great power. It was a cause arising from an international problem which apparently only Russia understood and was ready to try to solve.

Chiefly, however, the Partisan movement sprang from the continuing desperate plight of the South Slav masses. It was bound up with the people's best fighting traditions and with their centuries-old strivings for a free, decent, peaceful, civilized life. The Communists played a leading role in it at its inception simply because they were acute and agile enough to be able to utilize those strivings at a crucial moment. They had a long underground experience behind them. Some had fought in Spain. The technique of their leadership fitted the times, and they issued appeals and directions which many of the people in Serbia, Croatia, Slovenia, Dalmatia, Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Montenegro were prepared to follow.

The Liberation Front, with its fighting Partisans, was a sudden promise of fulfilment of all the apparently futile political efforts of the peasant and other democratic parties during the previous fifteen or twenty years. The numerous reports which have reached me about it, even the unfavorable ones from conservative and reactionary sources, indicate that it may be considered the climax of the mass upheavals which began in the eighteenth century in various parts of the world, including America. It by-passed everything and everybody that were old and tired in spirit, corrupt and cynical. It overrode things and ideas which had lost their validity or which leaned upon vested interests and special privilege. The Liberation Front attracted the young and active, who saw that the best promise lay in going into the mountains, into the woods, to fight.

The Liberation Front was many things, but primarily it was an instrument of hope. Most immediately it was a concrete, fighting reaction to the Axis "technique of depopulation." It was dangerous to individual life, of course. It brought reprisals. Yet it was also the course most likely to lead to survival. It was an escape for those who were due to be drafted for slave labor in Germany. It offered a way out to girls and young women who did not want to be raped by Germans or Italians at home or sent to brothels behind the Russian front. It was better for both the young men and the young women to go out with their own people and help to kill the enemy, to blow up trains and bridges and viaducts.

The fact that some of the foremost military commanders and political leaders of the Liberation Front were Communists did not mean that the rank and file wanted the country to go Communist. They were not as definite and clear as that. But at no time were they anti-Communist. Indeed, a large number of the rank and file were tentatively pro-Communist. This was because many Yugoslavs had been pushed to the point where, so far as they could see, nothing else was open to them. They had been pushed to that point not only by the Axis occupation and by the absence of a sustained, convincing policy on the part of Britain and America, but also by the action of official Belgrade and its henchmen in the provinces for the past twenty years.

The Communist Party of Yugoslavia did not raise the issue of communism or capitalism. It said, in effect, that the problem before the people was to summon all their energies to destroy fascism; everything else could wait. This became the program of Communists and non-Communists. The slogan was "Death to fascism! Liberty to the people!" This slogan was politically perfect, a complete program. It rang through the villages and through the forests, where hundreds of thousands of people were hiding. It appealed to their deepest feelings. It was uttered by leaders who unquestionably were of the people and who did not stop with slogans. They led armed bands in forays against the fascists. They actually dealt death to fascists, and liberated villages, towns, and regions. They distributed food to civilians, even though the fighting guerrillas themselves had little idea where their next meal was coming from.

At various times in 1942-43 the Liberation Front Partisan movement has controlled from one-third to one-half of Yugoslavia. As I write, it holds more than one-third. But the freed area has never been of one piece. Regions dominated by the Partisans are islands surrounded by enemy-occupied territory. The size of these islands has changed from day to day with the ups and downs of warfare. And the islands which have endured the longest have been those in which the population was most mixed—Croatians and Serbians, Orthodox and Catholics—which suggests that the Liberation Front is a unifying movement. It has had in fact profound success in overcoming the old antagonisms which all other forces in the country, including Mihailovich, have been doing their best to stimulate.

Partisan generalship has often been superb. At times it has played the very devil with the Axis and the Chetniks. It has withstood five general offensives. It reached its highest success between September 10 and 25 of this year, when the Partisans occupied most of the Yugoslav Adriatic coast and swept into northern Italy, where the population is preponderantly Slavic. It is too soon to say whether they will be able to hold their gains until the big invasion of the Balkans begins either from the sea or the east; but it may be that some day their commander-in-chief, Tito, will be recognized as one of the great leaders of World War II.

"Looks as if we'll have to give them back to Schiaparelli, Fritz."

From the first, the Partisan movement knew where it was going, what it wanted. And it learned to maintain itself. It lived off the enemy and the territory where it operated. Partisan units, with complete indifference to death, have abruptly appeared as if from nowhere and wiped out enemy forces three and four times their number. For two years now, with the utmost ingenuity, these Yugoslav minute men and women have been penetrating enemy lines, blowing up heavily guarded arsenals, trains, and bridges, stopping convoys and making off with food and equipment.

The forces of the Liberation Front now number between 200,000 and 250,000. That was the estimate, on September 28, of the Axis-controlled Finnish commentator Christopher Schildt, who, talking to Sweden from an Axis-controlled radio station, said that the Germans would be able to drive the Partisans away from the Adriatic coast "probably only step by step." "It has been shown," he added, "that it is impossible to defeat these Yugoslav guerrillas."

For two years, in day-to-day battles which one of the most amazing propaganda swindles of the war credited to Mihailovich, the Partisans have held between twenty and thirty Axis divisions in Yugoslavia and away from the African, Russian, and Sicilian fronts. Last month they disarmed most of the Italian army in their country. Now they are a power obviously to be reckoned with. Their struggle, whose importance is only just beginning to be recognized, has been grim and demanding, uncompromising, revolutionary. They have been fighting not only the immediate Axis enemy but also Mihailovich, the hero manqué, the patriot-blunderer and blind agent of amoral interests which have been at large in the Balkans for a thousand years.

But the most significant aspect of the movement is that it includes both Communists and diverse non-Communists, and that a formula has been worked out under which all work together militarily and politically—a formula that must be extended as quickly as possible to the international scene, where Britain, America, and Soviet Russia are now struggling with the problem of their future relations.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

"TOO cautious, lacking in boldness," was the way General Kurt Dittmar, speaking over the German radio on October 12, characterized Allied strategy in Italy. This criticism by the most prominent German military commentator is interesting not only because it indicates the official German line but because it bears the hallmark of an honest professional opinion. The General appears actually incensed by the strategy of the Allies.

The situation of the Allies in Italy was and is, he declared, ideal for carrying out the Clausewitz strategy of annihilation—flank, encircle, destroy. But so far nothing of this kind has been done. To quote his words:

> Opportunities have not been lacking to the Anglo-Americans in recent months, and abundant means have been at their disposal. They have had superiority in numbers and at least equality in arms and equipment, on the ground as in the air. It is true that the terrain in the Apennines is peculiarly unfavorable for the attacker and favorable for the defense. But this advantage for our side is considerably limited by the possibility that an enemy with complete control of the sea may make a sea-borne encircling movement. . . . The political changes in Italy, which have been overwhelmingly in the enemy's favor, need not be enlarged on here.
> It is astonishing that all these circumstances have not induced the Allies to launch operations exemplifying at least approximately the Clausewitz formula. If in the beginning the hopes aroused by the Badoglio treachery misled the enemy, this excuse has not been valid since Mussolini was freed. But even in the last few weeks Anglo-American operations have presented substantially the same picture. One single attempt at a great surrounding and destroying movement was made—the landing at Termoli on the Adriatic—but the undertaking was carried no farther than the first step. One gets the impression that the enemy wanted to follow the Clausewitz strategy but at the last moment shrank back. In consequence even this sea-borne encircling movement hit only the left wing of our troops, not their depth.

"It is certain," concluded the General, "that the British and Americans will have a long hard road before them if they try to traverse the peninsula in this fashion." But he added that he wished to be cautious in pronouncing judgment. "For we know that with increasing experience in matters of war the methods of our enemy may change."

A month ago German men from fifty to fifty-nine years old were ordered to register for military service. Induction have not yet begun, but one can easily believe the Swedish and Swiss correspondents who say that the mere announcement has had a devastating effect. Even in the last war military service was required only through the fiftieth year. That ten more age classes must now be put in uniform shows how the bottom of the man-power barrel is being scraped.

New evidence of this has recently been provided—at the opposite end of the age scale. In a speech at Erfurt on October 6 Arthur Ammann, Reich Youth leader, announced that he had submitted a great thought to the Führer and that the Führer had taken it up. A Panzer division has been formed, he said, made up entirely of boys from the Hitler Youth, that is, boys of sixteen and seventeen years—all volunteers. The division will soon go to the front. It is a great honor for youth, and if in battle the division lives up to its high promise, others will be formed, and more sixteen- and seventeen-year-olds will have the same honor.

Premonitions of disaster are playing an increasing role in Germany. The newest schoolbooks contain a terrible poem—quoted by the Zurich Volksrecht of September 27—which may be roughly translated as follows:

> We are rising to the storm of battle,
> A hero's death is our right,
> The earth shall shake to its depths
> When its noblest race goes down.
> Just as Attila's house crashed and burned
> When he subdued the Nibelungs,
> So Europe will burst into flames
> At the downfall of the Teutons.

This eventuality is viewed not only in its titanic-romantic but also in its more practical aspects. It is known that the Nazi Party has its Ordensburgen—some dozen modern cloisters in which the young generation is trained for the higher levels of the Nazi hierarchy. The Swedish Aftontidningen of October 13 now reports on reliable information that in all the Ordensburgen the teaching is stressing a new theme: how the pupils are to behave in case of an "extreme emergency," meaning either Germany's defeat or Hitler's removal or disappearance. Of course such an emergency is treated as purely hypothetical. Nevertheless, the pupils are given most minute instructions on what they must do. A plan to continue the party and its activities underground has been worked out to the last detail. For, so the instructions run, "even in case of a German defeat and a corresponding peace, the National Socialist idea must never capitulate."

BOOKS and the ARTS

Charles de Coster's Hero-Legend

THE GLORIOUS ADVENTURES OF TYL ULENSPIEGL. By Charles de Coster. Translated by Allan Ross Macdougall. Woodcuts by Frans Masereel. Pantheon Books. $3.50.

VAN WYCK BROOKS has been calling for the heroic in literature. Almost as though in answer to his summons, here comes the reasonably complete, juicy, profusely and poetically illustrated translation of a genuine and timely hero-legend in prose. It is the "Ulenspiegl" of that nineteenth-century little Homer of Belgian literature, Charles de Coster. In a salty but elevated style its high-colored narrative deals with heroic action, and heroic action incidental to a struggle for liberty. A national and folk epic, the book, in Romain Rolland's phrase, is the epic of popular liberty.

Throughout De Coster's lifetime, 1827 to 1879, French literature abounded in studious trials at the epic—the form of the hero-legend—in prose as well as verse. Châteaubriand had attempted the form in prose in his Christian-legendary "The Martyrs"; Quinet, in "Ahasvérus," an epic in dialogues symbolizing progressive humankind. Hugo well-nigh crowned the total effort with his thunderous "Legend of the Centuries." Indubitably the young Belgian set to work in their train consciously and discreetly; indubitably "Ulenspiegl" is as artificial as the Aeneid. The kind's external traits are obvious in his narrative. Its mold is the traditional biographic one of the saint or hero saga. The material is a union of nationally sacred and historical stuff—legends of the revolt of the Netherlands against the Spanish monarchy and faithful details gleaned from Motley's "Rise of the Dutch Republic." Epic machinery conspicuously figures: allegory, description, dreams, even demons—although these demons are frauds, and satires of superstition. Significant epithets recur. The narrative's design is definitely symmetrical. Boldly it contrasts gestures and characters; opposes to the generous hero Tyl a thoroughly antithetic adversary, the cruel, cold Philip II of Spain.

Certainly the play of erudition is plain throughout the vigorous, tasteful, often jocund work. One sees it in the pleasantly archaic diction, imitated from Rabelais and from sermons of his epoch. One sees it in the wonderfully clear genre pictures sapiently reconstructing the atmosphere and customs of the sinister sixteenth century. The knowledge of the Inquisition's horrible tortures here displayed almost is unique. "Ulenspiegl" also offers a little synthesis of Flemish art. Like the paintings of scenes of revelry by Jordaens and Jan Steen, its lusty pictures of material and sensual life teem with references to fat roasts, tall flagons, milky breasts.

Still, it possesses an element which, setting it above the studious French attempts at the epic, curiously associates it with a no less magistral poem of its century than Goethe's "Faust." The points of relation between "Ulenspiegl" and that masterpiece, incidentally, are several. One is the common derivation of their heroes from penny chap-books. As Heinrich Faust sprang from a penny "life" of a Renaissance charlatan and necromancer, so Tyl Ulenspiegl came from a Flemish booklet recounting the exploits of a fifteenth-century Low German rogue—whose merry pranks, in the German variant of his "life," about 1890 inspired Richard Strauss with a certain rondo for orchestra on comic themes. Seventeen of the tiny chapters in Book I of De Coster's epic actually recapitulate episodes in the Flemish pamphlet. But the main point of resemblance between "Ulenspiegl" and "Faust," the one first referred to, is their common possession of the essential epic trait—a simultaneously credible and super-lifesized hero. We mean that Tyl, like Faust, lives and is superior to other natures in energy and exploits, faults and capacities. The deeper powers of a folk-life likewise are manifest in him. Through either figure we perceive the moral outlook of a people and the content of its destiny; receive revelations of the higher possibilities in life toward which it can lift itself. Their heroism of stature ultimately resides in this their mute manifestation of facets of the divine will.

In Tyl, as he acts, we touch the tough, life-and-liberty-loving Flemings, the "spirit of the Mother, Flanders"; and something besides. Tyl in a sense is "the people everywheres." Significantly a rider of mules like Sancho Panza and Margutte in Pulci, he is "the people," particularly in its slyness and bent toward clownery, its helplessness under the lash of the men on horseback, the lords temporal and spiritual, and its tenacity, its power to endure and survive. Never chivalric, his role in battle none the less is ardent, while in more ordinary forms of existence his heroic action lies in the creation of political ligatures, the animation of individuals who war for human liberty. De Coster also intended him to represent the achievement of inner no less than outer political and religious freedom. Whether deliberately, whether unconsciously, Tyl certainly was conceived of as the continuation of Euphorion in the second part of "Faust," as the really triumphant freeman, the conciliator of spirit and flesh, the discoverer of humane values. This last aspiration of his author only partially attained its object. Tyl does develop in a moral direction in the pages of the book. Only, De Coster did not possess the imaginative faculty requisite to the dramatization of inner conflict and search and growth, of naturally evolving consciousness of revolutionary values and their gradual realization in the substance of life. He was confined to the stratagem of allowing the sense of the new values to come conundrum-like to Tyl in the course of a dream, letting his character ache for the explanation until another dream supplies it.

This expedient, together with the balladry in "Ulenspiegl," constitutes the book's less satisfactory aspect. Had De Coster lived to continue his epic, he might possibly have found a better solution for his problem. Not that these defects seriously impair the value of the simple and high-hearted work. It is a unity, and shines with numbers of the glories of its kind. Magically it utters the power of the natal ground, the folk, the home. Ancestors, an entire people, contributed, and contribute, to its action. It is a living reliquary of their virtues; and "like a river moving through their country, mirrors within its waters of dream their cities and their skies."

PAUL ROSENFELD

Tomorrow's Italy

WHAT TO DO WITH ITALY. By Gaetano Salvemini and George La Piana. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.

PROFESSOR SALVEMINI, one of the most courageous and unflinching of all Mussolini's enemies, has collaborated with Professor La Piana of Harvard in this carefully reasoned and documented study of the issues on which may be decided the fate of tomorrow's Italy, and in a measure of tomorrow's Europe. The book is no flaming appeal to faith and action, but rather a worldly-wise and cynical examination of the policies and motives which may be, and perhaps actually are, seeking to shape the destiny of Italy without asking leave of the Italian people. You will finish this book perhaps a sadder but certainly a wiser man.

Professor La Piana, whose specialty is church history, has presumably written those extensive portions which are concerned with Vatican policies and the relations of church and state. They are sage and moderate in tone, and convey the authors' profound respect for the Catholic religion as the faith of very many Italians. They urge, as the sole possible solution of the "Roman question," the separation of church and state in Italy, approximately as in America. They recommend that the future Italian republic denounce the Lateran Concordat, which intermingled affairs of church and state, but retain the political treaty—minus two articles that manifestly do not belong in it—which fixes the territorial frontiers of the Papal State and prohibits any international guaranty of Vatican City such as is impulsively proposed from time to time by foreigners. The authors would have the new republic make an equitable adjustment of the Lateran financial agreement—indemnifying the church for properties expropriated by the Italian state—on condition that the church bear its just share of inevitable financial sacrifice along with the Italian people. They believe these settlements ought to be easy, but fear that the Vatican will resist them and oblige the republic to impose them as a unilateral dictation, as in 1871.

The Vatican and the political policy which the authors attribute to it dominate also much of the political portion of the book. Salvemini and La Piana are convinced, from their study of available evidence, that the Vatican, the British Foreign Office, and the American State Department are operating under a more or less formal understanding to preserve the Fascist state much as it is today—minus the Fascist label and the most conspicuous Fascist personalities—in order to perpetuate the church's privileged position and to prevent any effective revolution, Communist or democratic.

They examine in great detail the evidence which points to the existence of such a plan. They conclude that the Foreign Office originally intended to deprive Italy of Sardinia and Sicily and carve the mainland into two or more states but was opposed by the State Department. They infer that Myron Taylor, whose appointment as the President's personal representative to the Vatican by-passed the question of diplomatic representation while wooing the American Catholic vote, helped to formulate the three-sided arrangement which they believe now prevails.

"In accord with our State and War Departments [and with the Foreign Office] its [the Vatican's] plan is to keep intact the whole machinery of the Fascist state and of its local administration," say the authors, writing long before the invasion of Sicily. Since then AMG has been set up, with Lord Rennell of Rodd, international banker, Catholic, and friend of Volpi, Mussolini's former Finance Minister, as civil governor of occupied territories. And Herbert Matthews has reported to the New York Times from Sicily that "when every function of the state is identified with fascism, to abolish fascism would threaten to leave society high and dry. What often happens in effect is that the Fascist label is removed, but the same men carry on the same functions. . . . AMG is in a position where it will have to choose what men are going to be the executives of the future Italian government." The authors' prediction seems thus painfully confirmed.

There is a prophetic passage beginning on page 188 which I wish The Nation would reprint in extenso. It errs, on present evidence, at but one point. It assumes that the predestined Allied stooge, or democratic Quisling, is Count Grandi, eminent gangster, distinguished "anti-Fascist," president of the Chamber of Fasces and Corporations (the Mussolini parliament), "the man who, after Spellman's visit to the Vatican, was made a 'cousin to the King.' " The gentleman's name happens, at the moment, to be Badoglio. But after the present military crisis is past a civilian will be needed, and then who more "legitimate" than the "Anglophile" Grandi?

The authors have a profound confidence that the Italian people are democratic at heart and perfectly competent to govern themselves. They fear that President Roosevelt entertains the "dangerous illusion" that "the clergy can mobilize the masses and lead them wherever they wish." But they insist that the Italian democratic revolution must be allowed to take its course, even at the cost of considerable bloodshed and an anti-Fascist vendetta which they believe to be unavoidable—and certainly is, to judge by a recent Times dispatch from Naples.

There is so much wisdom in this book that any review must ignore most of it. Let me sum it up in this quotation: "There is no other school of liberty than liberty itself."

HIRAM MOTHERWELL

Not a Factory

THE INVASION OF GERMANY. By Curt Riess. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

MR. RIESS has written so many books in such a short time that the question arises whether he is an author or the name of a streamlined factory for literary creations. As a matter of fact, Curt Riess is not a factory but an individual. He proves this in his newest book, "The Invasion of Germany," by repeating again and again "I think," "I believe," "I do not believe," "as I have stated," and so on. Some of these personal ideas of Mr. Riess's are quite above discussion. He says, for instance, on page 12 of his book, "It is my firm conviction that mere inactive waiting will certainly accomplish nothing."

Unfortunately, not all the convictions of Curt Riess are so well founded and so harmless. He pretends to know almost all about the future; yet even his knowledge about the past is not reliable. He tells us, for example, that Marshal Foch "was outvoted" in 1918 when he argued against granting an armistice to the German army and insisted upon invading Germany. Too bad that Mr. Riess spends his time writing his own books instead of studying better books. For he would have known then that Foch himself wrote the proposals for the armistice and persuaded his allies to accept them; far from being "outvoted" on this question, Foch strongly objected to the invasion of Germany, and he explained his point of view with the famous words (reported by Colonel House): "No man has a right to cause another drop of blood to be shed."

The reader will find the first ridiculous falsification of historical truth on page 1 of Mr. Riess's book. This may save him the trouble of turning to page 2 and ff.

JOSEPH BORNSTEIN

Fiction in Review

THE season's fiction continues to be undistinguished, and this reviewer continues to cherish the pious hope that it is the war—the loss of talent to the services and the confusion of the times—that accounts for the poor quality of the new novels.

Margery Allingham is one of England's most successful detective-story writers; now, as Margery Allingham Carter, she has written her first non-mystery novel. "The Galantrys" (Little, Brown, $2.50) is the biography of a certain James Galantry, half gipsy and half gentleman, and it is also the story of a changing society, the period in English life when the established order of the eighteenth century was giving way to modern industrialism. But although Mrs. Carter, like so many of the English detective-story writers, is notably well-educated—and not ashamed of it—and despite the fact that in her hero's struggles to cope with his complicated heredity she had the material for a perfectly plausible psychological study, her novel sacrifices the realities of both fiction and social history to a quite eccentric interest in genetics. She is obsessed with the science of breeding; drawing most of her lessons from animal mating, she seems to regard all human character, not only James Galantry's, as if it were as susceptible to hereditary determination as the character of a horse. The result is neither convincing nor funny, just odd—especially the last section of her story, which is taken up with Galantry's vision of his descendants right down to their roles in the present war.

Still, there is one good reason, closely related to Margery Allingham's past reputation, why "The Galantrys" cannot be completely dismissed as merely the indulgence of an eccentricity—Mrs. Carter's prose, which is startling, in these days, for its intelligence and wit. No one who has not himself been deadened by the deadness of contemporary writing can fail to respond to the sweet pleasure of such a sentence as "No one spoke ill of her, everybody loved her absentmindedly"; or of a passage like this description of a rural performance of Richard III: "The play was Cibber's version, of course, but even that consequential little hack could scarcely hurt it, nor could the woman who played Queen Margaret and muffed her lines in the very midst of her envy." That Orville Prescott, in an otherwise accurate estimate of "The Galantrys," should refer to its style as "highly mannered" and censure Mrs. Carter for her habit of commenting on her characters as she goes, because "modern readers are conditioned to a different tradition, where characters may speak for the author, but not the author for the characters," indicates how willingly modern critical judgment has assisted in the damming up of one of the life-streams of fiction.

HAVE YOU DISCOVERED

Kierkegaard?

Of course you know his name, but have you read him? Soren Kierkegaard has been soberly compared to Socrates, Pascal, Nietzsche, Tolstoy, Augustine, Freud, Tertullian, and William James (to give only part of the list).

TIME MAGAZINE: "Had this philosopher and mystic not written in a minor language, his fame would have resounded with that of Carlyle, Nietzsche, and Dostoevski."

MIGUEL UNAMUNO: "I learned the language in order to read Ibsen and was rewarded by reading Kierkegaard."

REINHOLD NIEBUHR: "The profoundest interpreter of the psychology of the religious life, in my opinion, since St. Augustine."

COMMONWEAL: "The greatest Protestant Christian of the nineteenth century, a man equal in spiritual stature to Cardinal Newman."

CHRISTIAN CENTURY: "Kierkegaard has inspired all those philosophers and theologians of the recent past who have concerned themselves with the doctrine of man."

These are the ten Princeton Kierkegaard publications:

But if it is indeed the tradition nowadays for the characters to speak for their authors but not the other way round, then one wonders why so many of our novelists choose as their spokesmen characters of the least possible dignity and stature. There is Albert Halper, for example, whose new novel, "Only an Inch from Glory" (Harper and Brothers, $2.50), takes its stand as far from any likely notion of literary glory as Mr. Halper could manage and still keep a typewriter under his hand. Of his four main characters, all Greenwich Village failures, not one has even the energy of colloquialism, let alone the energy of ideas. When they speak for their author, it is in language that entreats the world down to their own benighted level. "She knew I was her friend, her loyal friend, that I'd be her friend for life no matter what she did or what happened to her," says the painter-failure of the sculptor-failure in a typical passage. "So she let me hang around her and take her out. She wouldn't let me spend much on her, either. She knew I was making only twenty-five dollars a week. Besides lending small sums to her fellow-students down at school she subsequently pressed ten- and twenty-dollar loans upon me, when I was out of work afterwards. It hurt my pride at first, but I soon realized she was generous with everybody; and it's hard to explain but I sometimes felt that the root of her generosity was a desire to get back at her mother." Mr. Halper's prose is so slack with humility that his novel manages to say nothing about failure except that it exists and is pitiful.

At the other extreme from Mr. Halper's kind of novel, and yet in its way also typical of the failure of verve in modern fiction, is Wallace Stegner's "The Big Rock Candy Mountain" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $3), a 515-page story of life in the West in the first decades of this century. Though theoretically preferable, hard work without inspiration turns out to be little more fun, in a novel, than humility without effort. For Mr. Stegner's writing is detailed, careful, utterly respectful of the world it describes; if Mr. Halper abdicates his own personality before his characters, Mr. Stegner dedicates every last ounce of his strength to their service. Yet the result, while not exactly muscle-bound, certainly lacks the resilience of fictional life. "The Big Rock Candy Mountain" is a novel of the American dream, most of its action centered in the rambunctious Bo Mason, a big, restless, amoral hero-villain who sacrifices his wife and family to his unprincipled ambitions. (By the way, this type of hero-villain—frontiersman, robber baron, or just plain gangster—is becoming alarmingly frequent in current fiction.) By far the best sections of Mr. Stegner's book are his pleasant and credible evocations of little-boy life in the country, one of which you may already be familiar with from its publication in the form of a short story.

Vardis Fisher's "The Mothers" (Vanguard, $2.50) is a historical novel of American pioneer days. A party of travelers—it includes, for popular consumption, a couple of vicious Germans—sets out to reach the green fields of California; although most of the group perish en route, a few hardy souls endure the unendurable tortures in order to reach their destination: this is Mr. Fisher's plot. "The Mothers" is certainly more exciting reading than Mr. Stegner's story or Mr. Halper's or Mrs. Carter's. But it is not a really sincere novel either in intention or execution, though it will no doubt make a sincere movie. I regret, however, that Mr. Fisher broke off his account of the beginnings of man, started last year in "The Darkness and the Deep," in order to switch his rather superficial and mechanical Freudianism from the ape world to the more familiar world of modern history, since even his persisting prejudice in favor of women becomes less authoritative, if not less gratifying, when it continues into a period of easier identification.

According to the announcements, Hans Habe's "Kathrine" (Viking, $2.75) is concerned with the life of an unconventional woman tangled with the destiny of a nation. I expected Mata Hari and was disappointed. After its first pages of watered-down Colette, Mr. Habe's novel is only a dreary, overcharged portrait of a still beautiful cocotte—she was known as Kathrine the Great—who is trying to marry her daughter to the son of her lover. Kathrine's lover happens to be an airplane manufacturer, and the war happens to be threatening—all of which provides Mr. Habe with his opportunity to take a fling at the fall of poor France.

"Out of the Silent Planet," by C. S. Lewis (Macmillan, $2), the diabolically clever author of "The Screwtape Letters," is a well-written novel about a journey to Mars. But unhappily I have no taste for fiction about life anywhere except on earth, and was therefore unable to finish a book which had been recommended to me as distinguished by several friends whose judgment is otherwise unquestionable.

DRAMA

"OTHELLO," in print, is as careless of the house rules of dramaturgy as it is prolific in bursts of poetry that move like ground swells through the emotions and the mind. Its several characters are believable because they speak with the irresistible energy and authority of the poetry; their relations to one another seem contrived, and the play as play would be stopped at almost any point by one sensible remark, for which the cue is always presenting itself.

Margaret Webster's "Othello" (Shubert Theater) is not only believable; by a tour de force of direction she has caused the faulty motivation not to disappear but to seem irrelevant. And only at one point, as I remember, does the unseized cue stand out.

The key to Miss Webster's particular and distinctive solution of a difficult problem lies in her bold use of Iago both as character and as instrument. The hero of this production is not Othello but Iago; the tragedy of the Moor, while it is quite effectively set forth, is, in a sense, the play within the play. Miss Webster might deny this. The audience bears me out. That fact may tell us more about a prevailing attitude toward the clever, sardonic, agile character who has the ruthlessness of his cynicism than about Miss Webster's intentions, but here is, at the very least, an interesting coincidence. (A friend to whom I mentioned this wondered if the sympathy for Iago was an expression of prejudice against a Negro Othello. The answer is no. It was rather the expression of a secret admiration for the man who exercises power—of which every human being secretly feels himself capable—and this admiration includes a kind of contempt for anyone, white or black, yellow or brown, over whom that power is successfully exercised. The ovation given to Paul Robeson at the end of the performance was certainly not simulated. It was just as certainly sentimental in part, and far more self-conscious than the wry sympathy accorded to Iago scene by scene. But cynicism and sentimentality are, after all, two sides of the same coin.)

It happens also that the most accomplished actor in the company is José Ferrer, who plays the role of Iago. Where his acting ends and Miss Webster's direction begins it is impossible to tell—their collaboration is complete. I can only record that he plays the role with passion and joy, as if he were creating it. The ostensible and inadequate motivation—Iago's desire to usurp Cassio's place—turns under one's eyes and ears into the far more sinister and exciting desire to play the part of the villain for the part's sake. Yet he remains understandable in human terms.

And what of Othello? Paul Robeson has an imposing figure and a powerful voice. But he performs rather than acts. Under Miss Webster's direction he performs passably well, but he creates no illusion. He speaks—often sings—Othello's lines, but he is not Othello in the sense that Mr. Ferrer is Iago. And he is not the Moor as Shakespeare conceived him. Both Mr. Robeson and Miss Webster have tried to prove that Othello is a Negro; they have attempted also to prove that "Othello" is a play about race. Both theories seem to me false and foolish. Fortunately Miss Webster's artistic sense is superior to her ideology, which has been confined to the public prints and does not appear in the play.

In Shakespeare's conception the essential quality of the Moor is his foreignness. He is the exotic character—so exotic as to bewitch, for all his denials, the innocent English—not Venetian—Desdemona. The stress upon his blackness points up his alien, not his racial, character. There is no particular reason why a Negro should not play Othello or, for that matter, why a Negro should. Color aside, Robeson is simply not the type. The exotic quality is missing. Moreover, Shakespeare's Moor was surely a man of movement, as agile in his way as Iago. Robeson is monumental and inert. He makes no use whatever of his body, which becomes a dead weight. His voice does move, and it is fit to declaim such wonderful lines as ". . . when I love not thee, Chaos is come again." But even his voice gets out of character; it is too often reminiscent of Paul Robeson, singer of spirituals. Also its great volume is too often unstopped—some of Othello's "Oh's" are simply rushes of vast and shapeless sound.

Miss Webster's Emilia is interesting and right. The physical attraction which binds this knowing, unromantic woman to Iago is played up. The sense of their frank pleasure in each other provides an irrational yet unchallengeable explanation for Emilia's blindness to her husband's machinations. And this characterization adds greatly to the dramatic power of the last scene, in which it falls to Emilia to express and release the play's emotional impact. Uta Hagen's Desdemona is less enchanted than one's memory of the part, but hers too is a very accomplished performance. The physical appearance of James Monks, who plays the part of Cassio, makes him not quite believable as the second in command. However, he improves upon acquaintance and he acts well. Roderigo, in this production, is almost a caricature of the Dupe, and Jack Manning plays that characterization to the hilt.

The settings are unobtrusive, as they should be. And both the settings and Miss Webster's use of a stage limited in depth point up the character of Iago as the manipulator who takes the audience into his confidence.

The play, as it is here projected, is of course not a tragedy, since Iago runs the show. Only in the case of Emilia, interestingly enough, do we feel that she is the dupe not so much of Iago as of her own mixed passions. In the last scene she does arouse pity and terror—but mainly for Emilia. Every other character is essentially a puppet dangling on Iago's strings. There is therefore no clash of wills, we do not hate the villain, and virtue is only technically triumphant.

So Proudly We Fail

WE SUFFER—we vaguely realize —a unique and constantly intensifying schizophrenia which threatens no other nation involved in this war. Geography is the core of the disease. Those Americans who are doing the fighting are doing it in parts of the world which seem irrelevant to them; those who are not, remain untouched, virginal, prenatal, while every other considerable population on earth comes of age. In every bit of information you can gather about breakdowns of American troops in combat, overseas, even in the camps, a sense of unutterable dislocation, dereliction, absence of contact, trust, wholeness, and reference, in a kind and force which no other soldiers have to suffer, clearly works at the root of the disaster. Moreover, while this chasm widens and deepens daily between our fighting and civilian populations and within each mind, another—much deeper and wider than any which geography alone could impose—forms and increases between this nation and the other key nations of the world. Their experience of war is unprecedented in immediacy and unanimity. Ours, even in the fraction which has the experience at all, is essentially specialized, lonely, bitter, and sterile; our great majority will emerge from the war almost as if it had never taken place; and not all the lip-service in the world about internationalism will make that different. This, and more and worse, is all so obvious, so horrifying, and so apparently unalterable that, being a peculiarly neurotic people, we are the more liable to nod and pay it the least possible attention. That is unfortunate. Our predicament is bad enough as it stands; the civil and international prospect is unimaginably sinister.

Since it is beyond our power to involve ourselves as deeply in experience as the people of Russia, England, China, Germany, Japan, we have to make up the difference as well as we can at second hand. Granting that knowledge at second hand, taken at a comfortable distance, is of itself choked with new and terrible liabilities, I believe nevertheless that much could be done to combat and reduce those liabilities, and that second-hand knowledge is at least less dangerous than no knowledge at all. And I think it is obvious that in imparting it, moving pictures could be matchlessly useful. How we might use them, and how gruesomely we have failed to, I lack room to say; but a good bit is suggested by a few films I want to speak of now.

Even the Army Orientation films, through no fault intrinsic to them, carry their load of poison, of failure. You can hear from every sort of soldier from the simplest to the most intricate what a valuable job they are doing. But because they are doing it only for service men they serve inadvertently to widen the abyss between fighters and the civilians who need just as urgently to see them. Civilians, however, get very little chance to learn anything from moving pictures. We are not presumed to be brave enough. And the tragic thing is that after a couple of decades of Hollywood and radio, we are used to accepting such deprivations and insults quite docilely; often, indeed, we resent anyone who has the daring to try to treat us as if we were human beings.

Just now it is a fought question whether numbers four and five of the Orientation Series, "The Battle of Britain" and "The Battle of Russia," will get public distribution. Whether they do depends on what is laughingly called the Office of War Information and on what is uproariously called the War Activities Committee. The OWI's poor little pictures, blue-born with timidity from the start, have finally been sabotaged out of existence; and judging by the performance to date of the WAC, it is not very likely that we shall see these films. And if we do see them, it is more than likely that we shall see them with roast albatrosses like "The Keeper of the Flame" hung around their necks.

I can only urge you to write your Congressman, if he can read. For these films are responsible, irreplaceable pieces of teaching. "Britain," one hour's calculated hammering of the eye and ear, can tell you more about that battle than you are ever likely otherwise to suspect, short of having been there. "Russia," though it is a lucid piece of exposition, is cut neither for fact nor for political needlepoint but purely, resourcefully, and with immensely powerful effect, for emotion. It is by no means an ultimate handling of its material, but it is better than the Russian records from which it was drawn, and next to the tearful magnificence of "The Birth of a Nation" is, I believe, the best and most important war film ever assembled in this country.

Beside it Samuel Goldwyn's "The North Star" is something to be seen more in sorrow than in anger and more in the attitude of the diagnostician than in any emotion at all. It represents to perfection some crucially symptomatic characteristics of Hollywood and of the American people in so far as Hollywood reflects, or is accepted by, the people. Hollywood's noble, exciting, all but unprecedented intention here is to show the conduct of the inhabitants of a Russian border village during the first days of their war; to show real people, involved in realities, encumbered by a minimum of star-spotlighting or story. The carrying out of that intention implies in every detail the hopeless mistrust in which Hollywood holds its public. To call this "commercial" and to talk about lack of intelligence and taste is, I think, wide of the main mark. The attitude is more nearly that of the fatally misguided parent toward the already all but fatally spoiled child. The result is one long orgy of meeching, sugaring, propitiation, which, as a matter of fact, enlists, develops, and infallibly corrupts a good deal of intelligence, taste, courage, and disinterestedness. I am sorry not to talk at length and in detail about this film. I can only urge you to watch what happens in it: how every attempt to use a reality brings the romantic juice and the annihilation of any possible reality pouring from every gland. In its basic design Lillian Hellman's script could have become a fine picture: but the characters are stock, their lines are tinny-literary, their appearance and that of their village is scrubbed behind the ears and "beautified"; the camera work is nearly all glossy and overcomposed; the proudly complicated action sequences are stale from overtraining; even the best of Aaron Copland's score has no business ornamenting a film drowned in ornament: every resourcefulness appropriate to some kinds of screen romance, in short, is used to make palatable what is by no remote stretch of the mind romantic. I think the picture represents the utmost Hollywood can do, within its present decaying tradition, with a major theme. I am afraid the general public will swallow it whole. I insist, however, that that public must and can be trusted and reached with a kind of honesty difficult, in so mental-hospital a situation, to contrive; impossible, perhaps, among the complicated pressures and self-defensive virtuosities of the great studios.

The thing that so impresses me about the non-fiction films which keep coming over from England is the abounding evidence of just such a universal adulthood, intelligence, and trust as we lack. I lack space to mention them in detail

BURLINGA

(the new titles are "I Was a Fireman," "Before the Raid," and, even better, "ABCA" and the bleak, beautiful, and heartrending "Psychiatry in Action"), but I urge you to see every one that comes your way. They are free, as not even our Orientation films are entirely, of salesmanship; they are utterly innocent of our rampant disease of masked contempt and propitiation. It comes about simply enough: everyone, on and off screen and in the audience, clearly trusts and respects himself and others.

There is a lot of talk here about the need for "escape" pictures. To those who want to spend a few minutes in a decently ventilated and healthful world, where, if only for the duration, human beings are worthy of themselves and of each other, I recommend these British films almost with reverence as the finest "escapes" available. JAMES AGEE

DANCE

OF THE two additional Ballet Theater novelties that I have seen, "Pictures of Goya" presents Argentinita and her associates in a sequence of episodes similar to those she has presented without benefit of Goya, including two jotas at the end, which are the best and which the group dances superbly. And "Slavonika," revived under the supervision of Lazovsky, impresses me as it did when it was first created by Psota: a constant commotion without a significant movement—without even the significance which the movements might acquire from the personal styles of the dancers, for the leads are danced this time by Karnilova and Romanoff, who lack even technical adequacy for the tasks they are given to do.

On the same program was Massine's "Aleko," with Kaye replacing Markova who was ill. It turned out to be highly interesting. After Kaye's work in "Pillar of Fire" I thought that she might be technically less brilliant than Markova in "Aleko," but would communicate more emotional intensity; actually, to my surprise, she communicated less intensity; and when I thought back to Markova's performance it seemed to me that the greater intensity in the communication had come in the greater sharpness of her movements—in other words, from her greater technical powers. What was so interesting was the way the difference in such powers—a difference so small and yet so enormous—revealed itself at point after point: watching Kaye one saw something difficult being done well or even brilliantly, whereas watching Markova at the same point one had seen no difficulty, no effort, no doing, but only an exciting pattern of body moving or motionless in space.

A couple of nights later, because of of Markova's continued illness, a reshuffling of works and casts brought Massine back to "Capriccio Espagnol"—brought, that is, dancing which communicated inner vitality and authority and power through restraint, subtlety, unfailing plastic coherence, in place of the excessive flinging about of arms and legs that Robbins had done in the earlier performance. But Romanoff was again the inadequate substitute for Lazovsky.

It is one thing to put Kaye into "Aleko" in place of Markova; it is another thing to put Robbins into "Capriccio Espagnol" in place of Massine, or Karnilova into a role formerly danced by Baronova, or Romanoff into the roles of Lazovsky. There has been, this season, too much of minor dancers in major roles, for lack of enough major dancers in the company to take care of all situations, all emergencies—this when people like Riabouchinska, Toumanova, Lichine are around doing nothing.

Lazovsky, it seems, is in the armed forces; and on that I will let Bernard Shaw comment. In a letter to the Daily Telegraph in February, 1940, he wrote: "One of the most astonishing artistic developments in the theater of our time has been the rebirth of the high art of ballet at Sadler's Wells. We thought it had died with Diaghilev. That it could revive in its fullest excellence as an English institution in London, in an outlying theater in a neighborhood making no pretense to West End fashionableness, would have seemed twenty years ago the dream of a madman. Well, it has happened, and our British male dancers are as good as any in the world. Necessarily they are young; their ten years' technical training has to begin when they are children, and they are superannuated from leading parts when they are thirty-five. Consequently they are all of military age. What I want to know is whether these irreplaceably rare and highly skilled artists . . . are to be sent into the trenches to fill thirty places which could be better filled by thirty unskilled laborers. If they were key men in any of the mechanical trades they would be exempted as a matter of course. Being artistic key men their importance may not be appreciated by our often Philistine authorities."

I don't know what was done in England; but I believe I read some time ago that in Russia the musicians and dancers have been kept at their music and dancing—not because their talents made them privileged, but because these talents were considered as important for the nation to preserve for the future as its industrial machinery. That is something our own country understands about young physicists and chemists, but not about young musicians and dancers: if Nijinsky himself had been dancing here recently the army would now be making a soldier of him. Some of the musicians who have been drafted into the armed forces have been used as musicians, but not all: I was told recently of an oboist of one of the country's leading orchestras (good oboists, I might point out, don't grow on trees) who was taken by the Navy Seabees and is now doing heavy construction work. "A dancer," Shaw pointed out, "can keep himself up to the mark only by arduous daily practice. A year of soldiering would ruin him." It would not improve the playing of an oboist. B. H. HAGGIN

Mr. Patton and Mr. Appleby Exchange Words

Dear Sirs: In Paul Appleby's article Appetite First! in The Nation for September 25 he made a point of how amazingly close production of each agricultural commodity has been to the goal set by the government.

"That didn't just happen," the Under Secretary remarks. Right! As he undoubtedly knows, the goals each year have been figured backward and forward from "production possibilities," but more backward than forward. Goals have been readjusted downward from known needs so as to come within reach without converting, mobilizing, and expanding all of American agriculture to meet the food needs of the war and post-war periods, without annoying the high-price-through-scarcity coalition that almost succeeded in assassinating the Farm Security Administration and has succeeded in blocking proposals to count in 1,300,000 underfinanced, underequipped, and therefore underemployed farm families. This can be done whenever the American people want it done and let their Administration and their Congress know. It would require a loan authorization of one billion dollars and would yield a dollar and a half in food for each dollar invested. FSA experience shows that more than 90 per cent of this money would be repaid on time.

Mr. Appleby was careful to stipulate throughout his article that food production "could of course have been planned and directed even better," but I fear that he was attempting to put the best possible face on a pretty inadequate and sorry job. Louis Bromfield is dangerously wrong in many of his statements and his conclusions, but his general feeling of dissatisfaction can be justified, though for other reasons, such as the scandalous labor-freezing provisions of Public Law 45, under which farm labor is immobilized in many sections of the country, resulting in simultaneous labor shortages and surpluses.

Paul Appleby is too fine a mind and too much a friend of underemployed working farmers to be used as an apologist for a food-production program which he was allowed no part in framing.

JAMES G. PATTON,
President, National Farmers' Union
Washington, October 7

Dear Sirs: I was answering Mr. Bromfield, who did not make the point Mr. Patton makes in his letter. If Mr. Patton's letter has any real reference to my article, it is to ask why I took the trouble to answer Bromfield and why I didn't write about how a still better job could have been done. Bromfield gave the consuming public a wholly erroneous notion which has a direct bearing on the conduct of the war. I tried to show how little he knew about the subject, and to reassure the consuming public. Mr. Patton is not declaring otherwise. His letter is about what might have been done in addition. I agree with him that a better job could have been and still could be done by a special program helping lower-income farmers produce more. I don't agree that the failure to get that last 5 or 7½ per cent makes all the actually stupendous achievement something that shouldn't be pointed to with pride and assurance. His point I indorse; his zeal I applaud; his language tends to be too extreme in suggesting that his point is all there is to the food story. He knows better.

On Excluding the Chinese

Dear Sirs: President Roosevelt's message to Congress urging repeal of the Chinese-exclusion laws focuses public attention sharply on long anachronistic limitations against the people of a friendly nation. It is to be hoped that Congress will quickly pass the Andrews-Magnuson bills to admit Chinese to citizenship.

Within the week the American Federation of Labor convention in Boston instructed its executive council to "make a thorough study of the question of possible future revision" of immigration laws affecting Oriental races. But in this crucial period, when our Chinese allies have for six years borne the brunt of Japanese aggression, there is no time for "studying" these statutes, which are a potent weapon for our common enemy.

The original Chinese Exclusion Act was put through by Californian and Southern conservatives in 1882, ostensibly to "keep out cheap coolie labor"—after the transcontinental railroads had been built chiefly by imported Chinese.

Certainly there is no danger of any deluge of cheap labor resulting from the proposed repeal. Only 105 Chinese would be admitted annually under quota provisions. But it would remove for all time the stigma of "undesirability" from the oldest civilized nation. We owe China that act of good-will.

Some months ago our country acclaimed the First Lady of China, Mme Chiang Kai-shek. Yet this gallant lady, who represents the true spirit of the Chinese people, could never come in as an immigrant under our present laws.

Poland and Russia

Dear Sirs: Marcin Rylski's article entitled Poland and Russia, which appeared in the Political War Section of The Nation on October 9, is an unfortunate deviation from your publication's tradition of fair and forthright presentation of facts.

Historical and geographical conditions and current political difficulties make the future of Polish-Russian relations a natural subject for discussion among Poles. But in alleging that it is official Polish policy to expect a restored Poland to stand "against Russia," Mr. Rylski is absolutely incorrect. It may be true that certain Polish right-wing and reactionary groups—like the clique around Colonel Matuszewski—stake Poland's future on opposition to Russia. But these groups not only lack any influence within Poland; they are outside the Polish government and in open opposition to it. The present government of Poland is based on a coalition of left, center, and moderate political parties, all of which are in agreement as to certain fundamentals of Polish policy, including the necessity for Poland to be on good-neighborly terms with the Soviet Union. The late General Sikorski's efforts to achieve that aim are continued by his successor in office, Premier Mikolajozyk, and by the Polish democratic parties. It is regrettable that so far those efforts have remained one-sided.

Indeed, there is considerable difference in the attitude taken toward Russia by the legitimate democratic parties of Poland and those groups represented by the Union of Polish Patriots in Moscow.

The bona fide Polish democratic parties believe in international morality and the comity of nations. They are for an agreement between Poland and Russia, but they oppose any idea of "trimming" Poland against her will. For the Union of Polish Patriots, however, Moscow's word is law. As a matter of fact, its members are mostly either known Communists or old-time fellow-travelers. Others are window-dressing, and in some instances probably unwilling puppets. The Union of Polish Patriots is one of the chief obstacles in the way of Polish-Soviet friendship. The Polish government is willing to negotiate with the Soviet government, but if any results are to be achieved, the Union of Polish Patriots will have to be left out of the picture.

Mr. Rylski represents the twenty Poles and Polish Americans who signed the so-called "Appeal to Reason" as the Polish American counterpart of the Union of Polish Patriots in Moscow. I think that some at least of the twenty signatories may not relish this view. As to the group represented by Edward Puhacz, which is introduced as the London counterpart of the Union of Polish Patriots, the only thing which can be observed about them is their complete anonymity, with the exception of Mr. Puhacz himself, who is known as having been a hireling of the pre-war semi-fascist Polish regime. Moreover, he has been convicted of libel by a British court and is considered a deserter from the Polish army.

Mr. Rylski seems to have doubts as to the sentiments of the Polish people on Polish-Soviet relations. Differences of opinion may exist, but it is well known that those who advocate Poland's acceptance of Russia's claims do not belong to the legitimate underground. Allegedly "underground" papers advocating a view contrary to that taken by the Polish political parties and the Polish government are of Soviet origin.

Mr. Rylski says that the Polish people "will make their choice." It is evident from Rylski's article that his choice is made. And so is the Polish people's. They do not coincide. The Polish people have chosen the way leading to an independent, democratic republic, to social progress, and to good relations with their neighbors. They refuse and will consistently refuse to be anybody's puppets.

The Shape of Things

THE MOSCOW CONFERENCE HAS ACHIEVED almost all that could have been expected and a good deal more than it seemed possible to hope for a few weeks ago. The documents are being published just at our press deadline, and we are forced to postpone extended comment until the next issue. It is clear, however, that the agreements cover more ground than was anticipated, although many subjects supposed to be on the agenda remain unmentioned. There is, for instance, no direct reference to immediate military moves, but the only conclusion to be drawn from this omission is that the Anglo-American plans laid before the Soviet government satisfied it that its allies were giving the Red army all the backing possible. Otherwise it is hardly likely that understanding on political matters would have been so complete. The agreements fall into two parts. One document, which is signed by China as well as the three powers, lays the foundations for a permanent world organization, open to all free nations, for the establishment and protection of peace. The other agreements deal with more immediate problems, and are confirmed to the United States, Britain, and Russia. They include the inauguration of a three-power advisory committee, sitting in London, to "examine European questions arising as the war develops"; the institution of an advisory council on Italy, in which France, Greece, and Yugoslavia will participate; a pledge to Italians of full restoration of democratic rights and an opportunity to choose their own form of government; a promise to liberate Austria; an understanding about the punishment of war criminals. Of outstanding importance is Russia's adherence to the unconditional surrender formula, which removes the Nazis' last lingering hope of making a separate peace. But overshadowing all specific details is the spirit of unity achieved. This is news which, combined with recent defeats, should prove shattering to German morale.

THE OPTIMISTIC NEWS FROM MOSCOW MAY seem to dispose of the pessimistic interpretations of the Senate's post-war policy resolution given by I. F. Stone in an article on page 518. But if the studied ambiguities which Senator Connally believes to be a policy have done nothing to hinder the discussions at Moscow, we cannot believe that they have done anything to strengthen the hands of the American representatives or that they will prove of positive value at any future international conference. The resolution does little more than put the Senate on record as being against aggression and for peace, just as Coolidge's preacher was against "sin" and, presumably, for virtue. It puts forward a misty conception of "international authority" which commits the Senate to nothing more definite than international finger-shaking at peace-breakers. Even approval of the World Court might be ruled out, as one of the resolution's supporters, Senator Gillette, admitted. The "wilful fourteen" who have been fighting hard to give the resolution some backbone are not quibbling when they seek to prefix "international authority to prevent aggression and to preserve the peace of the world" by the word "an." For by giving approval to "an international authority" the Senate would be indorsing the idea of a concrete organization dedicated to the task of preventing wars. With so timid a proposal as the Connally resolution before the Senate, it is not hard to see why the isolationists are keeping out of the debate. Some of them, like Senator Vandenberg, have testified to its weakness by announcing their intention to vote for it. And while Senator Wheeler spoke against it, his speech lacked its old fire. What is difficult to understand is why the President should have approved the resolution by indirection. One explanation is that he believes vagueness will give him a freer hand. Woodrow Wilson, we recollect, thought he had a free hand, too, when he sailed for Europe.

MARSHAL BADOGLIO GAVE AN INTERVIEW last week to the American press which will make an interesting document for historians although we suspect some of his "facts" will not survive scholarly scrutiny. His line was to place the sole blame both for Italy's entry into the war and for its disastrous conduct on Mussolini. He admitted no responsibility for himself or for the army, not even in the matter of Il Duce's overthrow. That, the Marshal insisted, was entirely the work of the fascist hierachy and he himself only came into the picture when the king sent for him after Mussolini's resignation. It would seem, however, that he dates his condemnation of the fallen leader from 1940, for when Herbert L. Matthews of the New York Times reminded him of a former meeting in Ethiopia, Badoglio replied: "Those were better times for Italy." We find this unguarded remark revealing for it suggests that what turned the Marshal against Mussolini was not the latter's long record of repression at home and aggression abroad but his failure to pick the right horse in the current struggle. Consequently, we remain unimpressed by Badoglio's promise, repeated and elaborated in this interview, to resign office immediately hostilities cease.

EVENTS, HOWEVER, ARE PRESSING BADOGLIO and his royal master hard, and within the next few weeks they may, one or both, have faded out of the Italian picture. The present regime lacks both energy and authority, and it is daily becoming clearer that it cannot rally the people against Germany, cannot recreate the army, cannot restore economic life. Badoglio has now approached Count Sforza and other political leaders with a view to forming a coalition government. But before such a solution becomes possible the problem of the monarchy must be settled. Count Sforza and other prominent democrats are willing to compromise this question by retaining the crown as a symbol provided that Emmanuel and his heir, Prince Umberto, abdicate and allow the throne to go to the latter's six-year-old son. One constitutional snag is that a statute of 1938 requires that in such a case the next of kin in the royal house shall be named regent. The democratic leaders feel that both Umberto and the King are so tarred with the Fascist brush that they must be completely dissociated from the government before there can be a hope of regeneration. There appears to be no remedy for the situation except the moral equivalent of that revolution which would certainly have taken place but for the Allied occupation of the country.

THE PRESIDENT'S RECOMMENDATIONS FOR A government-financed program of education and retraining for discharged service men and women should do much to allay the doubts and fears of the members of the armed services regarding their place in the post-war world. It has long been evident that many of the men and women in the services would need special assistance if they were merely to hold their own with the men and women of their own age who, for one reason or another, had not been called into service. This includes particularly the hundreds of thousands of young people whose education has been interrupted by the war, but it also includes those withdrawn from skilled occupations and those who presumably would have had opportunity for occupational advancement if they had remained in civilian life. Surely, the government is under obligation to see that so far as possible no one who has been in the services is occupationally handicapped. Doubtless, as some Congressmen have already complained, the educational and retraining program will cost the government a considerable amount of money at a time when there will be great pressure for economies. But if one million persons, as the committee that drew up the plan estimates, take advantage of the opportunities offered, the withdrawal of so many potential job-seekers from the labor market in the immediate post-war period should make the transition from a war to a peace economy that much easier.

CREDIT IS DUE TO PM FOR HAVING FORCED Governor Saltonstall to act in connection with the repeated Christian Front assaults on Jews in the Dorchester section of Boston. The assaults, directed mainly against Jewish children, had been going on for more than a year without official attention when Arnold Beichman, a PM reporter, interviewed a number of the victims and wrote a full-page story on his findings. When the story was first called to the attention of the Governor he denounced it as a "stinking article" and had Beichman ejected from the State House. Two days later, however, the Governor ordered the state police to investigate the complaints and appointed a five-man committee to confer with him on means of checking the growth of anti-Semitism. It is not known exactly what caused Mr. Saltonstall to make such an amazing about-face, but it is apparent that either the affidavits published in PM or some other authority convinced him of the seriousness of the situation. Influence also may have been exerted by a strong editorial in the Christian Science Monitor urging action with respect to the PM disclosures. In any case, the steps taken by the Governor are long overdue. For years Boston has been a center of anti-Semitic propaganda disseminated by Coughlin and Christian Front supporters. It was inevitable that this poison should eventually lead to overt acts against the law-abiding Jewish population. The mere prevention of violence will not clear up the situation. The speakers and writers who have deliberately inflamed public opinion against the Jews, whether on orders from Berlin or not, must be held legally as well as morally accountable for the outrages.

WENDELL WILLKIE'S BOOK "ONE WORLD" is under fire from at least one quarter of the Catholic Church. The Catholic Mirror, official organ of the Springfield, Massachusetts, Diocese, in its Guide to Best Sellers, has listed the book as "Not Recommended to Any Class." In an earlier issue the Mirror carried a review of the volume by the Reverend John K. Cartwright which makes it clear that Rome is still a long way from Moscow. "It is hard to see," wrote Father Cartwright, "what advantage the people of the Ganges and Irrawaddy will derive from the fact that Moscow has replaced London either as their center of administration or as their source of propaganda." Mr. Willkie shares, he said, "the insensitiveness of most politicians to the obvious and criminal tyranny of an ally," a stirring observation which loses a good deal of its force when we recall how "insensitive" the Catholic Church itself has been to the "obvious and criminal tyranny" of Fascism. Father Cartwright, who is a Jesuit, ended by saying that the book "does have value as a curious compend of sophistical reasoning." Variety, from which we glean this item, points out that Catholic opposition adds new hazards to the scheduled filming of "One World"—apparently there have already been objections on the score of politics. Between the isolationists on the one hand and the Legion of Decency on the other, Mr. Willkie may well discover that it's still a small world, after all.

THE EXECUTIVE ORDER FORBIDDING RACIAL discrimination by firms doing business with the government has been grievously weakened by a ruling of Comptroller General Lindsay C. Warren that it was "directory" rather than "mandatory." Warren ruled that in stating that all contracting agencies shall include a non-discrimination clause in their contracts the President obviously did not mean that they must include such a clause. Thus a minor official in the Administration who is notorious for his bias against the Negro has succeeded in nullifying the order which is the foundation of the efforts of the Fair Employment Practices Committee. From the beginning the FEPC has been hampered by the lack of any clear-cut power by which it could enforce the President's order against recalcitrant employers. Its one weapon was the threat of cancelation of contract, a weapon which has now been taken away by the Comptroller General's ruling. The President can remedy the immediate situation by issuing a new order making clear that compliance is required, but the larger problem of enforcement can be met adequately only by legislative action.

THE FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE WAGE-Hour Act finds the principle of fair working standards an accepted and integral part of the American industrial structure. When the act was first adopted in 1938 there were widespread predictions of dire calamity. It was said that whole industries would be ruined, that men would be replaced by machines, and that American industry would find itself unable to compete, on either home or foreign markets, with foreign industries that were under no such restrictions. One Senator from the South declared that the act had "crucified Dixie." Actually, none of the pessimistic predictions were borne out. Instead of calamity, the act brought unprecedented prosperity to many parts of the South, and many of the prophets of despair are now among its strongest supporters. As a result of the recommendations of all of the sixty-nine industrial committees set up under the law, it is expected that the minimum wage of 40 cents an hour will soon be put into effect throughout the country, two years ahead of the deadline set by Congress at the time the act was originally adopted. Although this minimum would seem to mean little under war-time conditions, it may prove of great assistance after the war. It should be particularly valuable as a means of preventing wage discrimination against Negroes, women, and other minority groups in the post-war period.

Roads to Rome

"WHILE it is true that all roads lead to Rome," General Sir Harold Alexander, commander of the Allied ground forces in Italy, remarked recently, "it is also true that those roads are mined." Nor is this the only reason why the Fifth and Eighth armies are counting their gains in yards. The terrain over which they are fighting is admirably adapted for defense in depth. Dividing the line in two is Italy's gnarled spinal column—the Apennine mountain chain, which extends numerous spurs toward both coasts. Pouring down from this watershed are many short, rapid streams which have cut deep valleys through the land. After the recent heavy rains some of them must be formidable torrents. The few main roads wind through the valleys, and before their use can be secured the high land on both sides must be cleared of the enemy. Stone-built towns and villages perched on high rocky ground make natural strongholds.

The Italian campaign has not gone according to plan, as General Alexander frankly admitted. The original idea was to land four divisions at Salerno and push rapidly across the peninsula to the Adriatic, trapping the two or three German divisions which were opposing General Montgomery's men farther to the south. But the German command, whether by a lucky guess or by good intelligence work, were prepared, and concentrated sufficient force at Salerno to keep General Clark's army pinned down near the beaches until the threatened Nazi forces could be withdrawn. Thus the German army was able to "disengage" itself in the Naples area and with the aid of reinforcements from the north to establish itself along the Volturno. And while it has been pushed out of that position, not without some cost to our side, it has a whole series of natural defensive lines to fall back on. At the present rate of progress it may be weeks or even months before our forces come within sight of Rome.

The nature of the terrain and the narrowness of the front—it is about ninety miles from the extreme left wing of the Fifth Army to the extreme right wing of the Eighth—precludes enveloping tactics of the kind which would force Rommel to choose between rapid retreat and the destruction of a considerable part of his forces. But if we look away from the actual front in Italy and study the whole strategic picture in the western Mediterranean, we see that wider outflanking movements are possible. General Eisenhower almost certainly has at his disposal reserves far in excess of any reinforcements needed for existing Italian operations. Since he has command of the sea and air, various movements are open to him. Reports of a concentration of troops and ships at Bari on the Adriatic coast suggest preparations for an amphibious expedition to join the Yugoslav guerrillas who are keeping many German divisions bloodily occupied. The broad agreements achieved at Moscow might prove the signal for such a move.

Another possibility is a landing on the Italian coast north of Rome; if successful, this would trap the Nazi divisions farther south and might force the Germans to evacuate the Holy City without a fight—an end which is clearly of great concern to the Allied high command. Before a landing in this region can be undertaken, however, it is essential for air bases to be established in Corsica so that fighter cover can be provided to protect the beachheads. This is not the work of a day, particularly as the rugged surface of the French island makes the task of building airfields a difficult one, but we can safely assume that it is being pushed forward with all possible speed.

Some military commentators have been wondering whether Rommel will seek to disrupt Allied plans by a counter-offensive. In relation to the risks involved, the maximum strategic fruits to be gathered would be meager. But the German commander might gamble on the theory that even a temporary defeat inflicted on the Anglo-American forces would be valuable in stiffening German morale and restoring his own rather shabby laurels. On the other hand, he can hardly afford to commit a large proportion of the reserves he has concentrated north of the Po, since he must have men available to stand off a new landing in Italy or to rush to the Balkans or even to France. And events on the Russian front suggest strongly that he cannot count on further reinforcements. Consequently, while progress in Italy may prove exasperatingly slow in the immediate future, the Allies are not likely to be deprived of the initiative.

Fire-Insurance Racket

WE CONGRATULATE Attorney General Francis Biddle on his statement to the Senate Judiciary Committee in opposition to the Bailey bill. This measure would exempt the insurance business from the anti-trust laws and "affirm the intent of the Congress that the regulation of the business of insurance remain within the control of the several states." The Attorney General spoke with great ability and great courage—the insurance lobby is politically very powerful. The facts he marshaled were more than a theoretical discussion of a proposed piece of legislation, for the bill is an attempt to avoid the probability that the Supreme Court will reverse the District Court's decision dismissing anti-trust indictments against 198 fire-insurance companies operating in the Southeastern states.

The facts presented by the Attorney General make two conclusions inescapable. One is that the fire-insurance business, as operated by the combinations which dominate it, is not a business but a racket using illegal and coercive tactics to extort high profits from the public. The other is that Senator Bailey of North Carolina is betraying the interests of his own constituents to serve this group of racketeers.

Mr. Biddle's statement provided the committee with a glimpse of the complaints which led the Department of Justice to act. They fully support the strong term we have applied to the fire-insurance business. "Even complaining about the South Eastern Underwriters Association rates," an Alabama business man wrote, "is a dangerous thing, since one is helpless without their underwriters." A Southern insurance agent wrote that the combine was threatening to close him out because his brother worked for an independent company. "I must either make my brother give up his business or I must give mine up." Control of the business by trade-association and rate bureaus explains the wide and profitable margin between the billion dollars the companies collect each year in premiums and the four hundred million they pay out in indemnities. The rates bear no real relation to the risks; statistics are meager and haphazard; the combines fix whatever rates they can get away with.

Profits are high and protection money commensurate. The Attorney General pointed out that 116 of the companies involved in the pending case were among the 142 companies which raised a fund of $446,000 in 1936 to bribe the Missouri Superintendent of Insurance and Tom Prendergast—a practice all too familiar to students of attempts to regulate business. These stalwart defenders of states' rights are at the same time engaged, through powerful lobbies at state capitals, in preventing legislatures from exercising those rights. The present case originated, in fact, as a result of a plea from the Attorney General of Missouri to the Department of Justice. His efforts to prosecute companies in his state, he said, were rendered difficult, if not hopeless, because the rate-fixing conspiracies were part of "a vast interstate scheme operating as a unit."

Behind the fire-insurance companies in this fight at Washington is the rest of the insurance business, all of it tainted, all of it anxious for exemption from federal supervision. It has found a willing collaborator in Senator Bailey, who is all for state regulation and points to his own state's "first-class insurance system." This has drawn a contemptuous snort from Josephus Daniels. In his Raleigh News and Observer that grand old Democrat says Senator Bailey must have got "a bit rusty" on North Carolina insurance law. Daniels tells the story of two farmhouses, one on each side of the Virginia-North Carolina line, both identical risks, "but the rate on the Virginia house was just about half the rate on the North Carolina house." The difference measures the difference in the effectiveness of regulation in the two states. North Carolina has no real control over fire-insurance rates, but it ought to have some control over Senator Bailey.

Famine in India

EXCEPT for the information contained in a few newspaper dispatches, the world at large has had until recently little knowledge of the severe famine which has gripped India for nearly a year. According to one estimate, made by a former member of the Central Legislative Assembly, 100,000 persons are dying of starvation in Bengal each week. Official records indicate that the weekly death rate in Calcutta is approximately three times the normal rate.

Although the causes of the famine are complex, it is obvious that the war and the friction between the British authorities and the Indian people are chiefly responsible. In normal times some 1,500,000 tons of rice are imported annually from Burma and French Indo-China. This supply has been cut off now for more than a year and a half. Supplementary imports have been hampered by the shipping shortage. Army demands, including those of the American forces in India, have been large. Although crops have been satisfactory this year, the Bengal rice crop suffered from a cyclone in the fall of 1942. The situation has been aggravated by the widespread sabotage of the railways during the recent political crisis and the efforts of some anti-British extremists to encourage hoarding. It has been further complicated by the refusal of many prominent Indians, particularly industrialists, to cooperate with the British-controlled government. Because of the existing political tension, effective government action to eliminate hoarding, control prices, and provide an effective rationing system has been extremely difficult.

Yet when all the difficulties in the situation are recognized, it is evident that the government under Lord Linlithgow failed to take even the most elementary steps to meet the crisis. It is only within the past few weeks that shipments of food have been sent to India. Rationing has not yet gone into effect. The fact that Lord Wavell in his first week in India found it necessary to set up relief camps and to enlist the aid of the army in speeding up the movement of supplies and organizing an effective distribution system indicates how little his predecessor had done. There is reason to hope that the steps being undertaken under Wavell's direction will alleviate the situation until the rice crop is harvested in January. But unless the United Nations divert shipping from urgent military purposes to rush food from Australia and New Zealand, tens of thousands of additional lives are certain to be lost. Added to those dying from starvation will be other tens of thousands doomed to death from disease as a result of a shortage of medical supplies and a breakdown in public health services. The situation presents a challenge which the British must meet if they are to justify at all their continued presence in India.

Post-War Gold Brick

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, October 28

DEBATE on the Connally resolution began Monday. It will probably continue well into next week. I dropped into the press gallery Tuesday to hear Senator Pepper speak against the resolution. Gluyas Williams could do justice to the scene in the green-carpeted amphitheater, under the yellow light seeping down from the glass ceiling, reinforced by steel girders against air raids that never came. There were not many more than twenty Senators on the floor when Pepper began, and though a few more drifted in during the afternoon, about the same number drifted out. Little attention was paid by those present. Several pairs of Senators carried on intermittent but animated conversations during the proceedings. One or two read newspapers. A few looked like aged schoolboys catching up with their lessons at the narrow Senatorial desks—the kind we had in the primary grades, with the top opening upward. There were usually one or two Senators wandering aimlessly about the chamber during the proceedings, stopping here and there for a chat, lighting a cigar, or just scratching their heads. They look pretty much as you would expect—commonplace middle-class lawyers or business men. A tendency to the pompous manner and florid speech is the principal mark of their high office, and a good many of them would be spotted instantly as phonies in any country store or corner pool room. Most of them have obtained office by ducking as many issues as possible, and they are still at it on the biggest issue of our time.

The debates, other reporters tell me, have been as poorly attended every day. There is not much use in looking in the Congressional Record to see whether your Senators were there. There was a time when a Senator could be counted present on a quorum call only if he was physically present in the chamber. The rules have never been applied so slackly as during this debate. Senators are counted present on roll calls all day if they have once put their head in the door and caught the clerk's eye, or made a telephone call, or even left word where they could be reached. I am told by a competent newspaperman that one Senator was counted present although he was in Baltimore—the theory being that he was within reach. At least on one day a Senate clerk was marking those physically present on a roll call in ink, those present only in spirit in pencil. This doesn't show up, of course, in the Congressional Record. The principal characters while I was there were Ball, refreshing in his youthfulness and simplicity, Connally, with his meager white mane and black-ribboned pince-nez, looking like a ham actor playing Senator, and Pepper, whose orotundity and tendency to make speeches even in private cover a real devotion to the public interest combined with a great deal of political agility.

I'd hate to think of the men in the services and their families at home watching these Senate debates by television. It might destroy faith in representative government, though the real test is not what happens in the Senate chamber but what you and I and several million others do about it. A little band of wilful men is once again at work in the Senate, but this time it is a band determined to establish, rather than to block, some system of international cooperation to prevent another world war. They're going to keep talking as long as they can. They hope that after a few days the country will wake up to what is going on and by pressure on the Senate force a less ambiguous statement on post-war international policy than that in the Connally resolution. Tonight there comes news that the executive committee of the C. I. O., meeting in Philadelphia, has adopted a resolution. The C. I. O. will have to do more than pass a resolution; I hope it will. Austin of Vermont has joined the original fourteen—Pepper, Ball, Hatch, Hill, Burton, Ferguson, Guffey, Green, Murray, Downey, Truman, Kilgore, Bridges, and Maybank. They are putting on a good fight. It remains to be seen whether the country's admitted desire for some kind of world order is only a vague sentiment or strong enough to affect the Senate.

The difference between the Connally resolution and the Pepper substitute is not one of mere semantics. The former, like the Mackinac declaration, can mean anything and therefore means nothing. The peace it will preserve is the peace of mind of the politicians at the next election. The Connally resolution, and the manner in which it has been handled, is an attempt not to obtain but to prevent a genuine declaration of post-war policy. Connally's maneuvers enabled a hand-picked subcommittee of eight to usurp the powers of the full Foreign Relations Committee. The committee itself refused to hold public hearings. The resolution was voted out and the Senate asked to take it or leave it in the form in which it was written. If it is accepted, there can be no genuine expression of opinion at the next election, because the resolution is so ambiguous that a vote for it is no test at all, and voters will be unable to separate internationalist sheep from isolationist goats.

Though Connally himself is on record for stronger action than whatever it is his resolution envisages, the chosen text undoubtedly suits him. His committee had been holding the lid on any post-war resolution since last March, and some months ago in the cloakrooms colleagues heard Connally say, "We'd better hurry up and adjourn or some damn fool will be bringing up a post-war resolution or the poll tax." Connally wanted no resolution if possible, an ambiguous one if necessary. The subcommittee's sudden action is undoubtedly linked with the Moscow conference, as Connally himself has more than once hinted. The large Polish vote in several important cities, the Administration's entente with the Vatican, always pro-Polish, and the far from dead desire for a cordon sanitaire impel Roosevelt and Hull to seek the restoration of Poland as it was in 1939. Their only possible talking point with the Russians is that the Soviet Union need not worry about strategic boundaries because there is going to be a real system of collective security after the war. Hull wants a resolution to show Stalin. I doubt whether anyone here is naive enough to think so hard-headed a customer can be sold so obvious a gold brick. The Connally resolution is nothing that anybody could rely on, but maybe some people are thinking that in a pinch they can say, "Look, we offered the Russians a system of collective security but they still insisted on their 1941 boundaries." I hope I'm wrong, but I think something of this sort is buzzing behind the diplomatic scene.

Overshadowing this Weltpolitik as played by the diplomatic pigmies is a desire on the part of common folk to have done with war and lawlessness between nations. The Connally resolution, as Pepper warned, moves toward World War III. The Pepper substitute will not preserve peace, but it will take us one little step in that direction. The time to prod the Senate is now.

"Face" and Freedom in Asia

BY H. G. QUARITCH WALES

LAST August, on the occasion of the forty-fifth anniversary of the American occupation of Manila, President Roosevelt promised to establish a Philippine republic "the moment the power of our Japanese enemies is destroyed." On September 24 Senator Tydings offered a resolution—now under consideration by the Senate Territories Committee—authorizing the President to free the Philippines immediately. The other United Nations continue to be vague about their intentions in Southeast Asia, though with the increase of military pressure on Japan in the near future, the question of the post-war status of the reconquered countries will become an urgent one. If we are to gain the support of the inhabitants we shall have to announce a policy which promises to fulfil their national aspirations. So far the need for such propaganda does not seem to have been recognized.

On two occasions in the past few months our lack of comprehension of the situation in Southeast Asia has been revealed. Japan's "gift" of two Shan and four Malay states to Thailand and its granting of pseudo-independence to Burma were dismissed by press and public as of no importance because all the territory involved remained as before under Japanese domination. In referring to the former event an editorial in the New York Times came forward with the information that the Shans "may or may not be remotely related" to the Siamese. The writer evidently did not think it worth the trouble to ascertain the established ethnographical fact that the Shans (or Greater Thai) are the closest of kin to the Siamese (Lesser Thai) and speak a different dialect of the same language. The very word Siam is merely a corruption of the word Shan. Some weeks later the Times belatedly recognized that Japan's psychological warfare ought to be countered but was still convinced that its stratagem was "characteristically clumsy and bound to be abortive."

It is not easy for the materialistic West to appreciate that where "face" is concerned Orientals make a less rigid distinction than we do between the shadow and the substance. A semblance of immediate independence is more likely to win their support than promises of real freedom some day. The transaction of the Shan states illustrated Japan's understanding of this principle.

I saw an earlier scene in the drama enacted in 1936 when I happened to be in Bangkok on a gala occasion. The streets and public buildings had been decorated in the usual way. Then unexpectedly a novel display was created overnight in one of the public gardens: a flower bed was laid out as a huge map of Siam—a greater Siam, including the coveted Shan and Malay states as well as a goodly slice of territory that had been stolen by the French. The flower bed had a huge popular success. Bangkok's citizens and their country cousins in town for the festivities flocked to admire it. Eventually word reached the ears of the British and French ministers. But before a complaint could be lodged at the Foreign Office, the flowers had faded and the Siamese authorities could plead ignorance of the whole affair.

Seven years later the dream seems to have come true. Perhaps Luang Pibul and other educated leaders are not deceived. But a great many people are happy that they can now plant their flower gardens and color their maps as they please, with no white man to say them nay. Besides, Japan's gift helps them to believe its other promises—for instance, that the misery caused by the forced change from rice to cotton cultivation is only a temporary phase of the slightly delayed "co-prosperity."

Lord Wavell knows what we shall be up against in the reconquest of occupied Asia unless we can offer the people a program more attractive than that of the Japanese. He knows how much depends on the invading army's receiving the active cooperation of the inhabitants. He has warned that the natives of Southeast Asia will oppose a return to the old colonial system. What indications are there that we intend to heed his advice?

Last July the British Colonial Secretary, Colonel Oliver Stanley, so far improved upon Mr. Churchill's well-known statements as to announce the government's willingness after the war to collaborate closely in the British colonies with neighboring and friendly nations. But he did not disclose when the "progressive approach to self-government" would be likely to reach its goal, the only real interest of the peoples concerned.

The Dutch alone among European colonial powers have come forward with something approaching a comprehensive plan for the future of their Asiatic dependencies. This plan, though it is not official, would have to be taken into consideration in formulating any Allied propaganda policy, since it is the work of Dr. George H. C. Hart, chairman of the Board of Economic Affairs of the Netherlands Indies, Surinam, and Curaçao. As explained by Dr. Hart in the March issue of Pacific Affairs, it calls for partnership of the colonies with the Netherlands in a commonwealth the members of which are apparently to be bound much more closely together than are the members of the British Commonwealth. The Indies are to share in the administration of the commonwealth and to have a greater degree of autonomy in domestic affairs. In the June issue of Pacific Affairs the Hart plan was critically discussed by Professor Raymond Kennedy, who showed that it is quite possible to interpret the "charter" as merely a continuation of the old system behind a new façade. As Professor Kennedy pointed out, the plan is silent on such points as whether there will be an appointed governor general or an elected chief executive, the extent of the franchise, the system of representation, and provisions for education.

If Professor Kennedy's doubts are unfounded, no time should be lost in dispelling them. The Dutch "charter" interpreted as he has shown it can be would make no appeal to the Indonesian nationalists. It is of no value to the United Nations as propaganda.

The principles of the Atlantic Charter lie ready to hand. Why not decide that they do apply to Asia after all? One reason of course is that they conflict with the arbitrary division of territory among the colonial powers. As long as we allow this to stand in the way of the natural and logical coming together of related peoples—which even the Japanese are willing to permit within their "co-prosperity sphere"—we shall fail to win the good-will of the peoples of Southeast Asia. We bemoan the supposed inability of India to unite. Why continue to divide those who wish to come together?

Historical claims based on former aggressions cannot be considered valid. If they were, the Siamese would have quite as good a right to the Malay States as any European power ever had. They can point to historical documents proving their suzerainty from 1350 A.D. until the arrival of the white man. In fact, however, the Malays hate and fear the Siamese, and Siam's claim here lacks the legitimate basis that a demand for union with the Shans would have. Allied propaganda must recognize the growing desire of the peoples of Southeast Asia, as they gain political consciousness, to coalesce along lines of cultural affinity.

The Malays of Malaya had already under the British begun to question a system which considered the people of one river valley a political unit distinct from those in the next. By a natural extension of this process they will be unwilling to remain forever divided from other Malaysian peoples, particularly those of the Indies. (They would probably exclude the inhabitants of the northern Philippines, who though of Malay blood do not share the same culture.) What is more, in antiquity most Malays did form a single prosperous nation, the history of which is now well authenticated. Unfortunately not we but the Japanese decided to remind them of this fascinating point. If now we wish to offer the peoples of this region something better than the Japanese fiction we must not seek to perpetuate the haphazard patchwork of empire.

An essential part of our propaganda, if Japan's psychological warfare is to be effectively combated, must be exposure of the enemy's false promises. We must show that while the Japanese preach nationalism and independence they practice imperialistic absorption. How else is to be explained their corruption of Buddhism and even of Christianity and Islam into some form of Shinto, with the intention of fostering spiritual allegiance to the Japanese emperor, or their attempt to impose Japanese culture by rewriting local laws, using the Japanese language in the schools, and opening Japanese "halls of culture" in the cities?

But the definite offer of real freedom is the one United Nations move that the Japanese propagandists really fear. That was evident in the reaction of the Tokyo radio to President Roosevelt's pledge to the Philippines. Deep consternation was thinly veiled beneath an announced intention to hasten the coming of Philippine independence "under the guidance of Japan." Less than two months later the Japanese set up a puppet republic, with José P. Laurel, a Filipino collaborationist, as its President.

To counteract the effect of such moves the Western powers should make public a time-table stating definitely when the various peoples of Southeast Asia will receive full freedom after the reconquest, the dates to be determined by the degree of their political advancement. Ultimately, of course, the question of boundaries must be taken up. The time-table should be guaranteed by the Asiatic group among the United Nations, leadership of which has been earned by China in this war. After this has been done, the other nations should seek the aid of China in impressing the sincerity of their purpose on the peoples to be liberated from Japan.

Diary of the Future

BY VERNON BARTLETT

II. Peace Breaks Out

JULY 18. To all intents and purposes the war is over. There is a good deal of fighting going on in the Erzgebirge and Sudetenland generally. The Czechs have been magnificent here, although they are virtually unarmed. They attack the Germans with spades, scythes, or bare fists. German divisions are also holding out in the Eiffel and the Black Forest. There has still been no formal surrender. Not one word has come over the radio for nearly a week to suggest whether Himmler, Ribbentrop and company still control the government, or even whether there is a government to control. The contradictions in their radio programs are fantastic.

France is now entirely free. Proclamation yesterday from the Committee of National Liberation in Algiers that elections will be held within three months for a new Constituent Assembly. The committee will transfer itself to Paris before the end of the week.

July 19. Berlin is in Allied hands. This was announced in a special broadcast by the Prime Minister before the 1 p. m. news. Armored cars reached the city's outskirts from the south and southwest before dawn. At about the same time gliders landed at the Tempelhofer Field and other airfields near Berlin. They took over all government buildings without much trouble.

Believe it or not, State Secretary Meissner turned up at the German War Office to welcome the commander-in-chief of the Allied forces. Meissner has been doing jobs of this kind, irrespective of the political color of his boss, ever since he was appointed by Ebert, first President of the German Republic. The most astonishing political chameleon in history, he seems to be the only minister who has stuck to his post.

Revolutionary committees have been established in Kiel, Hamburg, Danzig, and some towns in the Ruhr. Trouble among the armed forces seems to have begun in Kiel, as it did at the end of the last war. One sailor broadcast tonight from Hamburg and called on all men in the armed forces to arrest their officers and to form Workers' and Soldiers' Councils.

Just after listening to this man I turned the knob on my set and heard Admiral Räder telling the German people that the war had been lost and further resistance was useless. As one might have anticipated, he insisted that, once again, civilian morale had not stood up to the strain. The Reichswehr, he said, had not been defeated but had withdrawn, partly in order to avoid further useless casualties inflicted by an enemy with great superiority in all arms, and partly to give this enemy no excuse for doing further damage to historic German towns. He ended his broadcast with an assurance that the day of Germany's recovery and revenge would dawn. When he had finished, the band played "Deutschland über Alles." It also began the Nazi hymn, the "Horst Wessel Lied," but there was the sound of some kind of altercation, and the program came to an abrupt end.

July 21. At last a man has come forward to form a government in Germany, and if he is allowed to do so I hope every Allied government in Europe collapses. It ought to, for the man is that stupid and conceited man Ribbentrop. He has the collaboration of that other poor and unprincipled creature von Papen, and of a number of little-known generals. These men are in hiding somewhere, it is believed in the Black Forest, and they submitted their document—their terms, one might almost say—to the Allied High Commissioner's office in Berlin.

The document has the nerve to begin with all the old nonsense about the necessity of building a barrier between Communist Russia and the rest of Europe. It goes on to emphasize that the reluctance of responsible persons to form a government in Germany is a danger to the whole continent and "threatens civilization with disintegration." Ribbentrop claims that he worked with Hitler only in the hope of guiding his great energies and power into peaceful channels, and points out that in the great purge of June 30, 1934, Papen's closest friends and collaborators were murdered by the Nazis. This is supposed to show not that Papen is a moral coward but that he has never been a whole-hearted Nazi.

Then comes the inevitable reference to the army's lack of interest in politics, with the reminder that it was for years the opponent of Hitler. The generals, it is insisted, were against his reoccupation of the Rhineland, his campaign against the Czechs, and his attack upon the Soviet Union. The members of the government, or proposed government, hint that they are all gentlemen, with standards of behavior very different from those of the Nazis, the Communists, or, it is implied, the Socialists. They would gladly cooperate with the Allied forces but would, of course, need to be left with sufficient armaments under their control to enable them to keep order.

July 22. Jan Masaryk spoke up in behalf of the smaller nations today at the United Nations Committee in St. James's Palace. He quoted from articles in the American press hinting that the State Department would have very little time to consult individual European governments, and that those which most conformed to American views would get most help. Masaryk wanted to know whether these articles represented British and American opinion. He was given the usual diplomatic answer, and expressed his opinion of it with his usual refreshing frankness.

The truth is that Hitler has done two incompatible things to Europeans. He has united them by economic measures and by common suffering, but at the same time he has encouraged their acute sense of nationalism by trying to crush it by force. The Norwegians have developed a new sense of unity with the Yugoslavs, the Belgians with the Poles, as they have heard how hardships similar to their own have been inflicted on people way on the farther side of Europe. But these people have also had to suffer so much because they were Poles or Belgians or Norwegians or Yugoslavs that their national pride is much stronger than it was.

This is where Americans may make a blunder that might easily wreck the peace conference. Ever since their intervention in the De Gaulle-Giraud business they have failed to pay attention to the sensibilities of these Europeans, whose diversity of culture is responsible for the contributions they have made to civilization.

July 23. Himmler has reached Argentina. His machine was refueled in Spain and again somewhere in West Africa. It is not yet known how so important a person, even though he carried fake papers, escaped recognition in Brazil. The Foreign Office is extremely worried about the problem of extradition. Public opinion will certainly demand the surrender of such a prominent war criminal, but nobody quite knows what will happen if the Argentine government refuses to give him up. Bill Stoneman and other American newspapermen believe the United States, as leading promoter of the Pan-American Union, would be opposed to the use of pressure on Argentina.

Lunched at the Belle-Meunière with Dr. Negrín and Pablo de Azcárate, Prime Minister and Ambassador in the last government in Spain in any way elected by the people—and therefore the only government to which, without interfering in Spanish affairs, we could turn when the Franco regime disappears.

The conversation turned on a debate yesterday in Parliament in which a small group of members did less than no good by making a fuss about the bases leased to America by Britain, and about the American press campaign for more bases in other parts of the world. Surprisingly strong opinions were expressed about Gibraltar. No Spaniard, not even a Spaniard with so international a point of view as that of Negrín or Azcárate, likes the British occupation of Gibraltar. But I was surprised by the violence of Azcárate's reaction when it was suggested that the United States and Great Britain—with the Soviet Union and China a little in the background—should control Gibraltar among other bases which must be internationally controlled if an International Police Force is to do a proper job.

Azcárate wasn't in the least anti-American, but he didn't see why the United States, any more than any other country outside Europe or Africa, should control the entrance to the Mediterranean. He would rather have the present regime continue than have Gibraltar under the control of two great powers instead of one. His argument favored, rather, a full association of the smaller powers in any international arrangement.

Raymond Daniell of the New York Times was dining at a neighboring table and joined us for coffee. He pointed out, with a little justifiable bitterness, that a lot of us Europeans who had grumbled in the past because the United States paid too little attention to the affairs of the rest of the world now grumbled because the United States was paying too much attention to them.

A blunt reply has been broadcast to Ribbentrop and his buddies. The governments of the United States and Great Britain, in consultation with those of the other European United Nations, have no intention of dealing in any way with men whose crimes against mankind are so many and so appalling. They are fully prepared to govern Germany themselves, if need be, until a new generation of Germans is able to take over control.

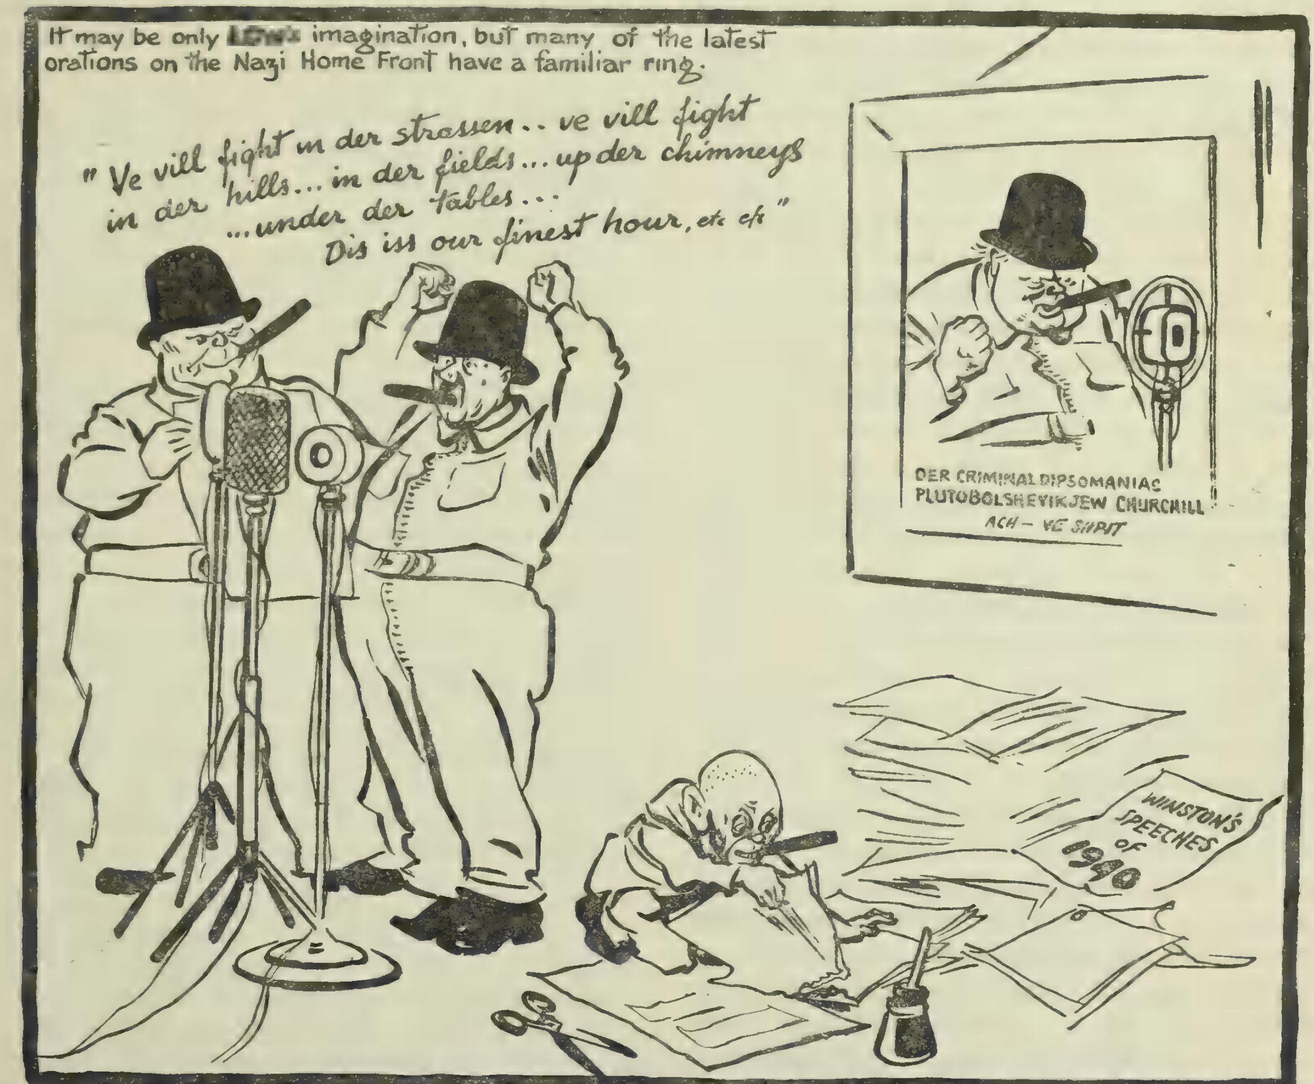
This announcement was broadcast and published this morning. It is encouragingly precise, but some of the effect of this precision was destroyed by one or two comments in Parliament suggesting that the nation is not united in rejecting all dealings with men like Ribbentrop.

This evening's papers announced that, as the result of a raid carried out by American troops based on Strasbourg, Ribbentrop, Papen, and seventeen important Reichswehr officers have been arrested. So much for that stupid, arrogant man!

July 29. Went today to Bloomsbury House, hitherto headquarters of the German refugees in Britain, and found the place a pandemonium. This is the result of the report in the morning papers that all refugees are to be sent back to the land of their birth. Shinwell, in a question yesterday in the House of Commons, had failed to get a convincing denial of the report, and this doubtless added to a panic already encouraged by letters and editorials in some of the Tory papers.

Many of the refugees hope to go back to Germany, but they want to hear much more about conditions on the Continent before they return to it. On the other hand, a lot of the refugees hope never to return to Germany, because their memories of their last few years there are so bitter. On the whole, the older people want to stay here; the younger people are prepared to get back into the political struggle to make Germany a country fit for democrats to live in. It seems pretty beastly that a few members of Parliament and some papers should start a campaign to rob these people of their free choice. Apart from everything else, there is enough confusion in Europe already without sending thousands more people to add to it.

The Soviet attitude is becoming much clearer, but not more reassuring. Russian armies intend to control territory from Danzig to Istanbul. Among the secret documents of the czarist regime published by Trotsky after the Bolshevik revolution was one claiming that Russian territory should stretch westward as far as the River Oder, and some people believe that Stalin has that claim in mind. As the Russian army is the only organized and disciplined set of men in Eastern Europe, this advance presents no real difficulty. Some American papers have gone so far as to suggest that Anglo-American troops should get there first, but most of the forces in Europe and the Mediterranean are British, and no British government could possibly push them into war against Russia. Great Britain and Russia cannot afford to quarrel, and the smaller nations of Europe would be the first to suffer if they did.



It may be only [redacted] imagination, but many of the latest orations on the Nazi Home Front have a familiar ring.
" Ve vill fight in der strassen .. ve vill fight in der hills ... in der fields ... up der chimneys ... under der tables ... Dis iss our finest hour, etc etc "
DER CRIMINAL DIPSOMANIAC PLUTOBOLSHEVIKJEW CHURCHILL
ACH – VE SHPIT
WINSTON'S SPEECHES OF 1940

IMITATION THE SINCEREST FLATTERY.

But it is not at all certain the Russians want to keep the territory they have occupied. Their emphasis on Free Rumanian, Free Bulgarian, and Free Hungarian movements suggests that they don't, but that they do not intend to have hostile governments in neighboring territories. Above all in Hungary, where a revolution has been overdue for a generation, the British and American negotiation with the same old bunch of land-owning aristocrats has aroused the liveliest Russian suspicions. The Anglo-Saxons have even dug out men as discredited as Tibor Eckhardt and as old as Count Bethlen.

In the Far East Soviet policy is rather more involved. Those few but fairly influential Englishmen and Americans who used to argue that there was no great hurry to open up a second front in 1943, because the Russians and the Germans were rather conveniently killing each other off, are now hoist with their own petard. Russians are now said to be telling themselves that Japan will be defeated, anyhow, and that it won't do any harm if the other United Nations suffer fairly numerous casualties in the process.

July 30. There's hell to pay. Serious rioting took place on Sunday in the Ruhr. Most of it was probably spontaneous, since the whole area has been terribly knocked about in air raids and a good many workers who had been transferred to work in factories in Austria and Czechoslovakia are now coming back to their native soil and are shocked by the state it is in.

There has been a lot of sporadic rioting in the last month, but this was much more serious. The Workers' and Soldiers' Council in Essen had stated in advance that resolutions would be passed at a demonstration denouncing the great industrialist families—Krupp von Bohlen, Thyssen, and so on; and it was clear that trouble was likely. But the same old division of responsibility between Allied military and civilian authorities stood in the way of sensible precautionary action. No warning was given in advance of any demonstration, and consequently nothing was done to limit its scope. Then, when it got really out of hand and began setting fire to the mansions of these Ruhr millionaires, Allied troops were called out. In the end they did what any troops would have done in similar circumstances: they turned their machine-guns on the crowd. And ill luck would have it that the troops in this case were Americans.

The effect in Washington has been instantaneous. The isolationists, the Russophobes, the Russophiles, the progressives, and the Anglophobes all seem to be united in criticizing the American Administration. American boys should be brought home instead of becoming involved in Europe's civil wars is the main isolationist argument. The Russophobes lay emphasis on the rumor that the demonstration was encouraged from Moscow. The Russophiles and the progressives generally are disgusted that Americans should be using machine-guns to defend German industrialists who have been the originators of two world wars. The Anglophobes trot out the old argument about the wily British Premier who has persuaded the guileless American President to play a dominating part in Europe while American boys are dying in the South Pacific.

[The third instalment of Mr. Bartlett's diary will appear next week.]

25 Years Ago in "The Nation"

IF IT IS TO BE a Junker peace, if the essential, underlying principles of the President's fourteen peace terms are not to be accepted, the world will go on in the same old stupid way—headed, as Mr. Asquith has just said, for destruction. . . . The more is the pity that Mr. Wilson has made the great blunder of allowing his dull and narrow Postmaster General, his narrower Attorney General, and all the other agencies under his control, to suppress adequate discussion of the war and of peace aims. . . . At the very moment of his extremest trial our liberal forces are by his own act scattered, silenced, disorganized, some in prison. If he loses his great fight for humanity it will be because he was deliberately silent when freedom of speech and the right of conscience were struck down in America.—November 2, 1918.

THE RESULTS OF THE ELECTION are specially gratifying to the suffragists. . . . The prohibitionists also will derive encouragement from the returns.—November 16, 1918.

NOW THAT REAL REVOLUTION is threatening or under way in Austria-Hungary and Germany, our conservatives have suddenly become alarmed at a process which is the inevitable result of the war we have been witnessing.—November 16, 1918.

FOR SEVERAL WEEKS the American public was kept in a state of agitation by reports of a "general massacre of all the upper classes" of Russia on the night of November 10. . . . The hideous affair was pre-described, commented upon editorially, and, save for the practical details of execution, carried through by the press before the fateful day arrived. . . . The only action of the Bolsheviki . . . was a general order "giving amnesty to all arrested hostages and persons alleged to be involved in plots against the Soviets except those whose detention is deemed necessary as a guaranty for the security of the Bolsheviki who have fallen into enemy hands." Not one newspaper copied this report. Having accomplished the massacre it might have seemed inconsistent to bring the dead to life, as well as weakening to the lavishly documented case against the Bolsheviki.—November 23, 1918.

THE SEMI-OFFICIAL ANNOUNCEMENT that President Wilson proposes to attend the peace conference has elicited a variety of opinions from newspapers and public men. The published expressions of opinion seem to be, on the whole, unfavorable to Mr. Wilson's plan. It is pointed out by critics that it would be an unprecedented thing for a President to cross the ocean or to attend an international conference.—November 23, 1918.

Tax Idle Savings!

BY GEORGE RICHMOND WALKER

WHEN Stuart Chase advocates taxing idle money—"defrosting uninvested savings," as he puts it—it is a simple case of dog biting man (no offense to Mr. Chase). But when Eric Johnston, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, comes out with the same suggestion, that is a case of man biting dog. It's news; it's good tidings; the world should sit up and take notice.

Perhaps Mr. Johnston would change his mind if he carefully considered the implications of his words. However, he did say in the September Reader's Digest that the government "needs to turn around and say to every investment dollar: If you stay idle, you pay full taxes." When asked specifically whether that meant he was advocating a tax on idle investment funds, he replied that this interpretation was correct.

In considering a tax on idle money it should be said at the outset that the tax is not a sudden bright idea of the money reformers. It is not, indeed, a money reform at all but a basic modification of the structure of capitalism. The economic theory which explains and justifies it stems from Adam Smith and comes down through Malthus, Proudhon, and Gesell; it is a line of thought that has run parallel to orthodox capitalist and socialist economic theories almost from the beginning, and offers an alternative to both. Probably Mr. Johnston is not aware of this, but no matter. He believes in a dynamic and competitive system of private enterprise, and he has perceived that such a system cannot function if capitalists are permitted to withdraw from economic activity—at will, for as long as they please, and without penalty.

The economists of capitalism, including even Keynes and Hansen, have assumed without question that investment must be induced by the expectation of profit. If investment outlets are insufficient, or if there is dissatisfaction with political or economic conditions, then capitalists have the privilege of holding their funds idle. But when they do so, the consequence is depression. As the investment of capital provides employment and expands the plant and equipment of industry, so the refusal to invest causes business stagnation.

Consider what this means. It means that those few who own or control investment funds have the power to prevent the expansion of industry. It means that they have the power to employ labor but no responsibility for employment. It means that holding as they do the threat of depression in their hands, they can coerce or frustrate the will of the majority, block reforms, and wear down a liberal Administration. The right to hoard investment funds is thus clearly anti-democratic and inconsistent with the successful operation of a private-enterprise economy. To deny the right would not mean a decrease but an enormous increase in economic freedom, for economic freedom means the opportunity to live, to work, and to produce and not the privilege of denying this opportunity to others.

Professor Hansen's scheme of public works, which forms the core of the National Resources Planning Board's post-war program, would not cure the evils of capitalism but would tend rather to preserve them. To capitalists he says in effect: "You may continue to save as much as you please; you may continue to limit your investments in private industry at the point where they yield the most profit; and you may invest your surplus savings in government bonds at a rate of interest that is satisfactory to you." The privilege of not investing would remain untouched, and therefore all political and economic factors would still have to be ordered to the satisfaction of capitalists, for otherwise they would invest neither in industry nor in government bonds. And again the consequence would be depression.

Industry itself, however honest its intentions or however carefully it plans, cannot solve the problem of unemployment, for industry cannot provide employment beyond its ability to sell the goods that its workers produce. The sales of industry depend upon consumer expenditure and capital expenditure. To the extent that income is saved, consumer expenditure is reduced; and unless the savings are promptly invested, the sales of industry, and likewise employment, will necessarily decline. Thus the power to employ rests ultimately with the individuals and business concerns having funds available for investment.

A tax on investment funds, although it would leave many problems unsolved, would transform the face of our economy. Imagine capitalists eagerly searching for outlets for their funds and gladly accepting whatever rate of return they could get! Imagine the effect upon monopoly control of prices if small and medium-sized industrial concerns could readily borrow the funds needed for expansion! Imagine the effect on business in general if producers knew that all the money paid out by industry in costs and profits would return promptly to buy the goods and services produced!

If the suggested tax were now in effect, the Treasury could borrow the funds it needs to finance the war without further recourse to banks and without any of the nagging, the parades, or the ballyhoo. People would rather buy 1 per cent bonds than pay a tax on their idle funds.

And after the war the tax would have these highly beneficial effects:

1. It would act as a continuing stimulus to spending and investment. A tax on idle capital, like a tax on land, would discourage its being held out of use.

2. It would cause a rise in the price of outstanding securities, real estate, and other capital assets, and thereby reduce their yields. A point of equilibrium would be reached when the yield from existing assets equaled the rate of return that could be secured from new capital investment, with risk factors taken into account.

3. With the rise in the value of existing assets the proceeds of capital-gain and estate taxes would be greatly increased.

4. Security markets would become stabilized and speculation would diminish. Flights from securities into cash and from cash back into securities would no longer be profitable.

5. Saving in excess of the demand for new capital would be discouraged; the ratio of spending to saving would increase; the effective demand for the products of industry would be maintained.

6. Funds could be borrowed at low rates by towns and cities and spent on municipal improvements; low interest rates would also stimulate private housing.

7. The rate of turnover of demand deposits would rise and become stabilized; the volume of money could then be effectively controlled with the view of preventing both inflation and deflation; changes in the volume of money could no longer be offset and nullified by changes in its velocity.

8. And, finally, the system of private enterprise would function at or near the level of full production and employment, and there would be much less need for public spending and for bureaucratic controls.

A tax on money hoarding would not destroy capitalism; on the contrary, it would release its creative energies. The tax would destroy the predatory power of capitalists to prevent an expansion of industry and to maintain an economy of high prices, low wages, and scarcity. The problems of a dynamic economy would remain with us, but not the general problem of economic stagnation.

If these results are desirable, from a liberal point of view, then a tax on funds available for investment should be item number one on a liberal program for the post-war world.

[A second article by Mr. Walker, explaining the mechanism of a tax on savings, will appear in an early issue.]

A "GOVERNMENT GIRL" in Washington reports the following incident as a drastic introductory lesson in Yugoslav politics. Meeting an attaché of the Yugoslav government in exile at a Washington party, she made small talk by asking an innocent question about the Croat problem. "Croats!" cried the eminent Yugoslav, looking as if he were on the verge of apoplexy. "Croats! You want to talk about us, and you talk about our enemies!"

THIS SCRAP OF CONVERSATION was overheard recently in a New York department store long known for the care with which it selected its employees and the terror of dismissal in which it kept them. Customer: "I'll report this to the manager!" Salesgirl: "So what? So they'll fire me. So what!"

PAUL J. O'CONNOR, Florida's deputy commissioner of internal revenue, favors a federal sales tax as easier to collect than the 20,000 delinquent income-tax accounts on his books. "It looks like those 1942 taxes are going to have to be forgotten," he told the Miami Beach Lions Club, "because the cost of locating the people and collecting the taxes will be prohibitive."

THE CRITICAL FACULTY: The Commonweal finds James T. Farrell's "My Days of Anger" a good book, but adds this note of caution: "It contains very coarse language. As the reader will gather from any review of this book in any paper, Catholic or not, its place is on the reserved list."

OLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

The Greek United Front

BY BASIL J. VLAVIANOS

HE news from Greece is extremely confused. Various contradictory reports have appeared in the American press, most of them garbled and leading. News emanating from Egypt and the Near is distorted by a ruthless censorship, which seems gned primarily to stifle the truth about the nature of Greek resistance. The reason for this is simple: pub- ion of the truth would create an atmosphere un- rable to the return of King George II to his country. sequently, foreign correspondents in Egypt must er cable nothing at all or repeat the confused and erally inaccurate stories furnished them by the sup- ters of the King.

ecently we have been told that Greece is divided, the guerrilla leaders are fighting each other, and the King and the British authorities have shouldered burden of appeasing them. The truth is quite differ- Small clashes, provoked by royalist propaganda, been greatly exaggerated by groups interested in ting the King upon a "divided" Greece. Actually, Greeks as a whole are united in their struggle against foreign and domestic tyrants. They are striving to ate themselves from the German and Bulgarian and to prevent the reestablishment of Greek fascism er George II.

heir unity is clearly reflected in a moving report h I received some weeks ago from the head of a gation sent to Egypt by the National Liberation t and other underground organizations. This report, ed by Elias T. Tsirimokos, former member of the k Parliament and now general secretary of the n for Popular Democracy, one of the groups form- the Liberation Front, describes the struggle against nvader as "the hardest and most beautiful ever un- ken by the Greek people."

e National Liberation Front (E. A. M.) was cre- one month after Germany's invasion of Greece to dinate the activities of various popular factions, otic organizations, and civilian movements. Its aims be summarized as, first, liberation of the country the foreign occupation, and, second, establishment popular government after the liberation. It keeps up ance to the invader by organizing armed struggle e countryside and hostile demonstrations in the cities. Greek people's support of the Liberation Front is reaction to the misery, starvation, and moral degra- n to which they have been subjected.

In the first year of the occupation, 1941-42, the chief concern of the Greek people was to escape destruction by starvation. People could not even obtain rationed bread. Owing to the inflation and the scarcity of foodstuffs, Tsirimokos said in his report, wages and the salaries of public officials were "nothing but wages of death and starvation." But in spite of the widespread misery the spirit of opposition and the strength of the popular movement grew day by day. Demonstrations of open revolt against the conqueror were staged, general strikes were called, and political warfare was carried on by every possible means.

On March 5, 1942, for instance, the news that citizens were to be drafted for compulsory work was the occasion of an enormous demonstration, organized in twenty-four hours, in Athens and Piraeus. About 250,000 people gathered at designated places and marched in the streets for many hours, despite the violent intervention of the Italian police. Many persons were killed and wounded, but the draft was frustrated.

Another important manifestation of resistance took place on July 22, 1943, when the expansion of the Bulgarian occupation in Macedonia became known. The Germans had declared that they would resort to unusual force to put down militant demonstrations. Only a few weeks before, they had executed 106 men for participating in one. However, more than 300,000 Athenians gathered that day to protest against the Bulgarian occupation, ignoring German bullets, hand grenades, and tanks.

It is known, from Tsirimokos's and other authentic reports, that as the result of successful guerrilla fighting a large section of Greece is today free and self-governed. Only the big cities, where the Germans maintain their garrisons, and the roads leading to the border are controlled by the invaders. Under the surveillance of guerrilla and underground organizations freely elected communal councils administer the country. Free Greece is living "under the most democratic laws the Greek people have ever known."

The National Liberation Front, or E. A. M., is the largest as well as the oldest of the Greek underground movements. Its army is known as the Greek Liberation Army, or E. L. A. S. Among other guerrilla units are the Greek National Democratic Army, or E. D. E. S., and the National and Social Liberation Group, or E. K. K. A. All have fought heroically against the incomparably superior forces of the enemy. The Allied command in the Middle East, with which the Greek guerrillas are connected, has repeatedly expressed the warmest admiration for their achievements. But the guerrillas are strongly opposed to the King, who gave impetus to the Greek fascist dictatorship. And this opposition is responsible for the systematic concealment of underground activities by the government in exile. Just as the truth about Tito's Partisans in Yugoslavia was suppressed, so the deeds of the Greek guerrillas, united in their opposition to King George II, have been relegated to obscurity by the propaganda of His Hellenic Majesty.

NOT BLUM, BUT STALIN

Everybody remembers that from 1936 to 1938 the slogan of the haute bourgeoisie in France was "Better Hitler than Blum." Some weeks ago during the height of the Russian advance there appeared chalked on the walls in one of the most conservative towns of France a new variant on the old theme: "You didn't want Blum; now you have Stalin." In this small episode is crystallized the political meaning of the last decade. The conservatives who saw in every popular movement, from the moderate socialism of Léon Blum to Roosevelt's New Deal, the specter of Moscow now face Moscow as an indisputable reality—the strongest force in Europe today.

The "civil strife" in Greece of which we read, to the extent to which it exists, is instigated by royalist agents. Tsirimokos openly denounced the King's methods in his report: "The whole movement of liberation has not only been ignored; it has been obstructed by agents sent to Greece. Abroad, calumny has characterized the aims of the heroic fighters for freedom as wicked and anarchistic." The idea of the King and his supporters is to win over, by any means at their disposal, one or more of the guerrilla leaders in order to divide the opposition and to substantiate their claim that anarchy would follow the elimination of the monarchy. They have been working zealously for months and months, and are still working, toward that end. On June 11, 1943, the London Tribune said that division among the Greek forces might result from this lamentable policy. The Greek liberals in this country issued a similar warning.

Owing to the censorship no one here is in a position to know how far King George's divisive propaganda has succeeded. But on August 10 the British managed to smuggle out of Greece and to bring to Egypt a delegation representing the Greek guerrilla and underground movement. This delegation was composed of three former members of the Greek Parliament—two of the Liberal and one of the former Royalist Party—one Independent Democrat, one Conservative, and one Communist. All these men are prominent in the groups which are resisting the German and Bulgarian occupation supporting the cause of the United Nations. Some long to the E. A. M., others to the E. D. E. S. or E. K. K. A, that is, to the organizations which, acc ing to the correspondent of the New York Times, engaged in bitter internal strife.

Not the slightest sign of any dissension among t has been apparent since they arrived in Egypt. Not have they reached a complete accord with the mili authorities in the Middle East on how better to sync nize the efforts of the guerrillas with those of the Al forces, but they have worked closely together in tr to solve the Greek political problem.

On August 17, 1943, the delegation, together with Exintaris, the accredited representative of all the G parties—except the Communists—in the last Parlian of 1936, and Mr. Kanellopoulos, who resigned last M as Vice-President of the government in exile, sig a letter to the Prime Minister, Mr. Tsouderos. It clared that "for the sake of national unity, which a insures the success of the national struggle and the mal development of the country, it is necessary th be announced that the King will not return to Gr before the people have decided on the form of gov ment." On receipt of the letter the Prime Minister mediately called a meeting of the Cabinet, and aft long discussion all the ministers, including the Pr Minister himself, one of the King's most devoted herents, decided to pledge themselves to support demand expressed in the letter and to inform the K of their decision.

Instead of making the required declaration, w any man of good faith would unhesitatingly have d the King refused. Ignoring the Greek constitution more and the political rules which require the Kin follow the advice of his ministers as long as he k them in office, he retired to Lebanon "for reason health."

This story was kept strictly secret from the Amer and British public until the Greek National Hera New York published the Tsirimokos report, sent through private channels. It is still impossible to ob accurate information of what is actually happenin Egypt. George II has succeeded in withholding all n about the representatives of the Greek people and attitude of his ministers, who have often seeme variance with him. At the same time the most dub stories have begun to circulate about alleged "civil str among the same guerrilla groups whose representat are collaborating so closely and harmoniously in Eg

Mystery still shrouds the situation. But two things certain: first, that news about the civil war in Gr has been deliberately exaggerated; and, second, that dissension among the guerrillas has been prov chiefly by King George II and his supporters.

M time to time the German high command disontents make some interesting revelations. They or example, that listening to foreign broadcasts, s so strongly condemned by the Nazi Party, has even to officers. In a detached, almost apologetic e circular says of this:

> tening to foreign broadcasts will be punished by rther paragraph shows that older men in increasnbers are filling up the ranks of the army. Offi-> ly way. Do we clearly understand that it is in-> sible—indeed, it would be idiocy—to subject such > o shouting and abuse from morning to night?

he air-raid bombings are again the chief convo weeks ago this column quoted from a circular given to German soldiers when they go home e front on a furlough. Here is what is said to the on the same theme:

> ny soldiers nowadays go home with a heavy heart.
> e urgent duty of officers—one which must not be l care must be taken to keep soldiers who have leave from spreading scare stories among the or this reason it is the duty of officers to "speak ry man on his return."

> When non-commissioned officers and men come back, they will have an urgent need to unburden themselves, to unload their worries, to get advice. The company commander should seize this opportunity to explain to them how wrong it would be to spread wild stories among their comrades. The reality is bad enough; any exaggeration is a crime. Above all, soldiers returning from leave must be told very forcefully that under no circumstances may news of this kind be communicated to the civil population of the occupied countries. That would be grossly prolonging the war.

Hitler has seldom made a speech without referring to his "fanatical" will or his "fanatical" faith. For years Germans were aware of this habit but were not especially struck by it. Strangely enough—as people's reactions are always strange—when he used the same word in the speech he made at the beginning of September, he seems to have scored a hit. It must have had a burlesque effect. For suddenly in popular speech he began to be called the Oberfanatiker, which means both "super-fanatic" and "top fanatic." It is reliably reported that in conversation people speak of him more and more not as the Führer but as the Oberfanatiker.

Hagen is a large industrial city in Westphalia. Near it is a camp for prisoners of war. When the city experienced one of the severest air raids at the end of September, some of the prisoners seized the opportunity to escape. On October 7 the Hagen newspapers and placard pillars carried an announcement by the mayor which is worthy of note. It informed the inhabitants that the authorities knew that a number of the fugitive prisoners were not only staying in the town but had been received into people's homes, where they were being concealed and fed. The mayor reminded the inhabitants that persons who thus helped the enemy made themselves liable to punishment by death. But the hosts of the escaped prisoners could not for a single moment have been in doubt about this fact, and that makes the whole episode the more remarkable.

The actualities of life in one of the destroyed German cities were pictured in the Dagens Nyheter of September 12 by a Swedish woman just back from Düsseldorf.

> Wherever I looked, whatever street I took, the same sight met my eyes—the fantastic forms taken by the pieces of house fronts still standing. The streets had been cleared, and people walked about like ghosts in a modern Pompeii. They lived in cellars, which were often intact though the house above had been destroyed. One frequently saw placards on the walls asking the salvage units not to dynamite the walls as the cellars were inhabited. The opera, the theater, and the hotels have been destroyed; the town's finest shopping street, the Schadowstrasse, is a heap of ruins.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Art of Pre-Columbian America

MEDIEVAL AMERICAN ART. By Pál Kelemen. The Macmillan Company. Two Volumes. $22.50.

WHEN land was discovered west of the Atlantic, the real shock to the European mind—which had always vaguely expected this discovery—was the realization that it was new land, unaccounted for in their philosophy. They evaded the shock by calling the natives "Indians," and by identifying them with the Lost Tribes of Israel or the survivors of Plato's Atlantis, and they were in general uninterested in asking what these people were really like. Nothing brings this fact home more clearly than the publication, after 450 years, of "the first book in any language to survey the achievements of all artistically important cultures in pre-Columbian America." It is interesting also that the European provincialism should still persist in the title of this book, as if you couldn't say anything more important about pre-Columbian art than that it coincided with the medieval period in Europe.

This impression is actually irrelevant, for the book as a whole is quite free of the condescension its title suggests. It is a simple, straightforward digest of the available archaeological information to date, an attempt to assemble a continuous picture out of our scattered bits of knowledge. Anyone who has tried for himself to sift through the writings of archaeologists and anthropologists and historians, each one concentrated on his own interests and locale, will appreciate what this means, and how fine a job has been done. At times the account slips into the natural dulness of the textbook, but for the most part it is so astonishingly good that one is tempted to leave criticism for praise. It is lucid and inclusive, simple enough for the general reader but solid enough to be useful to the student as well, and it is abundantly illustrated. The importance of such a book can hardly be exaggerated.

An important book must be judged stringently, however. This is especially true of books on art, and of books on American art, for they are uncommon and desperately needed. Grateful as we are for a study like this, we have a responsibility to measure it against the ideal. The quality of the plates, to begin with, is still not good enough—they are still not up to the level of the Propyläen-Kunstgeschichte series of pre-war Germany, for example. Some really bad photographs—Stela H at Copán, for one, and the gold Quimbayo pendant from Cleveland—reproductions from Maudslay's half-tones, and merely routine views of such sculpture as that at Quiriguá, good enough for identification but in no sense demonstrating its peculiar aesthetic quality, are disappointing in a volume so impressive. If you are writing about art, your reproductions have to be good enough to speak for themselves. On the other hand, one must be grateful for the quantity—there are more than 900 illustrations. And although there are certain curious omissions, such as the columned hall at Mitla, the dynamic kneeling figures fro structure 11 at Copán—of which good photographs do —and the more humane Mexican heads, the choice i markably comprehensive.

Perhaps the primary criticism of the text is that so of it is given over to a mere detailed description of the trations, item by item; so that it is rather a catalogue t text and might more happily have been arranged as in juxtaposition to the plates. The lack of any general interpretation to orient the reader amounts at time scholarly negligence. Thus in the section on Andean wea it is impossible to get a clear idea of the sequence of per of the relationships in time of the various sites, or o relation of styles and motifs to periods and sites. Term ogy is used freely without definition. We read on page of an "embroidery from the Ica Valley in Nazca st and on the next, of a fabric of "the Ica period, fro Nazca Valley." I am aware that this inadequacy derives the author's sources, and that it is hardly just to criticize for their carelessness. One can, however, give a clear ment even of confusion.

And is it too much to expect that the author will contr something to his material? Ideally the writer on art does things: he points to the object so that the reader will see it, and he interprets it in such a way that this iso thing will fall into a universal scheme of aesthetic va the most valuable thing about the book is that it does pr as art what has too often been seen as merely anthropolo material. The critical attitude, however, is singularly u sidered and inarticulate. Although he deprecates the fact

"our civilization tends to evaluate an art by the way it de the human figure," and insists that different ideals of sonal beauty should be recognized, he fails to indicate permanent artistic qualities to which such varieties of in human features or in architectural decoration are sidiary. There is almost no reference to qualities of ma or characteristics of design. That passion for mass, com ness, and the weight of the stone which constitutes a sculptural attitude is never defined in speaking of sculpture. He comments that the faces on the Mochica Chimu pots "have nothing either cruel or exaggerated a them"—but what does that mean? These portraits ar contradiction of the easy generalization that "the In were not interested in realism," and the author make effort to explore their significance. Perhaps that sort o ploration is too much to ask for in the first book that even the material together; but it does make the differenc tween an able, intelligent survey and a really valuable tribution to the field.

This book shows pretty well what is known abou

Countess Draws a Blank

MR. BLANK. By Countess Waldeck. G. P. Putnam's ons. $2.50.

E Mr. Blank you are invited to meet is Herr X, leader f the Germans after Hitler. Who on earth will this ank be? If you want to know, meet Countess Waldeck. ads you past the dummies of everyone who could pos- e considered and says quite impartially: This might be e; that one is unlikely; this one is out of the question. she abandons her impartiality and says: This one be best.

course Countess Waldeck is personally acquainted with all the possible Mr. Blanks. She talked with Fritz n once in a sanitarium and with Prince Louis Ferdinand, on of the Kaiser, in the New York house of an Ameri- iter—pardon me, of a famous American writer. Thus ows which of the gentlemen have charm and which have ake Schacht, for example; "the moment he begins to e finds he has charm." Fat, jovial Göring "has charmed lly everyone who has come in contact with him." Otto r has a "civilized charm." Even when one discovers, ore careful analysis, that she did not know the gentle- rsonally, she appears extremely well informed. Field l Rommel—one of her possible Blanks—has a sh charm." Yes, and she knows the character of each d his secret ideas, and little anecdotes about him, ic or not. Mixed in with all this are political reflec- nd theses some of which are not unintelligent. And in also are seemingly erudite historical analogies and ions, derived in many cases from unknown sources. mple, she says that Foch thought the men who signed itulation of 1918 were representative of a new and d Germany. But as you read farther you find that in one the book is extremely original, in fact, a pioneer in For after the Countess has denied any chance to a Mr. Blank, a Social Democratic Mr. Blank, a liberal nk, and a big-business Mr. Blank—and on the other ter she has granted a very good chance to a Com- Mr. Blank—she urgently recommends the Mr. f her own choice. Now then, her choice is a setup consisting of Göring, Schacht, and Meissner. The last-named, in case you don't know, has been the personal "State Secretary" of the head of the German state for a quarter of a century; under Ebert he was a Socialist, under Hindenburg a conservative, under Hitler he is a Nazi. Of course in Countess Waldeck's opinion it would be still better if this trio could be completed by a Kaiser Louis Ferdinand. That this would be feasible appears doubtful even to her. However, Göring, Schacht, and Meissner—supported by the generals and the army, the two churches, and the trade unions—are not only possible leaders but practically indispensable. The Allies could do no better than to instal them. Göring is "well liked," he has a "hold over the masses." Schacht is simply a genius, "the smartest man in Europe." "He could fill the shoes of a German Talleyrand remarkably well." Thus we have here the definite proposal that the victors not only accept Messrs. Göring and Schacht but deliver Germany over to them—and not only so that these men can sign the capitulation but so that they can guide the Reich in "peaceful development" toward a progressive future.

The theory is that only they "could make the peace stick with the German people." The great goal of making the peace stick will necessitate "expediency." "Only if Mr. Blank gets the German nation behind the peace terms can a lasting peace be expected." And only a man who is recognized by the German people as a strong man "will be able to line up the German people behind the peace terms."

Now there is some truth in this. It will not be easy to line up the German people behind any peace terms—even the enviable terms that Countess Waldeck recommends. For she insistently recommends such a peace as Talleyrand maneuvered for France out of the Allies of 1815—and that, as is well known, was peace with some territorial aggrandizement thrown in. So that the Talleyrand redivivus, Schacht, may maneuver a similar peace for Germany out of the present Allies is precisely the reason she wants him for Mr. Blank. Apparently it has not occurred to the author that her suggestion that even a peace of that kind could only with difficulty be made to stick is a disturbing thought. But the problem is real. It will not be easy to get the German people behind any peace terms, and that fact will perhaps bring abundant fulfilment of the author's desire for expedients. Perhaps for a long time there will be no German government at all. Or perhaps there will be no peace treaty; or the occupation will be long. But for that reason to seek out Göring and Schacht to serve as Mr. Blank—and in addition to arm them with a Talleyrand peace—would be an expedient to condemn not because it is an expedient but because it is the caricature of one. For the question is not only, Are they strong enough "to make the peace stick"? but would they want to? As to that—take my word for it, says the charmed Countess. We can only trust that her word will not reach very far. Schacht and Göring of all people! As if they never had the opportunity to make a peace stick!

This is the first time that a proposal of such a kind, set down in black and white, has been made in this country. Fortunately a glance at the author is reassuring—and a glance at her can scarcely be avoided, for "I know," "I think," and "I say" are her chief arguments. Now the registered wife of the unknown Count, as has already been publicly established, is the former Fräulein Rosie Goldschmid of Mannheim. She has long been known to be the victim of a desperate case of snobisme. Her book is simply the result of a new attack of this wasting sickness. LEOPOLD SCHWARZSCHILD

Captain Ingersoll Reports

THE BATTLE IS THE PAY-OFF. By Captain Ralph Ingersoll. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

RALPH INGERSOLL went into the army and found a strange sort of peace. At first he was miserably unhappy at being wrenched away from the editorship of PM, and he hated intensely his grueling basic training as a private. Gradually he became swallowed in the vastness of the army and fascinated by its intricacies. When he made twelve bull's-eyes with his rifle, he was so pleasurably excited that the trembling of his hands made further shooting difficult. The organized killing of Germans became his crusade. For a subcrusade, embodied in this book, he chose the very object of his early hatred—basic training. It should be made far tougher!

Private Ingersoll went up the hard way to become Captain Ingersoll. No doubt he was good in his military job, but he remained Crusading Journalist Ingersoll and certainly excelled in that role. More or less by accident he turned out to be the first highly successful realization of the concept of soldier-correspondent. He himself puts the accent on the soldier part; feeling a little guilty about his army leave, he tore through the writing of this book in 100 hours and felt grateful when the War Department allowed it to be published. The War Department could scarcely have missed this bet, for here is powerful propaganda in the good sense.

The episode around which the book is built took place in the early part of the Tunisian campaign before the British Eighth Army broke through the Mareth line. The Americans were assigned to knock the Axis out of a mountain pass south of Gafsa. In order to take the defenders by surprise, American rangers and engineers made a terrific night march across the mountains—a march which would have been impossible for untoughened men—and without pausing for breath attacked the enemy's flank. Lieutenant Ingersoll, as he was then, went along on the march as an observer with the engineers, helped to direct mortar fire, and was nicked by a Stuka bomb that killed men near him.

His account of the engagement is war reporting at its best. Thanks to his gift for detail, one gets right into the middle of the battle; and thanks to his ability to synthesize complicated military operations, one sees the whole picture. This capacity for portraying both the forest and the trees is rare; newspaper correspondents seldom achieve it in their chopped-up daily cables, and few authors of books possess the requisite combination of inside information, battle-front experience, and narrative talent.

In the capacity of crusader-journalist Ingersoll devotes pages to educating his readers about how the wheels go round in this marvelously complicated army. He tells things which people need to know, but frequently don't, in order to understand how the war is fought. He describes the mechanics and psychological effects of a booby-trap, tells how many platoons are in a battalion, and makes clear the dual functions of G-3. He is particularly impressed with the enor organizational achievement of delivering millions of complete with the wherewithal to live and fight, in far ters of the globe. Hitler's suicidal miscalculation, he th was to underestimate the organizing ability of the Ame people.

This great negative service, however, fell short of

THE MODERN CASE FOR SOCIALISM

By JOHN PUTNAM

179 PAGES CLOTH BINDING $1.50

THE MODERN CASE FOR SOCIALISM includes all of the sound older arguments as well as a number of significant new arguments for Socialism. It makes use of the best of Marxian theory and also utilizes the theory of monopolistic competition. It points out that Socialism is inevitable not only because of the technological changes so brilliantly described by Marx and Engels, but also because of the increased economic strain which modern war imposes upon Capitalism. The gross wastes due to competition and private initiative are described separately for each of the major industries.

The author of this book was an Associate Professor of Economics at a large state university and is now an economist with a Government War agency. He writes under a pen name.

Fiction in Review

IT IS the sad story of current fiction that almost without exception, and whatever their particular little stamps of individuality, the new novels all seem to fall into one or the other of two equally abortive categories. They are either action stories—on the lowest level, historical romances—in which we get a play-by-play account of what happened, narrative unrelieved by characterization, insight, or comment; or they are "intellectual" novels, stories of emotion and sensibility in which nothing ever happens except in the minds of the characters. It appears that contemporary writing is unable to make an amalgam of these two extremes; it is unable, that is, either to comment on action or to dramatize emotion.

Elizabeth Janeway's "The Walsh Girls" (Doubleday, Doran and Company, $2.50) belongs in the second of these categories. Here is a novel whose life is so unremittingly internal that you long to cry out, in the famous exhortation of Henry James, "Dramatize, dramatize!" Mrs. Janeway starts with a perfectly good fictional idea, the relationship between two neurotic sisters, and she is an intelligent woman —in the sense, I mean, in which you grade an author for her understanding of her own theme. But you follow the history of the Walsh girls to its weak and contrived resolution with the increasing certainty that everything Mrs. Janeway has finally set down as her finished novel should have been simply spade work, the things she thought in her own head before she ever put pen to paper. In a better literary tradition all the reflection, explanation, and documentation which are the end-product of "The Walsh Girls" would have been merely the work of literary gestation; then would have come the real job of creation, the job of manufacturing a plot—a dramatic situation or a series of dramatic situations—to embody the author's knowledge of her characters.

If Mrs. Janeway had gone about her work in this way I can imagine that "The Walsh Girls" might possibly have emerged not as a full-length novel at all but as a dramatic novelette. And in that case, provided of course that Mrs. Janeway had been able to match her seriousness and psychological insights with an informed prose, she might have produced something fine and tight, like, say, Edith Wharton's "Ethan Frome," instead of another long, dreary record of confusion and maladjustment.

But to get back to the book as given and away from the dream of the book that might have been. The unhappy sisters of "The Walsh Girls" are Lydia, a repressed spinster, and Helen, younger and prettier, recently married to George, her childhood sweetheart. Before the story opens, Helen has been married to a German who was murdered by the Nazis. It is the memory of her tragic European years that Helen wishes to erase in her alliance with George, a solid citizen, but along comes Lydia to threaten her younger sister's effort at therapy-by-marriage. A domineering, self-sacrificing schoolteacher, Lydia would try anyone's patience, and her presence in Helen's home all but destroys the younger woman's already precarious balance. It is at this point that Mrs. Janeway introduces a touch of real horror: as a result of their strained companionship each of the Walsh sisters decides that the other sister is quite literally crazy. The final element in this pretty kettle of conflicts is a certain Charlie who unbelievably falls in love with Lydia, scaring that poor creature out such wits as she has left.

And all this dismal company resides in a Connect town alarmingly devoid of possibility. The investigat through the length of a long novel, of two tortured psyc with no room to move around in would surely tax the sources of the most talented writer—and Mrs. Janewa less talented than she is uncommonly courageous about s of the darker aspects of family life. For instance, of relationship between Lydia and Helen she gives us much m than the usual small-talk of sisterly jealousy; she shows, one thing, that family affection is not always the gene affair it looks to be and that people often help one ano for reasons of their own which are far from worthy. Ind it is insights such as these that impart to "The Walsh Gi its only strength and compensate in some small part fo enveloping tediousness.

I have come rather late to J. B. Priestley's newest novel, "Daylight on Saturday" (Harper and Brothers, $2.5 the story of an airplane factory. None of Mr. Priestl novels is ever as interesting to me as he is sympatheti a person. For Mr. Priestley seems a rare creature: e mously busy encouraging the English to beat the Nazis, still has time and the prime will to do everything that he within his talents, to prevent the war from being fough vain—to name the careerism that motivates so large a pa the patriotic effort, to prepare for the hungers and mise that will find a voice as soon as the guns stop roaring warn against the powers that be in English official life, to try to educate decent instincts to a reasonable orde society. I can think of no equally established American w who is using his pen to the same sound purpose, an from the point of view of fiction, this most recent of Priestley's vehicles moves a little too much like one of machines whose place in future civilization Mr. Prie wants to control before it is too late, I for one am read forgive it.

FILMS

VERY late—but the film is ready for national release, I am glad to say—I hacked through the thicket of "delightfuls" and "enchantings" which had kept me at a distance, to see "Jeannie," a gently characterized British-made comedy about a Scottish peasant woman who discovers, in the course of a trip to pre-war Vienna, that she doesn't have to feel like an old maid after all. A more acute pointing of the roles of an English business man (Michael Redgrave) and an almost traditional sponging count, more accuracy with the Viennese bourgeoisie (the hotel personnel seems very good), and sets much more evocative in details could have made it an entirely beautiful film. But Barbara Mullen alone (as Jeannie), in her prim, sharp-tuned delicateness, would make it one of the easiest, sweetest of light comedies; and I must apologize for my slowness in agreeing with everyone else who has seen it.

The Cagney brothers' first independent piece, "Johnny Come Lately," seems to persuade many people that the Cagneys (and others) should stay dependent. I do not agree. The film does show a fatal commercial uneasiness and, I half suspect, radical loss or atrophy of cinematic judgment. But "Johnny," before it breaks down into a panic of melodramatic and comic propitiation, does give a gentle and leisured if not very memorable first hour whose tone and pace would never have survived a big studio; there is a very appealing performance by Grace George; and there is a general ambience of hope and pleasure about the production, which, regrettably, loses its glow. The hazards of independence are great unless you have daring, brains, ability, and a basic unconfused carelessness about whether you go bankrupt or not; but with very few exceptions I believe that anything good in films which comes out of this country, at all soon, is bound to come from the independents.

Something I have learned only by hearsay is, I think, worth passing on as plausible. A former Hollywood man, now with the Signal Corps, went along with the raid on Kiska. On the way he did a fair amount of shooting of the colossal paraphernalia, the slow inflation of the controlling personalities, and (I hope) the generalized tension between life, memory, future, and death, which are bound so laboriously to converge upon any such action. Once there he also photographed, enthusiastically, the two dogs, the scrupulously impudent inscriptions, and the general letdown which were all the Japanese left. He exposed, in all, a good many thousand feet. They may have been the record of what some people feel to have been the turning-point of the war—the moment at which the Japanese went somewhere else in preference to heaven, as we have learned to expect of them. Or they may have been the matrix of one of the funniest and most mitigating pictures about war which could ever conceivably be made. I suspect they may have been both at once, and I suggest that the title "Desert Victory" was used too soon. In any case, if I have heard right, my conjectures are as irrelevant as my hearsay must be counted unreliable. The complete negative, unless my informant has been misinformed, was destroyed in Washington.

JAMES AGEE

ART

SIXTY-EIGHT of Van Gogh's oils and eleven water colors and drawings (at Wildenstein's until November 7) go to make up the most important show of the artist's work since that at the Museum of Modern Art in 1935. The Van Gogh Problem, of which we are reminded from time to time by single pictures, asks again for solution. Exactly how great a painter was he? The problem is made no easier by this exhibition, in which the complete masterpieces are too few and far between.

It is more difficult to judge painters fairly than writers and composers. The difficulty is physical. Color and texture cannot be reproduced in their full values for purposes of circulation. Because a sufficient number of the originals of a painter's masterpieces are seldom present in any one place at any one time, we fall into the habit of demanding the absolute measure of his talent from every picture, good or bad, as long as it's an original. We do not ask as much of the lesser works of writers and composers simply because their best is just as accessible. I think it hardly fair to pronounce on Van Gogh without having seen all his masterpieces, but that is part of the inevitable presumption of writing about art.

A roomful of Van Goghs has an impact. Yet all but some seven or eight of the paintings here lead to the question whether the impact has as much to do with art as with that emotion or quality of strikingness which Kant distinguishes as analogous to th beautiful, but only analogous, in th its presence makes us linger on the object embodying it because it keeps a resting our attention. It is the qualit to which primitive art, at its best o worst, owes its inevitable effect upon th cultivated observer, and which is pa of the emphatic physical presence o the work of art that exposes to fu view its inner workings, its means o effectuation. With Van Gogh there als enters the power of an original temperament frustrated by its rupture wit that world of logic, competition, an compromise in which it found itself.

I do not hold with Dr. Alfred M Frankfurter that in the means of expression Van Gogh chose for himsel he was never "other than an amateu with a divine genius." There is to much good painting in his bad picture to say that. Van Gogh's distortion o vision, induced no doubt by his psychopathic state (compare with Roussea Douanier and Eilshemius), arrived a results of the same order as those o Cézanne's inability to draw with academic correctness. The "rarity wit which Van Gogh touched complet mastery"—to quote Dr. Frankfurte again—was due to a faulty comman not so much of his medium as of h temperament. Van Gogh became to obsessed by the pattern glimpsed in nature. The frenzied insistence with whic he tried to reproduce this pattern in h separate brush strokes and give it th same emphasis over every tiny bit o canvas resulted in pieces of violent decoration the surfaces of which had bee ornamented instead of painted into picture. Similarly, Cézanne's preoccupation with the justness of color value down to the last millimeter in the delineation of space and volume mac him lose sight at times of the whole i view. In his case, though, segments a least of otherwise unsuccessful picture survive as superb texts in the painter' art. It was Van Gogh's misfortune an distinction that, unlike Cézanne, h could not rejoice in the limitations o his medium.

The appreciation of an artist has it own history. At this moment several o the Van Goghs of the Paris perio (1886 to 1887) seem to please eve more than the later work—though the are not quite as original—especially th Renoiresque "Bridge Across the Seine, in which subtle touches of pure, hig color are so well placed to define spac and its tensions. The self-control her and in the "Corn Field," the flowe y only one of the bands, heard on only one record-side, played on riverboats; and what the volume offers is simply eight enjoyable performances—spontaneous and vigorous in style, with fine solo passages—recorded by small groups of Negro musicians between 1926 and 1928. Some of the musicians I never heard of before—among them a trombonist named Albert Wynn, and a trumpeter named Punch Miller who is good but not as good as the characteristically extravagant and confused booklet in the set would make him. Others are men as familiar as Joe Oliver, Albert Nicholas, Barney Bigard, Luis Russell, Pop Foster, Paul Barbarin; and some of them turn up in Set B-1009, "Harlem Jazz 1930," which offers performances that were recorded by four of the famous Negro large bands between 1929 and 1931. The best of these are the Duke Ellington "Jolly Wog" and "Double Check Stomp" (80035) and the Fletcher Henderson "Just Blues" (80037), in which the ensemble scoring leaves plenty of room and freedom for the excellent playing of the soloists; in "Radio Rhythm" the Henderson band goes through a lot of motions without anything really happening; the Luis Russell "Saratoga Drag" (80038) has a good tune, spirited ensemble playing, and one good solo passage by Red Allen and Greeley Walton, but "Case on Dawn" has only its ensemble drive; the Don Redman "Shakin' the African" (80036) is better than "Chant of the Weed," which has only distinctively clever scoring and gets tiring for lack of anything more.

One of the pianists in the "Riverboat Jazz" volume, Alex Hill, contributes two exciting solo performances on one of the records (80034) in Set B-1008, "Barrel House Piano," along with others by Mary Lou Williams (80033), James P. Johnson (80032), and Frank Melrose (Kansas City Frank) (80031). Melrose is the only real barrel house pianist of the four; and the title is used here for several styles of piano-playing that are strong, driving, and filled out. Aside from this they are, of course, different—Mary Lou Williams's, for example, being richly intricate, Johnson's flashily brilliant. All are, however, enjoyable.

Set B-1007, finally, "Chicago Jazz Classics," offers performances recorded in 1928 and 1929 by Benny Goodman with groups assembled for the purpose that included Joe Sullivan, Jimmy McPartland, Wingy Manone, Bud Freeman, Glenn Miller. And what all these men do individually and together, is so bad that it is almost unbelievable.

With Markova out of the company for the remainder of the Ballet Theater's New York season Tudor's "Romeo and Juliet" was given with Nora Kaye as Juliet. Her performance was excellent—and for me surprisingly so; for after her heaviness in "Aleko" I was not prepared for the lightness and delicacy she achieved in "Romeo."

On the same program was Tudor's new ballet "Dim Lustre," to Richard Strauss's Burleske for piano and orchestra, and with scenery and costumes by Motley. The first time one sees Tudor's choreography—say in "Lilac Garden"—one is struck by the distinctiveness of the movements; as one continues to see it in other ballets—"Pillar of Fire," "Romeo and Juliet"—one is struck by the recurrence of these movements, and struck all the more since they are so few and are therefore repeated so much. But in "Pillar of Fire" and in "Romeo" there are also new things—additional movements for the new ideas and situations, providing new contexts for the old movements; whereas in "Dim Lustre" there are new subject (very slight), new scenery (not very good), new costumes (very handsome), for which the choreography is made out of nothing but a few old mannerisms. The dancing of Kaye, Laing, and Hightower was fine.

In contrast to this is Lichine's "Fair at Sorochinsk," to music of Mussorgsky that includes "Night on Bald Mountain," and with scenery and costumes by Remisoff that we have seen many times before. Even the traditional and familiar Russian peasant dance movements are given new twists, an individual style, the impress of an individual mind that is further evident in the manipulation of groups, and in the striking movements that convey the diabolism of Red Coat. Moreover, it is interesting to see how well Lichine uses individual dancers—how he contrives what shows off their strong points and conceals their weaknesses. He gives the peasant boy Gritzko not only the leaps and turns that Eglevsky does so brilliantly but an almost brutal vigor in stance and walk that keeps Eglevsky from falling into his usual lad-with-the-delicate-air attitude when he is not leaping or whirling about. And the sensational movements of Red Coat seem to represent Lichine's perception of what Dolin can and cannot do, after he has watched him do the leaps and turns of "Swan Lake" poorly (but with appeals for applause that bring a thunderous response), and then observed his superb character-dancing in "Bluebeard."

Letters to the Editors

The Case of Alton Levy

Dear Sirs: Readers of my article in The Nation last winter on the Winfred Lynn case may be interested to know about another Jim Crow-in-uniform case now assuming national importance—the Alton Levy case.

In civilian life Alton I. Levy was an organizer for the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union. He also wrote songs and skits, a talent he has exercised in the army; his "G. I. Love You" is popular in Western camps. His army record was excellent—he became a sergeant within six months of entering the army, and he had no disciplinary record—until he began to criticize the treatment of Negro soldiers.

Last August Sergeant Levy was tried before a court martial at the Lincoln (Nebraska) air base. He was accused of having made false and malicious statements "with the intent to bring discredit on the military service." There were three charges, two of them alleging that he had made slanderous statements about the commanding officer of the camp, the third that he had complained publicly about the way colored soldiers were treated at the base. Levy denied the first two and admitted, or rather insisted upon, the third.

The evidence came entirely from two girls, one of them a WAC, with whom Levy had had dates. (The WAC, a bush-league Mata Hari, also brought charges against four other soldiers with whom she had had dates.) It was so flimsy, and was so effectively countered by Levy's testimony and other witnesses for the defense, that on the second day of the trial the president of the court stated, "The court does not believe that the accused is guilty of any of the specifications as drawn." Nevertheless, after another day of testimony, which involved only one of the three charges, the court reversed itself and found Levy guilty on all three counts. Its sentence was severe: reduction to the rank of private, a fine of $18 a month, and four months' imprisonment at hard labor. Levy is now serving out this term.

Levy had three strikes against him when he went up for trial: he was a Jew, a labor organizer, and a fighter for Negro rights. At the base Negro soldiers were forced to put up with inferior equipment, denied their fair share of passes into town, forced to walk two miles to mess hall, and, according to one of Levy's letters home, "hounded and harassed, yelled at and cursed and insulted, and generally treated abominably." Levy complained about these conditions in staff meetings and in contacts with his superior officers. He had an important administrative post in the Negro section of the camp, and he knew what he was talking about. Sergeant Levy, in a word, was making a nuisance of himself. He had to be "got," and got he was.

This case of a white sergeant, buried away in a remote air base, who had the courage to speak out on military Jim Crow will not be over when Sergeant Levy comes out of the guardhouse a private. There are indications that the army authorities, in reprisal for Levy's allowing the case to become a national issue, are considering another court martial and an even more severe sentence. Full information on the case may be obtained from the Workers' Defense League, 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York City, which is conducting a campaign to free Al Levy and end Jim Crow in the army.

The Question of Sovereignty

Dear Sirs: Questions of sovereignty loom large in discussions of post-war collaboration. It seems certain that isolationists, in the propitious guise of nationalists, will center their fight on an international superstate. It is as well to look the matter over now, to see where we stand.

Our own experience after the Revotion afforded an example pertinent to the present situation. The colonies, having come through extraordinary hardships and hazards in throwing over a superior central power, adopted our first written constitution, the Articles of Confederation, under which each of them was fully sovereign, retaining its "freedom and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States." None could be taxed, and none suffered interference with its domestic affairs. We had thirteen nationalistic interests, often conflicting.

The Continental Congress, w framed the Articles, was a single ch ber in which each state had one and Rhode Island as much powe Massachusetts or Virginia. The Cong could declare war, form treaties, n requisitions for the national exper and so on, but it had no power to force its findings. Thus its powe direct the armed forces was empty cause it could not conscript men for army or navy. It could do no more request money from the states, and ing its last year they contributed than enough to meet the interest on national indebtedness. It could issue rency but could establish no reserve, it emitted script so freely that the ph "not worth a Continental" became of the national idiom. National se ties sold for as little as one-twent of their face value.

The Articles of Confederation did provide for an executive or a judic and there was no regulation of t or industry. The states carried on c mercial wars and erected tariff v against one another. New York le duties on firewood from Connecticut on cabbages from New Jersey.

Veterans of the Revolution went paid and everywhere threatened trou Once they frightened Congress moving from Philadelphia to Prince In Massachusetts Shays's Rebellion led by a man who had fought at Bu Hill, and civil war was narrowly aver Amid the blessings of unrestricted tionalism the young country was "d ing to chaos."

Amid the blessings of unrestri nationalism Europe drifted after First World War into the chaos armed conflict. A League of Nations been set up, but it had no more po to enforce its rulings than the Conti tal Congress. There was a similar p war inflation, and there was a time w the currency of most European s was not worth a Continental.

In such circumstances the Amer colonies realized the imperative need a strong, cooperative national gov ment. The Founding Fathers met sec at Philadelphia "for the sole and press purpose of amending the Art of Confederation," but they did not of the sort. They threw that docun out of the window and erected an i eral republic. If a Napoleon had they did, Arthur Meier Schlesinger is, it would have been branded a d'état.

Mr. Rylski Replies

Dear Sirs: In answer to the letter from Dr. Ehrenpreis, which appeared in last week's issue of The Nation, I should like to clarify two points which I discussed in my article.

First, I did not accuse the Polish government and the parties which support it of "expecting a restored Poland to stand against Russia." I freely agree that there are no Polish political leaders who do not desire good relations with Russia, as well as with the rest of Poland's neighbors; they would like to see such relations just as they would like to see the end of all wars, the universal happiness of their nation and of the world, and so on. But all that has nothing to do with politics. The real question in Polish-Russian relations—a question carefully overlooked in Dr. Ehrenpreis's letter—is whether the Polish government is ready to collaborate with Russia on terms acceptable to the latter, whether it is prepared to make such collaboration the basis of its policy.

Under the present relation of forces, to declare to Stalin: "We want to cooperate with you, but only on our terms," that is, on the basis of Russia's acceptance of Poland's view concerning its eastern boundaries, means abandoning the policy of collaboration and paving the way for the inevitable rupture. The reason for that is simple. If the Polish "legitimate leaders" take their policy seriously, they must look for some force strong enough, in their opinion, to impose their position upon Russia. Stalin will therefore regard them as a hostile factor. Polish-Russian relations of 1941-43 prove this point conclusively; the Union of Polish Patriots, born in 1943, has nothing to do with that. The essential fact is that on the fundamental question of boundaries there is complete unanimity among the "legitimate leaders" of Polish democratic parties, the Polish government, and the extreme reactionaries, including Colonel Matuszewski: they all insist on the premise of the inviolability of the boundaries of 1939.

The second point concerns Dr. Ehrenpreis's assertion that the Polish people have already made their choice concerning Poland's future policy, and that this choice concurs with the policy of the Polish government in London. This statement is supposedly conclusive because the men who make it are the only "legitimate" representatives of the Polish people. There are, however, all kinds of legitimacy: Otto of Hapsburg bases his claim to legitimacy upon his hereditary rights; the Polish government in London upon the fascist constitution of 1935; Dr. Ehrenpreis and his friends upon their pre-1939 status and the support of their political friends in Poland. The only democratic legitimacy is that based on the will of the majority of the population. Today, under the German occupation, the Polish people cannot express its will. No student of Polish affairs can truly state who, in October, 1943, has the majority in Poland; who will have it at the moment of Poland's liberation from the German oppressor is even more difficult to foretell. Assertions, even if they are as absolute as those of Dr. Ehrenpreis, are not proof. The fight for the soul of the Polish people continues, and nothing is less certain than the triumph of the camp represented by Dr. Ehrenpreis.

The Shape of Things

UNDER THE GUISE OF "ECONOMY" THE House Appropriations Committee has eliminated or curtailed funds for more than a dozen projects of vital importance not only to the public welfare but to the war effort. The most serious cut from the standpoint of wartime efficiency was the reduction in the amount set aside for defense housing from $200,000,000 to a bare $50,000,000. With a view to rectifying the man-power shortage caused by lack of housing, the National Housing Agency conducted a city-to-city survey of housing needs in war centers. It found that 925,000 units would be needed to house 1,200,000 war workers, and that in the absence of other possibilities the government would have to provide for at least 184,000 of these workers. The $200,000,000 requested meant a subsidy per house of barely $1,000.

OTHER CUTS WHICH WILL SURELY INTERFERE with production efficiency included the elimination of $1,000,000 requested by the Public Health Service to provide physicians in areas now deprived of medical services; a $2,000,000 reduction in the funds requested by the War Manpower Commission to pay transportation costs of foreign labor for war plants; a $2,500,000 reduction in the funds requested to train nurses for the war emergency; the elimination of a request for $3,961,000 for emergency teacher training to overcome the present grave shortage of qualified instructors, and of $125,000 for special war work by the Women's Bureau; and the elimination of all funds needed for the enforcement of the child labor laws. In several instances, agencies which have been under fire from Congress for not meeting the full demands that have been placed upon them were denied the funds necessary to carry out their duties. For example, the WMC was denied a badly needed $2,500,000 to improve the efficiency of the United States Employment Service, while the NLRB was refused the $300,000 it requested for enforcement of the Smith-Connally bill. And, most ironic of all, the Budget Bureau was denied $180,000 of the funds it requested for personnel to inquire into legitimate economies that might be made in government expenditures.

BURLINGAME

ESCAPING THE DREADED PRUNING KNIFE OF the committee, surprisingly enough, was the budgeted appropriation for the Office of War Information's foreign branch. Psychological warfare is one of those dreamy New Deal notions which cause the purer breed of American Congressmen to see red in more ways than one, and several of the species have been patiently waiting for the chance to cripple Mr. Davis's agency. Imagine their discomfort when testimonials to the OWI's work in Africa and Italy poured in from Generals Marshall, Eisenhower, Patton, and Devers. Imagine their downright embarrassment when they were told what Admiral Cunningham said as the Italian fleet steamed into Malta: "Tell General McClure [in charge of psychological warfare in North Africa] that they've accomplished in one day with propaganda what I've been trying to do for three years with the Navy." In approving the appropriation the majority of the committee reported that "More than 80 per cent of the German and Italian prisoners captured in Sicily admit being impelled to give up by propaganda leaflets and broadcasts." But prejudices and political unscrupulousness die hard in anti-Roosevelt circles, and Republican Representatives Taber, Wigglesworth, Lambertson, and Ditter found it necessary to file a dissent. One had "grave doubts" about the OWI's work, another called the agency a "stench" and let it go at that, while a third charged it with issuing campaign buttons to boost a fourth term. Political warfare abroad may be starry-eyed, but at home it is practical.

DESPITE A SHORTAGE OF SUPPLIES HERE, THE National Lead Company shipped 700 tons of titanium to Japan nine months before Pearl Harbor. The purpose, as explained by Assistant Attorney General Wendell Berge to the Kilgore committee, was to help the company's Japanese cartel partner evade a British embargo on shipments of titanium from India to Japan. The British imposed the embargo because of I. G. Farben's interest in the Japanese company. I. G.'s partners in this country were National Lead, Dupont, and the Titan Company, Inc. All three were indicted by a grand jury in New York last June but prosecution, in the manner grown customary, has been suspended "in order not to interfere in the war effort." I. G. Farben and Dupont seem to have been the leading figures in this world cartel for the control and exorbitant pricing of titanium, the most valuable and useful of all white pigments for paint. After the war began American partners of I. G. kindly arranged to take over German patents "in trust" for the duration to prevent their seizure by the Alien Property Custodian. This is the familiar cartel pattern. Its importance is that these cartels intend to resume after the war. A few great companies here and abroad figure in most of them; their political influence is enormous and invariably reactionary; their objective a continued scarcity economy. It isn't going to be easy to preserve peace and freedom where and while they operate.

CONFIRMED CYNICS ARE REFERRED TO LAST week's issue of the Saturday Evening Post, wherein they will find the headiest brew of Realpolitik since Machiavelli worked out the recipe. "Power Politics Succeeded in Italy" by Demaree Bess is the contribution we have in mind. Its thesis, briefly, is that we won out in Italy because we rejected all recourse to popular forces. Far from having anything against fascism as such, we tried from the start to bribe Mussolini into breaking with the Axis; having failed in this objective we fought and were ultimately in a position to approach Italy with anti-fascist slogans intended to win over the people. At the same time we instructed AMG officials "to suppress all forms of local political activity"; and with the slogan "Abolish Fascism!" we combined "such a conservative policy otherwise that it amounted to the freezing of the status quo in Sicily, once Mussolini's personal party machine had been destroyed." By this sort of manipulation, writes Mr. Bess admiringly, "the decks were cleared for negotiations with any group inside Italy which could get rid of Mussolini." Accepting Mr. Bess's analysis without his glowing approval, we can see the "power-politics" part of his title, but we are not so sure about the success. The Darlan deal, with which he enthusiastically compares the Badoglio arrangement, has been defended on the ground that it saved lives. But what lives have been saved in our inch-by-inch advance through Italy? "Had the armistice come immediately," Adolfo Omodeo, rector of the University of Naples, told Herbert Matthews, "the Allies could have landed at Genoa, Spezia, and northern ports, and Italy would have been theirs. Now the peninsula is being devastated from south to north." Tragic, but we needed those fifty days for Mr. Bess's power politics.

AT A RECEPTION COMMEMORATING THE seventh anniversary of the defense of Madrid, Alvarez del Vayo termed Franco's message to the Filipino traitor, José P. Laurel, "an act of aggression against the United States." That most Americans, even those who formerly treated Franco with the utmost consideration, interpreted the message in a similar manner was indicated by a disapproving editorial in the New York Times on November 4. But the congratulatory message is not an isolated proof of Spain's continued servitude to the Axis. Immediately afterwards, the Franco regime was reported by Berlin to have signed a trade agreement with the "government" of Mussolini, and Nazi broadcasts to South America gave it wide publicity. Berlin, evidently, is anxious to convince Ramirez that he is not Hitler's only playmate, in this hour of Germany's gravest military setback, but that Spain, in spite of Portugal's shift to the side of the United Nations, has remained faithful. The Madrid government has denied the story of the agreement, but its word is hardly better than Berlin's.

NOT LONG AGO, CORRESPONDENTS AND commentators united in describing the great changes which had taken place in Falangist Spain as a result of recent Allied victories. The smallest detail—the printing of an Allied communique before a German communique—was taken as evidence that Franco was rapidly swinging to the Allies. Evidence to the contrary—the maintenance of the Blue Division on the Russian front, the continuous anti-American propaganda disseminated throughout Latin America, the recent address of Senor Arreses, Falangist leader, which reaffirmed the fight against communism as "the permanent aim of Spanish foreign policy"—all this was dismissed as accidental. As the New York Times tearfully pointed out, "this country has been patient with Franco, especially during the Civil War," and it was assumed that Franco would reward that patience by coming over to the Allies once Hitler's prospective defeat made that course expedient. Now comes Franco's double perfidy. The disappointment in certain quarters is bitter. But not bitter enough, it seems, to bring about immediate recall of Ambassador Carlton Hayes, whose mission in Madrid is the greatest diplomatic failure of recent years.

THE COAL SETTLEMENT MUST BE REGARDED as a substantial victory for John L. Lewis. Although he did not succeed in getting the full increase of two dollars a day—ten dollars for the five-day week—which he demanded last spring, the weekly increase under the new contract amounts to approximately $11.50 because of overtime pay on Saturdays. From the standpoint of the general public, however, the settlement is not without merit. The working time of the miners has been lengthened by one hour a day in addition to the extension brought about by the introduction of the six-day week. This should mean a considerable increase in the production of coal at a time when every effort must be made to expand output. Moreover, the partial recognition of the principle of portal-to-portal pay must be regarded as justified. When the extra hours and payment for part of the underground travel time are taken into account, the settlement can be fitted within the framework of the "Little Steel" formula. The most serious cause for apprehension in connection with the settlement lies in the fact that it will undoubtedly strengthen Lewis's prestige not only within the United Mine Workers but in the labor movement as a whole. Responsible sections of organized labor may have to pay a heavy price for Mr. Lewis's victory.

Ballot Readings

OFF-YEAR elections are to political analysts what birds' entrails were to Roman seers and what tea leaves are to gypsies. Pick your oracle judiciously and you can get almost any interpretation you want. To Wendell Willkie last week's vote means that "The country is tired, very tired, of the present national administration." Harrison Spangler sees the mystic portent that "The American way is on the march!" To the New York Daily Mirror the election of Joe Hanley as Lieutenant Governor makes Thomas E. Dewey the "outstanding symbol of the anti-New Deal forces in the nation," while the more prosaic sybil of the Times sees the Hanley triumph as the profound conviction of the people that a Republican governor should have a Republican lieutenant governor. Always the last word in gaudy divination, the Daily News thinks the whole election shows that the country wants to forget Hitler for a while and send more planes and men to General MacArthur. And James A. Farley, absolving himself of any responsibility, reads the figures as a warning which he hopes will have "a sobering effect on those who guide the destinies of the states and the nation."

Foregoing our own privilege of reading signs, we prefer to note a few of the factors that may have contributed to the results, which we do not for a moment pretend to find gratifying. The first factor is that "those who guide the destinies of the states and the nation" can now count on Mr. Farley for post-election warnings rather than pre-election assistance. The kind of campaign which the New York State chairman put on for General Haskell was ardent enough to have elected a Democratic sheriff in Mississippi, but hardly more than that. And there is no doubt that many a Democrat, acting on instructions from his ward boss, voted for the discredited Judge Aurelio—on the Republican ticket. Aurelio's name appeared on the machines under both Democratic and Republican labels, but his total Republican vote plus the vote for George Frankenthaler, whom the party unofficially sponsored after repudiating Aurelio, was greater than the vote for Mr. Hanley, the head of the ticket!

Across the Hudson, Boss Hague developed a similar incapacity for delivering the vote, with the result that after an apathetic campaign, Mayor Vincent J. Murphy of Newark was defeated for Governor of New Jersey by Republican Walter E. Edge. Mr. Murphy's excellent record as a labor leader clearly left Hague unenthusiastic if it did not scare him out of his wits.

The defeat of William C. Bullitt for mayor of Philadelphia and the photo-finish race for governor of Kentucky are the other straws which are said to be pointing straight at a New Deal debacle in 1944. But no one in his right mind expected Philadelphia to elect a Democratic mayor, and if that miracle could have been achieved for any Democrat it certainly wasn't the vulnerable Mr. Bullitt. The Republican victory in Kentucky, however, unquestionably reflects a rising tide for the G.O.P. which no one in Washington is likely to ignore.

In a class by itself was the savage mayoralty campaign in Detroit. The primaries were won by Frank FitzGerald, who enjoyed the backing of Detroit's powerful trade unions, of Negroes who resented Mayor Jeffries's wretched handling of the race riots last June, and of chauvinist white elements who resented the Mayor's earlier stand in support of the Negroes' right to share in the Sojourner Truth housing project. Between the primary and election day Jeffries made a shameless—and successful—bid for the anti-Negro vote, talking wildly of a black conspiracy to take over the city. FitzGerald himself was not above attacking Jeffries for favoring "bi-racial housing" but was accepted nevertheless by the Negroes as the sweeter of two lemons. Jeffries won, and Detroit now seethes more than ever.

The defeat of FitzGerald, like that of Murphy in New Jersey, was also a blow at organized labor's political prestige. These two losses, together with the American Labor Party's failure to save Haskell from defeat in New York, are hard pills to swallow, but they are far from fatal, especially since the Labor Party's vote in New York was much larger than expected.

We can accept the fact that more Republicans than Democrats voted in New York, New Jersey, and Kentucky without being convinced that there are more Republicans than Democrats in those states. The war-time shifts of manpower which played so large a part in 1942 are still operative, and the soldier vote, conceded by both sides to be overwhelmingly Democratic, is absent this year as it was last. Should these two powerful elements be adequately represented in the 1944 vote, Mr. Spangler's "way" may turn right around and march back again.

Subsidies or Chaos

NO PRESIDENTIAL message in recent years has covered matters of more immediate concern to the American people than Mr. Roosevelt's recent message on food and food subsidies. Yet there is grave danger that its proposals will be ignored in Congress. It is apparent that the home-front struggle against the insidious and destructive forces of inflation is nearing another of its all too frequent crises. For the first time since the hold-the-line order was issued last spring, the cost of living has shown signs of resuming its advance. Congress has failed miserably in its primary obligation to check through taxation the increase in the amount of surplus or "dangerous" money available for bidding up prices. Seeing the apparent failure of the OPA's roll-back program, labor has once more become restive. The miners have succeeded in wresting a contract from Ickes which gives them even more than the Illinois formula repudiated by the War Labor Board. And the C. I. O. convention in Philadelphia unanimously demanded a scrapping of the "Little Steel" wage formula and pledged support for the wage demands of the Railway Brotherhoods.

In the face of these conflicting pressures the President clearly has no choice but to attempt to bolster his hold-the-line program as set forth last spring. To yield on any front invites disaster. But the demands of labor can only be staved off if the government lives up to its promise and reduces the cost of living to the level at which wages have been pegged. As Mr. Roosevelt points out, organized labor has loyally supported the stabilization program up to now on the clear understanding that the cost of living would be rolled back to a point where it reached a balance with wages. Some reduction in living costs was achieved during the summer months. But owing to the pressure of the farm bloc, no substantial cut in food prices could be achieved without reimbursing either farmer or distributor through subsidies. If food prices are to be brought back to the September 15, 1942, level, further subsidies will be needed.

It is evident that the fight over subsidies is crucial to the entire stabilization program. If Congress supports the recent action of the House Banking and Currency Committee and refuses further subsidies to hold down food costs, it will be impossible to resist labor's demands for a substantial increase in wages. The increase in the miners' wage scale can probably be reconciled with the "Little Steel" formula, but if that formula is scrapped, as the C. I. O. now demands, the entire stabilization program must eventually go with it. It might still be possible to maintain price ceilings on a few key articles in a period of gradually rising prices, but anything like the present over-all regulations, would be administratively impossible. And once the price-wage spiral gets under way, regulation becomes increasingly ineffective.

Although the C. I. O. can hardly be blamed for being angered by the Administration's failure to live up to its promise to reduce the cost of living, it displayed singularly poor statesmanship in issuing its demand for elimination of the "Little Steel" formula just one day after the President sent his subsidy message to Congress. The demand will undoubtedly be used by opponents of the subsidy to buttress their contention that the stabilization program has already broken down. Actually, there is still a fighting chance. Even if Congress rejects the President's plea for subsidies, he may again, as in June, use his veto power. As long as there is a chance, labor should give him its support. For the alternative to subsidies is economic chaos.

The Meaning of Moscow

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

AT MOSCOW Hitler suffered his greatest political defeat of the war, a defeat which will do more to bring about the downfall of his regime and the collapse of his military power than any of his recent disastrous defeats in the field. To say that is not to minimize the importance of the armed struggle. On the contrary, the Allied political victory at Moscow could never have been won if the military victories had not preceded it. Let no one forget the Red Army; in the mild person of Foreign Minister Molotov, it attended every session of the Moscow conference.

The political effects of the decisions reached at Moscow have only begun to be felt but every day reveals new ones. Already the promise and challenge to Austria have been answered with anti-Nazi riots and new, brutal repression by the Gestapo. As we go to press, unconfirmed reports announce Finnish peace feelers and a move on the part of Turkey to permit use by the Allies of plane and naval bases. From every occupied or satellite country come stories of aggravated tension and new acts of resistance. For not only Germany, but the anti-Axis world as well, has read the meaning of Moscow. It knows that the three great powers have sealed a pact which guarantees victory. It knows that this long-delayed pledge of union is the thing Hitler has been employing his total armament of propaganda to prevent. The Moscow agreement, quite apart from its terms, is in itself an act of political war. For lack of such an agreement the grand strategy of the United Nations has faltered; indeed until now, as The Nation has steadily pointed out, a plan of campaign which ignored, or even rejected, the political demands of the war was no plan at all.

The Moscow meeting accomplished several valuable results: 1. It helped to bridge the dangerous gap of suspicion and fear between Russia and America—a gap which Britain had been trying desperately to straddle. It did this not only by bringing the three powers together, but by creating a European council to continue the political consultations initiated by the Foreign Ministers. 2. It agreed on the early creation of an international organization, initiated by the chief allied powers, including China (a most important inclusion), and open to all other peaceful states. 3. It arrived at a military understanding, undefined but clearly basic to the whole agreement, which will take the place of the confused clamor of demands, promises, excuses, and accusations which have poisoned Allied relations and encouraged Axis hopes. 4. It promised the abolition of fascism in Italy and the establishment of democratic guarantees. (The actual time for instituting this change is left to the decision of the combined chiefs of staff, a precaution which robs the promise of much of its immediate political effect.) 5. It opened a direct political offensive against Nazi power in Central and Eastern Europe by pledging Austria its liberty in return for effective resistance. 6. It agreed to deliver Axis war criminals for punishment to the peoples they have oppressed.

This is much: put together it forms a framework and a promise. It marks a new departure in Allied relations.

For this achievement every democratic critic of America's previous foreign policy must be thankful. Those persons who today are claiming that the Moscow agreement is the logical culmination of a policy slowly and patiently evolved by the President and his Secretary of State can hardly be taken seriously. It is, on the contrary, an effective veto of almost every political measure they had previously enacted.

The man who contemptuously refused to be drawn into discussions of European political problems, declaring that they had no relevance while the war was being fought, has now helped to frame an agreement on just those problems. And the agreement, by all its implications, rules out further dealings with the procession of purchasable fascists and amenable reactionaries who have been used, or encouraged to believe they would be used, as the State Department's Quislings. The victory won at Moscow was a victory for all people everywhere who have bitterly resented the role being played by America in Europe. Perhaps Mr. Hull's chief success lay in his willingness to abandon a discredited policy. This took courage, and the fact that Mr. Hull had no real alternative detracts only a little from the credit due him. He might have refused to undertake the mission; or he might have convinced himself that his previous attitude was still tenable and worth fighting for.

In any case, there is no denying the domestic value of Secretary Hull's participation in the conference. As Mr. Stone points out, his presence in Moscow assured the new pact a friendly reception in Congress. Even the opponents of the Administration's foreign policy have accepted it with satisfaction. I have no doubt that the incorporation in the Connally resolution of the collective-security section of the Moscow agreement, and the prompt and almost unanimous adoption of the amended resolution, are to be attributed largely to Mr. Hull's influence. For this too we should be grateful.

The Russian government has supported democratic resistance in Nazi-occupied Europe for the best of reasons: to help win the war and to buttress its own security after the war. Neither reaction nor revolution would serve its needs when the peace came. The first would offer an open menace. The second would bring the threat of armed intervention and, in any case, make it difficult for Russia to import the equipment needed for a rapid restoration of its industrial power. Russia wants, at least during the first few years after Hitler's defeat, a stable Continent and good relations with the West. It wants a workable system of collective security. And it wants the protection of its old boundaries.

The United States and Britain—but especially the United States—have feared the spread of Russian influence in the rest of Europe. They have looked upon all popular movements as likely to produce a break-down of authority and open the way to Communism. While proclaiming democratic aims, they have backed reactionary groups which promised authoritarian if not fascist rule. If they could have continued this policy they would doubtless have been pleased.

But they could not. Russia demanded a hand in political decisions in Europe. It intervened first by favoring de Gaulle. It backed strongly the underground movements, and Communist elements have taken the lead in organizing resistance everywhere. It favored the Partisans in Yugoslavia over the Mikhailovich forces. It encouraged the Greek guerrillas to oppose the King. It criticized AMG in Italy and proposed the creation of the Mediterranean Commission to advise on political policies in that region. Russia's acquiescence in the recognition of Badoglio is now seen to be an act of only limited significance. The section in the Moscow agreement guaranteeing democratic rights to the people of Italy has been described by some writers as an astonishing concession on the part of the Soviet government to its Western allies. The reverse is probably closer to the fact. Russia has been endorsing democratic rights all over Europe; it is the British and ourselves who have backed the elements that suppress them. The Soviet position may be inconsistent with its own internal practices, but Stalin is not a man to let consistency stand in the way of Russia's national interests.

It is those interests which proved decisive at Moscow.

Some Western statesmen, during recent months, may have looked back rather wistfully to the period after the last war when Russia was chaotic, struggling, shorn of vast territories by Germany, fighting for its survival against internal enemies, its old army broken, its new revolutionary forces untrained and unequipped. In those days Russia couldn't intervene in the great decisions regarding Europe. Instead it could safely be harassed and plotted against, its enemies supplied with arms and money, and its borders closed by a ring of hostile states.

Today, twenty-six years after its birth, Soviet Russia is the strongest state in Europe. It is winning victories on a scale that diminish the successes of Britain and the United States to relative insignificance. The days of Russian weakness and dependence can not be brought back. No other nations can carry into effect decisions which run counter to Russia's needs. No federation headed by a hostile Poland can serve today as a new cordon sanitaire. Even the attempt of the Western powers to set up little reactionary vassals as a counterpoise to the Soviet Union begins to look impractical. With the Red Army driving toward Berlin, Russia's claims must be considered and Russia's good will won.

So Mr. Hull went to Moscow. The result is not an obvious Soviet triumph. Concessions were made on all sides and the plan which finally emerged offers Russia security without depriving the other parties to the agreement of any advantages they can propely claim. Mr. Hull brings back the promise of a system of collective security based on a free and democratic Europe. That such a promise represents the needs of the Soviet Union is the world's good fortune.

F. D. R.'s Victory

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, November 4

THE President, in one of his darkest hours, has won one of his greatest victories. Democratic national headquarters are in mourning; the election returns seem to foreshadow a Republican victory in 1944. The OPA, main bastion of the home front, is in deepest gloom; large sections of labor, agriculture, and industry are wilfully insistent on price and wage increases likely to unloose a disastrous inflation. This is the moment at which the President, by consummate strategy, has at last succeeded in leading the United States out of isolationism and into a concert of powers for the preservation of peace. He has used a conservative Southern Democrat to bring about an entente between capitalist America and Communist Russia. And as this is being written tonight there is every indication that the Senate, where Wilson's hopes fondered, will by more than a two-thirds' vote approve the four-power pact at Moscow. This is a historic achievement, the first step toward preventing World War III; and except for a handful of mischief-makers here, there is a general feeling of satisfaction among men of the most diverse views over what the President and Secretary of State Hull have accomplished.

At the State Department, newspapermen who have been critical are being greeted with jubilation. The Moscow pact is felt to be a complete answer to the critics; the critics, for their part, are pleased with the results of the three-power conference—for which, they feel, they can claim some credit. The uproar over the Welles affair had made Secretary Hull exceedingly sensitive to the charge of being anti-Soviet and anxious to prove that he was as good a diplomat as his former subaltern. This was a propitious mood in which to send him off to Moscow. As one of the correspondents who have been most critical of Hull in the past, and will probably be so again in the future, I honor him for his achievement; it was no easy one for a man of his years and views. In White House circles the Moscow pact is regarded as fully justifying the President's action in forcing the resignation of Welles at the price of keeping Hull. To have the Moscow agreement made by the idol of the anti-New Dealers, an irreproachable conservative, is considered to be worth many compromises.

Had the Moscow pact been presented to the Senate some time after the passage of the Connally resolution, the "but" brigade would have taken ample advantage of its vague wording and many loopholes. It is fortunate that the determined group of fourteen Senators led by Pepper and the sponsors of the B2H2 resolution had drawn out the debate and blocked a count on the Connally measure until the Moscow pact was announced. The release of the text in the midst of the debate caught the fence-straddlers and the quasi-isolationists off guard. They were forced to prove that they meant what they said when they claimed to be for international cooperation. All but the extreme isolationists at once claimed the Moscow pact as their own. Connally said "the sentiments therein expressed" were "in substantial conformity" with the terms of his resolution; the Pepper group welcomed the Moscow agreement as "the kind of clear declaration of principle" Pepper and his colleagues had sought to write into the Connally measure. The ignominious Taft thought that "on the whole the Moscow declaration is far more like the Mackinac resolution," and when Connally incorporated language from the Moscow announcement in his resolution, it was Vandenberg who suggested that by unanimous consent these additions be considered a part of the original resolution instead of an amendment. Senator Carter Glass deserves a large share of the credit for this move, which provides all but formal ratification and the force of a treaty to the Moscow agreement.

One of the principal fears expressed during the debate on the Connally resolution was that it might be construed as having approved in advance a treaty later to be negotiated by the Administration. The Washington Star quoted unnamed State Department officials as saying that the Moscow declaration had the force of a treaty, though it did not require ratification by the Senate. This evoked a statement from Connally declaring that this anonymous report had been strongly denied by Under Secretary Stettinius. Whatever the value of the denial, and whatever the name applied to the Moscow declaration, it involves far more than a mere statement of generalities. It envisages continuous action through a joint political commission in London; it has already committed the powers to specific action in the case of Austria, and in the case of Italy to a general line of policy in regard to reconquered territory. The declaration involves a great deal more than most treaties, and it is obvious that in it the Administration has found another of its devices to circumvent the Senate on international policy. The passage of the Connally resolution in a form embodying language from the Moscow declaration places the President in a powerful position to carry on under its terms without further reference to the Senate. Mr. Roosevelt has outwitted his opponents again.

The Moscow agreement must be read in the light of the Soviet declaration that Russia's 1941 boundaries were not open to discussion. It is agreed here that nothing short of a successful war against them would lead the Soviets to give up what they consider the boundaries necessary to their security. A small group of Senatorial pseudo-isolationists, led by Reynolds and Wheeler, seemed anxious during the debate on the Connally resolution to lay the basis for just such an armed conflict. I call them pseudo-isolationists because the isolationist position they assumed during Hitler's period of expansion has been exchanged for the most open kind of interventionism against the Soviet Union. In these Senators the Atlantic Charter has found new and strange devotees.

Reynolds, once the hero of the Bundists, seems to have become the chief reliance of the Poles, and he who glossed over Hitler's aggressions now tells the Senate, "If Soviet Russia intends to have and to hold the once-free Baltic republics and parts of Poland . . . that intention must be resisted by force of arms or be permitted to prevail by default. . . . Civilized nations have never been isolationist in their attitude toward international bandits and robbers." Reynolds has also become the champion of the colored peoples. He wants the Four Freedoms guaranteed to "all colors of skin," but instead of starting his reforms in the army—as chairman of the Military Affairs Committee he is reported to be a powerful influence in promoting the segregation policy—he casts a demagogic eye on the British Empire. Wheeler, who excused the partition of Czechoslovakia at Munich, is worried about Soviet designs on Outer Mongolia.

This is the new isolationism. It speaks the language of idealism but parallels the Nazi line for the propagation of dissension among the Allies. The Senate rejected it by a vote of 70 to 15 in turning down the Danaher amendment, but the Senatorial franks will spread the new brand of anti-Soviet poison assiduously. The same breed of men who once asked, "Why die for Danzig?" are now prepared to give their all for Bessarabia.

Relief for 500,000,000

BY BLAIR BOLLES

Washington, November 5

IN A few days the sincerity of the Allies' determination to pursue a united course—the heart of the Moscow declarations—will be put to a hard test at Atlantic City. On November 10 the representatives of forty-four governments will meet there to set up the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration for the distribution of food, clothing, and medical supplies to the hungry, dirty, sick men, women, and children living under the heel of the occupying Nazis and Japanese in territories marked for liberation.

The UNRRA will find 500,000,000 potential clients as the Allied armies advance. It is easy to agree to free these people from the horrors of malnutrition, but it is difficult to make the necessary arrangements. Already there has been interference. When studies were undertaken this year to improve the catch in the Caribbean off Venezuela so that there might be enough fish to feed the Mediterranean peoples, spokesmen for the New England fishing industry protested successfully—though their catch is insufficient to supply those peoples' needs. When Tuskegee technicians were about to set out for French West Africa to try to enlarge the peanut output there, the British objected that they have peanut enterprises on the Gold Coast—though Gold Coast peanuts would not leave a mark on the fats and oils shortage in Europe. When Cuba accepted the American government's proposal that large acreages of sugar cane be turned to rice production to help develop a stockpile for European relief, American owners of Cuban sugar property pricked American rice growers into complaining through their Congressmen.

The UNRRA represents an attempt to take from the United States the trappings of Santa Claus which it assumed through Herbert Hoover's operations after the last war and to permit the nations which will receive relief to keep the self-respect that disappears with charity. The cost of the enterprise is to be shared by all UNRRA members. Some can pay in gold, some in goods. Up to now the United States, through Governor Lehman's Office of Foreign Relief and Rehabilitation, and Great Britain, have been sharing the relief burden. Such a burden, however, sometimes has its compensations. Members of the Chicago Board of Trade, for example, profited greatly from the Hoover operations, which stressed the use of wheat and corn from the United States.

The UNRRA agreement creates a number of agencies, and the way they work together will undoubtedly set a pattern for other types of joint agencies which the United Nations may choose to create for dealing with world problems. Policy will be determined by a Council to which each member government will name one delegate, but the Central Committee of the Council "shall when necessary make policy decisions of an important nature" between semi-annual Council sessions. The Central Committee is made up of delegates from the Big Four—the United States, Great Britain, China, and the Soviet Union. The Council is to subdivide itself into a Committee of the Council for Europe and a Committee of the Council for the Far East; these "shall consider and recommend to the Council and the Central Committee policies with respect to relief and rehabilitation in their respective areas."

International food movements today are controlled by the Combined Food Board in Washington, on which only the United States, Great Britain, and Canada are represented. The board allots food to other countries on a strategical basis, to supply the armies. Some of the governments which are about to become members of the UNRRA suspect that the Combined Food Board will take a tough view of relief requests. Forty lesser powers note that the four great ones control the Central Committee, and that two of them control the Combined Food Board.

The line between great and small powers is sharply felt by the governments invited to join the UNRRA. The first draft for the organization, published last June, caused resentment because, as the Dutch government made clear in a protest note to the State Department, it seemed to place all the power in the hands of the Big Four and left the other forty in the position of an unconsulted claque. The draft was revised during the summer to meet the objections of the Dutch and also those of the United States Senate, which notified Cordell Hull informally that the proposed agreement amounted in fact to a treaty and should be submitted to the Senate for its approval. The new draft, published September 23, provided for the two continental committees of the Council; but the Big Four still dominate, and the Combined Food Board remains a problem. The lesser powers see no means of pressing their views upon the board, and they wonder, too, whether the board will protect them from competition in the food-buyers' market.

Whoever distributes the relief will gain political advantage. Three avenues of distribution are being considered before the Atlantic City meeting: the Allied armies; the exiled governments; and the governments of the great powers on a sort of neighborhood basis—Russia for the Balkans and Central Europe, Britain for the coastal countries, and so on. Here is a ticklish problem. The exiled governments are to sign the UNRRA declaration; yet Washington and London doubt whether some of the exiled governments, particularly the Yugoslav government, will be wanted back in their own countries.

The relief planners advocate that the food be produced as near to its consumers as possible. London and Washington relief authorities regret, for instance, that the agriculture of the liberated provinces in Italy, where food is being distributed by the AMG, and of the three Apulian provinces under Marshal Badoglio has not been converted to the production of foods needed for relief. The Allies missed the chance last winter and spring to direct the plantings in North Africa; now American agents are going to help the fruit and vegetable growers, in December sowings, to start a crop more vitally needed in the work of feeding Europe's starving—that is, beans.

Dried beans and peas are destined to become, with flour, the chief elements in food relief. Beans are a fair substitute for meat, which is scarce in Europe. To obtain larger quantities of them the United States is negotiating a contract with Chile for an 80 per cent increase in its bean acreage. One hundred million bushels of wheat for flour are available under the terms of the International Wheat Agreement of June, 1942, in which the United States, Canada, Great Britain, Australia, and Argentina pledged to assign their surpluses to foreign relief.

The peoples to be rehabilitated have been given some reason to hope that they will get a variety of food but not large quantities. The OFRRO—now the Division of Liberated Areas of the Office of Foreign Economic Administration—has experimented with a dehydrated vegetable stew of precooked beans and peas; soybean grits, barley, dehydrated diced vegetables, brewer's yeast, and meat seasoning, and with a dehydrated soup powder. A serious attempt is to be made to provide milk in some form for all infants and pregnant and nursing mothers.

Relief needs are tremendous. The exiled governments have submitted estimates, sometimes overdrawn, as in the instance of a request for an amount of lard equal to half the United States stocks. Soap is an urgent item everywhere. Textiles are wanted throughout Nazi-held Europe, where a second suit of underwear may save a man from the plague of typhus.

The textile situation shows how the program to be worked out at Atlantic City will benefit business; those who view it as "globaloney" are shallow thinkers. Textile manufacturers are already worrying about stocks which may be left on their hands after the war—blankets, overcoating, towels, heavy woolen underwear, rayon materials, light underwear, shirts, socks, bedding. The UNRRA may become one of the heaviest purchasers of textiles in the world.

More important, relief and rehabilitation will hasten victory. A starving, unruly population in combat zones would slow down the advance of our troops. Relief need not wait for peace; where the soldiers go, relief must follow. Rehabilitation activities may continue, however, for years; Hoover's job was not done until 1923.

Finally, a well-thought-out rehabilitation program will assist the people of Europe and Asia to revive their own economies so that they will be able to participate in world commerce and thus stabilize world politics.

10 Years Ago in "The Nation"

AFTER FIFTEEN YEARS of non-recognition, it is curiously moving to see the beginnings of a rapprochement between "these great peoples," as President Roosevelt calls them, "two great republics," as President Kalinin calls them —Russia and the United States. . . . In short, the Bolshevik has come out from behind those whiskers and appears to look about like anybody else, with the important exception that he holds in his hands large contracts for the purchase of American goods.—November 1, 1933.

THE VOTERS of New York City have elected Fiorello H. LaGuardia and the majority of the candidates on the Fusion ticket. . . . This is distinctly a popular victory. . . . Philadelphia voters likewise rose en masse and . . . ousted the Vare machine, . . . whose fraudulent election tactics were sufficient to keep Pennsylvania in the Republican column in the last national election. In Bridgeport, Connecticut, a Socialist landslide resulted in the election of Jasper McLevy and thirteen Socialist aldermen out of sixteen. . . . Prohibition received its expected coup de grâce when Utah, Pennsylvania, and Ohio provided the votes needed for repeal.—November 15, 1933.

THE PORTRAIT of the old-time banker was that of a shrewd, hard man who would exact the highest interest he could get and foreclose on a defaulting debtor without mercy. But he was personally honest . . . and scrupulous in regarding himself as a trustee for his depositors and stockholders. . . . Since the Coolidge era the portrait . . . has been painted over. . . . The banker has lost the fiduciary capacity. . . . He is no longer a trustee of any but his own interests.—November 15, 1933.

COULD ANYTHING be more typical of a certain type of German mind than Hitler's "triumph" in the election just held? You suppress all opposition parties, you lock up in concentration camps your chief political opponents, you control the entire press, the radio, and the stage, you threaten anybody who dares oppose you, you send Brown Shirts to make sure that everybody votes for the only men you have permitted to be nominated for public office, and then when you have thus dragooned the voters into giving you a 92 per cent vote you turn to the rest of the world and say: "See how the entire nation stands behind me!"—OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, November 29, 1933.

Diary of the Future

BY VERNON BARTLETT

[This is the third instalment of "a cautionary tale . . . a rash attempt to write history before it has happened," by a distinguished British journalist and member of Parliament. The diary begins on June 30, 194–, as Germany is on the point of collapse, and goes on to record a period of intense excitement and confusion as military problems give place to political problems. A fourth instalment will appear next week.]

III. The Ununited Nations

AUGUST 1. There are now three distinct forms of military control in Europe. There is the army of occupation in Germany—mainly American and British, with "token" contingents from the smaller Allied nations. The Russians have not yet decided whether they will cooperate in this force, and their troops alone are in charge of the area east of the River Oder.

The second military control is in Italy, Bulgaria, Rumania, and Hungary, where many of the old officials—in Hungary far too many—have been kept in their jobs. Here the armies have only had to hand over their aircraft and heavy guns and tanks to the Allies and to disband most of the men they had under arms.

The third military control is in the form of "United Nations Auxiliary Police" in the territories of the United Nations formerly occupied by Germany.

August 2. In the old days poor devils of refugees, political or racial, would hide for days in ditches and briar clumps until a chance came to cross the German frontier and to escape from slavery or death. The traffic now flows in the other direction. United Nations frontier guards are always coming across German soldiers or S. S. men trying to escape back into Germany from one or another of the countries they used to occupy.

General von Stülpnagel, the former military governor of Paris, was caught some days ago disguised as an Alsatian peasant. All men so arrested are sent to special concentration camps. As soon as possible they will be examined by the political police of the countries from which they have fled, and many of them will be held as war criminals.

August 4. Debate in the American Senate on the ending of "lend-lease" except for material to be used exclusively against the Japanese. Several speakers dealt with eventual repayment for goods that have been delivered under the system.

Meanwhile the Office of War Information is in trouble again because it has ventured to point out that repayment can only be made in goods, especially since almost all the gold is already in the United States. Sir Walter Layton, who is just back from Washington, sees very little hope of a more liberal policy toward imports. However ready Americans may be to cooperate internationally, the man in Main Street does not yet realize that this involves a freer exchange of goods and thus an increase in American imports.

August 5. Dr. Melville Mackenzie, formerly of the Health Section of the League of Nations, is back in London from a quick tour of Europe. He's very worried about the supply of medical requirements; although he has been working on these problems during the war, they are graver than he had estimated. For one thing, conditions in Eastern Europe are still too unsettled to enable supplies to be distributed, and it's there that typhus and other epidemics are likely to gain their greatest hold. For another, there's a good deal of competition with the military for trains and other transport. The generals, naturally enough, want to enforce order throughout Germany and the liberated countries as soon as they can, and they want a lot of transport for the purpose.

Typhus, according to Mackenzie, will inevitably carry off thousands of older people. Fifty thousand people in Poland are believed to have died of it in the first two and a half years of the war. But he anticipates a terrible lot of malaria as well, and while the Japs still hold out there won't be much quinine available. He confessed that his greatest anxiety of all was the new epidemic of what had been called "Polish influenza." Despite the favorable season of the year, it is already causing many thousands of deaths in Southeastern Europe. Our own forces there have been able to shake off its effects fairly quickly, but the inhabitants are far too undernourished to do so.

August 9. Dateline, Berlin. Very uncomfortable flight as the few priority passengers were squeezed up among great boxes of medical requirements. Charlie Wythe Williams, who is doing a lot of broadcasting, and Bill Hillman, of Collier's, were fellow-passengers.

Called at Cologne to land urgent medical supplies. Bill Hillman, Wythe Williams, and I felt very conspicuous, as we are all fat and the Germans aren't—not any more. A few minor German officials about, all horribly obsequious. I almost prefer them in their other mood.

One of the doctors on the airplane told me that conditions in Belgium, where he is stationed, are infinitely worse than in Germany. After the last war most of the kids I saw on my first visit to Essen had rickets, and I have always been amazed by the way in which, thanks very much to the cult of the sun, they grew up brown and fit physically. But they were diseased and warped mentally and so became easily the dupes of Hitler. We shall certainly need a hell of a lot of wisdom if the millions of half-starved kids between Moscow and Madrid are to develop into reasonable and contented human beings. What a job to tackle, and what a lot of people at home and in the States who are unwilling to tackle it!

I found Berlin inexpressibly drab. Our own lack of paint in London has had a melancholy effect. But Berlin was always an ugly city, and is much more so today. The Brandenburger Tor has been destroyed, and so have the Dom and a good many buildings along Unter den Linden. The Inter-Allied Commissioner is established in Hitler's Reichskanzlerei—again one is struck by the need for a United Nations flag. It would look swell on the flagstaff where the swastika used to fly.

The Berlin branch of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration has taken over a lot of buildings in the Potsdamerstrasse and is besieged by Germans who want to explain to somebody that they always loved the Americans and the British, and would like to help in the organization of food distribution, especially if they could receive some kind of diplomatic protection while doing so. I'm told that some of the highest American and British officials are only too ready to listen to these Germans, especially to the ones who were known in banking or business circles before the war. Too many of these fellows have bobbed up because they are business men and the distribution of food is allegedly a business, and not a political, job. According to Eric Gedye, who has the next room to mine in the hotel, no Social Democrat is given more than the briefest interview, although they did make some effort after the last war to introduce democracy into Germany, and might have been much more successful if they had received any encouragement from the Allies.

Went out to the Rundfunk building to broadcast back to Britain. The broadcasting station has been taken over jointly by the American Office of War Information and the British Political Warfare Executive. Glad to find Wally Carroll, with whom I went to Russia in 1941, and David Woodward, an old newspaper colleague, on the OWI staff.

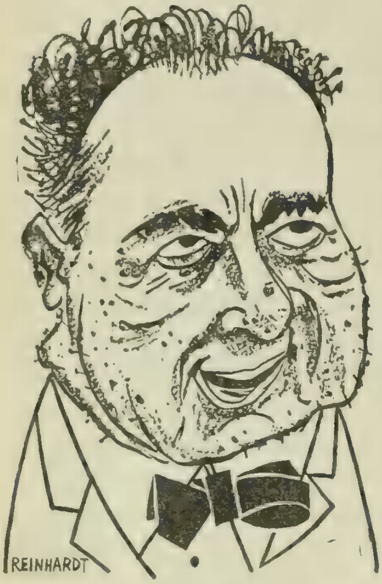
They've not yet been allowed to begin the work of reeducation in the broadcasts to Germans, as there is no agreement between Washington, Moscow, and London about the kind of Germans we want. Their job, therefore, consists mainly of issuing orders on behalf of the Allied Commander-in-Chief or the High Commissioner. There are scores of such orders every day in the absence of any German administration.

August 10. Spent all the morning talking to different people working in the Inter-Allied High Commissariat, now installed in the German Foreign Office in the Wilhelmstrasse, next door to the High Commissioner's official residence. The staff seems to consist of national groups hardly on speaking terms with each other. There is none of that admirable cooperation that General Eisenhower managed to institute between the armies of the United Nations in Tunisia. We are now suffering from the fact that the State Department and the Foreign Office each cultivated different groups of Free Germans, Free Italians, Free Hungarians, and so on, during the war.

Bill Stoneman has turned up on a quick tour that has taken him to Paris, Brussels, Rotterdam, Oslo, and Copenhagen. In each country all the Quislings have been murdered. The revenge has been particularly violent in Norway, where a kindly, peaceful people has been provoked by terrible oppression during the war. He finds the French disappointingly unprepared for a sensible peace. People to whom he talked in Paris were interested only in food, the return of their prisoners of war from Germany, and the establishment of a system of old-type alliances round Germany. The Belgians and the Dutch are in grave danger of famine since they have dense populations and the Germans stole almost their entire livestock. In these countries, and also in Denmark and Norway, he met many people who talked wistfully of becoming members of the British Commonwealth. The American Deputy High Commissioner for Western Europe told him he believed this to be the result of British propaganda.

Bill Stoneman is extremely depressed by the amount of Anglo-American friction he has found in each one of the countries he has visited. This confirms everything I hear from every newspaper colleague. In the Prime Minister's desire to do nothing which could possibly offend President Roosevelt or add to his task of keeping the American people interested in Europe, the British are held to have acquiesced in an American policy which is extremely unpopular throughout Europe. Despite statements made in Washington, it does seem to be true that many American officials of the UNRRA are—against the will of Governor Lehman—coupling relief supplies with political conditions. Stoneman is very angry with the British, who have so much more experience of Europe than the Americans, for making so little protest against a policy which may, in his view, embitter Europe against the Anglo-Saxons and increase rivalries inside Europe for a generation to come. Philip Jordan, who is in Budapest, happened to telephone while Bill was still with me, and they exchanged views with a frankness which must have caused a lot of worry to the military censor.

Philip says that the situation in Budapest is scandalous. Both British and American officials are "appeasing" as hard as they can. The British deputy commissioner used to stay with aristocratic Hungarian families for the shooting—in the old days when one shot animals and not men—and is all amiability to any of these aristocrats who happen not to have cooperated actively and openly with the Nazis. When Philip expostulated about this, the reply he got was that we had to work in with these people because there weren't any others. In other words, since 40 per cent of the land belongs to a few hundred families and most of the peasants have less than one acre of their own, there is no middle class. And since there is no middle class or highly organized working class, we must see that one doesn't develop; therefore we are bolstering up an aristocracy that managed to avoid a land reform even after the last war.



Dieckhoff

By playing in with these aristocrats we are confirming all Russian suspicions of our motives, especially as governments run by these aristocrats had sent armies to fight side by side with the Germans on Russian soil. The Soviet Ambassador has already brought this matter up several times in his talks with Anthony Eden, but no improvement has followed.

Just before I left London, Ridsdale and the other lads in the Foreign Office News Department were very worried about Russia's silence regarding Poland. Stoneman suggested that the Soviet Union would go on receiving, and publicizing, requests from all kinds of organizations in Poland to be incorporated as a state in the Soviet Union, at least until the British and Americans had made it clear that their own policy was not to encourage people in Hungary or elsewhere who must be prejudiced, for class as well as national reasons, against the Russians.

August 11. Had a very embarrassing meeting with Dieckhoff, former ambassador at Washington and Madrid. In the old days I always found him much more reasonable and entertaining than most German officials, and he was certainly well aware that Hitler, encouraged by Ribbentrop, was leading his country to war.

I met Dieckhoff as I was walking across the Tiergarten. We saw each other simultaneously, and we each quite obviously wondered whether we should recognize each other. It seemed stupid not to; so we sat on a bench and talked. He was so anxious to excuse himself for continuing in the diplomatic service despite the actions of his government that I concluded his conscience was giving him trouble. But it was just the behavior of these people who knew the difference between right and wrong but who never had the guts to stand up for the right which enabled thugs to run Europe.

When Dieckhoff got up to go, a man on a nearby bench also arose. I wondered who he was, and Dieckhoff explained that he was under a kind of open arrest as he was on the C list of war criminals—a list of men who had not been Nazis but had held responsible posts under the Nazi regime. He was therefore—and quite rightly—under constant surveillance.

Spent the afternoon on a prolonged walk through Berlin. Prostitution is already growing very rapidly, and I imagine quite half the girls on the Kurfürstendamm were new at the business. Any of them would rather have a cake of soap than a bunch of Reichsmarks.

I would hazard the forecast that even if no harsh terms are imposed upon Germany at all—and they certainly will be—the German people will not recover for generations to come. Two world wars and world defeats in a generation, one period of inflation and the prospect of another, the terrific casualties on the eastern front, and the knowledge that they have won the hatred of the whole world have utterly demoralized them. Worst of all, the labor movement has been so effectively wiped out that the people see no alternative to the kind of authoritarian government that Hitler gave them. It looks as if perhaps for years to come the United Nations would have to run Germany.

There is still a great hesitation about using Germans who have come out of the concentration camps. The excuse is that many internees were Nazis who happened to have quarreled with more important Nazis and to have been shut up for doing so. But there remains the fact that the Nazis only polled one-third of all the votes at the last free elections ever held—in November, 1932—and that in the first three years of Hitler's domination it was found necessary to sentence a quarter of a million people to imprisonment, in addition to the far greater number shut up in concentration camps with no trial at all. It's impossible to tell how many genuine "safe" Germans are still alive and in decent health; the disquieting fact is that no effort is being made to find out. Very reluctantly I am driven more and more to believe that neither the British nor the American government wants to have anything to do with such people, because both these governments still refuse to face the fact that, for the ordinary man in the street, the war was rather against a dominating and selfish class of men who are to be found everywhere but were particularly strong in Germany than against all Germans. For us it was a war against dictatorships; for our governments it was a war against a rival nation.

Water Has Gone to War

BY RICHARD W. ABBOTT

AFTER winging their way for hours over occupied territory the men huddled in the nineteen Lancasters knew that in a matter of seconds their objective would be reached. Slowly at first and then with increasing speed the bombers bore down on their targets until only fifty feet separated them from the water below. Now the target was dead ahead, and the bombardiers let loose their big 1,500-pound mines. Some exploded in the water with ear-shattering noise and little other effect. Others landed fairly on their target—the dams in the Ruhr valley.

Almost half of the big Lancasters did not see England again, but the damage they caused that night was worth the loss. Three big dams in Westphalia were shattered—the Mohne dam, the Eder dam, and the Sorpe dam. The industrial loss was tremendous. Thousands of workers were rendered homeless, and power stations were made useless for at least a year—until the damage could be repaired and the huge reservoirs refilled.

There was great elation in Allied headquarters when the full results of the raid were learned from reconnaissance photographs. The Berlin radio called it typical of the work of the R. A. F., with the destruction confined as usual to schools, churches, hospitals, and homes.

Soon, however, the Berlin radio was reporting the news of another flood—this time with high glee. Floods were sweeping across the American Middle West, and the German propagandists made the most of them. Fertile bottom land had been seeded to corn, wheat, and other crops which were expected to fill America's and the world's bread basket for the coming year—the year when demands upon American farmers would be heavier than they had ever been before, the year when occupied Europe might once again be free and clamoring for American food. Farmers were in despair as the water rose in the river banks and then spilled over in a roaring flood which devastated their fields. War factories were forced to close. At Weldon Springs, Missouri, the water inched its way into a TNT plant and also cut off the supply of raw materials. Three other war plants in the same area were flooded, and the story was the same up and down the valleys of the rivers.

When the waters went down, the damage was totaled as 21 dead, 160,000 homeless, 2,000,000 seeded acres of farm land lost to food production, innumerable war plants stopped or slowed down, and an incalculable number of man-hours lost. The Big Inch pipe line was broken in Arkansas by flood waters, and the flow of oil to the east was reduced at a time when reserves were being stored for the invasion of Sicily and Italy.

John Hughes, an Illinois farmer, was a typical flood victim. Like most farmers, Hughes had been struggling all the year against the shortage of labor, of farm-machinery parts, and of seed and fertilizer. By herculean efforts he had managed to get his 160 acres of bottom land seeded, in between rains. He watched the waters ruin his fields, drown part of his livestock and poultry, and flood his home. Hughes has two sons in the army and was eager to replant his acres. But the seed scarcity and the lateness of the season were almost insuperable obstacles.

The most appalling thing about the flood was that it could have been prevented—even though our earlier flood-control programs have not worked, as a glance at the record makes clear. Take the Upper Mississippi flood-control project, for example. Some years ago, after the disastrous 1933 flood, Congress authorized the army engineers to build a series of flood-control dams on the Mississippi River between St. Paul and St. Louis. Twenty-six dams were proposed, and at the time of Pearl Harbor approximately three-quarters of them had been completed. Yet they were of little help this spring. Alton, Illinois, which is situated twenty miles north of St. Louis, above the mouth of the Missouri River, is the site of Dam No. 26. Flood waters at Alton this spring were the second highest since the city was founded in 1814.

Another count against huge dams of this kind is the fact that even if they were effective in controlling floods their period of usefulness would be limited by the silting up of the reservoir area. Silting occurs when the current slows down as it comes into the backwater of the dam and deposits the soil which it has carried along with it. This fact seems to have been ignored by the army engineers in their dam-construction work for flood control. Congress too has been primarily interested in construction rather than maintenance, since the letting of contracts for building the dams offers excellent opportunities for pork-barrel politics.

At the present time Congress is considering the appropriation of $100,000,000 to enable the War Department to meet the most urgent flood-control needs. In addition, the War Department is planning gigantic post-war flood-control projects. If these are along the same old lines, the money will be wasted and the consequences may be tragic. Recent studies carried on in Texas have shown that the average life of a flood-control dam is between twenty and forty years when no erosion-control work is done on the watershed of the river system. At the end of that time silt has so filled up the reservoirs that they no longer serve their purpose. Can we afford to have another disastrous flood in, say, thirty years, when America may again be at war for its existence?

Because the estimated damage to the railroads from floods this year was over $10,000,000, the Association of American Railroads is seeking money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to relocate roadbeds. C. P. Couch, chairman of the board of the Kansas City and Southern and the Louisiana and Arkansas railroads, said before a Senate committee, "Steps must be taken to protect the nation's railroads from these recurring interruptions. They're acts of God over which we have no control." What Mr. Couch should have said is that rainfall is an act of God over which we have no control—not floods. By using our intelligence and forgetting pork-barrel politics, we can prevent floods. But we must not rely on dams and levees on the big rivers. We must tackle the problem at its source—back on the watersheds where the small streams rise.

A river system should be thought of as a network of streams flowing down from every hill and ravine. It is in the hills that floods start, and it is there that they should be controlled. The Tennessee Valley Authority has effectively demonstrated this principle. On the streams feeding into the Tennessee River it has constructed dams at strategic locations to form reservoir areas in times of heavy rainfall. Farther back in the ravines and along the small creeks it has built "check" dams. These may be nothing more than log or earth barriers which individually impound only a small amount of water, but collectively they impound huge amounts.

However, building dams, large or small, is only part of the job of flood control. As a nation we have been exceedingly extravagant with our soil and forest resources. At first thought this may seem to have little significance in flood prevention. But consider that a pound of humus material in the soil will hold nine pounds of water and the relationship can be clearly seen. When top soil is eroded, when forests are overcut or burned, precious humus is lost. With effective forest-fire control and regulated cutting the amount of water draining off in flood times could be materially reduced.

Soil-conservation work is also important in flood control. Terracing, strip cropping, and contour plowing are big aids in slowing down water runoff. Such work is essential if silting up of even small reservoirs is to be prevented.

To sum up: floods must be controlled not by building huge dams and levees on the main river systems but by the use of small dams at strategic locations on the tributary streams. Check dams should be built on the small creeks flowing into these tributaries. Adequate forest-fire control must be accomplished, and proper cutting methods of timber must be not only encouraged but made mandatory. Soil conservation work should be expanded to reach every farm.

In time of war or peace America is no richer than its soil and water resources. We must see that they are used wisely and well.

MILITARY INTELLIGENCE: "Flip Quiz," a children's game manufactured by Selchow and Righter, New York, includes the question, "Who commanded the Loyalists in the Spanish Civil War?" The answer provided is "General Franco." The manufacturer has no explanation of how the mistake was made, and reports that there have been no complaints thus far. . . . One of the definitions in a recent cross-word puzzle published by the New York Times was "Famous Ukrainian patriot." The patriot was Petlura, who with German help fought the Bolsheviks in 1918.

DR. ALFRED BAAKE of Chicago, a spokesman for the National Civic Federation, comes out for collective bargaining: "It is to the interest of organized labor for business to have the right to bargain with labor without interference of government."

THE RUBICON, an Italian-American news letter, offers this explanation of the destruction in Italy: "The civilizing work of two thousand years, which was only scratched by the various invaders of Italy who were supposed to have been uncivilized, has been destroyed in great part by the military machine of civilized nations that were fighting for democracy against autocracy."

FESTUNG EUROPA: Many reports from France tell of patriots writing "Vive De Gaulle!" in public places. There has been no report thus far that anyone has written "Vive Giraud!" . . . German-language underground newspapers are circulating among Germans in Norway. . . . Since the Norwegians have had to give up all their firearms, the bears, wolves, foxes, and wolverines in their country have been increasing at an alarming rate. And the wild animals no longer show any fear of man. . . . A Nazi paper in Prague explains the military situation with this quotation from Clausewitz: "Defense is the more effective form of warfare for insuring the defeat of the enemy."

CORRECTION: It was stated in this column on October 23 that Prince Hubertus zu Loewenstein's draft classification was 4-c, the category of refugees who want to defeat Hitler but don't want to shoot Germans. This was an error, for which we apologize. The Prince, a pre-Pearl Harbor father, is in Classification 3-a.

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

The Swiss Barometer

BY MAX MANDELLAUB

THE last twenty-five years have witnessed the progressive degeneration of the classic conception of neutrality as defined by international law. Still, the oldest European republic, with a deeply imbedded tradition of neutrality that has withstood centuries of wars and revolutions, has again succeeded, at least technically, in maintaining its status as a neutral country.

Though Swiss neutrality today undoubtedly lacks many of the constituents formerly regarded as essential, it cannot be denied that the homeland of the legendary William Tell preserves at least some aspects of its independence: Swiss and not German soldiers control the sources of the Rhine; Swiss and not German soldiers watch the most important mountain pass linking Germany and Italy. The Swiss militiaman, with his modern equipment and good training, is ready behind his wall of Alpine granite.

Hitler prefers Swiss neutrality to guerrilla warfare in the Alps and the blowing up of the St. Gotthard tunnel. Of course, German-Swiss relations and commercial clearing agreements contain an imperious "give and take," and Hitler takes more than he gives. The latest British black list contains the names of many Swiss firms reliably reported to be cooperating extensively with the enemy. The big Swiss armament company, Gebrüder Sulzer, one of the world's foremost manufacturers of Diesel engines, as been added to the list of "hostile firms." The wner of this newly blacklisted concern is Dr. Hans Sulzer, former Swiss Minister in Washington, who last year headed a commercial delegation from the Swiss Confederation negotiating for a softening of the British lockade. The Swiss people themselves, however, watch losely those among them who do business with Hitler, whether it is in machine tools or apples, electricity or heese, anti-aircraft guns or cows.

On the eve of World War II all Swiss political parties ade the solemn promise that if Switzerland once more ucceeded in staying out of the war, the suffering of bleeding world should not be a source of enrichment. ow there is again a good deal of talk about Swiss corporations making huge war profits. "The pay of excesive dividends is social dynamite," warns a liberal paper n Basel. Even the cautious Neue Zürcher Zeitung has aid that many enterprises are again earning huge profits nd paying high dividends, but it added, "After all, this s a time of prosperity for industry."

In spite of a continuous and insidious Nazi propaganda there are relatively few fascist sympathizers among the Swiss people, though the number has varied with Hitler's victories or failures. Intellectuals—students, lawyers, physicians, journalists, and civil-service employees—have been less resistant to fascist poison than the peasant or worker. Fascists are more militant in the French part of Switzerland than in the German and Italian parts.

The sudden collapse of the French Republic revealed the intimate relationship existing between Swiss neutrality and a strong independent France. With the establishment of the Vichy government, the political picture at Berne showed the influence of Pétain and Laval. By midsummer, 1940, M. Pilet-Golaz, head of the Swiss State Department, made a speech which was taken by the people as an abdication of Swiss neutrality and as such bitterly resented. Semi-official Swiss newspapers expressed admiration for the military skill of the German Panzer divisions, praised the realism of French collaborationists, and hoped for a privileged position in Hitler's New Europe. Colonel H. K. Sonderegger, a deputy from Basel-Land, "in agreement with a certain foreign power" proposed to several high politicians the overthrow of democracy and the establishment of a new government composed of Frontists (Swiss Nazis) and other elements sympathetic to Berlin.

Only after the surrender of Italy was much publicity given to the activities of the Swiss fascists. Two deputies, MM. Gadient and Bratschi, who were involved in the Nazi conspiracy, tried to divert public attention by violently attacking "unpatriotic" elements among the Swiss liberals. Strangely enough, the Colonel and his supporters were never brought to trial, though the Colonel was politely invited to hand in his resignation as deputy four months before his term expired. A few months ago it was stated officially that Deputy Sonderegger could not be punished for high treason, ". . . since he had not succeeded in carrying out his intentions."

The progressive parties are now much encouraged by the defeat of Italian fascism and the certitude of Hitler's eventual fall. A few months ago Die Tat, the organ of an aggressive independent politician, M. Duttweiler, demanded a radical change in Swiss foreign policy and stated that the head of the Swiss Department of State, "as a friend and protector of the Frontist-Nazi traitors," was no longer an acceptable leader of his country.

Such are the conditions under which the general elections to the National Council (Swiss Parliament) and in

BURLINGAME

WHO WAS RIGHT?

For two years this section has maintained that Franco and his Falange were 100 per cent pro-Axis and that they were aiding the enemies of the United Nations by every means in their power. We denounced as the most unrealistic form of appeasement a policy based upon the expectation that Franco would come over to our side as soon as he felt free to do so. Many persons, including Archbishop Spellman, thought otherwise. The Archbishop, in his famous article in Collier's, spoke of Franco in terms of warmest approval. In view of the congratulations which Franco has recently offered the Filipino traitor Laurel, we think we are entitled to inquire—Who was right?

many cantons to the Council of State (Swiss Senate) took place on October 30 and 31 of this year.

In 1939 the Swiss people elected a Parliament composed of 187 members. The strongest party, the Liberals, obtained 49 seats. Closely following them came the Socialists with 45 seats and the Catholic Conservatives with 43. The other parties shared the rest of the seats. During the life of this outgoing Parliament certain political changes took place. An important and militant group of the Swiss labor movement headed by Léon Nicole was outlawed and its parliamentary representation annulled by a majority vote of the House. This procedure was anti-constitutional, but political, not juridical, reasons prevailed. Nazi hegemony in Europe was behind this suppression of the strongest party in Geneva.

Throughout his entire political career Nicole had been an ardent anti-fascist. In his newspaper Le Travail he had exposed the subversive activities of many Swiss reactionaries long before the collapse of France brought definite proof of their treason. It was therefore bewildering when a well-known Swiss liberal, William E. Rappard, instead of protesting against such an open violation of the Swiss Bill of Rights, used the opportunity to enter Parliament.

But outlawing a progressive movement does not necessarily mean destroying its impetus. The military setbacks of Nazi Germany in 1942 and 1943 and the ever-increasing social tension in Switzerland have changed the political tone of the Swiss Socialist Party. In 1941 only a few Socialist leaders opposed the proscription of Nicole's party and its widely read daily newspaper. Now the pressure of the masses has become so strong that the Labor Congress held in September voted almost unanimously for a resolution advocating the legalizing of the prohibited group. Many bourgeois liberals have also taken up its cause; ten thousand signed a petition urging "the repeal of an untenable violation of democratic rights." Thereupon Nicole and his son were put in jail, accused of illegal communistic activity.

In May, 1943, in the municipal election in Geneva newly founded labor party obtained the largest numbe of mandates, twenty-six, the Liberal Party coming ne with nineteen. The authorities could prevent the trad tional Socialist Party in Geneva from participating in th vote, but they could not hinder the election of a "labo list" presented, in spite of many difficulties, by Swis citizens inspired by a sense of responsibility which tha old Swiss newspaper the Berner Tagwacht called "th will of a social Stalingrad" against reaction at home. I the industrial center of Schaffhausen, only a few yard from the German border, the Socialist candidate, Bringolf, gathered 45 per cent of the votes cast in an electio for the Senate. In the canton of Vaud an opposition candidate almost succeeded in replacing the reactionary incumbent. In Zurich the Independent Party headed b M. Duttweiler and the Socialists made good progress i the cantonal elections. In Basel the progressive movemen proved its strength in several plebiscites.

The elections of two weeks ago determined the political make-up of the new Swiss Parliament. The Socialist made gains almost everywhere and are now for the firs time the strongest political faction in the National Council; their 56 seats represent an increase of nearly 25 pe cent over 1939. The so-called Liberal Party lost two seat and now ranks second with 47 deputies. The Catholi Conservatives maintained an unchanged representatio of 43. The smaller parties together have 48. However the coalition in power did not lose its majority, and th Swiss Senate was little affected by the new political trend The question of Socialist participation in the federal government will be the main issue of the coming months an may lead to a bitter controversy among labor leaders.

Vast changes have taken place in the past four years but they will probably seem unimportant beside the developments of the future. The Swiss people are marching forward. They demand full employment with decent wages and the living democracy promised by the Swiss constitution. Their hope lies in the fighting peoples of the United Nations. If a poll were taken today to determine whether the Swiss people want a victory of the Anglo-Americans or of the Germans, 95 per cent would be in favor of the United States and Great Britain. If they were asked whether they wanted a victory of Soviet Russia or of Germany, an overwhelming majority would still be against Germany.

Switzerland was not defeated by Hitler, but the defeat of France disclosed Swiss Pétains and Lavals. Switzerland was not looted by Hitler, but the looting of Nazi-controlled Europe had its equivalent in Switzerland in Nazi "clearing dictates." Swiss democracy was not crushed by the Gestapo, but the crushing of democracy in Europe forced legal labor movements to go underground. No Hapsburg, no Franco, no Darlan looms as potential head of a post-war Switzerland, but the inevitability of a revoutionary situation in Europe is not accepted without pprehension. Geographic and political frontiers have ost their meaning. In the pulse of the Swiss people ounds the heartbeat of the people of Europe fighting or the promised century of the common man.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

THE city of Hanover was heavily bombed at the end of September and again in the second week of ctober. On October 14 the newspapers contained a umber of decrees issued by the Gauleiter of the prov-nce, Lauterbacher. One of them ran:

> I have reasons for repeating emphatically the decree issued after the previous raid—namely, that offices handling assistance for persons whose homes have been destroyed or damaged by bombs must keep open even after office hours. All office hours are suspended. This applies not only to the city of Hanover but to all districts and communes which have received évacués. Moreover, I request party and state offices under all circumstances to help people even if they are not directly under their jurisdiction. It must be remembered that Hanoverians have spent trying nights and that a great many of them have been obliged to make great sacrifices. They are entitled to attention and polite treatment. I expect swift action, with no bureaucratic delays, in all cases.

A second decree granted the inhabitants an extra eek's rations—two ounces of coffee, half a bottle of randy, one-quarter of a pound of bread, and three-uarters of a pound of meat. A third was worth noting, the first place, for its heading, "Hanover Will Be eld." It went on to forbid the more important state d party offices to move away.

> The housing shortage caused by the September and October raids necessitates the removal of some offices to other places in the district. But I hereby issue a drastic precautionary order that the responsible main offices are to remain in the capital of the district and province. No exceptions will be allowed. Hanover will be held under all circumstances!

The problem of "holding" Hanover—an expression stomarily applied only to a besieged town or sector of e front—must be a difficult one, for two days before ese decrees Gauleiter Lauterbacher had published an-ther, entitled "Hanoverians, Listen!" describing the avest danger of the moment. "After heavy air raids the emy tries to undermine the population's fortitude by rculating lying rumors through broadcasts and agents. ch efforts must be opposed energetically and unitedly." nd then he announced how they were to be opposed: every person was given the right to arrest any other erson; everybody was to be his own policeman. "I there-re order and authorize every citizen to arrest all rumormongers and take them to the nearest party or state office. Whoever fails to do this makes himself an accomplice and will be treated accordingly."

"Armament plants in general cannot count on obtaining many new workers. Therefore more efficient employment of the man-power now available is a matter of the gravest interest." This was the comment of the Hamburger Fremdenblatt of October 20 on the establishment of a new branch in the already gigantic bureaucracy of war industries.

The head of the new bureau bears the title of "Reich Engineer for Labor Utilization." Under him work thirty-four "district engineers for labor utilization," and under these are five thousand "factory engineers for labor utilization." All factories employing as many as three hundred workers come under the jurisdiction of this office, which is to introduce "far-reaching changes in the utilization of labor," over the heads of the factory managers and other officers. Many of these far-reaching changes will of course be technical, but not all. Reforms in the art of "handling people" are also on the program. "Willingness to work is as important as manual or mental skill." In short, the new bureau was created to "overcome inertia, which is often very stubborn."

"If we trace the most idiotic and mischievous rumors to their source," declared the Gauleiter of Salzburg at a meeting on October 8, "we never find that they originate with the common people, who are doing their work heroically and with an exemplary sense of duty. They come invariably from quite different strata, from people who do not share the common burdens and sacrifices. But we will get at them!"

Behind the tactic of representing "the better people" as the only oppositionists is the desire to arouse suspicion of the opposition in the mind of the masses, as well as the Nazis' real fear of what they call "the reaction." Once before, at the time of Stalingrad, this theme was worked furiously. Then Goebbels gradually let it lapse. But since the appointment of Himmler as Minister of the Interior it has again been intensively cultivated, and not merely rhetorically. Of late quite a number of "the better people" have been executed.

Some cases have been mentioned in this column. D. N. B., the official German news service, announced the latest with a certain enjoyment. For the first time in Germany a bank director had been brought to the scaffold and beheaded. It was only a banker from the medium-sized city of Hindenburg in Schlesien, but others may follow. The crime of the fifty-six-year-old George Miethe was "persistently to spread treacherous and seditious rumors among his employees. His behavior was especially reprehensible because he misused his position as leader of an enterprise."

BOOKS and the ARTS

China's Revolutionary Tradition

A SHORT HISTORY OF CHINESE CIVILIZATION. By Tsui Chi. With a Preface by Laurence Binyon. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $4.

WHEN a modern Chinese sets out to write the history of his country for use in powerful Western countries with records of racial prejudice and national aggression, he might be expected to coat its weaknesses with a liberal layer of whitewash. He might also be expected to become lost in the maze of an ancient civilization that stretches from the first legendary beginnings in 2697 B.C., or earlier, down to the living present. Mr. Tsui Chi, an erudite Chinese scholar, has avoided both pitfalls and has produced a relatively short, graphic, and most interesting volume. Only in the later chapters about modern China and Chinese personalities does he apply whitewash, and even then he tries to be objective.

The first thing that Americans complain about, in books on China, is the names of Chinese cities and towns, and of Chinese personages. However, the Chinese, like Americans, have names, and their use can't be helped. Such names abound here, but it is not necessary to remember more than a few of them, for this book deals not merely with the rise and fall of dynasties, wars and more wars, and revolutions upon revolutions that overthrew decaying and corrupt dynasties; it is primarily a record of Chinese thought and China's civilized achievements in philosophy, literature, art, and science. A sparkling stream of folklore, mingled with social awareness, enlivens the book, bringing it close to the common reader and at times making it as fascinating as a novel. On the social side the book reveals the common man of China rising throughout history to destroy oppression and corruption. This revolutionary basis of Chinese history is not confined to the ancient past but also holds today, and modern Chinese history must be considered in its light. Instead of scaring Americans to death, it ought to bring China closer to us and our own history and illuminate for us the democratic nature of the Chinese people. The words of an ancient historian who explained the downfall of the great Han dynasty in 220 A.D. might be legitimately applied to the present: "When the footpaths of the rich ran across every field and the benefits of streams and mountains were monopolized by them, the poor hadn't enough ground on which to rest the end of an awl."

Mr. Tsui not only justifies the doctrine of Confucianism as necessary during times of decay but also analyzes it for what it is: a feudal, social philosophy of conservatism, heavy with formalism, exaggerated ceremony and ritual, which was fought by the great natural, equalitarian philosophies of Lao-tze and Mo-tze. In brief graphic passages the author also analyzes the social philosophies of other thinkers, such as Hanfei, who advocated a reign of law and the equality of all men before the law.

People interested in the development of painting, pottery, sculpture, and early Chinese inventions such as printin paper-making, the compass, and gunpowder, will find th book of great interest. The rise and influence of Buddhis upon China, and the liberality with which Chinese rule received and welcomed the first Christian priests, are pregnant with meaning. China had no prejudices against Chri tianity until a Papal Bull attempted to tell Chinese Christia how to conduct themselves. The first Jesuit priests to Chin were welcomed as the bearers of Western sciences such a astronomy, arithmetic, and cartography. But the impact o Christianity upon China in the eighteenth and nineteent centuries became intricately mingled with foreign commercial aggression. The early Western business men trading wit China were half-pirate, and their true nature was revealed i the British opium wars which forced opium upon China The unequal treaties which followed gave foreign missionaries special rights and privileges. Had Christianity been a non-aggressive as Buddhism, its influence on the Far Eas might have been entirely different.

Americans may disregard many of the countless Chines names in this book, but not that of Wang An-shih, th great reformer, Premier under one of the Sung emperors Wang An-shih was a man so modern that he might hav lived in the present. One century after the founding of th Sung dynasty in 960 A.D., the dynasty was tottering under burden of decay, with luxury and corruption underminin the country. A powerful landlord class had again risen, an the peasants groaned under fearful burdens, including usurious debts and heavy taxation. There were foreign wars an social uprisings. The story of the rise of the people is preserved for us in the famous Shui Hu tales which Pearl Buc has translated in "All Men Are Brothers." The Sung cour turned to religion and pleaded with heaven to save it.

Instead of turning to heaven, Premier Wang tried t introduce courageous and sweeping reforms, such as a national budget, a just taxation system, and the granting o generous loans at low rates of interest to the peasants. H cut down the unwieldy army and created a smaller powerful body of crack troops, and also a universal militia system.

The reforms of Wang An-shih have a modern ring. To hi banner flocked all the progressives of his day—young men opposed to Confucian conservatism as well as to the corruption and injustice of the prevailing system—and out of thei struggle came the great natural painting and literature of th day. But the conservatives fought Wang, much as American reactionaries fought the New Deal; and they branded him and his supporters as the Chinese equivalent of "visionaries" and "starry-eyed dreamers." Premier Wang happened to have a backbone, however, and he met his opponents head-on. Mr. Tsui says that Premier Wang was too energetic and aggressive and wanted progress too quickly, whereas the Chinese are "by nature conservative." In this respect he takes the view of the ruling class, not of the Chinese common people generally, who most assuredly welcomed every energetic reform which Wang An-shih introduced. But the conservatives of the time triumphed and Wang fell from favor; his sovereign soon thereafter died. Reactionaries came to power, and Wang and his supporters dared not raise their heads for many years. By that time, however, social decay had gone so far that they were recalled to power, but too late. The Mongol hordes were already advancing into China, and soon the Sung dynasty was destroyed and the foreign barbarians established the Yuan dynasty until another peasant revolution uprooted it and brought the Mings to power. The Mings in turn degenerated, and in 1621 A.D. fell before the invading Manchus, who ruled until they were overthrown by the followers of the late Dr. Sun Yat-sen in 1911.

The fate of the Chinese Republic is now known to many: years of civil war, in which all the great powers had a finger, each of them supporting any war lord who served their commercial interests. The Kuomintang as the progressive nationalist party became, after 1927, the party of the new ruling class, with the ubiquitous landlord, merchant, and modern banker taking possession and repeating a historical process. This led to the rise of the Chinese Red Army. Mr. Tsui is, I believe, utterly wrong in making a distinction between the Kuomintang and the plutocracy of modern times. They are identical.

Mr. Tsui perhaps throws a sop to America when he says that China's modern army was reorganized and trained by "Europeans and Americans." It was reorganized and trained by German military advisers, one of whom, General von Seeckt, designed the main military campaigns against the Chinese Red Army—which was another peasant revolution. Until Japan forced Hitler to withdraw the German advisers in 1938, General von Falkenhausen was the head of the German military mission. Von Falkenhausen was until recently the Nazi military dictator of the Low Countries. The Soviet Russians took the place of the Germans until recent months, when Americans have had a finger in the Chinese pie.

The description of the New Life movement as given by Mr. Tsui is also beside the point. This is a semi-fascist movement modeled on the similar organization of one Signor Mussolini. Mr. Tsui has tried to walk a tight rope in regard to recent events and personalities, but he makes a mistake when he describes Madame Chiang Kai-shek as the "mother of every wounded soldier in China."

> Madame Chiang is a woman of sincere, unpretentious character, and although she learned to admire the American political and educational system, was never captivated by the luxury and superficial brilliance of modern New York. She dresses like a simple and modest Chinese wife, and as one of the leaders of the New Life movement, she has given an example to the women of China to dress plainly, live frugally, and abjure those new-fangled frivolities which are quite out of keeping with their dignified Chinese traditions.

Mr. Tsui perhaps gets his Soong sisters mixed up. That description might apply to Madame Sun Yat-sen, but never to Madame Chiang. The paragraph was perhaps written before Madame Chiang's visit to this country with a retinue of relatives and retainers. Jade and diamonds, mink and sables, silks and satins, do not constitute frugal and plain living, and are totally out of harmony with the bitter lives of the soldiers and the common people of China.

Discounting Mr. Tsui's account of such incidents and personalities, this book is nevertheless well worth reading.

AGNES SMEDLEY

What to Do with Germany

THE HIDDEN ENEMY. By Heinz Pol. Julian Messner. $3.

HEINZ POL, a liberal, democratic German journalist, presents in this book the thesis that it would be equally catastrophic for the peace of the world if either one of two current theories about Germany were made the basis of postwar policy. One theory is "that the Nazis cannot be distinguished from the German people and that Germany as a whole is an aggressor nation." The other is "that only the Nazis are the culprits and that in order to build a new and better Germany it will be sufficient to get rid of Hitler and his crowd."

As against these two inadequate theories Mr. Pol contends that the pan-Germanism of the old military aristocracy represents a greater threat to the peace of Europe than Nazism does. He traces the rise and development of pan-Germanism in interesting historical chapters which are worth the reader's attention not only because of the immediately relevant conclusions drawn from them but also because of the light they throw upon German history.

The discriminating judgments of this book are of the greatest value at this particular juncture of history, when the passions of war and the exigencies of military strategy tend to obscure the realities of the German scene and to make a wise disposition of the German problem difficult. The passions of war invariably tempt nations to picture the foe in terms of total depravity. Vansittartism is an inevitable concomitant of conflict. Vansittart's theory is a rationalized form of the vindictiveness which always expresses itself as an overtone in war-time emotion. It leads to silly miscalculations of the complex political factors with which we must deal. It would be foolish to fight a war for democracy and fail to claim as allies the very considerable democratic elements in an enemy nation, elements which were the first to defy tyranny and to pay the price of their defiance. Some of them tried in vain to persuade the democratic world of the peril which Hitlerism represented for it as well as for Germany, and of the necessity of meeting this threat with outside as well as inside resistance. The outside resistance did not materialize until after the internal resistance was crushed. A tragic and ironic note is added to history by the fact that some of the appeasers of yesterday are the proponents today of the idea that there are no democrats in Germany.

On the other hand, military strategy may easily tempt us into the opposite peril. Democratic opposition has been crushed so thoroughly in Germany that the first crack in the Nazi structure must come through tension between the Nazi Party and the army leadership. This situation will undoubtedly give the old Junker leadership of the army the chance to offer itself as the representative of a decent Germany with which the democracies can and ought to make peace.

HITLER'S "NEUTRAL" ALLY

IN THE EYES of our State Department Franco is neutral, but The Nation has insisted from the first that he is a fascist and an ally of Hitler and Mussolini. His latest actions—signing a trade pact with Mussolini and congratulating Japan's puppet President of the Philippines on his inauguration—indicate that The Nation is right.

In next week's issue J. Alvarez del Vayo, Foreign Minister of the last freely elected government of Spain, now editor of the Political War Section of The Nation, will discuss conditions in Spain today, Spanish-American relations, and the meaning of current political moves in both countries.

Even now, in November, 1943, after the Moscow Conference, Franco helps Hitler and the United States helps Franco. For a clear explanation of this curious state of affairs, read Dr. Del Vayo's article in next week's issue of

Military strategy will make it necessary for the Allied co
mand to deal with the army leadership; and the conservati elements in the democratic world will seek to extend t immediate necessity of military strategy into a settled politic policy, calculated to prevent radical revolution. The handlin of the Badoglio palace revolution in Italy is a perfect dre rehearsal of what we may expect when the German collap comes. The danger contained in such a policy toward Ge many is all the greater because there are indications th Russia favors it. The Russian propaganda for a "free Ge many" is still ambiguous; but it may mean willingness deal with the German army rather than desire for a Co munist revolution.

A peace which established the Junkers in power would as catastrophic as a peace based upon the theory of the tot depravity of Germany. Mr. Pol proves conclusively that the political objectives of the Nazis were preached by t pan-Germans long before the Nazis were heard of. As matter of fact, Nazism is in some respects merely a low middle-class version of the creed of the German aristocrat
It adds certain corrupt religious overtones to their progra compounds internal tyranny with a predatory internation policy, and spices the theory of racial supremacy with t specific poison of anti-Semitism. The people who worry abo whether Germany can ever be cured of Nazism direct the anxiety to the wrong peril. Nazism is too corrupt to win t soul of any people permanently. But the predatory creed German militarists is sufficiently diluted with private decen and "Christian" tradition to give it a more lasting qualit
There lies the real danger.

Mr. Pol is on the right track. Nevertheless, he has giv his thesis a slightly too narrow content by his emphasis up the history of the Pan-German League and its importance German life. The creed of pan-Germanism is undoubted the most specific symptom of the dangerous political orient tion of the German military caste. But fully to understan the pathetic political inadequacy of modern Germany o would have to study the whole history of the German cla structure with particular reference to the inability of t bourgeois and proletarian democratic forces to break t power of this military caste. Should the so-called democrat world give this caste another lease of life, our era would ad a crowning folly to an age already overwhelmed by trag futilities.

"A New Man"

THE AMERICAN: THE MAKING OF A NEW MA

By James Truslow Adams. Charles Scribner's Sons. $

JAMES TRUSLOW ADAMS attempts to describe and define "a new man," the American. By "the American he means neither the genius nor the caricature but the averag
John Doe. The fashioning process requires historical trea ment, but the book is not narrative history. The author conception of the American man is stated in terms of t American dream. But the American dream itself is not single unchanging vision: it is as complex, as contradictor as life. In my opinion—which Mr. Adams does not share-the historian returns baffled from the quest. But a pleasa

IT CAN BE DONE!

Simply by opening its doors Sweden saved the Jewish population of nearby Denmark. Simply by opening the gates of Palestine thousands of Jews from nearby countries will save themselves.

The Germans finally "lost patience" with Denmark . . . y a few weeks ago. After years of occupation, the Nazis ved in with their harshest iron fist, with firing squads, icentration camps, martial law.

As always, the first Nazi victims were the Jews. The zis at once planned to deport the ENTIRE Danish vish population to Poland for annihilation.

JT THE JEWS WERE SAVED!

They were saved because one small government took im- diate and vigorous action. Sweden directly protested the rder-program for the Danish Jews. Sweden warned the zis of "serious consequences." Sweden made known that is ready to receive and to shelter all the Jews of Denmark.

IIS WAS ENOUGH TO SAVE THE JEWS!

n spite of the fact that Denmark is a little country, under viest military domination, in spite of every "insurmount- e" obstacle, the bulk of the Jews in Denmark escaped to ety in nearby Sweden.

They are safe because of one reason—the doors of a ghboring country were unlocked. And because of that t, the escaping Jews found superhuman resources and rgy and vitality to reach these doors of safety.

Not only this alone, but the German terror in Denmark abated because of the Danish and Swedish reaction. The rman propaganda passed to the defensive, explaining and logizing at length why Germany was "compelled" to in- urate the terror campaign against the Jews in Denmark. e German propagandists in their new, unprecedented, apolo- ic campaign tried even to argue that the measures against Jews were not a result of political or racial considerations only undertaken from a purely military point of view.

This is the great and historic service that Sweden and nmark rendered to humanity and to a martyred people. ey destroyed completely the legend that "nothing can be ie." They have proven irrefutably that, with good will, Jews can be saved even in the most precarious and most gerous circumstances.

FATEFUL CHALLENGE

When will the great and mighty democracies learn from living and shining example of small Sweden? When will eat Britain declare that all the Jews who can escape the th trap of the Balkans and reach nearby Palestine will l an open door there?

For Palestine is the nearest and most practical haven. It be reached through Turkey by train or bus. Palestine is further from Bulgaria than Miami is from New York. Only its doors need be opened for masses of Jews to save themselves.

And other doors could be opened temporarily: the nearby island of Cyprus, the vast territories of North Africa, where the doomed Jews of Europe can find immediate temporary asylum.

This is a fateful challenge.

Through the action of Great Britain, hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions of human lives will be saved. It is up to Great Britain to make known to the world, to the terror-stricken Nazi satellites and to the Godless enemy, her firm determintion to save the Jews. Salvation will follow immediately.

WE HAVE FAITH IN AMERICA

We know that the conscience and humanity of Americans will not accept a policy of inaction in a matter of life and death to millions of other human beings. We have faith that the force of your indignation will enable us to carry out plans for the rescue of European Jews before it is too late.

In this faith, we intend to carry on the struggle to get action on the part of the Governments of the United Nations.

Not only is this Committee trying to move the Governments through direct negotiations in Washington, London, Palestine and Turkey, where it has its committees or representatives, but it is also organzing sustained mass action. The pilgrimage of 500 United States orthodox rabbis to Washington, and the Week of Compassion observed by six thousand Christian churches, marked the inaugural of a petition campaign. This petition is addressed to President Roosevelt and to the Congress of the United States demanding that immediate and effective measures be taken; that a special Inter-Governmental Agency to Save the Jewish People of Europe with powers and means to act at once, and on a large scale, be created immediately.

Add your name to the millions of signatures that will make this petition a powerful instrument of public opinion.

With the active help of all humane and public-spirited Americans we shall not fail. We must not fail. The lives of millions of human beings are at stake. Democratic governments cannot resist forever the pressure of an outraged public opinion. Ultimately they must yield.

This campaign is strictly a race against time and death. Your immediate financial help will determine its scope and speed . . . and thus the rescue of a martyred people.

stroll through our brief past is not time wasted, even though we should come back empty-handed. On every period Mr. Adams has shrewd and informative things to say, and he says them with that engaging, eager evenness of tone which has made him a veritable Dale Carnegie among historical writers. He is too well bred ever to challenge a cherished tradition. His mind is perfectly attuned to his own conception of "the American": the book, although not egocentric, might be considered a self-portrait. So Mr. Adams moves with naturalness and gusto in the realm of the accepted. The method breaks down only when he touches upon foreign problems. His few references to Europe seem to me painfully "safe and sound" in the worst sense of the terms: the safe almost empty, and the sound chiefly sound.

I fully agree with Mr. Adams that in order to describe "the American" you will have to heap up contradictions. The problem is whether an accumulation of antinomies can be accepted as a definition. The Americans, to begin with, are "in fundamentals more like the British than they are like any other people." In my opinion this is a popular delusion, due to the use of a common language. England is caste-bound; our first tenet is equality. England "loves understatement" (cf. Shakespeare, Milton, Dickens, Carlyle, Kipling, et al.); we love exaggeration. English life is leisurely, ours trepidating. The language obstacle once conquered, it has been my experience that Americans get along more easily with average Frenchmen, Germans, Russians than with the English. The Continentals are people, and even folk; the British are peculiar.

The great Anglo-Saxon principle of "liberty under the law" is an essential element in our character. But Mr. Ada neatly explodes that fallacy. We have at the same time t cult of the law and the cult of lawlessness; that is why have so many prosperous lawyers. "Thus in one way another—smuggling, lawmaking chicanery, or just absolu non-observance with no penalty—the American develop the deep instinctive belief that he need not obey any la he did not approve of. . . ."

DIFFERENCE OF OPINION ON

MAXIM LITVINOFF

By ARTHUR UPHAM POPE

[L. B. Fischer Publishing Corp., $3.50]

In the N. Y. Journal American, BENJAMIN DE CASSERES writes:

"One of the most obsequious and nauseating biographies I, as an American ever read. . . . Fellow-Americans, if you need a quick emetic, this is your book."

But There Is a Contrary Opinion!

Former Ambassador JOSEPH E. DAVIES in the Washington Post says:

" 'MAXIM LITVINOFF' is one of the most important books of the day. It is a definite contribution to the creation of an intelligent public opinion, which is needed to create and sustain a firm working arrangement for the future."

WALTER DURANTY in the N. Y. Times says:

". . . a remarkable feat of scholarship and research as well as a vivid and interesting picture of a man who has played a singularly important role in world affairs of the last twenty-five years."

LAWRENCE DAME in the Boston Herald says:

"It cannot fail to be read with interest and profit in these days when we must try to understand Russia. . . ."

STERLING NORTH in the N. Y. Post says:

"This is a serious study of a major character in the current international drama. . . . It should do much in cementing American-Soviet relations and in dissipating the Red bogey."

Next among Anglo-Saxon "racial" gifts is the capacity compromise. Yes, but Henry IV, Frenchiest of the Frenc was compromise incarnate. In the two major crises of o history, the issues of independence and slavery, compromi was conceivable. America was offered the equivalent dominion status, and the slaves could have been redeem over a period of years at a handsome price. In both cas the "Anglo-Saxon" preferred the arbitrament of the swor

And so it goes: American sternness, American goo nature; American shrewdness, American naivete; Americ crusading spirit, America's attachment to the main chan and the profit motive; America's rugged individualism, a the desire of every American—a born "joiner," a passiona conformist—to be an individualist of the standard typ an individualist exactly like everybody else. No wonder i in that confusion, we find many excellent Americans wl consider the activities of the Dies committee the perfect pa tern of un-Americanism.

The period type—itself a will-o'-the-wisp—is more re than the national. Mr. Adams shows that at one time adve ture, grab, hurry, display could be accepted as characteristi of "the American." But these traits did not belong to Wasl ington, Jefferson, or Lincoln; they aptly describe the Frenc
Second Empire.

I believe Mr. Adams is right in regarding not the Amer can man but the American dream as the deeper reality. B that dream—honest work, freedom, and peace—is commo to untold millions in Europe. In America most of the ol stacles to the attainment of that dream did not exist, or ha been removed. For two centuries America was a tangib Utopia. We have a special responsibility in making the un versal dream come true; we have the freest chance, and n valid alibi.

"The New Man" hailed by that excellent "American Crèvecœur in 1792, is not a new national product, a loc type like "the Italian" or "the Swede." He is "the commo man": men freely uniting on the basis of their commo humanity. This, I have always believed, is the America ideal, from Jefferson, through Lincoln, to Ruggles of Re Gap and Henry Wallace. Washington proudly called hin self "a citizen of the great Republic of Humanity at large.
On the pedestal of William Lloyd Garrison's statue I rea
"My country is the world, my countrymen are all mankind.
Walt Whitman sang, "O America, because you build fo mankind, I build for you." America cannot be reduced to th status of a "nation" like the snarling packs of yesterday i Europe. America remains the hope of the world, because transcends the "sacred egoism" of the tribes. The one accep able conception of "the new man," "the American," wa expressed by Terence in his Homo Sum. Nothing less will d
To reduce "the American" to a national type would be

ALBERT GUÉRARD

In Defense of Liberalism

REE MINDS: JOHN MORLEY AND HIS FRIENDS. By Frances Wentworth Knickerbocker. Harvard University Press. $3.

CLERICALISM was the target of nineteenth-century liberalism, and liberalism became the scapegoat of the wentieth century. Fascism-Nazism attacked it on one side, nd reaction, euphemistically termed "conservativism," on he other, taking no account of the fact that neither the rench Revolution nor liberalism is the villain in the histori-al drama but only a new form of man's eternal struggle for more freedom. Any effort to rehabilitate the often maligned deology of the past is therefore timely and welcome.

In portraying Morley and his friends Leslie Stephen and red Harrison, and in analyzing Morley's literary works Mrs. Knickerbocker displays not only an amazingly compre-ensive—I am almost tempted to say too extensive—reading, ut an intensive grasp of the controversy of our age. Perhaps is an overstatement to say that "these Victorians belonged . . to the happiest class of the happiest country in the appiest period of the world," but T. S. Eliot's description f it as "an age of bustle . . . which improved nothing, an ge of progressive degeneration" is not justified either. We ay make allowances for Eliot's Anglo-Catholicism which uts him under the ban of the Syllabus of Pope Pius IX xcommunicating liberalism. As for the attack launched by totalitarians," these foes of freedom could never have as-umed power without the tolerance granted by the suicidal nterpretation of liberty.

Morley himself is the leading figure in Mrs. Knicker-ocker's book as he was in that literary circle which rallied ound the Fortnightly. A group of American liberals cen-ered round The Nation, to which, incidentally, one of the Morley group, Leslie Stephen, was a frequent contributor. he author convincingly disproves various current accusa-ons against Victorian liberalism. These rationalists and dicals, in spite of having cast off dogma, had kept a eligious attitude. "Their humanism, their belief in the dig-ity of human nature, was rooted in their fathers' faith that an is the child of God." It is a misstatement that the Vic-rians favored hypocrisy. Nor did they approve of the xploitation created by the freedom of competition. J. S. Mill thlessly exposed the insincerities of his age, and in Mor-y's "Recollections" liberalism "stands for pursuit of social ood against class interests and for the dignity of the indi-dual." It may be true, as the author puts it, that nineteenth-ntury liberalism "had failed to humanize the industrial der out of which it grew," but those who reproach lib-alism because of this failure seem to forget that the moral ecepts of the Sermon on the Mount, too, have thus far iled to become realities.

Just now when reactionaries are anxious to exorcise the scist Satan by employing that Beelzebub which Thomas . Masaryk termed Caesaropapism, Mrs. Knickerbocker's holarly work should be made compulsory reading in some the Allied chancelleries, whose representatives apparently ve forgotten that "history itself is the story of liberty." It a gracefully written book, although the enviable literary

RUSTEM VAMBERY

What's the Answer?

WHICH KIND OF REVOLUTION? By W. D. Herridge. Little, Brown and Company. $1.75.

TOWARD the end of his term of office, when the depression was in its mid-gloom, the Canadian Prime Minister, R. B. Bennett, quite suddenly began to speak in the mellifluent fireside tones of the New Deal. His tory friends were greatly shocked, for Mr. Bennett was the soundest of right-thinking Canadians. The rest of Canada received the stirring summons to reform with a startled incredulity. Had they been more convinced, Mr. Bennett might still be Prime Minister instead of in the British House of Lords, and W. D. Herridge might well be in the Canadian Cabinet. For afterward it was freely rumored that Mr. Herridge, Canadian Minister to Washington from 1931 to 1935, was the source and inspiration of Mr. Bennett's "New Deal."

After reading his testament of faith we may believe almost anything of Mr. Herridge as a political heretic. "Which Kind of Revolution?" is a slashing attack on the frailties, the stupidities, the hypocrisy, and the reaction of what he terms "English-speaking Democracy." Too weak and unconvinced before the war to stop fascism, even now it "is fighting for the kind of freedom which will permit the old order to perpetuate its failure. Democracy is fighting a war of restoration. We are not trying to build. We are exhuming something which by all the laws of science and morality is long since dead." Worse than that, English-speaking democracy is drifting into a neo-fascism as a result of its fear and hatred of communism. Many have already made up their minds that the Third World War against the Soviet Union is in the making, a point of view partly confirmed by certain attitudes and actions of the British Foreign Office and the American State Department. For in England and in America reaction is in control. "Mr. Churchill fights his war on restoration with the social consciousness of a Marlborough and the political assurance of the hero of Blenheim." As for Mr. Roosevelt, in the brightest days of the New Deal his high aim was to streamline the old order. Now, even that is changed; the hopeful young men are gone, and in their place, as close advisers, are tired and aging reactionaries.

All this is stout, outspoken criticism of conservative leadership and policies. We suspect that Mr. Herridge knows the score but is a little frightened by his addition. He begins by demanding that we set out to build a new order and break ourselves of the vicious habit of administering palliatives. The magic formula for the new order is "the total use of resources." The outstanding condemnation of the old system is that it artificially perpetuates the economy of scarcity. A revolutionary change is needed because "there is no evolutionary way for limited use of total use." It develops, however, that Mr. Herridge is opposed to socialist measures and to anything resembling government planning. He thinks that war-time controls and regulations have few lessons that we can carry over into the post-war period. In fact, it turns out that Mr. Herridge has an old-fashioned devotion to free enterprise which should be given another chance to show what it can do in making total use of resources. We never do learn very much about Mr. Herridge's revolution.

Something else is very strange about Mr. Herridge. He talks a lot about Democracy, usually with a capital D, and usually in terms of reproach unless accompanied by "New." For communism, on the other hand, he has a curious and fearful awe. Take this astonishing sequence: "When, in the English-speaking world, the state goes Fascist, the common man goes Communist. This is the complementary action, automatic and inevitable. For the common man of Democracy will not fight for fascism against communism. This means that communism would destroy fascism. Then the flag of imperialist communism might fly in every capital." Now this is sheer nonsense. For the only sections of the world where the common man has showed any inclination to go Communist have been those sections where democracy has been peculiarly backward. In the English-speaking world there is a fairly healthy tradition that when tyrants—fascist or otherwise—show their ugly heads, the common man fights, as a democrat, for his liberties—for democracy. It seems to us that Mr. Herridge has fallen into the mistake which both fascists and Communists have made in the past, and of which they are now repenting, the mistake of underestimating the toughness and guts of democracy. Mr. Herridge would have done better to build more on the resources of democracy and less on magic formulas and bogyman fantasies.

BOOK

THE MODERN CASE FOR SOCIALISM
By JOHN PUTNAM

179 PAGES — CLOTH BINDING — $1.50

THE MODERN CASE FOR SOCIALISM includes all of the sound older arguments as well as a number of significant new arguments for Socialism. It makes use of the best of Marxian theory and also utilizes the theory of monopolistic competition. It points out that Socialism is inevitable not only because of the technological changes so brilliantly described by Marx and Engels, but also because of the increased economic strain which modern war imposes upon Capitalism. The gross wastes due to competition and private initiative are described separately for each of the major industries.

The author of this book was an Associate Professor of Economics at a large state university and is now an economist with a Government War agency. He writes under a pen name.

UADALCANAL DIARY," an adaptation of the Richard Tre- is book, is unusually serious, sim- and honest, as far as it goes; but uld be a shame and worse if those made or will see it got the idea it is a remotely adequate image of irst months on that island. The pic- is worth talking about at some h, and I hope to do that when is space. Meanwhile I think it is e rather respected, and recom- led, but with very qualified enthu- h.

"We Will Come Back," a furious and very entertaining Russian melodrama about guerrillas and a Nazi spy, is as phony in its way as "The North Star." But it can tell you even more about the Russians than "The North Star" can tell you about Americans, with about a hundredth the tedium and chagrin. It can tell you a good deal, for that matter, which the Russian war record films cannot: for as a piece of popular entertainment it is as intensely and internally Russian as a small, florid, vociferous opera company might be Italian. What you see inferred in it is violent, hysterical, innocent, reckless, and realistic almost beyond our comprehension. (Watch especially the guerrilla leader, the girl, and the two leading Nazis.) I was particularly interested to see the almost slapstick scorn with which a dying German is treated (good, I infer, for howls of laughter), and the attitude toward religion. God is repeatedly scratched behind the ears as He passes and slapped affectionately on the rump to make it stick; and toward the end, in a clear bid for applause, an old priest grabs a Nazi soldier and bashes his skull in with a rock. It looks as if Cherkassov in "The Calling of Dan Matthews" were only a question of a very short time.

"Old Acquaintance" is a typical woman's duet on the standard musical saws favored by any housewives' magazine (the tune is "Love Is the Sweetest Thing but We Have No Bananas Today"). What perplexes me is that I could sit through it with some interest. The two chief characters seem to represent, between them, all that a suburban housewife at her worst likes to think she is and thanks God she is not (honorable, realistic, and self-denying, like Bette Davis), and all that she thanks God she is not, but is (Miriam Hopkins as a frenzied tea-cosy sheltering the opposite characteristics). Miss Davis loses two lovers for the sake of Miss Hopkins and her daughter; Miss Hopkins loses everything except Miss Davis. Miss Davis is noble enough and Miss Hopkins ignoble enough to make it unnecessary for any housewife to take the morality play personally, beyond comfortably checking on what she knew already, that virtue's peculiar rewards are hardly worth the candle. The odd thing is that the two ladies and Vincent Sherman, directing, make the whole business look fairly intelligent, detailed, and plausible; and that on the screen such trash can seem, even, mature and adventurous.

CHARLES BURCHFIELD: Water Colors, at Frank Rehn Galleries until November 13. MILTON AVERY: Water Colors, at Paul Rosenberg's until November 15. EUGENE BERMAN: Oils and Drawings, at Julien Levy Gallery until November 30.

BURCHFIELD'S kind of painting is a staple of contemporary American art. A cautious acquaintance with nineteenth-century French painting, the example of Winslow Homer, and one or two small but valid sensations give a semblance of animation to a style otherwise academic and dull. Eight over-size water colors on cardboard, painted dryly and with a heaviness uncharacteristic of the medium, organize in a routine way details such as hundreds of other water colorists in this country note every week and organize in much the same manner. One subject that rouses Burchfield's talent is the frame-house neighborhood gone to seed. "Winter," with its weather-worn house slouching in the loom of a black factory, is the picture of this show. Burchfield felt that house

Avery is a "light" modern who in oil can produce offspring of Marie Laurencin and Matisse that are empty and sweet, with nice flat areas of color. For water color he goes to school with Marin, and his art becomes as period American as Burchfield's, if much more delicate and elegant. The painting is almost faultless within its limitations, but it has been seen before—the reticent color, the hinted and the actual black-and-whites, the tactful emotions about nature. They are the ingredients of a uniquely American contribution to landscape art; only Marin has summed it up already, at least in this vein.

Eugene Berman, Neo-Romantic, is, I suppose, a painter. But we can save trouble by taking him as simple specialist in frissons for the cocktail hour. Given that he has discovered essentially nothing about his art that Raphael didn't know, he is very dextrous. That is, he can paint any way he wants to, provided the way has already been discovered by someone else. The prescription for Berman's thrill this year, and thrill it is, is to take a Florentine master, clean him thoroughly, rearrange the figures, reheat and remix the subject, and then freshen up everything with Böcklin syrup. Piquancy is also gained by doing the canvas without ground or underpainting while yet striving after the same effect. There is an effect, a wonderful-rich effect, but it belongs to journalism and mode. It is as if Time Inc. were rewriting and simultaneously imitating the Harvard Classics. Berman's pictures, crowded as they are into a relatively small space, are too overpowering, too decadent, too spurious, and, really, too well done to be dealt with in measured words. If this is art, the age is doomed.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

MUSIC

HAYDN'S Symphony No. 104, which Toscanini played with the N. B. C. Symphony at his first broadcast, is a marvelous example of the Haydn method and its results. "The essential character of Haydn's form is dramatic surprise at the moment," says Tovey; and "nothing in Haydn is difficult to follow, but almost everything is unexpected"—which means, of course, that it must be listened to with close attention. The slow introduction to the first movement of No. 104 begins with a majestic, brilliant, radiant opening call in the key of D by the entire orchestra—after which comes the dramatic surprise of the dark D minor whisper of the strings in a deeply affecting passage that brings further surprises. Twice again the brilliant call of the entire orchestra is heard, each time with a new surprise in the whispered answer, and with newly startling details as these answers continue. The method is the same in fast tempo: in the Allegro portion of the movement the development section (beginning of side 2 of the Fischer or Beecham recorded performance) is concerned at first with two measures, of which each repetition brings an unexpected and expressive alteration—in harmony, then in phrase length with new harmonic progressions, then in instrumental color with the introduction of dark cellos and basses, then contrasting flute and oboe, and so on.

You come to realize that the Haydn method is a constant playing with the hearer's mind, and that it isn't only great emotional and technical powers but also sheer high spirits which produce those astounding details in that breath-taking succession: he is delighting in his use of his powers to amuse himself by writing today what will startle his hearers and move or delight them next week. This is most obvious in the bit of musical fooling at the end of the minuet of No. 104—the silence where you are expecting another trill, and then piano where you expert forte. But even when he is writing serious music you sense at times his amusement in contriving surprises like those of the introduction, or the one in the slow second movement: you think the movement is about over, when it goes off on wide-ranging and wonderful digressions.

With Haydn's symphony on Toscanini's program were two other works full of gaiety and humor—Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 8. Surprise produces some of the humor in Beethoven's symphony: the surprise of the opening theme of the finale coasting along pp and colliding suddenly with the ff C sharp; the unexpected play with that C sharp in the coda, ending in the unexpected change of tonality; the two places where the full orchestra ff breaks off, and first the flutes and strings p, then the bassoon and kettledrum pp go chortling on. This last trick is one which orchestra and bassoon go through a couple of times in the first movement of Mozart's Piano Concerto K.453, a delightful piece of high comedy by another composer with a love of fun and the powers with which to indulge it—producing, for example, the last comic stroke in the coda of the finale of K.453, where you expect the theme of the movement to reappear in the context in which it appeared before, and it doesn't reappear, and the movement bustles along and seem to be coming to the end, and suddenly not only the theme jumps out at you from the piano but with it a startlingly unexpected and hilarious extension of it from horns and woodwinds. In the Overture to "The Magic Flute" there is also a surprise—of the chattering Allegro after the solemn introduction.

There is little to say about the performances: only that the inflection of phrase, the clarity of texture, the rhythmic and plastic continuity, and the musicality that produced them were again things to marvel at. There is, however, something to say about the way the concert was broadcast. The N. B. C. Symphony series has acquired a commercial sponsor—General Motors—which presumably wishes to secure the good will of the people who listen to the broadcasts. It might have begun with the announcement, "General Motors presents a concert by the N. B. C. Symphony under the direction of Arturo Toscanini"; it might have said after the Mozart overture, "The next work to be performed by Arturo T canini and the N. B. C. Symphony this concert presented by General M tors is Haydn's Symphony No. 104 it might have ended with the statem that the concert had been presented General Motors; and it would have h the good will of those who care ab hearing Toscanini's performances w the N. B. C. Symphony. What it d after the Haydn symphony, was to p sent Mr. Kettering of General Moto who talked and talked and TALK and TALKED for nearly ten minut and at the end the last minute Beethoven's symphony was cut off fo concluding commercial announceme And I can report that in this way earned the intense ill will of everyo I talked to who had listened to t concert.

The Budapest Quartet's concerts the Library of Congress were not broa cast last spring, and will not be broa cast this fall. What C. B. S. give C. B. S. can take away. On the oth hand there is the great news that t concerts of the New Friends of Mu will be broadcast in their entirety WQXR under the commercial sponsc ship of the Book-of-the-Month Club. will be possible to listen to one of t great works of Beethoven and not listen to something like the Quint Opus 16; it will be possible to listen the Budapest Quartet and not to listen the Busch; and above all it will possible to listen undisturbed by t New Friends of Music audience, whi sits motionless, silent, and rapt only the New Friends publicity stories.

Ridiculous!

Dear Sirs: One can be quite sure that here are no farmers on the board of ditors of The Nation or the review of dward H. Faulkner's "Plowman's Folly" by Russell Lord would never ave slipped through. I have not read Mr. Faulkner's book and am not prepared to comment upon that, but I have ead the ridiculous review of it by Mr. Lord and have plenty to say about that.

As a great majority of the readers of The Nation are city dwellers they will probably get the impression that Mr. Faulkner's book contains a revelation that will revolutionize farming and also et the impression that at least a half dozen generations of American farmers ave been damned fools.

No one will claim that the farmers ave been 100 per cent perfect in the se of the soil or that none of their methods have been wrong and are in no need of correction. In fact even the rackpot ideas of Mr. Lord have their alue if they do nothing more than rouse an interest among farmers and get them thinking about better methods f getting the most out of the soil.

The thing which struck me the most in the whole review was Mr. Lord's philosophizing about the major operation of a blunt instrument of major urgery, "turning and rending a living body, soil," and appealing to the reader's reason to accept his idea that this can't happen to the soil and still have t remain healthy. The only trouble with uch a statement is that it ignores entirely the whole purpose of the soil, which is to raise crops. Mr. Lord spoke of the luxuriant growth of grass along he Illinois Central's right of way and he baked out, burned out, farmed out ields beyond which looked bleak and thin. Yet Mr. Lord probably never topped to think that these same burned out, farmed out, baked out, bleak, thin ields would be producing from 30 to 60 bushels of corn per acre or an equivalent in other crops every year to add o the food of the nation but that the ground along the Illinois Central would be producing absolutely nothing.

One will agree perfectly that if the end purpose in the world were to create a perfect soil the ideal method of doing it would be the one which he described on the right of way of the I. C. There year after year the entire growth of vegetation is allowed to fall upon the earth and to accumulate year after year. Unquestionably this would build up a soil very rich in humus, nitrogen, phosphoric acid, and all the other things necessary for plant life, and enable the native grass to grow luxuriantly.

Unfortunately that isn't the end purpose to which we must put the soil of the world. Even Mr. Lord might find more nourishment in a good meal raised from the bleak, farmed-out fields than he would in feasting his mind upon the wonderful soil which had been produced by years and years of allowing all that grew upon the land to fall down and enrich the soil. We cannot have our cake and eat it. We cannot put everything that grows on the soil back into it and still raise enough food to feed the people of the country.

CLARENCE ARMSTRONG
Baltimore, October 8

Shocking!

Dear Sirs: Mr. Armstrong ought to read the book in question. His rugged assumption that our American methods of clean culture can not have been in general damned foolish will not stand. The simplest verticle measurements of the remaining top soil, even on the so-called flat lands of Illinois, show farmers farming themselves out of a farm in fifty years or less. The corn yields he cites —thirty to sixty bushels to the acre— are disgracefully low yields on land recently so fertile. When he says that you can't have your cake and eat it too he denies as a farmer the possibility of arriving at a permanent agriculture. This denial is quite in line with the soil-mining tradition of our past, but in the light of world experience it is absurd; and to come upon such thoughts arrayed in the civilized guise of a letter to The Nation is shocking.

More to the Point

Dear Sirs: In an age like ours when trade journalism is so blandly accepted as literature one can justify one's surprise at seeing such a title as "On Creative Imagination" set in large type on the cover of even such a magazine as The Nation. The practical reader who may object to such a consideration when so many tremendous events are in the making is just as wrong as our professional educationists who insist on method almost to the exclusion of substance. Through studies that might be written in extension of Mr. Humphries's essay one conceivably could learn far more about what goes on in these heads of ours than from reading blow-by-blow accounts of the battles between Pegler and labor or whoever and the New Deal.

A Curious Distinction

Dear Sirs: As a reader I wish to thank you for Lionel Trilling's piece on Eliot's Kipling.

As for Mr. Eliot's attitude to Jews and Judaism, I can refer Mr. Trilling— if he has not read it—to the curious remark in the first lecture of "After Strange Gods." It is difficult to obtain a copy of the book in these environs, but I remember that passage well enough to transmit its sense: that "too many free-thinking Jews" would be a distrusting element in a traditional American community. The qualifying words intrigued me, and Mr. Eliot never explained why pious Jews would be more acceptable.

Is This Coddling?

Dear Sirs: Justice Franklin Taylor of the Kings County Court recently attacked the present city administration for coddling criminals by granting them public assistance. Although I am not a supporter of the present mayor and have always been a registered Democrat, I feel that I should answer this outburst.

I have been employed by the Department of Welfare of the City of New York as a social investigator for many years. Most families that I have investigated for relief have no criminal records and were compelled to apply for relief because of conditions beyond their control. At the present time there are no able-bodied persons receiving relief— except women with small children. Most, if not all, of the persons receiving relief have been examined by our doctors

Inconsistent

Dear Sirs: Miss Kirchwey's clear recognition of the pro-democratic nature o the Soviets' foreign policy (the Mosco Conference, The Nation, October 30 was marred by one inconsistency. Sh says "just once has the Soviet government deviated from its support of th democratic forces, when it joined wit Britain and America in accepting a co-belligerents the present regime."

One wonders what else the Sovie government could have done in the fac of Mr. Churchill's speech of September 21. It seems to me that the onl wise course was to insist upon the creation of the machinery through which the Soviet government could raise thes points in fruitful fashion. It did so. I had unofficially expressed its dissen from Anglo-American policy by charging the AMG with maintaining Fascist in office and with being too concerne with capitalist interests. Officially i proposed the setting up of the Mediterranean Commission, and it requeste a place on it for the French, thus proving that it had virtually recognized th French committee as a provisional government.

And looking at the results, for Italian democracy, of the Moscow pact one i bound to consider the Soviet course a wise one. If one contrasts our past policy with the Soviets' it is hardly to be doubted that the improvement is due t two things—the Italian people's refusal to accept the Badoglio regime as it was and the Soviets' political influence in the councils of the United Nations. I think the published agreements prove, as Miss Kirchwey later suggested, that Stalin had formally acquiesced as the only means of furthering a modification.

The Shape of Things

BY COURAGE, OBSTINACY, AND A GENUINE belief in democratic rule, the people of Italy are slowly winning their political battle. Step by step they have forced the "ex"-Fascists now in power to yield ground, and have circumvented the attempts of the Allied military control to buttress the status quo. The latest victory is Badoglio's promise to resign as Premier as soon as Rome has been freed. Behind this obvious admission of failure lies a series of events that show the growing strength of the democratic opposition. Chief among them was Count Sforza's refusal to head a Cabinet under the King. Sforza has steadily insisted that the King's abdication is a prerequisite for any effective government. His position was strengthened by the more drastic demands embodied in a manifesto issued by the Rome Committee of Liberation. This important group called for a government representing only those elements that have a record of steady opposition to Fascism and the war. In lieu of any satisfactory solution, Badoglio has created a Cabinet of "technical experts" to carry on until Rome falls—and he with it. But this is an obvious stop-gap and nothing more. Real power is passing to the people and nothing can check it.

PROBABLY TO HELP PUT A DAMPER ON THE rampant over-optimism concerning the duration of the war, the Office of War Information now reveals that Hitler's speech of last week was not quite so despairing as at first reported. Referring to the corrected text, the New York Times cites the Führer's boast that while losses have been sustained this year, the "ring of encirclement" which existed at the start of the war has been destroyed "with powerful history-making blows." And it points out that while Hitler did in fact remark that "if the German people despair, they will deserve no better than they get," his speech did not end on that note, as reported, but on the contrary with the "fanatic belief that nothing can exist for us but our victory." Noting these changes, and also reports that the speech was well received in Germany, we still cannot shake the impression that it was essentially the words of a man who, knowing himself doomed, is determined to sell his life dearly. The braggart who two years ago announced that "never was a great empire smashed and destroyed in shorter time than was Soviet Russia this time" and who last year proclaimed "Stalingrad firmly in German hands" was reduced to assuring his people that the Allies would find an invasion of Western Europe harder than landing in Sicily. Both Stalin and Churchill emphasized in the same week that much sacrifice and hardship lie ahead and warned against the slightest relaxation in the Allied countries. But their words, ringing with confidence, contrasted strongly with the Führer's assurance that whatever might happen he would not go crazy.

THE APPOINTMENT OF LORD WOOLTON AS British Minister of Reconstruction provides a perfect illustration of that British Tory flexibility which Freda Kirchwey refers to in her article on page 581. Mr. Churchill's inclination has been to keep post-war problems in the background. The present British government, he said in a recent speech, had no right "except with a very general measure of agreement" to go beyond "the one function by which its continued existence is justified—the prosecution of the war." His aim has been to sidetrack political controversies which might endanger the party truce. But as the London Times has pointed out, a policy of doing nothing is also controversial. The British people know that they have to face economic and social readjustments which will tax all their imagination, energy, and genius for compromise. They do not want to be as unprepared for peace as they were for war. After resisting this public mood for a long time, the Prime Minister has recognized its strength by an appointment likely to meet general acclaim. As Minister of Food since April, 1940, Lord Woolton has achieved several near miracles. He has maintained an adequate supply of food and distributed it fairly, he has greatly improved the nutritional standards of the poorer classes and so contributed to the excellent health record of Britain throughout the war, he has kept prices on an even keel, and he has made rationing popular. New Deal baiters might note that he has been both a teacher of economics and a social worker. He entered the business world as personnel manager for an important chain of department stores, where he carried out an enlightened employment policy with such success that he was promoted to general manager and eventually chairman. With his experience in both government and industry, his belief in planning, and his social consciousness, he seems a "natural" for his new job.

ONLY THOSE WITH SHORT MEMORIES WILL be shocked at the long-distance flirtation between Lieutenant Colonel Philip F. La Follette and Colonel Robert R. McCormick. Hardly more than a fellow-traveler of the New Deal at its inception, the former governor of Wisconsin soon turned into a determined opponent. Not content with the negative role of sniping from the sidelines, he blossomed forth in 1938 with his National Progressives of America, a curious political creation which attempted to harness the effective demagogic devices of fascism to avowedly democratic purposes. But the Roosevelt strength was not as far gone as La Follette thought, and the deepening crisis abroad served to enhance the President's position. La Follette thereupon laid aside his pretty flags with their cross-and-circle symbol and plumped for America First. Now, in the South Pacific, he continues to follow the prescribed path of the good America Firster. Attached to General MacArthur's staff, he is widely regarded as the liaison man between the General and the MacArthur-for-President forces in this country. It is the General's candidacy in fact which has brought this holder of a name revered in liberal circles to terms of bubbling cordiality with the publisher of the Chicago Tribune. ". . . the way you have stood up, taken it on the chin, and kept coming back to give 'em some more during the last year is grand," La Follette wrote McCormick a few weeks ago. "Perhaps some day some of us over here can put our oar in back home and lend a helping hand." Is the notorious Tribune just another device with which La Follette hopes to achieve a purer democracy?

THE PETROLEUM INDUSTRIAL WAR COUNCIL, refusing to take the emphatic "noes" of the OPA and the Economic Stabilization Director for an answer, is now lobbying Congress to obtain a boost in crude oil prices. No doubt it can count on support from the delegations of the leading oil-producing states, and probably it hopes for a deal with the farm bloc, which is also out to exploit a sellers' market to the limit. The big oil companies which dominate the Council can hardly claim that present prices are ruining them, for their published accounts show that they are making handsome profits. They rely, therefore, on the argument that the present price of crude is too low to compensate for the risks involved in sinking new wells. The result, they assert, is that the discovery of new reserves is lagging far behind current production. It appears, however, that the big oil companies, while reluctant to invest money in exploration, are quite willing to buy proved oil reserves at speculative prices. According to the Wall Street Journal of November 9, major companies have been buying wells from East Texas independents at prices which meant paying from $1 to $1.25 a barrel for oil in the ground. A normal valuation would be 15 to 50 cents a barrel. The present OPA ceiling for crude in this district is $1.25; so that buyers of wells at these fancy rates are discounting a sharp upward revision of the price of crude. The implied confidence in Congressional willingness to break the opposition of the government agencies charged with "holding the line" will, we hope, spur consumers to make their voices heard on Capitol Hill. The extra 35 cents a barrel which the oil companies have demanded will cost the public at least a cool half-billion dollars.

SENATOR REYNOLDS AND THE DEMOCRATIC machine of North Carolina have come to a parting of the ways. In his twelve years of Senatorial service Reynolds has compiled a record so distinguished that today he is opposed by 93 of the state's 100 Democratic county chairmen, its entire delegation in the House of Representatives, the Governor, and practically all the press of North Carolina. In the light of this remarkable achievement perhaps it is not altogether coincidental that Mr. Reynolds now finds himself too busy to run for renomination. His burdens as a Senator, he says, are too heavy to permit him to take time off for campaigning, and he must consequently choose between the "service of my state and nation, or the furtherance of my own personal, political ambition." Ever the slave to duty, the Senator, whose "service" includes rabid isolationism, clowning, race-baiting in all its forms, and general rabble-rousing, intends to "continue in public life" the fight for those principles which have marked his legislative career. A foretaste of the rich public life that lies ahead for "Our Bob," as he is affectionately billed by his publicity staff, is the letter written a month ago to Gerald Winrod, the Kansas Streicher, and printed by the New York Post. "These character assassins," Reynolds wrote, referring to critics of the "Jayhawk Nazi," who is now under indictment for sedition, "are still at large but the day of reckoning will arrive and is on its way. With assurances of my highest esteem," etc. Our congratulations to North Carolina.

IN VOTING TO EXTEND QUEZON'S TERM AS Chief Executive of the Philippine Commonwealth, Congress was undoubtedly motivated by a desire to make the utmost use of Quezon's very considerable prestige as leader of Filipino resistance. A substantial minority in the House quite properly raised the question whether the desire to capitalize on Quezon's prestige was worth overriding the explicit provisions of the Philippine Constitution under which the Vice President would have succeeded him upon the expiration of his term. The question is practical as well as legal since Vice President Osmena is probably more popular in the Philippines than Quezon. A much more effective move to offset Japan's recent declaration of "independence" for the Philippines would have been the adoption by Congress of the President's proposal that the date for the liberation of the islands be advanced from 1946, as provided under the present law. Reports from reliable sources indicate that the Japannese are having greater success than is ordinarily realized in obtaining cooperation from the Filipino population. While some guerrilla warfare contines, particularly in the south, the United States is not, at the moment, winning the political battle in the islands. Nothing short of a declaration of complete independence, with economic guarantees, will serve to reverse the trend.

Britain's Contribution

THE President's message on reverse lend-lease and the White Paper released simultaneously in London and Washington by the British government provide the best of answers to those who think we have somehow been victimized by the British in this war. The first thing that strikes one in comparing these documents with the President's last report on lend-lease in August is that British cash purchases in this country have actually been greater than lend-lease exports. The White Paper discloses for the first time that these cash purchases amounted to $6,000,000,000, as compared with total lend-lease exports to the United Kingdom on June 30 last of somewhat less than $4,500,000,000. This $4,500,000,000 must be regarded as a protective payment on our part to keep Britain in the war as our transatlantic bulwark against Nazism. For as the White Paper says of the $6,000,000,000 in cash earlier spent here for supplies, Britain's liquid financial resources were becoming exhausted, and it was faced with the danger that the flow of munitions and food would be reduced through its inability to pay.

No balance sheet can ever encompass the greater price paid by Britain in property and lives in the war against the Axis. If a balance must be struck, this $4,500,000,000 is offset by reverse lend-lease on June 30 last of $871,000,000 from the United Kingdom. Our last lend-lease report showed total lend-lease exports to China, India, Australia, and New Zealand of $1,133,000,000. The figures were lumped together, probably in order to hide the minute measure of our aid to China. Against this we must offset $300,000,000 in reverse lend-lease from Australia, New Zealand, and India. This does not measure the full extent of the British Commonwealth's contribution to "mutual aid," as lend-lease is called in Britain. For Canada has made a $1,000,000,000 gift of aid to the mother country, and is making another $1,000,000,000 gift to others of the United Nations, a far greater per capita lend-lease expenditure than our own. Nor does it take into account British contributions to others of the United Nations.

In addition to reverse lend-lease to our own country, Britain supplied $716,000,000 worth of supplies to the Soviet Union and $750,000,000 worth to other allies. Britain's total payments to the United Nations in excess of the amounts received from them amount to $9,000,000,000. How enormous this amount is may be seen by comparing it with the total of our own lend-lease exports to all United Nations on June 30. The total was $9,882,000,000. One must also consider that costs here are about 50 per cent higher than in Britain, so that an expenditure of $1.50 here is the equivalent of not much more than $1 there. It may also be recalled that the United Kingdom's population is about one-third ours.

Australia with its 7,000,000 people and New Zealand with its 1,600,000 have made huge per capita contributions to reverse lend-lease. This is especially striking in the case of foodstuffs. They have supplied the bulk of the requirements for the American forces in the South and Southwest Pacific. We have never made public detailed figures on our lend-lease of foodstuffs, which is considerably below our food exports in the last war. But a few figures are available. Our total exports of butter in the first half of this year were 8,100,000 pounds. Australia by June 30 had contributed 6,628,000 pounds to our troops and New Zealand 12,550,000 more of butter and cheese. We shipped 45,400,000 pounds of beef under lend-lease during the first six months of this year. Reverse lend-lease of meat by Australia on June 30 totaled 61,480,000 pounds, while New Zealand's contribution by that date was 49,650,000 pounds of fresh meat and another 21,600,000 of canned meat. These figures are not comparable, but they provide a good idea of the magnitude of the contributions made by these British Commonwealth countries.

Finally we may note that while lend-lease is about 12 per cent of our war expenditures, mutual aid is about 10 per cent of Britain's. When we consider the greater sacrifices made by Britain in the war, and the part that lend-lease has played in helping other people to fight our battles as well as their own, Britain's is an excellent record. We do not cite these figures to disparage our own contribution but to shame the mean-minded and the Anglophobes. There are entirely too many of them, though they are still a minority, in Congress and the press.

Opportunities in Algiers

NOTHING could more clearly demonstrate the failure of our policy toward the Fighting French than the reorganization of the Committee of National Liberation which has just taken place in Algiers. We who chose in turn Pétain, Darlan, and Giraud in preference to General de Gaulle now witness De Gaulle's complete political triumph. With the withdrawal of Giraud and all but two of his appointees from the committee, De Gaulle, whose prestige we tried by every device, open and not so open, to undermine, becomes the recognized leader not only of free Frenchmen throughout the world but of those Frenchmen who constitute the spearhead of resistance in France itself.

One of the principal items in our stock of rationalizations concerning De Gaulle was that he lacked popular support. But the chief significance of the political shift in the committee last week is that the shakeup was forced by representatives of the resistance movements, who have been arriving in Algiers in increasing numbers. According to these active fighters, De Gaulle is more popular in France today than he has ever been, and he has American diplomacy, at least in part, to thank for it. At first many Frenchmen were taken in by German propaganda which took the tack that De Gaulle was a tool of the Western powers. "But," one of them reports, "as soon as we saw that it was Giraud and not De Gaulle who was invited to the United States, we knew that the enemy propaganda was wrong."

However at variance this end-result may be from our diplomats' intentions, we could accept it as a fortunate outcome were it not for the deep distrust that has naturally been sown in the process. Instead of confronting a French power grown strong with our aid and encouragement, we confront one that has grown strong despite us. In terms of diplomacy that is a compounded failure. We must now contend with a coolness and a national sensitivity which are in good part of our own making.

This sensitivity was all too plain in the tart reaction of the committee to the Moscow agreement. The fate of Germany, the committee said bluntly, could not be dedecided without France; since France was not represented at the Moscow conference, it could hardly be bound by any decisions reached there. The fact that this acid reminder was addressed to the Soviet Union as well as to Britain and America, coupled with the absence of Communist representation on the reorganized committee, tend to disprove the hoary charge that the De Gaullists are under Communist, or even Russian, domination. Both circumstances, on the contrary, add evidence to the truth that the source of Gaullist strength is in France itself, and that if this strength rests on any "ism" at all, it is nationalism.

This circumstance throws light on the refusal of the committee to grant complete immediate independence to the Lebanese. The Allies have been extremely careful to reject the notion that the committee constitutes a government. As Churchill put it, they "are not the owners but the trustees of the title deeds of France." It is hard to see how the trustees for a people rendered acutely sensitive to their world standing could surrender any of those "title deeds" under duress. De Gaulle is in far less favorable a position to preside at the liquidation of the French Empire than is Churchill to perform that function for Britain.

Regardless of whether or not it was feasible for the committee to be represented at Moscow, there are moves that can be made now to assure the French of our good faith. General de Gaulle points out that so far no arrangements have been made for cooperation between the French committee and Allied military authorities concerning the invasion of France. A move in this direction would not only help to avoid political embarrassment in the future but would go far toward eliminating the suspicions which have so corroded Anglo-American relations with the French. At Moscow our representatives had the courage and good sense to abandon a policy which would ultimately have led to a clash with Russia. Developments in Algiers now afford us an opportunity to reverse an equally bankrupt policy, which can only end in the hostility of a resurgent France.

China's Role in the War

HOPES for more effective Chinese participation in the war have been raised by the recent and apparently successful consultations between Chiang Kai-shek, Lord Louis Mountbatten, and Lieutenant General Stilwell, and by China's rather unexpected participation in the Moscow conference. But these favorable developments should not blind us to the serious difficultes that must still be overcome before China can become an effective partner in the coming offensive against Japan. Recent information from China suggests that these difficulties are probably greater today than at any time in the past despite the recent successes at Chungking and Moscow.

Officially, there has been no hint that relations between China and the other United Nations have not been of the most cordial and cooperative nature. There is no reason to believe that if Roosevelt, Churchill, and Chiang Kai-shek met around a table they would have any great difficulty in reaching an agreement on most of the main issues in the field of war strategy and peace plans for the Far East. The problems that have arisen concern the practical working relations between the British and American armies on one side and the Chinese on the other. They concern also China's internal strains and stresses, its capacity to mobilize its resources for an all-out military effort.

A great part of the difficulty on the American side derives from the fact that the Chinese war effort has been oversold to the American public. Our soldiers and technicians in China have suffered an unhealthy disillusionment when confronted with the harsh realities of the Chinese situation. Some of this was perhaps inevitable, but a large part of it could have been avoided by more careful preparation by our military educational authorities. American and Chinese military methods have little in common. In some respects the Chinese methods are probably better adapted to Chinese conditions, in others they are perhaps inferior; but the practical problems of working out cooperation could have been eased if the Americans had known what to expect before being sent on the job. This preliminary education might well have included some inkling of how primitive life is in the interior of China, of its background of warlordism, its semi-legalized traditions of "squeeze" among officials, in both high and low places, together with some information regarding the effects of internal dissension on the military effort. With such preparation there might not be so much grumbling to the effect that China is not carrying its share of the load.

Although the danger of civil strife between the Kuomintang and the Communists seems to have been averted for the present, internal political dissension still has a paralyzing effect on the country's military and economic effort. The suspicion and open antagonism between these two factions are only a small part of the picture. Owing to the rivalry of cliques within the Kuomintang, Chiang Kai-shek's power often is little more than nominal. Orders from the local war lord in a provincial capital are often far more influential than those issued by the Generalissimo. On the economic front the war effort has sagged badly, owing partly to profiteering and speculation and partly to the destructive effects of the inflation. At first, rising prices tended to stimulate both industrial and farm production, but the inflationary cycle has now reached such an advanced stage that producers find it almost impossible to operate under government contracts. The resultant slackening of production has naturally placed a heavier burder on the United States and Britain, for it means that shipments must be greatly increased before China can play a decisive role in the war.

Problems of this kind undoubtedly place a great strain on our American military leaders, whose one interest is to get on with the war. It is only natural that some of them should be tempted to write China off as an effective ally and think of the war as primarily an Anglo-American undertaking. A far more constructive approach, in view of China's strategic geographical position and tremendous potentialities in man-power and resources, would be to seek agreements with the Chinese designed to minimize the difficulties. Perhaps the best way to make sure that civil war is not brought on by "incidents" in the border areas of the northwest, for example, would be for American military posts to be set up there just as in the areas under direct Central Government control. There is every reason to believe that if more American aid were sent to these areas, the tempo of guerrilla warfare could be greatly stepped up. In the economic field the United States could undoubtedly utilize its gold resources in checking the inflation, provided the Chinese government took effective steps to curb profiteering and stimulate production. Because China is rightly sensitive regarding foreign interference in its internal affairs, agreements of this kind may not be easy to arrange. But the Moscow conference has shown the world that when the stakes are high, the most difficult problems can be resolved. Someone with real authority should go to Chungking and seek a settlement while there is yet time.

A Nation of Cry-Babies

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, November 11

PRICE and wage stabilization is complicated business. You start with the simple concept of a ceiling, and you end by analyzing the hind quarters of a steer to make sure that price control isn't circumvented by substituting an inferior cut of meat for a better. You insert a control at one point in your war economy and find you have twenty problems for each one you have solved. The present shenanigans of the corn-hog ratio may serve to illustrate the complexities. If the price of hogs gets too far ahead of the price of corn, it pays farmers better to feed their corn to their hogs and sell it as pork than to put the corn on the market in persona propria. The ratio at this time, though narrower than a year ago, is still too wide. Chicago stockyards are glutted with hogs, while the shortage of corn is hampering other branches of agriculture (dairies, poultry, cattle) which also need corn for feed, and many sections of war industry, which use it in making alcohol (converted in turn into smokeless powder and synthetic rubber), plastics, paper, and other materials.

Because so much corn grunts its way to Chicago as pork, scarce tankers must be used to bring molasses from the Caribbean for alcohol, and Great Lakes steamers needed for iron ore must be diverted to bring wheat from Canada for Northeastern livestock. Politics doesn't make the situation any simpler. The Department of Agriculture, largely responsible for this disarranged corn-hog ratio, has always been orientated toward the Midwest and is as Republican-minded, even under Democratic Administrations, as the corn belt. While booming farm prices haven't made the Midwest any less Republican—it turns slightly Democratic only in adversity—the chief sufferers from the march of relatively low-priced corn into decidedly high-priced hogs have been Northeastern dairy and poultry farmers and Southwestern cattle raisers. The latter are Democrats by tradition, the former occasionally Democrats by persuasion. Neither tradition nor persuasion is likely to hold them in line in the absence of plentiful feed supplies, and the 1944 election cannot be won without them.

On this, as on other sectors of the crumbling anti-inflation front, the Administration is trying to cushion the producer's feed-supply difficulties with a subsidy, instead, for example, of raising the price of milk. One virtue of this approach, as that excellent little farm paper Spade pointed out recently, is its economy: it would take a $2 price increase to put an equivalent $1 in the pocket of the farmer. It is cheaper to do it directly, by a subsidy, which has the added merit of holding down the cost of living. This virtue of the subsidy is its chief defect in the eyes of the distributor and the middleman. And if the truth be told, it does not appeal greatly to the farmer, whom the vagaries of nature have made a gambler. His hankering as a debtor for the roulette of inflation has haunted American politics for several generations, and like every other class and group in our country he is much quicker to see his immediate profit advantage as a producer than his ultimate fate in a general débâcle. Far more serious than the corn-hog ratio is the hog-patriot ratio, which has never in our history been wider. In Congress the voices of moderation find it hard to be heard, and good men are stampeded—Voorhis and Pepper, for example, on citrus fruits—by the greedy squeals. All the great lobbies in action against price control and subsidies—oil, meat, citrus, milk—have been fattened by the war, but each feels a sense of grievance because his neighbor at the trough seems to be getting more swill.

With the exception of some low-paid workers—the canners and food processors in the so-called farm bloc are among the worst offenders—and a stratum of white-collar workers with fixed incomes, there is not a class or a group in this country which has not benefited by the war, which is not eating better—yes, eating better—and living better than it did before. Anyone who spends a few days covering the present price-control fight comes away with the impression that we are the world's greatest nation of cry-babies. It is a paradox of which we should feel ashamed that the weakest spot today in the United Nations is not among the poor battered Chinese, or the bombed and blasted British, or the Russians, heroic and virile amid their country's devastation, but on the home front of our own country, the one that has suffered least and benefited most and occupies the softest spot in the greatest war of human history. This is no reflection on our good men at the front, but only upon the snivelers at home, where everybody wants the cost of living held down, but everybody also wants his own income pushed up. This mathematical miracle would be too much for an Einstein, certainly for a Roosevelt.

I believe that were the President vigorously to roll back prices, he might yet save the country and himself, but his ability to do so without Congressional approval is constitutionally dubious and would be politically possible only in an atmosphere of crisis. At the bottom of the situation is the general feeling that the Russians will soon defeat Hitler, and then help us take care of the Japs. If this is correct, a general loosening of the line on wages and prices, the easiest course for the Administration and the one it will probably adopt, may do little harm. But if the Germans extricate enough of their men from the Russian front to put up a real fight in Western Europe, and the war lasts until the winter of 1944-45, the inflationary spiral will get out of control and the war may be lost on the home front. An inflation, at the very least, would lay the foundations for terrible economic maladjustments after the war and a strong fascist movement based on an impoverished middle class.

Never before has our democratic system seemed so clearly a wrangle of pressure groups rather than a voicing of the general will on the general welfare. Never before was it so necessary for the leaders of each group to forget the coming elections—political and trade union—and tell a few unpleasant economic truths to their own people. Our task is to do so on the labor front, where the cowardly surrender to Lewis has penalized the bulk of labor leadership, which better than any other group has helped hold the line. What needs to be said to labor, as steel prepares to follow coal, automobiles to follow steel, is that three or four billions more in the pay envelopes of our workers will be worse than meaningless, since (1) there just aren't the goods to buy with it, and (2) it will only help push up other prices. Ultimately none will suffer more than labor if wages and prices begin chasing themselves around and up the inflationary Maypole. I know the main offender is the farm bloc and its processor allies. I know huge profits are being made in war industry. I know the Administration has been unable to keep its pledges regarding prices. I still say that a general rise in wages except for low-paid and fixed-pay workers is an illusion. It is unfortunate but it is true that the only course open to labor is to put up a fight to hold the cost-of-living line. Better to wage a slowly losing battle on that front than to kid ourselves into disaster.

NO ELECTION in the country was ever attended by so much fraud as the one we have just gone through. In this state, of course, the natural home of chicane and boundless rascality, the fattening-place of the corruptest of all American politicians, every variety of cheating has been practiced. . . . In Brooklyn, in open defiance of law, the officials whose duty it was to count the vote deliberately announced their intention of performing their functions in secret with closed doors. This in order to make the majority as large as might be needed.—November 5, 1868.

THE MOST INTERESTING FEATURE of the Riverside Magazine for November is not the opening fable by Hans Christian Andersen. . . . The first place is rather to be assigned to the "Negro fables," . . . which are a positive contribution to the literature, if it may be so called, of the American Africans. They were taken down as they are reproduced, verbatim, from the lips of slaves or freedmen. . . . So far as we know, the Rabbit is the Reynard of all. . . . —November 5, 1868.

THE EFFECT OF THE ELECTIONS, so far as we can yet judge, seems to have been everywhere tranquilizing. A very large proportion of the Democratic Party is undoubtedly well pleased with the result, and is trying . . . to make out that Grant is a Democrat. . . . From the South there is little news, and that little is mainly good news. The result of the election has apparently had the sobering and soothing effect that was hoped. . . . We have heard of no assassination or rioting since a week ago Tuesday.—November 12, 1868.

THE READERS of The Nation, who are interested in all good things, will perhaps like to hear a word of Mr. Emerson's new course of lectures now going on in Boston. . . . We know perfectly well what we are to hear from Mr. Emerson, and yet what he says always penetrates and stirs us, as is apt to be the case with genius, in a very unlooked-for fashion.—JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL, November 12, 1868.

"SMOKING AND DRINKING," by James Parton. . . . The three articles before us—Does It Pay to Smoke? Will the Coming Man Drink Wine? and Inebriate Asylums—belong in the front rank of things readable.—November 12, 1868.

GENERAL GRANT . . . has ordered all applications for office to be burned without being shown to him.—November 19, 1868.

THE ERIE RAILROAD COMPANY . . . is a striking example of the evils resulting from a large bonded debt upon any railroad property. . . . The sudden appearance . . . of the newly issued certificates led to an official inquiry on the part of the New York Stock Exchange, which was met on the part of the president of the company by a brazen-faced acknowledgment of the entire fraudulent issue, accompanied by a disguised threat that still further fraudulent issues were in preparation.—November 26, 1868.

Spain's Mounting Crisis

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

SPAIN is once more in the spotlight of international events, and will remain there until the crisis which has overtaken the Franco regime has been resolved once and for all. Until the beginning of this year it was generally supposed that Franco would fall immediately after the collapse of Hitler's New Order. Today many people in a position to know believe that he may fall before that. A shrewd and important American business man in Spain made the guess that Franco would not last another six months. That was in September.

Franco's regime began to crumble with the first serious Axis defeats. It received its initial shock when American troops landed in North Africa and the Nazi theory of the impregnability of Fortress Europe was proved false. The second great shock was the Battle of Stalingrad, when the Nazi theory of the invincibility of the German Wehrmacht was shattered. Then followed a succession of Axis defeats: one month the failure of the Axis submarine war; the next month the irreparable weakening of the Luftwaffe; in the summer the fall of Mussolini, the hardest blow for Franco from the political point of view; in the autumn the collapse of the German eastern front. The current history of Spain is the history of German military reverses, and the process which is sealing the doom of the Axis is preparing the same fate for Franco.

It was inevitable that a dictator who had been put into power by Hitler and Mussolini should suffer the consequences of their defeats. But the crisis might not have developed so rapidly had Franco succeeded in creating an efficient governmental machine. He has created nothing—nothing but the gallows and an espionage system to serve the interests of Hitler in Spain. He has not even built up a strong fascist party to discipline political thought should a day of reckoning come.

The Phalanx, under the control of veteran agents of the Gestapo, is useful in the Western Hemisphere. Inside Spain it is weak. Corruption and lack of a clear ideology have made it a mere tool of terrorism; it has not known how to use the power it could have enjoyed as the only political party in Spain. The Phalanx is breaking. Thousands and thousands of people within its ranks are on our side; they are waiting for their chance to give it the final coup de grâce.

Even more serious than the Franquist inability to establish a national political machine has been the failure of the government to organize the economic life of the country. No one will deny that in 1939 production was gravely affected by three years of warfare. Nevertheless, between 1939 and 1943 there was ample time for Spain, benefiting like Portugal from its formal neutrality, to repair at least in part the ravages which the war had wrought. But the critical food situation could hardly have been alleviated by the methods which were applied to it. Every American who has passed through Spain since the fall of France has described the appalling spectacle of a restaurant menu offering a magnificent dinner for 150 pesetas ($14) while in the streets children fought over a crust of bread thrown to a dog. While olive oil, one of Spain's basic sources of nutrition, filled the cellars of one province, a hundred miles away people could not obtain an ounce. Inefficiency beyond description, immorality, estraperlo (the classic Spanish word for racketeering) have turned against Franco a great section of the middle class, which supported him during the war.

The same lack of capacity has been evident in the conduct of foreign affairs. Franco's servitude to the Axis has prevented him from exercising the initiative and aggressiveness usual in a young totalitarian state. Glorious dreams of empire cannot be brought to fruition by a little puppet regime. Except for the sudden seizure of Tangier—the British could have ejected Franco long ago if they had wanted to—not one of the "imperial" claims of the Blue Empire has ever been implemented. Even the great crusade for Gibraltar dwindled to a noisy Phalangist demonstration in Madrid on the day that Franco's great admirer, Sir Samuel Hoare, presented his credentials to the Spanish government.

In South America Franco's foreign policy has proved all but catastrophic. By siding first with Castillo, then with Ramirez, he has earned the unanimous dislike of the South American people, beginning with the populace of Argentina. Franco's foreign policy has finally been reduced to such acts as the infamous message of congratulation sent to the Philippine Quisling Laurel and the humiliating, confused, stupid note of explanation, describing this message to an enemy of the United Nations as "an act of courtesy."

While Franco rapidly loses ground inside Spain and sees the impending defeat of his only strong ally in Europe, Nazi Germany, a new injection of hope comes from an unexpected source. The most insolent "neutral" in Europe sees himself permitted to behave toward the victorious coalition in a manner which would not be tolerated from anyone else.

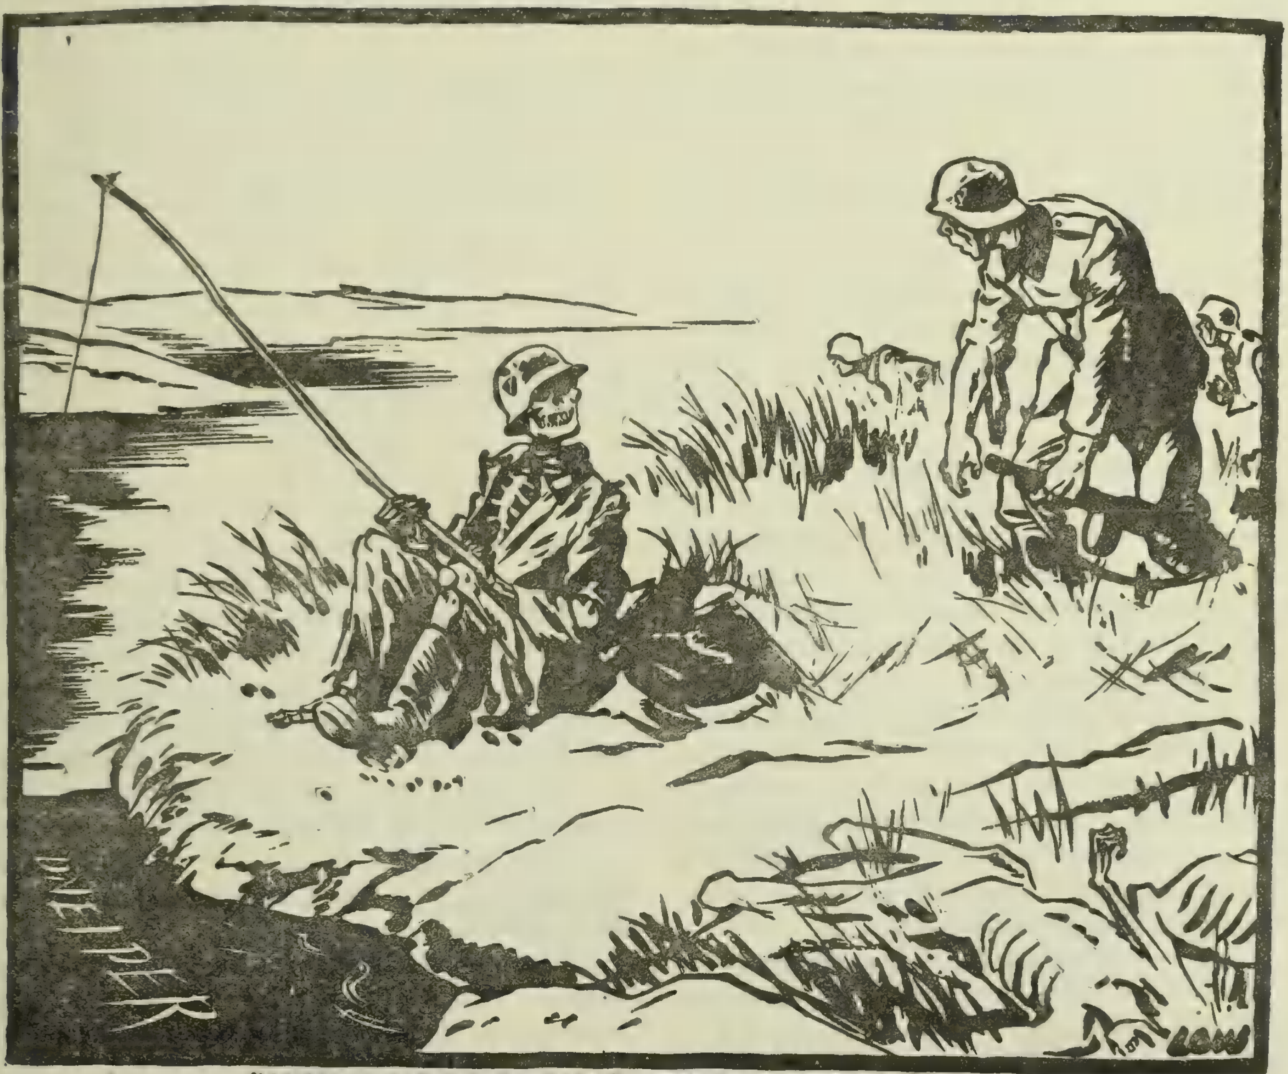
We shall not record here the list of Franco's insults and hostile acts. It could never be complete. Even while this article goes to press a new impertinence may be reported from Madrid. A day or two before the publication of the ludicrous note about the message to Laurel, the United Press described a letter which Franco had sent his men in the Blue Division "advising" them to join the German army. Naturally the Spanish embassy in Washington denied the story. It has become accepted practice in Spain for the government, the radio, and the press to act and speak against the Allies, while at the same time the ambassador in Washington issues denials even of information which has passed the official censorship in Madrid—a most unworthy game for the great powers that tolerate it.

Since the situation in the Mediterranean no longer offer an ostensible excuse for the toleration of Franco by the United Nations, he must have the conviction that he has been chosen as the instrument of a subtle Allied political scheme. He may be correct in that assumption. At the moment his doom was certain, at the very moment of reckoning, Franco was favored by a maneuver of diversion contrived chiefly in London. Between the hard-pressed dictator and his enemy, the Spanish people, the heirs to the Non-Intervention Committee interposed the silhouette of Don Juan.

It is true that Franco has shown a growing disinclination to see the monarchy restored. His reactions to the plan have been contradictory and confused. They correspond to the increasing weakness of his position. Just as he congratulates Laurel one day and another day pretends to apologize to the State Department, so he opposes the monarchy on Monday and on Friday sees as the best possible way out of his difficulties the restoration of Don Juan, with himself as a new Primo de Rivera.

On the whole he has benefited by these monarchist intrigues. He must see in them a stubborn determination to prevent the full victory of the Spanish people. He can easily deduce that there are men in London and Washington who dislike the thought that such "premature" anti-fascists as the Spanish Republicans may govern Spain during the political reshaping of Europe.

The idea of restoration is pure insanity. Except for a small group of the old nobility, the big landowners, who hated the agrarian reforms of the Republic, and the Catholic hierarchy, the monarchy has no popular support.



"HULLO, BACK AGAIN? HAVE A GOOD TIME?"

Two years ago it might have been different. When the road to an Allied victory was still long, the hunger great, and the repression equal to Himmler's, there may have been people in Spain who would have welcomed a regime which would have granted an amnesty and distributed a little bread. Today, with victory certain, people everywhere are turning against the concept of monarchy—in Italy, in Yugoslavia, in Greece. To imagine that there is any possibility of reestablishing the Bourbon throne in Spain is, at best, naive. Naive, but most dangerous. In opening the Third Congress of the Free World Association, I declared that any move to establish the monarchy in Spain would lead to civil war. I repeat that warning here.

Division among Republicans, especially those in exile, is often used as a pretext for this reactionary maneuver. To impute such importance to those differences is to be ignorant of the political tradition of Spain. Division among Republicans has always existed. It was abundant in 1931, but it did not prevent the Republicans from ousting the King and bringing the Republic into being. Division was still greater in July, 1936, on the eve of the Franco revolt, but it did not prevent the Republicans from putting up a magnificent fight against fascism. Divisions which may exist now did not prevent Spanish Republican leaders, of all parties, from denying with one voice the other day the absurd assertion—made in Español, a Phalangist paper in Madrid—that some of them were plotting to bring back the King.

This time there is no way to divert the popular will. Allied diplomacy, after having missed so many opportunities to learn by experience, might at least learn now from the recent example of Giraud. It must accept the fact that there is only one solution for Spain—the reestablishment of the Spanish Republican constitutional legality.

I think that Americans who sympathize with the cause of the Spanish people should be told specifically what we mean by reestablishing Spain's constitutional legality. Acceptance of this thesis implies, first, recognition that the constitution of December 8, 1931, remains in force, and, second, acknowledgment of and respect for the legitimacy of the three political institutions on which the constitutional structure of the Republic is based. These three institutions are the Presidency, the Cortes (Parliament), and the Government. Recognition of the fact that these constitutional entities are legitimate and that they must remain in force would firmly establish what might be termed "democratic legitimism" as the keystone of Republican policy in exile.

Since the end of the Spanish War a controversy has been carried on between those persons who base their political attitude on a belief in the continued validity of the Cortes and those who maintain that the only legal institution still remaining in force is the Government which at the last meeting of the Cortes, held at Figueras just before the overthrow of the Republic, received a unanimous vote of confidence. The second point of view has recently been elaborated in a study made by one of Spain's leading jurists, Señor Pablo de Azcárate, who for many years was joint secretary general of the League of Nations and after the outbreak of the Spanish War served as the Republican ambassador in London.

In regard to the Presidency, it will be recalled that the exiled Republic has been unhappily deprived of its President, who personified the nation as a whole. Don Manuel Azaña, who was elected President in May, 1936, relinquished his high office in Paris in February, 1939. The president of the Cortes, Señor Martínez Barrio, who was obliged under the constitution to deputize as President until a new presidential election could be held, declined to take over the responsibilities of the post left vacant by Señor Azaña's resignation.

So much for the Presidency. In regard to the Cortes, in order to decide whether it is still to be considered valid, one must refer to Article 53 of the constitution. That article establishes four years as the duration of the parliamentary mandate; thus the term of the deputies elected in February, 1936, expired automatically in February, 1940. But that by itself would not resolve the question, since Article 59 of the constitution could be quoted in support of the opposite view. By virtue of this article, the dissolved Cortes shall meet again, automatically regaining its authority as a legitimate power of state, unless elections for a fresh Cortes have been held within the constitutional period—which was not the case as regards the Parliament elected in February, 1936. And if it is granted that the Republican constitutional regime was not legally abolished, but only suspended by an act of military rebellion, it is possible to argue that all parliamentary mandates must be considered in suspension from the moment that the Republican institutions ceased to function on national territory.

Now about the Government: in determining its legitimacy it is essential to take into account the terms of Article 75 of the constitution, which provides that "the President of the Republic shall appoint and be free to dismiss the Prime Minister and, on proposal of the latter, other ministers." The basic principle of parliamentary rule, which assumes that the Government must also enjoy the confidence of the Parliament, is incorporated in the same article. The last paragraph stipulates that the President of the Republic must necessarily dismiss the ministers "in the event of the Cortes explicitly withdrawing their confidence."

In the light of these provisions and with the Presidency of the Republic vacant, the Government, although it has no one to whom it can formally present its resignation, would consider its powers legitimately revoked as soon as it had received from the Cortes a vote of censure adopted in accordance with the terms of Article 64 of the constitution. Conversely, it must be recognized that so long as this vote of censure is not adopted, the government which was in power when in March, 1939, Republican institutions ceased to function on national territory has not only the right to be recognized by all Spaniards as the one legitimate and constitutional government of Spain but also the strict and imperious obligation of claiming and defending such a right at all times and in all circumstances. Article 64, which concerned itself with votes of censure against the government, stipulates first that these shall be proposed in writing and signed by fifty deputies, that they shall be communicated to all deputies, and that they shall not be discussed or voted on until at least five days after their presentation. It adds the following significant sentence: "Neither the government nor the ministers shall feel forced to resign unless a vote of censure is approved by an absolute majority of deputies of the chamber." The dispersion of the membership of the Cortes in many lands obviously renders impossible any action by that body in conformity with this provision of the constitution.

The great logical and political force of the thesis of the restoration of constitutional legality lies in the democratic purity of its origin. The attitude of Spanish Republicans will be all the stronger as regards both themselves and others if they attempt no more than the reestablishment, without distinctions, additions, or suppressions, of the constitutional organisms which were functioning in Spain when the Republic ceased to exist on Spanish soil. If unfortunate circumstances have made it materially impossible to reestablish some of these, there is no excuse for not restoring the rest. To make changes, to lay down exceptions, to recognize this and refuse to recognize the other, would endanger the cause of liberty and the independence of Spain.

Spanish Republicans must learn to restrain their impatience, not only the impatience caused by partisan passions, but that inspired by high and noble motives. The time will come when they can revise everything that needs revision; but this will not be until the Spanish people have recovered their liberty and are once again in possession of those means of expressing their will with which they were endowed by the Republican constitution. For it is this will and no other which must determine political institutions and the future destiny of the Spanish nation.

It is therefore not necessary to improvise solutions for Spain. The Spanish Republican government is a reality. It is a government with a much more solid constitutional basis than some other governments which have been recognized by the United Nations. The government's task is precise: to see the Spanish Republic reestablished, to return to Spain and render the Spanish people an accounting of the last phase of the war and of its own activities in exile, and to call for elections. These elections will give the people the right to choose a President of the Republic and to elect a Cortes and the future government of Spain.

Charleston Contra Mundum

BY ENID EWING

DOWN in the Carolina lowlands, unknown to the rest of the nation save a few army and navy officers and a handful of housing administrators in Washington, a war is being waged on home soil. Like its worldwide contemporary, this bitter little war is one of attrition and of nerves, and it is being fought to preserve a way of life. The battleground is historic Charleston. The combatants are some 35,000 land-proud, tradition-bound Charlestonians and an invading host of migrant laborers, service men, and their families.

The invaders, 100,000 strong and still coming, have been pouring in for the past two and a half years, the majority of them lured by the well-paid jobs to be obtained in the Charleston Navy Yard and the Charleston Shipbuilding and Drydock Company. War-time pay rolls in the shipyards approximating $100,000,000 a year have increased department-store sales 56 per cent, so that Charleston stores recently led the nation in percentage increase in trade. The transportation of war workers has become a nightmare; the 6,000,000 paying passengers carried on Charleston buses in 1940 have become more than 25,000,000 this year.

Are the Charlestonians merrily riding this tide of expansion? They are not! Fighting the weight of numbers, they have managed so far to harry their foe with a passive resistance that would delight the All-India Congress. Their weapons are exorbitant rents charged for bad and inadequate housing, hotel-dining-room prices for hash-house meals, and complete lack of recreational facilities, except for a few theaters with fuzzy acoustics.

Hoisting Yankee dollars on an ancient pulley line to his cashier, a Charleston dry-goods merchant, front-row Kiwanian, and member of the oldest chamber of commerce in the nation warned me, "Don't imagine these new people will stay here. It would be foolish for merchants to expand to meet this temporary need, even if they could. Why turn the town upside down for a lot of migrants who will go back to Arkansas and Texas when they can't make the wages they're making now? What's more, money's in the wrong hands today. These people don't know how to spend it, and we'll probably have to fill their gas tanks when it's all over to get them out of town. [More than 90 per cent of the workmen at the Charleston Navy Yard are investing more than 10 per cent of their pay in war bonds.] Hell, these laborers don't even pay local taxes."

Another merchant growled that his business had grown so that he had been obliged to instal a cash register and none of his employees knew how to use it!

Newcomers chuckle over a hoary quip likening Charlestonians to the Chinese: they live on rice and worship their ancestors. There is another point of resemblance: Charlestonians have repeatedly thwarted their would-be conquerors. Since their arrival from Barbados in 1670 they have battled the Indians, the French, the Spanish, and the Yankees to preserve the attitudes of a landed aristocracy. They have, to their way of thinking, survived two Yankee invasions—Sherman's soldiers and the millionaires of the twenties in search of picturesque estates. They are now combating a third.

"You won't like Charleston," the bus driver said to me. "Even Southerners don't like it."

"Why not?"

"Because Charlestonians don't take kindly to foreigners."

"Foreigner? I'm from New York!"

"Sure, but you're a foreigner to Charlestonians." He chuckled softly. "They say if the South had been successful in seceding from the Union, South Carolina would have seceded from the South, Charleston would have seceded from South Carolina, and South of Broad would have seceded from Charleston."

"South of Broad?"

"Yep. You'll hear a lot about that in Charleston. Most of the people that live south of Broad Street, along the Cooper River, are descendants of the old plantation owners who raised rice and cotton in the back country until they lost slave labor. They still own Charleston. Matter of fact, they are Charleston."

With this warning I arrived at the last outpost of feudalism in America—part of the third Yankee invasion. As a war wife I joined an army of women searching for almost non-existent one-room-kitchen-and-bath apartments. The one sizable apartment house in town has a "no vacancy" sign set in concrete, and the only other possible quarters are rooms in private dwellings. A number of enterprising Charlestonians accept "guests" in the name of patriotism, but their rents, as one victim complained, are "damned unpatriotic." Many families of two or three persons continue to occupy the whole of ten- and twelve-room houses.

A friend in New York turned the trick that enabled my husband and me to enjoy the debatable distinction of living "south of Broad." This section is within the walls of the original city. The stones have long since crumbled, but the walls of thought built up through many generations are still impenetrable. Charlestonians ask only to be left alone. Any attempt to exchange ideas meets an eloquent silence. You are a welcome guest at the dinner table of a Charlestonian just so long as you partake heartily both of his food and of his thinking.

The essence of Charleston is found in its three "charitable" organizations—the South Carolina Society, the St. Andrew's Society, and the St. Cecilia Society. Membership is hereditary and male. The St. Cecilia, the first social club in North America, is the most exclusive, divorced men and actors being barred. Twice a year its members, their wives, and their unmarried daughters attend the St. Cecilia Ball. Rich Northerners may have bought the beautiful wrought-iron gates and balconies of venerable Charleston homes, but they have never been able to buy an invitation to the St. Cecilia Ball. The press is not admitted. An intrepid girl reporter who once managed to crash the gate described it as a drunken brawl.

When Rear Admiral William Glassford, since detached, became commandant of the Sixth Naval District and of the Charleston Navy Yard, Charlestonians had someone to reckon with. For the salt-water admiral took one look at the housing predicament and general discontent and began to do something about it. He discovered that the men on whom the navy depends for a fair proportion of its destroyers and sea-going tugs were living, except for a few in government-financed housing projects, in trailers and abandoned PWA huts or in dismal rooming-houses, many sleeping by shifts in "hot" beds shared with fellow-workers. Hundreds were living—and still are—in inland towns from fifty to seventy-five miles from the Navy Yard, commuting in privately owned buses. Navy Yard officials estimated that the Charleston housing shortage was costing the nation one destroyer a month, and until recently both army and navy men believed that the war effort in this section could be stepped up 100 per cent with sufficient housing, more cooperation from Charlestonians, and better recreational facilities.

Cooperation? This past summer, with an estimated 2,000 new residents arriving monthly, many a Charlestonian pulled the shades of his three-story house, covered the furniture, and hied himself to cooler climes.

The first inkling of the Charlestonians that peacetime rights were one thing, war-time needs another, came when the United States Housing Administration opened a rent-control office in Charleston and clapped ceilings on rents. The housing authorities could not abolish the practice of charging from $50 to $90 a month for single rooms, but they could keep landlords from boosting the rent with each new tenant. That they meant to get even tougher became apparent when they had a house-to-house survey made to determine existing housing facilities. This so-called infringement of personal rights brought screams of protest. John B. Blandford, national housing administrator, did nothing to cushion the blow when he said the government would offer to lease homes and buildings for use by civilian war workers, but if this did not "yield a sufficient amount of necessary housing in time," the NHA would "be forced to recommend the compulsory use of available private facilities through billeting, commandeering, requisitioning, and similar devices."

To date it has not been necessary to commandeer or requisition private facilities. Sweating housing authorities, for the army, the navy, and the Housing Administration, have obtained incredible results in the past year, after disentangling themselves from the red tape that thwarted earlier efforts. More than 4,000 federal-financed housing units have been completed for civilian workers, and 1,950 more are being built for workers yet to come. But army and navy personnel, not billeted, is still at the mercy of Charlestonians.

All this does not impress Charleston. Despite the changes forced upon the city, despite federal spending, despite the admonitions of fuming Washington "bureaucrats" to fall in line, Charleston still flaunts the recalcitrant, imperturbable air it has worn since it was founded. It intends—come fire, flood, or conquest—to preserve the way of life that has always obtained "south of Broad" and to remain Charleston contra mundum.

Britain Between the Acts

IV. THE MOOD OF THE LEFT

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

AS I have suggested in earlier articles of this series, the British worker is today a man of inner conflicts. He is loyal, determined, hard-working, tired, anxious about his future, uneasy about the peace, cynical, and devoted. If you think that is too many things to be at once, look into your own heart. His state mirrors in sharper outline the state of the country as a whole, and there would be no point in singling out the worker for special attention if I did not believe that the future of Britain lies in his hands.

I believe that. And I consider the slow but evident stirring of doubt in the minds of the common people in Britain a sign of health. The time has passed for the surrender of mind and body, the tension, the closing of ranks that carried the country through the terrible year after Dunkirk. The time for dispersion, for sharp political cleavage and militant opposition has not yet come. Today—with the shape of the peace emerging while the war is still being fought, with the problems of the future forcing their way across the needs of the present—today is a time when normal men and women inwardly begin their own post-war planning, their process of reconversion. Consciously and unconsciously they are preparing to meet the demands of a world at peace that will be far less simple and certain and organized—even less satisfying in many ways—than the world of war.

Today they are looking for some assurance that what lies the other side of the struggle will be profoundly different from what led into it. They are looking for a faith. They are looking for leaders. All they see now is uncertainty. The medley of reports and programs so far ground out by individuals and private or public agencies is no source of satisfaction. You do not endure weariness and great effort, you do not fight and watch your comrades die, in order to achieve a program. The peace-time substitute for blood and sweat and tears must be comparably moving. It must fulfil the hopes men fear to put into words.

Englishmen are notoriously bad at putting high hopes into words. All they will tell you is that they want jobs after the war; that they want security in case jobs fail, and no more dole. They want the people who run the country to see to those things, whatever it may mean. But under this prosaic, rather inglorious demand is a realization, dim in some minds but clear and exact in others, that it will take a new organization of society to provide men with those basic necessities which they have come to regard as rights. Jobs and security, and the other aspects of civilized living that are within reach when those have been won, are understood by most Britons to call for a revolutionary change from all that existed in the inter-war. The Britain of Chamberlain and Baldwin —and of Ramsay MacDonald, too—failed to provide the vision necessary to satisfy even the most primitive needs of an advanced and industrious people. Those men and their backers failed as the ruling groups in America and on the Continent also failed. Where the social structure was less stable than in Britain, that failure brought fascism; to the whole world it brought war.

Will the dismal process be repeated again? Will there be new Chamberlains and Baldwins, concerned with the preservation of the old England and the old Empire—which means a system already bankrupt and class privileges no longer supported by vigor and stability? Will there be new MacDonalds, warily avoiding the responsibility of power? Will there be a new collapse of courage and the capacity to plan and execute, so that Britain will again stumble from boom to slump, forewarned but helpless?

Those questions lie behind the uneasy, skeptical, wary mood of the ordinary men and women of Britain. Mr. Churchill is right to warn the people against premature optimism and a relaxation of effort, to remind them that months of bloody fighting lie ahead. But when he demands the same sense of "urgency and crisis," the same unity, that controlled the minds of men during the time when the nation's existence hung in precarious balance, he asks the impossible. The people will work and fight. But they will still ask questions. And this Mr. Churchill knows, too, for in the very speech from which those words were taken he asserted that it was "a definite part of the duty and responsibility of this National Government" to "set about a vast and practical scheme to make sure that in the years immediately following the war there will be food, work, and homes for all."

That is a good promise, but I believe it will be received with reserve by a large part of the British people. Very few with whom I talked expect vast and practical post-war schemes from the present coalition government.

Who can provide them? What men, what parties? What political alignment will emerge from the war to convert the old economy to new conditions and new demands? As I have said before, many intelligent persons expect little change either in control or program. They believe the present ruling groups will again exhibit that zero-hour flexibility which has saved so many critical situations in Britain's history. The big-business forces have already recognized, far more clearly than the same elements in this country have done, the need for government control. They are ready to accept the state as a partner in order to save themselves from liquidation. The end of laissez faire is proclaimed by most of its old devotees—even among the strongest private interests. The new setup will be the existing one, with many of the controls established during the war perpetuated in the peace to make possible a planned, or partly planned, economy. Official labor will be encouraged to share, as it now shares, the responsibility for running the show. Business will make profits; the workers will keep their jobs; reforms will be put through—more social security, more housing, better schools—and the power relationships will remain essentially unchanged. The persons who elaborate this picture of post-war Britain believe it will work, at least for a time. They see it as a successful, polite form of semi-fascism, which will prove acceptable to the key people in each group. They have absolutely no faith in the will of the workers to demand more, or in the intention of their leaders to cut loose and organize a fight for power.

I give this view only to disagree with it. I believe the attempt to create such a system will be made; that the first post-war election may result in a new coalition to meet the immediate problems of demobilization and reconstruction and industrial conversion. But I do not believe the Labor Party or the trade-union movement will accept permanently the role of junior partner in a national government. I talked with a lot of labor men in and out of office; with Morrison and Bevin and Cripps, with Laski and Aneurin Bevan and George R. Strauss, with leaders in various constituencies. I discussed plans and programs with people outside the party leadership such as Wintringham and Mackay of Common Wealth, Warbey of the Socialist Clarity Group, and many others. I spent an hour with Harry Pollitt, leader of the Communist Party.

Among them, as you can see, are bitter critics of the Labor Party. Some oppose the truce, believing Labor should have remained in opposition during the war, free either to back or to fight government measures. Some believe that the predominantly trade-union control of the party is a fatal obstacle in the way of its winning majority support in the country. Some think the leadership in the party and the trade unions has become too inflexible and bureaucratic, too jealous of its present small area of control, to undertake the hazards of a genuine fight for power and social change. All of them agree that Labor's voluntary surrender of independent action during the war had brought about a dangerous, if temporary, loss of contact between rank and file and leaders. But only one or two of the men actively engaged in political action on the left consider the situation beyond repair. Labor may go into the first post-war election without adequate time for rebuilding its machinery and putting forward a platform. That handicap, the majority believe, is a temporary one. By the second election Labor will be prepared to fight.

My own view is more hopeful than this narrow concensus of left opinion. I could see everywhere the ill effects of the political truce. The whole left movement has suffered greatly in the interests of unity. The sacrifice was necessary, but it should not be minimized. It accounts for much of the suspicion and worry that afflict the rank and file. I recognize, too, the need for modification in the structure and control of the Labor Party to give it a broader popular appeal; and I think such modification will be hard to bring about. Nor have I any faith that minor groups can challenge successfully the dominance of the party; the chief value of the Common Wealth, for example, is its effect as an irritant. And, at least in the near future, even the Communists will serve chiefly as a goad.

The hope of change in British political life lies in the Labor Party. And the hope of a more militant, effective Labor Party lies in the revolutionary situation that lurks beyond the horizon of the war.

I am certain that many Labor men who today loyally accept and apologize for the decisions of the National Government are prepared to lead their party in a bid for power tomorrow. No one who has met Herbert Morrison and heard or even read his speeches can doubt that he intends to be Prime Minister in a Labor government. He will not consent to serve in a long-drawn-out coalition. Nor will Bevin. Nor will the best of the other Labor functionaries. They want more than office; they want power. And unlike Ramsay MacDonald they are not afraid of the implications of power.

Whether they realize how profound must be the changes a Labor government would be called upon to put into effect, I don't know. Most of them are "practical" men, inclined to act on a rather narrow pragmatic basis. But ahead lies a challenge that will be hard to ignore. Both men and political machines will adapt themselves to the demands of the post-war world or be replaced by others.

If this sounds vague and threatening, I will try to be more exact, though no one but Vernon Bartlett would dare pin the future down to a succession of concrete events! Those people who like to look upon revolution as an unhappy by-product of war have reversed the facts. This vast catastrophe of war is, instead, an incident of a much greater revolution. The growth of fascist power which preceded it was another incident of the same revolution. The next phase can develop on a wide scale only when fascist power has been exterminated; though it is already beginning to appear here and there on every continent. The next phase is the rebuilding of the social and economic structure. That this can be accomplished through the agency of those groups that held power before the war, and still hold the balance of power, I do not believe. The job of rebuilding calls for a genuine shift of power. One might wish that stronger men and a more militant party stood ready to take command in Britain. But the British left at least has the machinery of power in its hands. It has achieved a high degree of political maturity. It has some good leaders with experience in the mechanics of government. Both men and organizations are so far ahead of anything this country has yet produced that an American observer is inclined to optimism. British Socialists and independent progressives can control the political destiny of their country as soon as they decide to do so. And events are conspiring to sweep away the hesitations and compromises which proved disastrous in the years before 1939.

A COLUMN BY JOSEPH KAUFMAN, the Weekly Round Table, appeared until recently every Sunday in the Lynn, Massachusetts, Telegram-News. It consisted of imaginary conversations on politics by characters with such names as Mr. New Dealer, Mr. Conservative, Mr. Liberal, and Mr. Isolationist. The local Knights of Columbus didn't like the column. They said it contained statements too favorable to Russia. They sent a delegation to see the editor of the paper. The column no longer appears.

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Japan's Gloomy Home Front

BY SELDEN C. MENEFEE

DURING the last few months unmistakable signs of internal strain have appeared repeatedly in Japanese home and empire broadcasts. This is not to say that the morale of the Japanese people is about to crack or that the Japanese economy is collapsing. Our victories so far have been minor; our forces are still too many thousands of miles away from Japan proper to offer any real hope of a military victory before a year or two years of hard fighting. And the heavy industries of Japan's inner fortress are still virtually untouched by the war. Nevertheless, Japan's leaders evidently realize that their chances of ultimate victory over the United Nations are rapidly fading away. And their utterances, together with the defensive military strategy they are pursuing, must have produced the beginnings of disillusionment among the people.

The first important sign of internal dissension occurred last June, just after the fall of Attu. At that time, according to Federal Communications Commission analyses made available by the Office of War Information, Bin Akao of the Japanese Diet was dismissed from the Imperial Rule Assistance Political Society, which runs the Diet, for making a speech critical of the regime. Three Diet members followed him out. One of them was Seigo Nakano, head of the fascist Tohokai and a strong exponent of Japanese imperialism in Southeast Asia, who committed hara-kiri on October 27.

At about the same time the head of the Broadcasting Corporation of Japan, Hiroshi Shimomura, made this startling comment: "Not only in our nation but throughout the world, I think, many are complaining now that the war is too greatly prolonged and that our living conditions are exposed to menace, inconvenience, difficulties; they say that we have had enough of war and that the war should be stopped."

In September, when Premier Tojo announced his latest program for "total war mobilization," Mainishi, one of Japan's leading newspapers, said openly, despite the rigid press censorship, that the people of Japan were tired of hearing about national danger, and that their enthusiasm for "continuously repeated speeches by leading men has become dulled." Public opinion, it said, "frankly criticizes the government because the crisis was predicted long ago and yet no action was taken."

Since the Diet met in October to give its rubber-stamp approval to the government's fourteen key bills, Tojo has not only continued as Premier and Minister of War but has also been Minister of Munitions. His new post gives him theoretically the power of life and death over all Japanese industry—a power the military has always coveted but had not before acquired, even under the National Mobilization Law of 1938.

All previous legal restraints are canceled by the new munitions law. The government may take over war plants, change their articles of incorporation, order them to cooperate or merge with other companies, dissolve them, and seize their funds. Each company must select one man who will be responsible to the government for war production, or the government may name this man if it chooses. This key figure may conscript workers, and his word is law. Any member of his staff who fails to follow his orders is subject to penal measures. The one apparent weakness in the law is that some of the control associations which gave private business a powerful voice in setting up industry-wide monopolies will continue in existence.

Other measures approved by the Diet provide for the decentralization of war industry as a precaution against bombing raids, for the drafting of students and even Diet members, and for the scrapping of old-age retirement provisions as a means of obtaining man-power.

At the same time industry is told to "lift the morale of industrial workers." To this end arrangements very much like the War Production Board's labor-management committees are being encouraged. On October 25 a domestic commentator referred to "a strained condition in meeting the demands of the state," and to grumbling in the factories over bottlenecks in supplies and transportation. He praised a worker who had made a valuable suggestion for cutting the amount of wire needed in a given operation and advocated that all male employees form voluntary groups to work for industrial efficiency. (This must be very disconcerting to the Japanese worker, who has been trained all his life to be unimaginative and obedient, rather than original in his ideas.) The same speaker exhorted Japanese girls—presumably those of the middle and upper classes, since most of the others are already working—to go into the war plants. "The girls of enemy America make up a third of the employees of the Douglas Aircraft Company," he said. "When you hear that the hateful Flying Fortresses are made by these girls, can you women of Japan remain idle?"

Japan's war production depends mainly on its shipping and aircraft industries, and there is plenty of evidence that they are doing poorly. Last month a domestic broadcast reported that war production had been slowed by absenteeism caused by the bad weather in the first part of the year but that it had since recovered. Most industries, it said, had exceeded their quotas, but the production of steel, iron ore, and chrome was behind schedule. To step up iron production, old veins are to be reopened in Japan proper, and small furnaces are to be set up on the spot to save transportation. Production of industrial machinery also fell short of the figure set—this may seriously affect the aircraft industry—and decentralization was advocated as a remedy.

In recent months Japan's leaders have frequently made guarded references to the possibility of defeat. "We shall be defeated if we are content only with our present extraordinary effort," Tojo told his Cabinet in September. "The gravity of the present situation does not permit even a moment's delay in coping with the greatest of crises." At the opening of the recent Diet session the Emperor himself said in his customary message that the war situation was "truly grave," and Tojo added that "the enemy is overcoming many difficulties and dangers and the war is growing in intensity." A domestic commentator has admitted that time can be Japan's enemy: "Unless the decisive war-time internal structure is renovated and strengthened, we shall not be able to nip the enemy's efforts in the bud." This reversal of the former propaganda line, which was based on the assumption of invincibility, may be intended, like Dr. Goebbels's similar about-face, to awaken the people to the desperate struggle; but it must also suggest to them that the war is going against the "Yamato race," and that worse things are to come.

The concept of an "inner zone" of defense was openly discussed for the first time at the recent Diet session. The importance of measures for "self-sufficiency" in Japan, Manchuria, and Korea was stressed, and it was stated that "all and any enemy advances in this area must be kept out." The Japanese have been told that they must not expect any help in the way of food or consumers' goods from the "southern regions," because all shipping must be used for transporting war goods. All staple foods except salt and sweet potatoes are rationed; sweet potatoes are being substituted for rice wherever possible.

The Emperor is being exploited more than ever before as a symbol to rally the people. He receives a constant stream of Japanese and puppet officials, sends congratulatory cables to Axis politicians, and issues rescripts more and more frequently. He grants money to bereaved families and honors to war heroes alive and dead. He performs ceremonial acts at Yasakuni, where the ashes of war heroes are enshrined, and his whole family worships there. Here is evidence of the bankruptcy of Japanese propaganda, for as the Emperor steps out of the clouds and becomes a mundane figure, he loses some of his effectiveness as a symbol of divinity.

Several of Japan's leading propaganda spokesmen have been removed recently because of their blunders. Lieutenant Colonel Iwasaki, information chief of the Japanese forces in China, lost his job in June. He had been sending home such glowing reports that the Japanese people believed the capture of Chungking was imminent. Captain Hideo Hiraide, a naval spokesman who has repeatedly "annihilated" the American navy, was fired a month later. In October Major General Yahangi, chief of the army press section, who had been predicting a "sweeping offensive operation" by Japan, was given another job.

These trends have implications for American political warfare that can hardly be overestimated. Our propaganda could not expect to be effective while the enemy was winning military victories, but with Japan on the defensive the United Nations should be able to carry on vigorous propaganda warfare. It is necessary, however, to reach the people of Japan by radio, and this can be done only when we have established powerful medium-wave transmitters in China or the outer Aleutians. Only a handful of government monitors in Japan and a few Japanese-army radios outside Japan are now able to hear our short-wave broadcasts. Not until we can broadcast to the four million Japanese who presumably still have medium-wave receivers—or until we can drop rice-paper leaflets on Japan's cities—shall we be able to lay the psychological groundwork for acceptance of defeat.

When that time comes we must recast our propaganda in three ways. First, the Emperor, now the symbol of militant nationalism, must no longer be spared political attack. We need not try to dethrone him; we should merely produce evidence that he is no deity by stressing the fact that he is a weak puppet of the war lords. We must leave it to the Japanese themselves to cast him out. This they will doubtless do if defeat is accompanied by social revolution, which seems likely. If we tried to do the job ourselves, we should be giving a dangerous hostage to fate by providing the jingoistic factions with a symbol of martyrdom to build on after the war.

Second, we must offer something positive to the Japanese. If they see nothing except annihilation ahead, they will fight to the end. But if we can reach them with the promise of a harsh but just peace, guaranteeing the national integrity of Japan proper once it has divested itself of totalitarianism, the prospect of defeat will be less terrible.

Finally, the United States, in concert with China and the other United Nations, must hold out to the peoples of the Far East the hope of membership in a world society of nations. Not until we do this can we wage effective political war upon Japan.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

WHEN an editorial in a leading Berlin newspaper is headed "Is the Enemy Already in Germany?" one gets quite a shock. That title did in fact appear over an editorial in the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung of November 1. And in the next few days similar articles appeared in a number of papers in other cities. The enemy referred to was the twelve million foreign workers in the Reich. The Allgemeine Zeitung raised this question:

> Do the millions of foreign workers represent the famous Trojan horse? That antique monster must have taken on huge proportions if this supposition is correct. As the front line has demanded more and more men, an increasing number of foreign workers have replaced them. This development, in the worst of all wars, has created a problem which is as disturbing to the stability of the Reich as is the fighting on the battlefield.

A Rhineland newspaper expressed it more crudely. The German public, it said, was "obsessed by the nightmare of a so-called fifth column made up of foreign workers who would one day get out of hand."

Of course this anxiety about the role the foreign workers may play in the future must be allayed. The newspaper articles were written for that purpose. Phenomena which the people have seen with their own eyes cannot be passed over. So we hear something of "worries and problems which cannot be eliminated." The Berlin paper went on to say:

> Since it is no longer a matter of small, selected contingents of foreigners, the authorities cannot examine or test the political reliability of the different groups of workers. It is natural that along with many friendly workers there should also be many who are indifferent, and some who are hostile, to Germany. We must also reckon with those individuals who seize the opportunity offered by their work in Germany to commit sabotage or otherwise help the enemy.

The article continued that it would be "unreasonable" to expect "enthusiasm" from the foreigners, who share all the restrictions, needs, sorrows, and dangers of German workers. Housing conditions have seriously deteriorated as a result of the bombings. "Social standards" have been lowered. Besides, said the newspaper discreetly, the foreigners, "as well as German workers, see what is lacking" in the factories. Nevertheless, it assured its readers, there is no reason to view the foreign workers as a real, dangerous Trojan horse. Though "dissatisfaction undoubtedly exists" among them, there are "as yet" no signs that they "are developing into that mighty political or even military vanguard hoped for in London and Washington."

Now that the Moscow communiqués have directed attention to Austria, an article that appeared in a Budapest newspaper on October 10 may be of interest. Its appearance was in a way sensational since Hungary is an ally of Germany. Though newspapers there are under the same censorship as German papers, the Pester Lloyd's article, entitled "Vienna—Autumn, 1943," described, in scarcely veiled language—and with scarcely veiled partisanship—the pronounced enmity between the Viennese and the invaders from the north.

> The Viennese give the évacués from the north the collective name of Bombinger, and it cannot be said that the word expresses love or pity. Some évacués complain, unjustifiably, that the Viennese are unobliging or even unfriendly. But here as elsewhere the old adage is applicable: "As you shout into the woods, so the echo returns." Indeed, it is undeniable that the extremely stramm (aggressive) and even contemptuous behavior of the northerners often touches the Viennese in a sore spot. The interloper's conduct is apt to be especially offensive when he comes from a district with newer traditions. . . .
> The power of the Reich is relentlessly determined to take energetic measures in Vienna and to nip in the bud every individualistic move. This is sufficiently proved by the red posters announcing executions, now appearing in increasing numbers. The posters usually carry several names, some of which are often those of women.

It hardly needs to be said that the expressions "extremely aggressive" and "coming from districts with newer traditions" describe the Prussians. Furthermore it is certain that the censor in Budapest understood this and let the article go through notwithstanding.

All during the war Germany has practiced a kind of bluff—window dressing in the most literal sense. Shops have been compelled to keep their show windows decorated just as in peace. A foreigner going through the streets saw the windows full of everything anyone could want. But if he entered the shop to make a purchase, he learned that none of the articles were to be had.

Like so many other forms of bluff in Germany, this is to be kept up no longer. The shopowners themselves, according to the Berlin correspondent of the Stockholm Dagens Nyheter, have rebelled. Using the slogan "No Illusions in Shop Windows!" the Professional Association of German Retail Traders has started a campaign against the practice. And their organ, Der Einzelhandel, informs us that they expect to accomplish their purpose. The Nazi authorities have allowed themselves to be convinced that "deceptive shop windows in war time may constitute a danger." "Public resentment may be aroused if the shops continue to display wanted goods which are not for sale"—especially if food shops display dummy articles and empty cans and bottles. A decree is impending forbidding what was previously commanded.

BOOKS and the ARTS

MAX REINHARDT

BY JOSEPH CHAPIRO

THE death of Max Reinhardt marks the passing not only of a great metteur en scène but of an epoch without doubt the most brilliant in the history of the modern theater, which for half a century was filled with his name. It was the epoch inaugurated in Paris about 1890 by Antoine, continued and extended by Stanislavsky's Moscow Art Theater, and brought to its culmination in Berlin by Max Reinhardt, who became—in Stanislavsky's words—its most glorious and complete expression.

Reinhardt was born September 9, 1873, in Baden, near Vienna. He never became a German citizen; yet since he spent almost forty years of his active life in Berlin it is no more than proper to regard him as a German artist. In effect it was he who revived the German classics and rescued them from the philologists who had kept them locked up in their dusty Germanic seminars like insects carefully fastened down with pins in laboratories. And it was he who made the German language sound from all the great stages of the world.

Yes, he was a German artist, but he recognized no frontiers. Just as he brought the German theater, both classic and modern, to foreign audiences, so he was indefatigable in introducing foreign authors into Germany. He restored the entire Shakespearean repertory, giving almost 3,000 performances in a quarter of a century. He modernized the Spanish classics, brought back the Commedia dell' Arte, and revived the French classics in German. During the retreat of the German army, eleven days before the armistice, when chauvinism was at its height, he proclaimed the freedom of the spirit by putting on a performance of Racine's "Phèdre."

Moreover, he constantly sought out every contemporary manifestation of the human spirit, transforming his stage into a living mirror reflecting the problems tormenting the minds and hearts of all peoples. And this man who came from a poor Jewish family, this man who never had any systematic education, raised himself so high by the strength of his own genius that he was able to dominate all social strata. He portrayed all types and illustrated their joy and suffering, their aspirations and despair, with thrilling precision.

His sense for literary values was as extraordinary as his flair for actors. He discovered writers and actors before they themselves knew their vocation. At the same time he suggested to playwrights—the most celebrated playwrights—scenes and acts, if not whole plays. He offered leading roles to people who had never been in the wings and who, from one day to the next, became famous actors.

There are some who claim he stifled the individuality of his actors. What nonsense! Reinhardt's genius expressed itself in exactly the oppòsite direction—in making the actor conscious of his own ego. I remember how he would walk beside the actor, rehearsing the role with him, moderating and accentuating his own voice and gestures, so that he became a mirror in which the actor could survey himself, criticize himself, and become himself.

But Reinhardt's great originality, the essence of his work, lay in his mises en scène. What did Reinhardt understand by the mise en scène? There are those who believe the secret of his magical virtuosity consisted in his arrangement of the stage, in décor and costume. They wonder why the name and fame of this artist who concealed himself behind the stage curtain surpassed that of the greatest actors. The truth is that all his ingenious stage machinery served him only as a means whereby the stage could be forgotten. What mattered to him was making the connection between the actor and the audience, between the dream and the reality.

From the actor he turned to the audience, whose slightest reaction he watched and studied incessantly. When the curtain goes up, the spectator is still too taken up with the impressions of the day to be able to concentrate solely on what is happening on the stage. The art of the actor consists in snatching him away from his preoccupations as quickly as possible. Otherwise the actor's dream cannot become real. Therefore the stage and the hall, his two sworn enemies, must be made to offer the least possible obstacle to the realization of the dream. I recall how upset Reinhardt was every time he heard anyone sneeze or cough at an intense moment. That spectator was his infallible criterion. Reinhardt knew that the play, or at any rate the particular scene during which the unhappy wretch coughed, was not yet up to the mark, and as soon as the theater was emptied he set to work again with his actors. He was convinced that perfect dramatic art, by carrying the spectator away from his real life, should, at least for the duration of the stage dream, cure him of his cough.

All of which explains his tireless search for the technical improvements that other metteurs en scène subsequently adopted without, however, succeeding in using them with Reinhardt's mastery. He began with the footlights, which light the face from below upward, in distinction to nature, which casts its light downward. Moreover, each hour of the day has its specific kind of light, as each kind of light has its own color, the tones of which change with the passing minutes. So he created gamuts of color hitherto unknown to the theater. Like a great painter extracting inimitable colors from his palette, he mixed them in the air until his projectors yielded the natural light that would give the audience the feeling of noon or of a particular hour of a sunny or gloomy day.

Later he invented the famous "sky" or horizon, an enormous concave wall, altering its depth at will and opening up perspectives according to the needs of the landscape set. With the revolving stage, that veritable harbinger of the talking cinema, Reinhardt endowed his actors with the means of moving from one room to another, from the street to the house or vice versa, without having to lower the curtain.

BURLINGAME

For Reinhardt disliked the curtain, and he abhorred intermissions. He believed that when the curtain came down it destroyed the spectator's illusion, and that consequently the struggle between the spectator and the actor had to begin again with each new act. The ideal stage to him was one permitting him to present a complete play without the slightest intermission. Later on, however, he somewhat modified his view when he perceived that certain plays require a stationary stage.

As basically important to Reinhardt as the stage was the hall itself. When he grew weary of wrestling with the problem of perfecting a theater, he would have new ones built. His first important acquisition—the Deutsches Theater—was extremely beautiful but seated almost 1,000 and had a stage proportionately large. An intimate play, he found, could not always be suitably presented in such a theater. Plainly the rules of business were against such conceptions, but Reinhardt, whose artistic demands took precedence over all other considerations, built a theater of 400 seats which he called Kammerspiele or Chamber Playhouse, similar to halls where only chamber music is played.

It was in the logic of his art that he should have turned from the intimate theater toward the crowd that had always fascinated him, the same crowd which once filled the ancient circuses in its passion for huge spectacles. The result was the Grosses Schauspielhaus, an enormous hall seating 3,500, with a center arena where the actor, freed from the conventions of the stage, took his place at times right in the midst of the audience. Thus at performances of "Danton" actors and supers were stationed in the boxes and in the aisles, whence they hurled their violent diatribes against the Revolutionary Tribunal. Before long, so great was the illusion of reality he created, many in the audience began to mingle their excited voices with those of the actors.

Having successively pushed back the limits of the stage, he finally did away with it entirely. His dream of presenting plays in the open air was realized in the small city of Salzburg. In a short time the town became the most important rendezvous of the cosmopolitan world. There he utilized every spot lending itself to dramatic effect, even to his own château, in which he gave a single performance of Molière's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" for his guests, who included the performers.

Reinhardt, the great dreamer, was at the very summit of his career when the European catastrophe summoned him abruptly to a horrible reality: Hitler came to power and with him barbarism. Reinhardt left at once, leaving many of his dreams behind him, not to speak of all he had acquired in the course of a lifetime of hard work. Deprived of his wealth and his theaters, he went to Austria, thence to the United States, where he had already been so well received. The United States had always fascinated him. He considered Americans the ideal theater public, the most enthusiastic, and the most willing to be carried away by the actor's art. Unfortunately he did not succeed in finding the kind of setting he needed to express his genius freely—that is, a theater permitting him to create a select and permanent company, to perfect his staging continually, and to realize his new ideas. Accustomed to work only within the limits of his own imagination, he was suddenly confined to a narrow cage, at the pleasure of entrepreneurs.

I finish these lines after returning from the funeral of the man who was so dear to me. I am not yet able to inclose his personality within the narrow frame of an article. But of this I am certain: for a long time the theater will continue to draw sustenance from the deep well of Reinhardt's genius. Soon legend will catch up his name. It will tell of one possessed by the stage who left it one day to enter the circus arena, which in turn he abandoned to enlist in his high purpose churches, historical monuments, public places, and even his own home. Our poor world, which La Fontaine called "a spacious comedy in a hundred diverse acts," was for him as much the synonym of the beautiful as an unending drama that obsessed him from his childhood to his dying breath, the drama he never ceased illustrating with all the sorcery of his genius.

Brailsford on India

SUBJECT INDIA. By Henry Noel Brailsford. The John Day Company. $2.50.

IF THERE is one point in the Indian problem that cannot be disputed—or, at any rate, is not disputed, outside the ranks of the British Conservative Party—it is that Britain ought to stop ruling India as early as possible. But this is a smaller basis of agreement than it sounds, and the answers to literally every other question are always colored by subjective feelings. Mr. Brailsford is better equipped than the majority of writers on India in that he is not only aware of his own prejudices but possesses enough background knowledge to be unafraid of the "experts." Probably he has not been very long in India, perhaps he does not even speak any Indian language, but he differs from the vast majority of English left-wingers in having bothered to visit India at all, and in being more interested in the peasants than in the politicians.

As he rightly says, the great, central fact about India is its poverty. From birth to death, generation after generation, the peasant lives his life in the grip of the landlord or the money-lender—they are frequently the same person—tilling his tiny patch of soil with the tools and methods of the Bronze Age. Over great areas the children barely taste milk after they are weaned, and the average physique is so wretched that ninety-eight pounds is a normal weight for a full-grown man. The last detailed survey to be taken showed that the average Indian income was Rs. 62 (about £4-13-0) per annum: in the same period the average British income was £94. In spite of the drift to the towns that is occurring in India as elsewhere, the condition of the industrial workers is hardly better than that of the peasants. Brailsford describes them in the slums of Bombay, sleeping eight to a tiny room, with three water taps among four hundred people, and working a twelve-hour day, three hundred and sixty-five days a year, for wages of around seven and six-pence a week. These conditions will not be cured simply by the removal of British rule, but neither can they be seriously improved while the British remain, because British policy, largely unconscious, is to hamper industrialization and preserve the status quo.

The worst barbarities from which Indians suffer are inflicted on them not by Europeans but by other Indians—the landlords and money-lenders, the bribe-taking minor officials, and the Indian capitalists who exploit their working people with a ruthlessness quite impossible in the West since the rise of trade unionism. But although the business community, at any rate, tends to be anti-British and is involved in the Nationalist movement, the privileged classes really depend on British arms. Only when the British have gone will what Brailsford calls the latent class war be able to develop.

Brailsford is attempting exposition rather than moral judgment, and he gives no very definite answer to the difficult question of whether, on balance, the British have done India more good than harm. As he points out, they have made possible an increase of population without making it possible for that population to be properly fed. They have saved India from war, internal and external, at the expense of destroying political liberty. Probably their greatest gift to India has been the railway. If one studies a railway map of Asia, India looks like a piece of fishing-net in the middle of a white tablecloth. And this network of communications has not only made it possible to check famines by bringing food to the afflicted areas—the famine now raging in India would hardly have been a famine at all by the standards of a hundred years ago—but to administer India as a unit, with a common system of law, internal free trade and freedom of movement, and even, for the educated minority, a lingua franca in the English language. India is potentially a nation, as Europe, with its smaller population and greater racial homogeneity, is not. But since 1910 or thereabouts the British power has acted as a dead hand. Often loosely denounced as "fascist," the British regime in India is almost the exact opposite of fascism, since it has never developed the notion of positive government at all. It has remained an old-fashioned despotism, keeping the peace, collecting its taxes, and for the rest letting things slide, with hardly the faintest interest in how its subjects lived or what they thought, so long as they were outwardly obedient. As a result—to pick just one fact out of the thousands one could choose—the whole subcontinent, in this year of 1943, is incapable of manufacturing an automobile engine. In spite of all that can be said on the other side, this fact alone would justify Brailsford in his final conclusion: "Our day in India is over; we have no creative part to play."

Brailsford is justifiably bleak about the future. He sees that the handing over of power is a complicated process which cannot be achieved quickly, especially in the middle of a war, and that it will solve nothing in itself. There is still the problem of India's poverty and ignorance to be solved, and the struggle between the landlords, big business, and the labor movement to be fought out. And there is also the question of how, if at all, a backward agricultural country like India is to remain independent in a world of power politics. Brailsford gives a good account of the current political situation, in which he struggles very hard not to be engulfed by the prevailing left-wing orthodoxy. He writes judiciously about the tortuous character of Gandhi, comes nearer to being fair to Cripps than most English commentators have been—Cripps, indeed, has been the whipping-boy of the left, both British and Indian—and rightly emphasizes the importance of the Indian princes, who are often forgotten and who present a much more serious difficulty than the faked-up quarrel between Hindus and Moslems. At this moment India is such a painful subject that it is hardly possible to write a really good book about it. English books are either dishonest or irresponsible; American books are ignorant and self-righteous; Indian books are colored by spite and an inferiority complex. Well aware of the gaps in his knowledge and the injustices he is bound to commit, Brailsford has produced not only a transparently honest but —what is much rarer in this context—a good-tempered book. Nearly all books written about the British Empire in these days have the air of being written at somebody—either a Blimp, or a Communist, or an American, as the case may be. Brailsford is writing primarily for the ordinary British public, the people who before all others have the power and the duty to do something about India, and whose conscience it is first necessary to move. But it is a book that the American public might find useful too. Perhaps it is worth uttering the warning that—owing to war-time conditions—there are many misprints, and as some of them have crept into the statistics these are apt to be misleading.

GEORGE ORWELL

Ernie Pyle in Africa

HERE IS YOUR WAR. By Ernie Pyle. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

BRIDGE TO VICTORY: THE STORY OF THE RECONQUEST OF THE ALEUTIANS. By Howard Handleman. Random House. $2.

ERNIE PYLE, a small-town guy himself, has written about how a few hundred thousand other small-town guys fought the global war in the mountains and deserts of Tunisia, which reminded him quite a bit of the land around his place in Arizona. Ernie—it would seem pompous to call him Mr. Pyle—was perhaps the least natty and the most widely beloved newspaper correspondent in North Africa. Folks kept dropping in at his peregrinating tent to pass the time of day: two M. P.'s, for instance, who were young enough to be his sons and who didn't have much in common with him as far as he could see, were always coming in to chat. Ernie, in turn, was constantly dropping in on folks, too, because he liked folks. He got a great kick out of putting their names and addresses in the paper, because they loved it, and also because sometimes they helped him get his dispatches through censorship more quickly and with less emasculation. Mothers and sweethearts in America were always writing to Ernie asking him to say hello to their boys, which he did with pleasure.

Ernie is a small-town guy in the tradition of William Allen White and Will Rogers. He is shrewd, he invariably looks on the best side of things, and he makes jokes, funny ones, directed against himself, not against anyone else. Being around fifty and not too husky, he suffered in North Africa from climate and hardships. "The large and small diseases that infected the ragged carcass of this sad correspondent at all seasons and in all climes were known medically as Puny Pyle's Perpetual Pains." But let no one think that the small-town American, puny or not, was at a loss anywhere in the world. Two hundred miles deep in the Sahara Desert Ernie almost, but not quite, succeeded in conveying to an Arab boy by sign language that he shouldn't throw rocks at dogs.

Ernie used to be the editor of a Scripps-Howard paper. Eight years ago he persuaded the big boss to let him roam around the United States talking to folks and writing what he pleased. This worked out fine. His chatty articles were quietly relished in thousands of homes throughout the country. When war came, naturally he wanted to see what was going on overseas. He didn't bother about big headlines or grand strategy; he wrote the equivalent of letters home, telling the folks how their boys were getting along, what they were seeing, how they dolled up their tents, what it felt like to be in the middle of a battle, and so on. This book is an edited collection of his dispatches from North Africa.

He wrote in a flat, drowsy monotone, no more dramatic than a letter and just as irresistible. He didn't jazz anything up, nor did he get excited; this bothered him, because he thought he ought to. He wrote about what you would have seen yourself—provided, of course, you had Ernie's keen power of observation and his deep, sympathetic understanding of small-town guys. He did not go in for the spectacular, but he got around; and he got to more places than most correspondents because he wasn't chasing headlines.

Among other things, Ernie went sightseeing in a jeep to find out what a tank battle looked like. He got a little too close for comfort; he was in the middle of the humiliating but educational American defeat in central Tunisia. He was close enough to the shooting to be able to interpret shell-shock to those who have not suffered it. War has its own sounds, he says, which clothe themselves in unforgettable fierceness; and when you get away from the front the wind whistling around the eaves will remind you of a Stuka diving, and a shoe dropping in a hotel room above you will seem like the faint boom of a far-off big gun.

The one overwhelming desire of all American soldiers, Ernie found, was to get home. In the beginning, he thinks, they would have settled for a negotiated peace in order to get home. By now they have become less homesick, better adjusted to war life, coarser, rougher, and resigned to staying until the enemy is whipped. When it is over, they want things fixed so there won't be any more war. But somebody else will have to do the fixing; the men talk about sex, not about the Ball-Burton-Hatch-Hill resolution.

Perhaps it is part of the perverseness of this war that it has to be fought in the most ungodly climates. North Africa was bad enough, but the Aleutian Islands, as described in "Bridge to Victory," were far worse. Bare existence there was an achievement, without Japanese snipers. Among other hazards were frozen feet, for the army was not smart enough to equip the men with the right boots.

Mr. Handleman, a correspondent for International News Service, has given the first comprehensive picture of the Aleutian campaign—the conquest of Attu and Kiska. He has done an able job of reporting. Like Ernie Pyle, he was interested in what the men did before they were precipitated into war. Major Hartl, who commanded the troops that landed on the Holtz Bay side of Attu, was a schoolteacherish fellow who never swore—he had not been used to swearing in civilian life when he was chief accountant of the North Dakota State Public Utilities Commission. It seems rather miraculous that the former accountant turned out to be an excellent battle leader; and that men who used to coach high-school baseball in Mississippi or serve customers in a Hollywood drive-in restaurant could be metamorphosed into soldiers tough and courageous enough to wrest the Aleutians out of Japanese hands.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

Fiction in Review

DESPITE the destructive efforts of the critics—and even the Times Book Review allowed itself an unaccustomed field day of happy irony—Ilka Chase's "In Bed We Cry" (Doubleday, Doran, $2.50) is a novel inevitably slated for large sales. In the first place, it deals with a segment of contemporary life infinitely inviting to wishful thinking: its world is the world of the zebra stripes, bounded on the north by Cartier and on the south by Carnegie (Hattie, not Hall). In the second place, it talks about sex—oh, how it talks and talks!—in just the right voice to tickle the ears of people who would be horrified by out-and-out pornography. The gentility of its sexual accent is, in fact, one of the things that especially interest me about Miss Chase's upper-bracket Bohemia. Just as Devon Elliott, the dainty little tycooness of the cosmetic industry who is Miss Chase's heroine, can be blandly ruthless in her business dealings at no sacrifice of either manners or adorableness, she can move from bed to bed and still be a lady. The daughter of a college professor, Devon speaks French, knows a Picasso from a Chippendale breakfront, and even has friends in Washington. The upper-class libido, at its freest, is as well-anchored in literacy as it is cushioned by wealth.

I could wish that Miss Chase had been more specific than she is about the spending of Devon's millions. Vulgarly, I would have enjoyed seeing the actual cost-sheets instead of being left to wander wide-eyed through an untagged paradise of Madison Avenue decorating and English butlers, of champagne buckets and snacks at Voisin's. I could snare only two cold-cash items to pass on to my readers: on Beekman Place a plausible gift of roses costs $35; and at the Fifth Avenue salon of Devonshire House a good account is someone who spends ten thousand a year on her cosmetic upkeep. (Don't look now, darling, but isn't that a tumbril?)

The central problem of "In Bed We Cry" might be described as the conflict between sex and science—Devon's husband is tired of mixing beauty preparations and wants a laboratory of his own in which to experiment with a cure for burns—but the auxiliary problems the book confronts are rather more suggestive. For instance, did you know that in one important section of metropolitan society the big matrimonial hurdle is to find a man who doesn't drink? Another problem is that more and more men are finding it impossible to match the incomes of their wives; and Miss Chase says that after the war it will be even harder for women to balance their beds with their budgets. Political compatibility has also to be taken into account, what with the war and Roosevelt; Devon wonders about the political background of her refugee lover; she herself has strong feelings about the Nazis since they broke into her Paris salon and stole her secret formulas. Indeed, on the whole subject of refugeeism east of the Avenue Miss Chase is thought-provoking. "Not all refugee Europeans were automatically desirable," she explains. "Recent arrivals especially were so hell-bent on charming rich American women and trying to show up American men as poor lovers that their overzealousness made them ridiculous."

"In Bed We Cry" is a mine of such nuggets. But after all, that is reading it the wrong way; Miss Chase did not intend her novel as a social, even a revolutionary, document but as a purer form of entertainment.

"Hills of Home" (Houghton Mifflin, $2) is a first novel by Curtis Martin, a young naval officer now in the Pacific. But it is not a book about war; it is very much a book about peace, a strangely anonymous little volume which seems to me to have more merit than I have yet seen claimed for it and certainly more taste and decent humility than is characteristic of current fiction. Published as a novel, it is actually a collection of short stories connected by the fact that they all deal with the inhabitants of a single New Mexican town and that a certain John Fellows, standing for the author, appears in each of them.

I find Mr. Martin's stories touchingly successful in the composite picture they give of a small community. The ubiquity of John Fellows—he pops up at rather odd moments in every chapter—may be a literary fault, but it accurately indicates the range of Mr. Martin's interest in his fellow-townsmen: he draws his friends from every section of the town's life. His sympathy is simple, innate, and without a touch of self-consciousness or condescension; it not only illuminates the individuals he chooses for his little narratives but gives to the town itself the kind of poignant animateness which invests old houses and streets we have grown to love. If to be the kind of person he is is the first mark of literary talent, Mr. Martin is largely endowed.

Some of the chapters in "Hills of Home" are better than others—my favorites are September's Bridge and The Hills of November—but once the book gets under way, there is not a story without quality in the writing or without dramatic point. It is Mr. Martin's method to understate drama but, again, this is not self-conscious flamboyance in reverse; for instance, one does not have the impression that here is another author aping—and parodying—Hemingway, loading the most violent emotions into the fewest and sparsest words. On the other hand, despite Mr. Martin's naivete, he shows a sense of craft; I think it would be impossible, for example, to introduce the grandfather's visit into The Hills of November as Mr. Martin does, and compress it into such short space, without a knowledge that this is a very good literary way of doing things.

"Hills of Home" is not a book of great importance; it hasn't enough intellect for importance. Nor, indeed, does it profess to be any more than a first effort at writing fiction. Perhaps because I am so aware of the pitfalls it avoids, I praise it out of proportion to its actual accomplishments. But I have written so often of the self-indulgence of modern writing, its exhibitionism and its overwrought sensibility, that I am glad to err in compliment to restraint.

FILMS

"PRINCESS O'ROURKE," I had thought, might be treated like other social errors of its sort: an unobtrusive raising of the window, and the less said the better. But since it is being acclaimed, by everyone in sight so far as my eyes carry, as one of the best comedies of the year, I am forced to reconsider. Reconsidering, I accept it as a jaw-breaking rebuke to anyone, like myself, who likes to think that Hollywood underestimates its audience. This noisome show is about a Princess who, with the help of her jolly old chum President Roosevelt, married an American air pilot. The two basic lines of comedy are snobbery of the sorriest native kind: the common man's worship of the titled one, and the common man's even more abandoned, even less understandable adoration of himself. Along the inside of this vicious-cycle track, neck and neck, scamper the ideas that all titled European males are sterile and that all untitled works-in-progress from God's little acre are guaranteed capable of bringing on any number of sons just like them. This ugly rubbish is packaged in the kind of prime government-inspected whimsy which you might expect if the New Yorker's humorists were picking up egg money from Railway Age: Princess-meets-banana-split, and so on. There is also a grisly saucer of musical chop suey called Honorable Moon. Jack Carson I like and Jane Wyatt I am eager to forgive, in spite of everything; and I am vulnerable to Olivia de Havilland in every part of my being except the ulnar nerve. But if ever a standing indication were needed that as a people we do not deserve to mouth such words as "democracy," let alone "common sense" or "minimum human decency," this is it.

"The Iron Major" is a respectful, rather dull picture about the football coach Frank Cavanaugh. Such able, unintellectual, cagy teachers are very much work talking about, but all the talk here is in words of less than one syllable. All you get is Pat O'Brien's nicely controlled performance and a few pretty period-shots of Worcester, Mass.

"Deerslayer," on the other hand, can be recommended to anyone who would not feel that an eight-year-old boy who gallops up howling "Wah-wah, I'm an Indian" needs to consult a psychiatrist. I don't feel that most bad pictures are "bad enough to be funny"; they are just bad enough to be fascinating, not to say depressing as hell. But this defenseless and disarming show is the purest dumb delight I have seen in a long time.

MUSIC

AFTER Toscanini's second broadcast with the N. B. C. Symphony—superlative performance wasted on mediocre Russian music—which I listened to on Frequency Modulation, I tuned in on WQXR's FM broadcast of the first New Friends of Music concert. It had been scheduled to open with Beethoven's Quartet Opus 127 played by the Busch Quartet; and I caught the finale played with a surprising suavity of tone in place of the thin, scratchy, wooden sounds that I had expected to hear. The movement ended; and then came the announcement, "You have just heard Beethoven's Quartet Opus 127 played by the Busch Quartet on Victor records." Amazed, I switched the machine to WQXR's normal broadcast, and again heard the finale of Opus 127, this time with the thin, scratchy, wooden sounds of the living Busch Quartet of today. The great point of FM, its superiority over the normal broadcast, is its wider frequency-range, which produces greater fidelity to the living sound; but WQXR was broadcasting the living concert performance in the normal way, and on FM it was broadcasting a performance whose sound was reduced in range to the limitation—possibly 5,000 cycles—of European recording six or seven years ago! It was a little like the manufacturers' selling cheap radio sets equipped with FM tuners but with speakers incapable of transmitting the FM range.

Among Victor's October releases that have been late in reaching me is Milhaud's Suite Provençale played by the St. Louis Symphony under Golschmann (Set 951, $2.50). In this work some eighteenth-century folk-tunes of Milhaud's native Provence and some themes of the Provençal composer André Campra (1660-1744), which seem to have been quite engaging in their original forms, are made horrid by the harmonic treatment Milhaud subjects them to. Some of the orchestration is attractive; the performance is very good; and the sound is reproduced with the extraordinary beauty that Victor achieved also with the St. Louis performances of the Couperin-Milhaud "La Sultane" music and Sibelius's Seventh Symphony.

"Miss Markova's phenomenal balance," wrote Edwin Denby of Markova's Juliet, in the Herald Tribune, "her quickness in those movements of the body which are generally heaviest (movements of the thighs and hips) give her a lightness that is all her own." Strength and agility of thighs and hips, then, were what produced a Juliet who was "a creature of another sphere," as against Nora Kaye's Juliet, who did not convince one "of [her] innocence of heart or of her unique spirit." Strength and agility of thighs and hips were also, presumably, what produced the greater sharpness of Markova's movements in "Aleko," and in this way a gypsy with greater emotional intensity than Kaye's. And I suppose the same explanation accounts for other differences. Alicia Alonso in "Giselle" and the pas de deux of "Les Sylphides," Rosella Hightower in the "Bluebird" or "Nutcracker" pas de deux were technically brilliant, graceful, exquisite; but at each point one recalled a breath-taking pattern of silhouetted body moving or motionless in space, which was partly the particular configuration of Markova's body and partly a mere matter of strength and agility of thighs and hips.

One gets a sharper realization of the tremendous, straining, panting, sweating muscular effort which produces the appearance of cool grace, of a body whirling, soaring, floating in space with incorporeal quickness and lightness, creating breath-taking patterns as it moves or stops moving—the effort which produces the appearance of all this happening without any effort at all. And if one happens to pass the dancers on the street without recognizing them one gets a sharper realization of how largely their radiant, lovely, glamorous, impressive appearances on the stage are created by make-up, costume, lighting, and how completely the rich personalities and significances they communicate are created by whatever movements they are given to do by the choreographer.

"Lilac Garden" was excellently done. In "Les Sylphides" with Hightower and Alonso was Lucia Chase, who substituted for Markova in the Prelude with an inadequacy that was painful. In "Three Virgins and a Devil" John Kriza, trying to do more than Jerome Robbins had done as the Youth, ruined the part by doing too much; while Robbins, in the Lazovsky part of the Devil, tried to do things in ways of his own that made one long for Lazovsky; and in general these lesser male dancers who were given more to do this season flung themselves about excessively. This was part of the all-around let-down that showed itself further in the raggedness of the group movements in the second act of "Giselle." Michael Kidd, in the title role of "Billy the Kid," lacked technical security (in balance) and—perhaps for this reason—the dynamic force that Loring had; and if Loring cannot be had to dance in the ballet he should at least be brought in to restore what has been changed and forgotten in the movements of groups; but even in its present state of deterioration it is one of the outstanding things in the Ballet Theater repertory. And the same may be said of "Petrushka," where the principal roles were danced adequately by Massine, Chase, and Eglevsky, but the crowd scenes were the usual chaos, and the performance of the music was the usual massacre.

Letters to the Editors

Jim Crow Again

Dear Sirs: At this time when everyone's attention is focused on the world-wide battle fronts, we often forget the struggle to retain civil liberties taking place on the home front.

At the Federal Correctional Institution at Danbury, Connecticut, on August 11, 1943, nineteen of the conscientious objectors went on a work strike to end segregation of Negroes and whites in the dining-hall. At other times the men are allowed to mingle freely, but during meals they are kept in separate parts of the dining-room and not permitted to talk to each other.

The federal government, as personified by the President of the United States, has on a number of occasions reiterated its belief in the Four Freedoms and in the equality of all regardless of race or religion. Segregation is unjust under any circumstances, but for the federal government to permit Jim Crow in federal institutions that are supported by all sections of the population is to play into the hands of fascist reaction and to be paying only lip-service to the ideals of the Four Freedoms.

The prison authorities refuse to negotiate with the strikers. These men are anxious to end the strike and would do so readily if the prison authorities showed any indication of ending segregation some time in the future. It is ironic indeed that these young men, who are such unflinching believers in democracy, have been placed in solitary confinement for adhering to democratic ideals that many thousands of anti-fascists have died for in Hitler's concentration camps.

ALEXANDER M. MANN

Hollis, N. Y., November 3

A Socialist Explains

Dear Sirs: I should like to make a few belated comments on the article by Harold Laski in The Nation of September 18. Mr. Laski remarks that he has "no knowledge of the attitude of the various divisions of the American socialist movement in regard to the attempt to rediscover the terms on which the international working class might find unity." It is obvious from other sections of his article that the author is referring here to the kind of political as well as trade-union international unity which characterized the relations of the labor and socialist movements prior to the First World War.

While I cannot speak for the Social Democratic right wing of American socialism—of whose historical antagonism to the Soviet Union Mr. Laski is well aware—I should like to explain briefly to Mr. Laski and those who share his hopes the position of the more leftward division of American socialism, which, for all its tactical differences with communism, looked upon the Soviet Union as potentially "socialist" as late as 1937 and called for its "defense" by the international working class.

First let me say that American socialists, in particular those represented by the Socialist Party, see no reason, either in Realpolitik or ideology, for any lack of "unity" among the three great status quo powers—Britain, the United States, and Russia. We agree fully with those increasingly numerous and more far-sighted representatives of private enterprise—whose enthusiasm for the Soviet Union increases with every internal retreat from "communism," every victory of the Red Army—that Russia (that is, Stalin) today is in no sense a threat to the present order, that Stalin is not seeking to promote revolutions abroad, even though, in an effort to wring strategic concessions from his United Nations partners, he may hint at the dire consequences of non-cooperation or go fishing for palace revolutions among the potential Darlans and Badoglios of the German army. We would go even farther and add that Stalin will do everything in his power to prevent democratic—that is, non-Stalinist—social revolutions in Europe, success of which would unquestionably constitute a serious threat to the Russian dictatorship. Stalin's Russia is therefore the natural ally of some forces which seek to preserve the main outlines of the status quo, and the most potent anti-revolutionary force in the world today.

But the very factors which furnish a logical base for the cooperation and unity of Stalin's Russia and the governments of the capitalist democracies, as well as their liberal supporters, have destroyed any logical base—a common ideology and purpose—for unity between democratic revolutionary socialists and those Stalinist forces throughout the world whose sole purpose is the defense and support of the totalitarian state machine of Stalin. The politicians of right-wing Social Democracy—some of whom are mentioned by Mr. Laski—who have long since made their peace with liberal capitalism, may very well also make their peace with Stalinism, as did their Spanish representatives in the middle thirties. But there is no ground for unity today between the Socialist and libertarian left and the adherents and apologists of the Stalinist right, which has sought to exterminate them, physically as well as politically, within the past ten years.

The cleavage between these two tendencies of what was once the international social revolutionary movement does not rest, as Mr. Laski seems to think upon a "generation of internecine conflict" stemming from the "split" of 1919. It rests rather upon the experience of the past decade, the character of Soviet development, and our analysis of the nature of the Russian state. To Mr. Laski the Soviet Union represents a stage in the completion of the process of human emancipation which began with the French and American revolutions. We too believed that at one time. This was undoubtedly the potential of the Russian Revolution. Today, however, we believe that in structure and organization the Soviet Union has come to represent that totalitarian collectivism, that bureaucratic party-state, toward which both Germany and Italy, starting from wholly different ideological premises, have been heading. We know now that the mere nationalization of the productive processes, however complete, does not mean "socialism," any more than the alignment of the Red Army on the side of the democracies means that Russia is a "democracy."

If Mr. Laski and the liberals do not understand the real character of the cleavage between the democratic socialist and the Stalinist forces—putting it down to silly "tactical" differences and outworn rivalries—Stalin and his international cohorts understand it very well, and have acted accordingly. That is why they have extended the hand of friendship to every right-wing opportunist within the international movement and the dagger to the left. The execution of Alter and Ehrlich was not an isolated "crime," one of those inexplicable naughty deeds for which the liberals are forced to apologize. Alter and Ehrlich represented all that was best in the international socialist and labor movement—and incidentally still maintained a certain faith in Stalin's "socialist" integrity. It was precisely because of this, and because they refused to act as stooges for Stalin's designs in Poland, that they had to be destroyed. But before them other left-wing socialists and libertarians in Spain, in France, in Germany, and throughout the world were destroyed, even while they were giving their lives to the fight against fascism. Here in the United States the cohorts of Stalinism make a united front with capitalism's most disreputable elements, while they call for the suppression of the Socialist press, the imprisonment of Socialist leaders, and—lacking the power of execution—attempt to assassinate verbally every labor and radical leader with the integrity to oppose their designs.

Mr. Laski may say that regardless of our attitude toward Stalin and the Communists we have no quarrel with the heroic peoples of the Soviet Union. That is quite true. But unfortunately there can be no unity, on an organizational basis, with the peoples of a police state, over the heads of their rulers. If there were an independent, that is, a real labor movement in Russia, if there were opposition working-class parties, such unity would be possible. If, as Mr. Laski claims, the Soviet Union is "the central support upon which the future of the working class depends," then God help the working class!

The Shape of Things

IN THE QUARREL BETWEEN THE FRENCH Committee of Liberation and the government of Lebanon neither contestant emerges spotless, but both appear somewhat less tarnished than the British referee. Back in 1936 the government of Leon Blum promised Syria and Lebanon, both mandated to France by the League, that they would be granted independence in 1939. The outbreak of war in that year made fulfilment of the pledge impossible. With the fall of France, the Vichy regime revoked the pledge entirely, but when its forces were driven out of the two Near Eastern states by the British and Free French, General Catroux renewed the promise, adding that "their sovereign status will be guaranteed by a treaty in which our mutual relations will be defined." There is no reason whatever to doubt that the Fourth Republic will honor that promise. But the French Committee of Liberation is not the Fourth Republic. Having no sovereign status of its own, it is utterly unable to confer that boon upon the state of Lebanon. As a Committee spokesman points out, Lebanon is "in process" of attaining a new independent status linked to France by treaty. But Lebanese leaders, tired of the long wait and inflamed by Pan-Arab agitation, decided that the time was ripe to take advantage of the scarcely hidden hostility between their French political guardians and their British military protectors. Without benefit of discussion they declared themselves sovereign and independent. Whereupon the French Delegate-General, Jean Helleu, cracked down with all the harshness of imperial usage. Violence followed, and the Arab world flared up in protest.

DESPITE THE UNREASONABLE IMPATIENCE of the Lebanese and the indefensibly drastic reaction of the French, the situation is not hopeless provided the British act in good faith. It is hard to believe that they have done so in Lebanon up to now. They have worked at cross purposes with the Free French from the start of the Syrian-Lebanese occupation and have made no secret of their long-standing antagonism toward French influence in this part of the world. Now that the French find themselves in difficulties, the British appear to be doing everything possible to lower the prestige of their ally. In shocked tones they condemn the arrest of Lebanese leaders, as though the world had never heard of the imprisonment of Gandhi and Nehru, and in a blend of hypocrisy and intimidation they warn over the B. B. C. of "measures which it [the British government] might see itself forced to take to keep the pledges of Britain toward the Lebanese [and] to maintain British honor throughout the Arab world." Is this one more incident in the long campaign to discredit General de Gaulle? More important, is it part of a larger design to keep France in a subordinate role after the war? M. Helleu was in effect repudiated at Algiers when General Catroux was dispatched to Beirut, and a settlement now should not be impossible. The British can make a genuine contribution not by threats of force and demagogic appeals to Arab nationalism, but by recognizing Catroux's proven integrity and by extending to both sides their good offices. The Lebanese may be satisfied that the colonial problem cannot be solved by the individual action of small states in the midst of a world war if they are convinced that it will be solved by a coherent policy worked out at the peace table.

THE IMMENSE TASK OF POST-WAR RELIEF confronting the newly formed United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration may be seen by comparing the estimates of need submitted at Atlantic City with the shipments of the American Relief Administration after the last war. Europe's total relief requirements during the first six months after the war are estimated at 45,855,000 metric tons, of which 9,500,000 tons will have to be shipped from the United States and the rest of North America. Russia's needs, known to be enormous, were not included in the estimate, while China has indicated that it will need 3,200,000 tons during the same period. Shipments by the A. R. A. in the first eight months after the close of World War I—hitherto regarded as a herculean achievement—fell short of 5,000,000 tons. Offsetting to some degree the increase in the volume of goods required is the fact that the organization of the relief effort is far advanced over that existing some months after the end of World War I. Although differences in viewpoint among the various nations were in evidence at Atlantic City, more real cooperation exists among the United Nations today than was ever present among the Allies in 1918-19. This development augurs well for the peace, provided the larger issues are approached in the same spirit.

AS ITS FIRST PROJECT UNRRA MIGHT WELL undertake to assist in the relief of the Indian famine. The agreement setting up the organization includes among its objectives "the relief of victims of war in any area under the control of the United Nations," and the plight of the starving people of India is certainly in part due to the war. For not only has the Japanese invasion of Burma cut off imports which normally play an important marginal role in India's precarious balance of nutrition, but the transformation of India into a major war base has overtaxed its transport system and multiplied the problem of distributing supplies which exist in the country. In meeting these problems India needs technical rather than financial help. It has money to buy food from abroad to the extent that shipping is available. But to a large extent the shortages could be met if a way could be devised to end hoarding within the country. This is not so much a matter of coercing a few big speculators as of persuading millions of peasants to part with their scanty surpluses. Most of them raise barely more than enough for their families to subsist upon but usually they market small quantities of grain in order to buy cloth and a few other necessities. When such goods are not available, as at present, they have no inducement to sell. That is why a shipload of cotton goods might go farther in relieving Indian hunger than several shiploads of wheat. A somewhat similar though less desperate problem has already been tackled by Allied relief organizations in North Africa and it is possible that the experience gained there could be turned to account in India, if the British authorities are not too proud to accept help. The new Viceroy, Lord Wavell, has shown more appreciation of the situation and more energy than his predecessor and it is claimed that the famine is under control. But the scope for international aid remains great.

"OLD NOTRE DAME STILL REIGNS OVER ALL." So says the Associated Press. And well it might, for in four successive weeks Old Notre Dame has triumphed over Navy, Army, Northwestern, and Dr. Francis E. McMahon. The last of these victories has been protested, however, and in the end may prove to be of the Pyrrhic variety. Dr. McMahon, a teacher of philosophy at Notre Dame, has been ousted for making public pronouncements on matters not strictly philosophical. A vocal opponent of isolation even before we got into the war, Dr. McMahon has been speaking out in favor of international collaboration. He asks for friendly relations after the war with all our allies, and he includes the Soviet Union. He is known to consider communism far less a menace than the cult of the Nazis. Abhorring anti-Semitism, he has in his zeal seen fit to condemn Father Coughlin. And above all he has persisted in calling General Franco a fascist, an idea which he may uncritically have picked up from the General himself. As Dr. McMahon has discovered, the Notre Dame authorities "do not want the name of the university associated with the promulgation of these views." As views they do not seem to us un-Catholic. But who are we to judge? Dr. McMahon suggests that "powerful pressure has been exerted on the university authorities to muzzle" him. And who, we are led to wonder, is in a position to bring such pressure on the country's most renowned Catholic university, a proud institution which this season has yet to meet its match on the football field?

AS WE GO TO PRESS FORMER KING CAROL of Rumania is scheduled to address the people of the United States by radio. That is five minutes too long, but we trust the American people enough to assume that they will be able to listen to a king without harm. Carol's radio appearance is no doubt part of his new plan to sell himself to the public—as a democrat—with the expert help of a high-powered public relations firm, Russell Birdwell and Associates, which he has retained at a reported fee of $35,000 a year. Carol's objectives are crystal clear. He would like to drop the "former" which now precedes his name. He would also like to obtain the right to control some $80,000,000 of Rumanian funds now frozen in this country. That would certainly be worth a measly $35,000. We look with skepticism, both political and commercial, on the prospects of King Carol. Meanwhile we think our readers might be amused to know that the familiar term applied by a public relations man to his client is "bum."

The Showdown on Prices

WITHIN a comparatively few days final decisions will have to be reached on three controversies, decisions that will go far to determine our success or failure in checking inflation in World War II. The first of these decisions must be made within the Administration; the other two by Congress. For some time now Mr. Ickes and the OPA have been at odds over the extent to which the price of coal should be increased to compensate the owners for the higher wages provided in the new agreement negotiated with John L. Lewis. Mr. Ickes insists that a substantial price increase is necessary in order to assure greater coal production. But the OPA has strongly opposed the principle of linking price increases to wage agreements, pointing out that the net effect of such an arrangement is to divert labor's support from the stabilization program by enlisting specific groups of workers in the drive for specific price boosts. Should such a practice become general, all possibility of holding the line on prices and wages would quickly disappear, and a disastrous process of inflation would swiftly develop.

An equally serious threat to the stabilization program is contained in the bill now before Congress to grant the 1,100,000 members of the non-operating railway workers' unions an 8-cents-an-hour wage increase against the recommendation of the Director of Economic Stabilization, Fred M. Vinson. As Mr. Vinson pointed out in his letter to a subcommittee of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, passage of the bill would mean the breaking of the "Little Steel" formula by Congress itself, thus making it impossible for the Administration to hold to the formula in dealing with the demands of other labor groups. Such action could not fail to be fatal, since the C. I. O. and the U. M. W. have already come out for scrapping the formula, and Lewis's union is now directing its fire against the War Labor Board itself.

Efforts to hold the line on the wage front must be considered in relation to the struggle now under way in Congress over the use of subsidies to bring the cost of living down to the level at which wages have been stabilized. The prospects of a complete Administration victory in that struggle are not bright as we go to press. Nevertheless, there is still a possibility that the sequence of events of last spring will be repeated, and that the President, by vetoing the bill for extending the Commodity Credit Corporation with its rider prohibiting food subsidies, may force Congress to provide some funds for a continuation of subsidies. Failure to obtain these funds would not only mean a collapse of the roll-back program but would result in an immediate advance of 3 per cent in living costs and a 7 per cent increase in food prices. Already many of the items in the average housewife's market basket are held at a low price by subsidies. Elimination of these subsidies would induce one of the sharpest price rises in the country's history and would almost certainly provoke an overwhelming demand for wage increases by both organized and unorganized workers.

In resisting this powerful three-front attack on the stabilization program, Mr. Vinson and the OPA are unquestionably holding the fort for the American people as a whole. But it is a fight in which they have received little active support against a politically powerful opposition. It is obvious from a reading of most newspapers that a vigorous and presumably well-financed campaign is under way to discredit and destroy the OPA and the entire stabilization program. This campaign is not being pushed by those who have suffered most from the war. The millions of white-collar workers, small business men, substandard workers, soldiers' wives, and others who have made the greatest sacrifice are precisely those who have most to lose by a further inflation. The elements that are seeking to break down the defenses against inflation—the large farmers, the food industry, the coal operators, railway employees, and a few other highly organized labor groups—are on the other hand, among those that have gained most, relatively speaking, as a result of the war. It is an uneven struggle, but there is still a fighting chance of holding the line if some of the millions of people whose future is in peril make their voices heard in Washington.

Unfinished Business

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

IT IS natural that the first enthusiastic welcome of the Moscow agreement should have been followed by a barrage of questions and the open expression of doubts. For Moscow was only a beginning. It brought together the three greatest Allied powers—with China drawn in on the question of post-war security—and established machinery for continued consultation and planning. It resulted in a few definite political proposals. But it left much unfinished business and it posed more problems than it solved.

These gaps now tend to loom larger than the solid underpinnings of unity. Ten Catholic bishops, speaking for the Catholic hierarchy in the United States, issued a statement which approved the Moscow declarations as a "step in the right direction" but emphasized the fear "that compromises on the ideals of the Atlantic Charter are in prospect." This obviously referred to the careful omission in the Moscow agreement of any reference to boundaries, including those of Poland, whose future has always been an intimate concern of the Church. European national groups, especially the Allied groups represented by governments-in-exile, are profoundly disturbed by the creation of a European Advisory Council with no continental representatives. France in particular has announced that it will not accept as binding decisions of a council on which it is not represented.

Neither the report made by Mr. Eden to the House of Commons nor Mr. Hull's unprecedented speech before the joint meeting of the Congress nor Marshal Stalin's speech on the twenty-sixth anniversary of the October revolution did much to dispel these worries. All three leaders, necessarily, emphasized the areas of agreement and the increase of confidence established at Moscow. All three ignored, with good reason, the specific complaints of interested groups. Nor did Mr. Hull, in two press conferences devoted to the conference, clear up any major ambiguities. Questioned sharply by newspaper men only a day or two after the appearance of the Catholic bishops' statement, Mr. Hull insisted that the principles of the Atlantic Charter would not in any circumstances be compromised, and pointed to the formula agreed upon for Italy as a model for other "liberated areas." Put under pressure to apply this specifically to the controversial issue of Poland and Finland and the Baltic states, Mr. Hull said that boundary disputes would have to be cleared up after the war and that an exact definition of all liberated areas was not possible at this stage.

The only revealing hints as to the future of Russia's neighbors have come from Russian leaders themselves. Stalin's reference to the Karelo-Finnish Republic and the Lithuanian, Latvian, and Esthonian Republics was obviously a sign—if any new sign were needed—that these areas would be permanently absorbed into the Soviet Union. And the statement by Constantine Oumansky, Russian Ambassador to Mexico, that "we shall have to retrieve 280 miles . . . to reach our frontier with Poland" was a clear announcement that Russia has no intention of relinquishing Eastern Poland.

In the matter of the European Commission, both Mr. Eden and Mr. Hull insisted upon the strictly advisory function of this body, for obvious reasons. They know that any final decisions taken by a commission from which the European nations are excluded could only create resentment and bitter resistance. Even though its functions are limited, the very fact that it represents the three big powers inevitably arouses the fear that Europe is to be divided up and its political problems solved in the interests of this small and overpowering military coalition. In spite of this, it is hard to see how the European commission could have been otherwise constituted. Obviously not all the Allied nations could have been included. And even if some system of selection or rotation had been devised, it is clear as crystal that no genuine expression of European interests is at present possible. A few governments-in-exile, like those of Czechoslovakia and Norway and the French Committee, could doubtless speak accurately in the name of their people. Others, like those of Greece and Poland and Yugoslavia, certainly could not. The present set-up is probably the best we can hope for in the present state of the war and of European political developments; the suspicions that cluster around the commission can be lessened only if it goes out of its way to invite the participation, on specific questions, of the smaller nations.

The problem of boundaries is also insoluble now, although its most controversial aspects are doubtless already solved. In some form or other the Baltic states will be a part of Russia, and so will Eastern Poland and Bessarabia and a slice of Finland. But just where the boundary lines will run, or just what degree of autonomy will be permitted, is unlikely to be decided until the general outlines of the peace take shape. Russia may well make concessions in return for solid assurances of security by its chief allies, but the concessions will not restore to Poland the land it wrenched from Russia—with Allied help—after the last war, or induce the Soviet Government to relinquish its own provisions for security. In spite of Mr. Hull's rather floundering attempt to reassure the Catholic bishops, these are the hard and obvious facts of the case.

Other important pieces of unfinished business, such as the future structure of Germany and the problem of regional federation, must also wait upon events. They could not have been settled in Moscow. The important thing is to have machinery at hand through which to take up each problem as it becomes ripe for solution. This, at least, Moscow provided.

The Enemy's Full Strength

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, November 17

I HAVE obtained a copy of a "Report on the Strength of the Axis" sent to all members of Congress last week and to a select list of leading industrialists. The report is by Major General George V. Strong, Assistant Chief of Staff and Chief of Military Intelligence. I had some difficulty in learning from the War Department whether or not the report was to be passed on to the public. "It's a touchy subject," one War Department employee said cryptically, and wanted to know where I had obtained it. On learning that I already had a copy, a responsible public-relations officer finally assured me that I was free to quote from it or condense it for publication. I propose to do so in this letter. For if the figures and analyses presented by General Strong are in any large measure correct, we still have a large war ahead of us, and the current wave of optimism which conditions most of our present political struggles is without foundation.

This optimism is in part the result of German propaganda and Soviet victories. But the dominant policy at the War and Navy departments—a belief that the best way to run the war is with plenty of ballyhoo, exaggerating victories and minimizing losses—must also be held responsible. An additional factor is our national temperament, which leads us to promote a war as we would a real-estate boom. The inflation of hopes may be as disastrous in the one case as in the other.

Of course, both War and Navy have their pessimists, and sometimes the same official will be optimistic one day, pessimistic the next. The effect is hardly clarifying. Here are a few salient points of this year's prophetic curve. On January 2 Admiral William F. Halsey, commander of the South Pacific fleet, predicted "complete absolute defeat for the Axis" in 1943. In July Vice-Admiral Frederick J. Horne, vice-chief of naval operations, told a Congressional committee that the war would last "at least until 1949." By October 27, however, Admiral Chester W. Nimitz, commander of the Pacific fleet, was sure that we would "win the war long before the gloomy prediction of 1949."

The War Department likewise seems unable to make up its mind. On October 18 General Henry H. Arnold, commander of the Army Air Forces, held a most optimistic press conference. Allied bombings, he said, were sapping Germany's strength, forcing it to strip Italy of planes and leave "relatively few in Russia"; Germany had lost 10,000 planes in the Mediterranean area and had only 500 available when Italy was invaded. As for the Japanese, they "seem to have their fifth or sixth team in action in the Pacific." But the day after General Arnold's conference a quite different picture was presented at a private meeting of Congressmen addressed by Secretary Stimson, General Marshall, and General Strong. According to General Strong, the Luftwaffe, despite heavy losses, is larger now than it was in 1939.

We owe our knowledge of these private talks to a House "freshman," George E. Outland, a progressive Democrat from California. Outland told me he was so struck by Strong's statement that he asked permission to use some of its facts and figures in a Washington column he writes for the papers in his district. General Strong replied by sending a two-page summary of his private address, which Representative Outland released to the press on November 12. A few days later the War Department sent all members of Congress the full Strong report "with relatively minor deletions for military security."

Two key statements in the Strong report may help us to understand the military realities which made themselves felt at the Moscow conference. "Our optimism for the future," General Strong says, "is based almost entirely on the ability of our Russian allies to keep nearly three-quarters of the German army occupied in the east, and on the ability of American and British aviators to keep up their tremendous raids on Germany's European Fortress." At another point the head of our military intelligence notes, "If all the resources of the United Nations were pooled we would have a definite advantage over Germany in the European theater. However, were it not for the enormous sacrifices of our Russian ally, who is paying a heavy price for her magnificent victories, the odds would be roughly four or five to one against us."

After declaring that we have all been deceived by "highly optimistic publicity regarding relatively minor victories," the General gives a hard-boiled view of the power still at the disposal of our enemies. As against the twenty divisions lost at Stalingrad and the eight lost in North Africa, the Reich this year has raised more than sixty new divisions, each with six hundred machine-guns and three hundred heavier weapons. "That gives you an idea," General Strong says, "of how much German war industry is producing in spite of our aerial offensive." Their weapons include new models of tanks and guns "in some cases equal to and in some cases better than anything which the Allied armies have to place against them." One of these is a new rocket gun, weighing less than 1,800 pounds but with fire power equal to six heavy field howitzers weighing nine tons apiece.

Behind this war-production record is a steady increase in man-power. Strong reports that in June, 1939, there were 23,000,000 persons employed in the Reich's essential war industries. Today there are 35,000,000, including an estimated 7,000,000 foreign civilian workers and prisoners of war. Germany's full potential can only be grasped if one considers that it controls a population of 325,000,000, all "contributing at least in some measure to the German war effort." Its position in materials is good. It controls 42,000,000 tons in steel capacity today whereas it had but 25,000,000 tons in 1938. In 1942 its coal production was 186,000,000 tons, and "Axis Europe as a whole produced almost double that amount." Germany is nearly self-sufficient in rubber, thanks to synthetic production, and although there is a shortage of certain types of oil and lubricants, it "has sufficient high-octane gasoline for its air forces." Despite rumors to the contrary, "there is much evidence that the German railroad and transportation network is functioning efficiently and adequately."

Germany's food position, according to General Strong, is better than it was in the last war. The present diet of both the worker in heavy industry and the soldier "is higher in caloric content than it was at the outbreak of the war in 1939." Meat and fat rations, though down, are larger than they were in 1918. "The bread, flour, and cereal rations in 1918," Strong reports, "were less than forty ounces, compared with eighty-two ounces at present. This is a decrease of only two ounces since 1939. The cultivated acreage is only slightly below the pre-war level, and this year's harvest will surpass any crop output since the war started, comparing favorably with the pre-war average." Whatever the conditions in occupied Europe, the Reich itself is far from starving.

The Luftwaffe has become the weakest point of the German forces, "but even this weakness should not be overemphasized." Until July 1 of this year German plane production "more than made up" for losses in combat. During the first six months of this year production was up 25 per cent, and the Germans were building a surplus. Since July losses have exceeded production, "but unless this high attrition rate is maintained, their losses will be quickly recuperated. . . . To prevent that recuperation we must keep up a steady flow of replacements, both of planes and crews, to meet our losses. A slowdown in production or training would be fatal."

General Strong admits that his sketch of German economy "has not taken into consideration the cumulative material and psychological effect of Allied air attacks." He says the bombing of the Ruhr, Hamburg, and Berlin has done "heavy damage." He estimates a 30 per cent decline of production in the Ruhr during May and June—"equivalent to a loss of about 3 per cent of total German output for those months." But the dispersion and decentralization of German industry has made it necessary to extend Allied raids "in order to affect the economic potential to a critical degree."

"We, rather than the Germans," the General says, "have become the victims of our own propaganda about Nazi weakness." He warns that if we fool ourselves and relax too soon we may find ourselves back on the defensive, "our men again fighting gallant but hopeless rearguard actions, outnumbered both as to men and as to guns." These words contrast grimly with the headlines.

The fight against Japan, according to General Strong, has only begun. The Solomons are an outpost of the new Japanese empire, more than 3,000 miles from its heart. There "in fourteen months of bloody jungle warfare American troops have pushed less than two hundred miles north, under the cover of bombers with fighter protection." Strong thinks Japan is in a powerful defensive position. "Japan's geographical isolation is such," he asserts, "that her strong fleet could most advantageously hold the strategical defense but at the same time assume the tactical offensive. So long as the sea routes to the Asiatic mainland are open to Japan, it will be extremely difficult for any nation or combination of nations to defeat the Japanese army in Japan, eastern Siberia, or northern China."

Guarding these sea routes is a fleet which "still dominates the Western Pacific from Kamchatka to the Marshall Islands," despite the fact that it has been weakened "in some important respects by losses in the Southwest Pacific, at Midway, and elsewhere." A chain of airdromes from Japan to Singapore in the west and the Solomons in the east makes it possible "to concentrate air power at any given point in the Southwest Pacific without delay." Interior supply lines give the Japanese a great advantage, and Japan itself "is further guarded from our attack through our lack of access to China."

Man-power is "one of Japan's strongest points in the present war," according to Strong. In Japan itself the number of workers in war industry has risen from 3,000,000 to 9,000,000 since the war began, and there is an ample reservoir of men for military service. There are 2,000,000 men of military age not yet called to the colors; 1,500,000 more between the ages of seventeen and twenty not yet subject to the draft. "If Japan were hard pressed, which she unfortunately is not at present," General Strong reports, "she could probably raise and equip an additional twenty divisions within the next two years. With the inclusion of the more than sixty divisions she now has, this would be a number of combat divisions approaching the planned strength in divisions for the American army, not only for the Asiatic but for the European theater as well."

Japan's industry, unlike Germany's, is not within our bombing range. Despite severe losses in aircraft since Pearl Harbor, Strong says it is estimated that Japan has 500 more first-line planes than it had then. In addition, the Japanese "are producing newer and better types of aircraft which are faster, better armed, and apparently more maneuverable than those used at the outbreak of war." Pilot training is keeping pace with production. And while the Japanese soldier has less imagination and initiative than our own troops, "his courage and aggressiveness are beyond question."

There seems little possibility of starving Japan out. Strong estimates that it has enough manganese, tungsten, molybdenum, vanadium, mercury, tin, chrome, and rubber on hand for two or three years, enough high-octane gas for nearly three, and about a year and a half's supply of lubricating oils. Shipping is a weak point, with losses exceeding construction by 60 per cent, "but as Japan is driven progressively into the inner sphere of her defenses, her shipping lanes will become shorter and less vulnerable to Allied action."

There is enough rice for the Japanese—a stockpile of 20 to 25 per cent of normal needs set aside for a bad year. The supply of soy beans and potatoes is adequate, of fish ample: "Do not fool yourselves that the Japanese will be beaten easily if the Germans drop out of the war."

"Our main advantage in the great struggle we face," General Strong says in a concluding appeal, "is our ability to produce weapons. If through unwillingness to face the facts we give up this advantage, if through over-optimism we slow down production and relax our efforts, we may find that our opportunity for victory has escaped us permanently. To insure the accomplishment of our war mission—the decisive defeat of Germany and Japan—we must have not only the whole-hearted, unselfish, single-minded effort of every man, woman, and child in this country, but also the full utilization of every bit of productive power, inventive genius, and executive ability that we possess."

I wish General Strong's sober accounting and solemn warning could be broadcast to every part of our country instead of being confined as it has been to Congressmen and industrialists. The prevailing mood is that Germany is as good as beaten, the defeat of Japan a sideshow that need not interfere with the resumption of business as usual. The Strong report, if given wide publicity, would help dispel these most dangerous illusions.

The Axis: Cornered, Not Licked

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

[This article, written before its author had had any opportunity to see General Strong's report, might appear to discount Mr. Stone's warning against over-optimism. But there is no real contradiction, for, as Mr. Mitchell would be the first to agree, his estimate of the situation would be invalidated by failure on the part of the United Nations not only to maintain but to tighten their grip on the still powerful Axis.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

THE true meaning of the German reverses in the Ukraine has not been appreciated by all observers. The German generals could quite reasonably have expected to stop their retreat at the Dnieper. Their armies had not been greatly reduced by the summer's retreat, they had shortened their communications, and they had reached prepared positions of their own choosing. Moreover, the Red Army, operating at the end of lengthened and hastily prepared supply lines, was certain not to be at its best. That under conditions in every way favorable to the defender the Soviet armies were able to strike at once in such power as to break through stubbornly held defenses and threaten with destruction as many as forty Nazi divisions is the highest testimony to Russian military prowess. The achievement has left many members of the American General Staff literally open-mouthed.

Because for foreign observers the Russian front is still the unknown war, many pertinent questions must remain unanswered. We do not yet know all of the factors which contributed to Soviet victory. German numerical inferiority and shortage of reserves are certain to have played a large part; Nazi communiqués complain repeatedly of the "overwhelming" numbers of the foe. Allied bombings have also inflicted cumulative damage on German power. And the enormous qualitative improvement in the Red Army should not be overlooked. Not only in size but man for man and unit for unit it is now more than a match for the German. We do not know the full extent of German and Russian casualties, but the circumstances of the past year indicate that those of Germany have been the greater.

It is certain that the Russians have not yet struck their heaviest blows. Fresh armies numbering 2,000,000 men are reported to be in training for the winter campaign, and it is doubtful whether Hitler, unless he chooses to strip the west entirely, has anything with which to match them. One may assume that the Russians are now repairing railroad lines, moving up supply bases, and otherwise easing their logistics problem. Hitler, having scraped the bottom of his man-power barrel, faces final assaults by fresh armies in both east and west without the necessary reserves.

Some British observers have pointed out that so many German divisions may be cut up by the defeats in the Ukraine that the war will end before spring. However, the desperation of the Nazi political chiefs, the skill with which the earlier retreats have been conducted, and the long distance still remaining between the Red Army and Germany proper make it probable that resistance will continue. Nor can any breakdown of morale be counted on to bring collapse. It is one thing for the individual German to be convinced the war is lost; it is quite another for him to be willing to face certain death in order to bring about an end to hostilities.

It is in the light of rapidly approaching German defeat that the Moscow conference must be viewed. Possibly the most vital single result of the conference was the satisfaction of Russian demands for an invasion of Western Europe. While it is hardly likely that we shall fulfil our earlier promise of a second front in 1943, Anglo-American invasion plans were evidently concrete and formidable enough to meet Stalin's wishes.

Another effect has been the subordination of the Italian front to demands in other fields. The Allies have not played all their cards in this theater of operations. Their invading armies are smaller than the German armies in Italy—though not inferior to the forces directly opposing Clark and Montgomery—and their new bases in Sardinia and Corsica flanking western Italy, like the superior sea and air forces at their disposal, have not found full employment. Progress up the peninsula has proceeded at a snail's pace, with the Germans refusing to commit their reserves in northern Italy until they learn where their foes are likely to make new moves. The slowness of this campaign and the failure to make new landings have been criticized. However, except as a base for air attack, Italy is of but moderate value to the Allies, and their strategy can be justly condemned only if it develops that the forces withheld from the Italian push are not to be better employed elsewhere.

Of far greater importance as a preparation for invasion is the Anglo-American bombing offensive, and despite bad weather and heavier losses it is certain to be intensified. Use of the Italian bases brings more targets within range and hence greater results. The American share of the offensive recently became one-third as compared to one-fifth six months ago. German industry has been well dispersed, with its plants camouflaged and placed in unlikely locations, and therefore raids do not always obtain the results expected. Nevertheless, the attrition of air bombing is probably nearly equal to that which would accompany the opening of a new major front on land. Only two answers, retort in kind and increased defenses, are possible. Germany no longer has the force for a really effective attack on England, but being unable to get at the United States, it has in desperation resumed nuisance raids on London. The second answer is no more adequate, for Allied planes are now turning to the elimination of German aircraft factories, and fighter output has been cut sharply.

While the European theater is the crucial one, recent developments in the Pacific are hardly to be classed as secondary. After two years of waiting and numerous false alarms, an amphibious offensive of genuine importance is under way. In the quality of its leadership and in its employment of combined land, sea, and air forces the campaign in the Southwest Pacific will probably be studied as a classic in years to come. As in the case of any move conducted far from home bases, time and careful preparation were required for the present attack. In fact, its beginnings date back to the final victory on Guadalcanal and MacArthur's move into New Guinea. The tactics employed by MacArthur, compelled to fight against superior numbers with almost no reserves to replace losses, should alone insure him a place among our greatest generals. By the use of superior air power each Japanese base—Milne Bay, Buna, Gona, Salamaua, Lae, and Finschhafen—was first isolated and then conquered by American and Australian troops.

The key to attack of this type is found in command of the air. Though the Japanese could at any step try to reinforce their garrisons and make a showdown fight, American command of the air made any such attempt excessively costly and liable to failure. Our "perfect" victories in the Battle of the Solomons and the Battle of the Bismarck Sea blocked the two most extensive efforts to save shore positions by risking large forces. At every step the Japanese have been forced to choose between abandoning a base or employing large forces to retain it under conditions making success unlikely.

In addition to his truly brilliant air and land tactics MacArthur is to be credited with camouflage of his main objective. Up to the middle of October most of the Allied moves seemed to be directed toward taking the rest of the enemy bases on the north coast of New Guinea. Madang and Wewak were repeatedly pounded from the air. Then, with the Japanese off guard, every available plane was thrown into a very effective saturation attack on Rabaul. Caught completely off balance, the enemy sought to get in reinforcements from Truk and the Indies. But new attacks gave little time for recovery, and ships and planes sent to Rabaul were destroyed in large numbers. Meanwhile, taking advantage of Rabaul's weakened state, and disregarding enemy air bases which had become inoperative, Halsey's men advanced up the Solomons ladder to Mono, Stirling, Choiseul, and Bougainville. A Japanese attempt to interfere with the landing at Empress Augusta Bay found the navy thoroughly ready, and in a night battle between equal forces the Japanese were defeated.

The recent fighting has uncovered our greatest single advantage over the Japanese, qualitative superiority. Our planes have chalked up almost unbelievably one-sided victories against the enemy's. They have destroyed warships by the dozen, though our own warships have revealed no such frailty against Japanese planes. Except at Savo Island we have won our naval battles, and the enemy's fixed habit of repeating his tactics has played into our hands. There has been no evidence of lowered Japanese morale or will to fight but plenty that a widening gulf exists as regards technical efficiency.

The present offensive is merely a preliminary step in the Pacific war, made possible by our growing naval and air strength. It probably aims far beyond Rabaul and will seek to gain island positions flanking enemy communications to the south. Many and long are the steps ahead. But the present attack is the greatest that Japan has so far faced. At last reconquest has begun.

Diary of the Future

BY VERNON BARTLETT

IV. British Political Tensions

[This is the fourth instalment of "a cautionary tale . . . a rash attempt to write history before it has happened," by a distinguished British journalist and member of Parliament. The previous instalment, which appeared on November 13, took the author to Allied-occupied Berlin five weeks after Germany's collapse. The next will describe the opening of the Peace Conference in Washington.]

AUGUST 12. Flew down to Munich for the day to see John Wheeler-Bennett, who is doing a job there for one of the more mysterious of the inter-Allied commissions. He was encouraging about the growth of the separatist movement in Bavaria, Baden, and Württemberg. There was a similar movement after the last war, and it was developing well until M. Dard, French Minister in Munich, heard of it and began to subsidize it, or try to do so—the men I knew in it at the time would never have taken money from a Frenchman. Once it was thus made suspect, no patriotic German would have anything to do with it. And yet, had the three southern states broken away from Prussia, you would have had two great German-language powers with roughly equal-sized populations—a northern and mainly Protestant one, controlled by Prussia, and a southern and mainly Catholic one, controlled by Austria.

John tells me the Bavarian forests and mountains are still so crowded with bandits that the roads through them are very unsafe even by day. Some of these men are soldiers who refuse to accept the surrender and shoot our fellows whenever they have a chance. Some are Nazis, Black Shirts and Brown Shirts, who are too frightened of the vengeance of their compatriots to venture back to their homes. Some are ordinary civilians whose homes have been destroyed. Bands of these men occasionally come up against bands of Czechs or Austrians or Yugoslavs or Greeks who were among Hitler's slave laborers and who are tramping back to their native lands. On some such occasions pitched battles take place, and there are very few survivors. One or two quite prominent Nazi leaders are in the mountains, and hold up the traffic as though they were robber barons.

Am writing this in an army plane on the way back to England. Another passenger is a very pleasant brigadier, name unknown. He produced the obvious, but startling, argument that it is much more important to see that the International Police, whatever form it takes, is strong than that Germany is weak. In other words, we failed last time not because we didn't disarm Germany thoroughly enough but because we didn't introduce collective armaments to check aggression and each went our own way.

August 14. Back from Berlin in time to attend an angry debate on demobilization. Every M. P. is getting scores of letters from men urging that, in their special case, demobilization should be speeded up. The Prime Minister, quite rightly, insisted he could make no further concessions, since we still had to defeat Japan and still did not know how large a force we should have to maintain for international police work. I managed to intervene to push forward the claim that this police force should consist almost entirely of highly mobile air-borne divisions, and that there need not be many of them. But the old enemies of the League of Nations are already active against the idea of even a small force.

The real struggle behind the demobilization campaign is, of course, the struggle for or against social security. Several Labor back-benchers pointed out that after the last war men were given a twelve months' out-of-work policy on demobilization, plus an advance of pay, a civilian suit, and twenty-eight days' leave. But that didn't prevent the most terrible chaos during demobilization and such unemployment after the short post-war boom that men were reduced to selling matches. Had the government accepted the Beveridge Report without delay or hesitation, men still kept in the forces would at least have the consolation of knowing that they could hardly be reduced to the match-selling status.

People who understand about party politics are convinced we are in for the collapse of the National Government. The people are expecting the immediate fulfilment of promises, precise or implied, made to them in the Atlantic Charter and scores of subsequent speeches; the privileged classes are coming out into the open and saying it would be dangerous to make changes, social or economic, at so critical a time. We must avoid controversy, they say, and apparently it is not controversial to insist that we ought to go on in exactly the same way as our fathers did in a world that is changing at a vertiginous speed. The Labor Party, which has for so long seemed to be moribund, is showing a lot of unexpected fight about all sorts of problems.

Bed early, with a high and sudden temperature.

August 22. Have had five marvelous days by the sea in Cornwall trying to shake off the effects of the very slight touch of Polish influenza I picked up in Berlin or Munich. What must a real attack be like! Fine surf bathing and grand sunshine. Rusty barbed wire all along the beach still, and a lot of soldiers cursing these wonderful surroundings because they want to be demobilized and to get back to work.

Back to London, alas, tomorrow. Political crisis on the horizon. The Preliminary Peace Conference—the European Preliminary Peace Conference—is to be held, rather unexpectedly, in Washington on September 15. The Prime Minister, who is over there now, is said to have agreed to this under great pressure from President Roosevelt, who is increasingly alarmed by the lack of American interest in any overseas problem except that of Japan. He hopes that a conference in the States will help to change this.

August 24. The debate on the composition of the British delegation to Washington has brought the political crisis to a head. When the list of delegates was read out by the Deputy Prime Minister—the Prime Minister being still in Washington—the Labor Party, the Liberals, and the Independents were obviously alarmed by the number of the "old gang" it contained. Shouts and jeers across the House as though there never had been a party truce. The government's refusal to answer any further questions led to bitter party meetings and to the drafting of a Labor resolution which, if adopted, will be a vote of censure on the government.

August 27. The Prime Minister flew back to attend Parliament. Made a moving speech on the gravity of a decision at this moment to end the all-party coalition government, but many of the Conservatives on the benches behind him were obviously anxious the coalition should end. They have everything to gain by it since they will not then have to share the praise for winning the war. On the other hand, members of the Labor Party who have wanted to end the truce for eighteen months or so are not anxious to share the blame for the kind of peace they fear the government will make.

Criticism concentrated on three points: the sense of social insecurity, intensified by the demobilization muddle and the threatened coal strike; the lack of a vigorous and constructive peace policy; the composition of the peace delegation. On the last point the Prime Minister was accommodating, and agreed to strengthen Labor and Liberal representation, but that didn't satisfy the rank and file of the Labor Party, who have seen how little their official representatives are able to make their desires known, or, at any rate, accepted.

At one time it seemed certain the government would be defeated. But once again the sense of international urgency kept a number of us from voting against it. All the same, it might have been wiser to get the fight settled one way or another. As the matter was left, the progressive wing of the peace delegation will be strengthened, but the government can count on so small a majority in Parliament that it will lack decision and energy in Washington. And never was it more important that Britain's voice should be strong.

August 28. The Relief and Rehabilitation Administration has again been attacked in Congress, and I am told that the Administrator is threatening to resign. Raymond Gram Swing, broadcasting last night, explained how the publicity campaign against the dispatch of food to Europe was being organized as efficiently as the campaign conducted years ago against the Disarmament Conference in Geneva. It is so difficult for Americans to realize that they haven't got unlimited food supplies, and that much of their own shortages come from the fact that thousands of farm workers have gone into war factories, where, earning far more than before, they also eat more.

The Peace Conference is also being bitterly attacked, even before its work begins. With obvious reluctance Swing quoted from an editorial in the Chicago Tribune. The American people, it asserted, were too busy dealing with the Japs to want to welcome these so-called peacemakers and busybodies from a small, decadent, and quarrelsome continent called Europe. The paper added that after the last war American troops remained in Germany until 1923, but that they would not remain one year, let alone five years, after this war. Knowing Raymond, I don't think he would have quoted from that article unless he had considered that it represented the views of quite an important number of people.

September 2. Have had two terribly moving days in Paris. The city is swept by every kind of emotion, of which the most depressing is the bitterness against the Americans. At every meeting I have had with De Gaulle, since the first one at the French front in 1940, I found it a little difficult to keep my temper. Despite a rather disarming and diffident smile, which suggested he wasn't quite sure of himself, he has been so dogmatic (the Italians have a word for it: prepotente) that it has been impossible to argue with him. I therefore had underestimated the extent to which people in France under the occupation had come to look upon him as the symbol of resistance. He has become, to an extraordinary extent, a national hero, and the campaign waged against him by the State Department has raised his pedestal by several feet. Many people in Washington and some in London had failed to appreciate that his affronts, his bad temper, his general troublesomeness would be approved by the French as evidence that their country was reasserting itself, that France still counted.

This has meant that, both by their dealings with Darlan and other men of Vichy and by their obvious dislike of De Gaulle, the Americans have entirely lost the traditional good-will of France. There was a good deal of feeling against the British as well when it became known that a British destroyer had saved Marshal Pétain. Again, I hadn't realized how, during the last year, the ordinary people of France had come to hate and despise that old man. But since the storming of the Cherche-Midi prison their anti-British feeling has diminished, for they would not have wanted him to suffer the same fate as Laval, Doriot, and Déat.

It was this storming of the prison that brought me over to Paris for my paper. The whole business was a kind of throw-back to the French Revolution. A students' demonstration on the Boulevard St. Michel started it. The prison is only about a mile away, and somebody suggested the attack on it. The crowd, armed with bricks, broomsticks, pokers, and so on, grew to a terrific size, and the French police and troops did not intervene. Prison officials handed Laval and the others over without protest and they were hanged from the electric-light standards on the Rue du Cherche-Midi. Nine men died in this way, including one who was not a political prisoner at all but was hanged by mistake.

One of the Quaker ambulance drivers took me up to the Gare de l'Est to see the arrival of a prisoners-of-war train. It was heart-breaking, and I invented an excuse to get away a few minutes after the train came in. Although these trains are naturally given the highest priority, it had taken nearly three days to come from Berlin; there is still such congestion and disorganization on the railways. Many of the war prisoners were cripples, but they were less pathetic than those others who had been consistently overworked and underfed since they were captured in 1940.

The saddest part of the whole business was the quietness. The French are supposed to be noisy and demonstrative, and these soldiers had been separated from their families for years. In most cases there was very little sound, and not much sign, of joy about the reunions: men and women were too weak and tired, the small children hardly remembered their fathers, and there were very few young men or girls, since most of them are still somewhere in Germany. As yet there are no trains to spare for them; they have to get back to France on foot.

50 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE LAST LEGISLATURE of Michigan passed a law which attempted to confer upon women the right to vote in municipal elections. . . . The Supreme Court rendered a decision last week declaring the law unconstitutional and void, on the ground that the constitution of Michigan does not extend the franchise to women, and that the legislature cannot confer the right by statute, an amendment of the constitution being the only lawful way to accomplish the result. Constitutional amendments providing for woman suffrage are, in fact, now pending in two Western states—Colorado and Kansas.—November 2, 1893.

AN INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS against immoral literature—probably the first of its kind—was held at Lausanne, September 12 to 14. . . . There is, of course a general agreement about the flagrant forms of obscene literature, which carry their grossness and their evil purpose on their face. . . . To execute a law which would be effective against the elusive forms of immoral literature without being an instrument of tyranny would require, in the authorities set for its interpretation and enforcement, a critical and aesthetic faculty and a moral sense such as the world has never yet seen in officialdom, or out of it, for that matter.—November 2, 1893.

THE CURRENT OPINION is that the logical candidate of the Republicans for the Presidency in 1896 is William McKinley. This is our opinion also. The Republican Party believes in protection. Formerly it believed in protection only for infant industries. Now it believes in protecting aged ones as well, and this it learned from McKinley. Formerly it believed in moderate protection; now it believes in extreme protection. This, too, it learned from McKinley. Formerly it believed in protection for a time; now it believes in protection for eternity. This, too, it learned from McKinley.—November 16, 1893.

Oscar Ameringer Never Weakened

BY McALISTER COLEMAN

WHEN word of the death of Oscar Ameringer came to the little colony of white and colored cotton workers which Ameringer founded in the Delta country of Louisiana in the depression years, there was grieving for the passing of the group's great-hearted leader. In the coal pits of Illinois old heads bowed lower when they learned that "Adam Coal-digger," whose writings they had followed for years in their union paper, would speak no more of the brave and wise and humorous words that had cheered them through recurrent crises. In New York veteran Socialists, remembering when Ameringer came out of the Midwest to join with them in organizing the garment workers, mourned the loss of one of the outstanding pioneers of the party. And all across the continent, on remote farms and in small towns and in great cities, fighters for the under-dog knew that a doughty comrade-in-arms had fallen in the struggle.

Literally in the struggle, for Oscar's death at Oklahoma City on November 6 can be attributed to his trip last year to the Louisiana colony, where he hoped to set up for the Negro workers a school as well-equipped as the Eva Frank Schoolhouse, built under Ameringer's direction, for the whites. He was suffering from heart trouble when, against the advice of his doctor, he made the long trip to the Delta. As was his custom, he lived in cheap hotels, took no heed of his diet, worked furiously over his plans—at anything but union hours. He was more dead than alive when his gallant wife, Freda, the daughter of Dan Hogan of Socialist fame, drove down to bring him home, but a stay at the Community Hospital at Elk City, Oklahoma, the cooperative started by his friend and comrade Dr. Michael Shadid, gave him a new lease on life.

Now he was full of plans again. Each day for a little time they let him sit in the sun that made the autumn flowers glow along the garden wall back of his comfortable Oklahoma City home. There he worked over the material for his projected history of modern Europe, to be written in the style of his "Life and Deeds of Uncle Sam," for years a best-selling Socialist pamphlet. He planned to resume his contributions to the Progressive, with which after Pearl Harbor his weekly, the American Guardian, had merged. Perhaps he would go back to painting again, and there was always his music. And then his heart stopped beating, and in America, the America of grass roots and quarter-sections and mean side streets, of coal diggers, share-croppers, and steel workers, a strong light went out.

To this America Oscar had come as a stripling from his native Bavaria in 1886. His mother was a peasant woman, his father a cabinet-maker, as austere as the mother was tender. The boy's childhood was an unhappy one. He was in early rebellion against authority, hating with equal intensity the Prussian drill sergeants on maneuvers near his little village and the sadistic teachers in the parochial schools. In his autobiography, "If You Don't Weaken," published shortly before Pearl Harbor, he writes of the days of his youth with a grimness tempered with humor and indicates plainly enough how the sensitive artist was transformed into a social rebel.

As soon as he arrived in this country he went to the Midwest, "the Valley of Democracy," joined the mystical Knights of Labor, worked at his trade of cabinet-maker enough to meet his modest wants, haunted the public libraries and read the biographies of our Revolutionary leaders, attended trade-union and Socialist meetings, walked on picket lines until he could say with George Bernard Shaw, "Socialism made a man of me."

Soon he was editing trade-union papers and organizing the brewery workers in New Orleans or the musicians' union in the Midwest, always hammering away at his favorite themes—industrial democracy with production for use as its goal, an alliance of farm and factory workers, workers' education, cooperation, all inspired by an indigenous hickory-shirt socialism. In Milwaukee Victor Berger was his teacher as he was also the teacher of Eugene Debs, and when the Milwaukee Leader was started, Ameringer became its most eagerly read contributor.

The First World War, with its subsequent reign of terror, first under Postmaster General Burleson and then under the ineffable A. Mitchell Palmer, drove knives into Oscar's heart. He saw his friends and comrades, many of them descendants of the revolutionary refugees of 1848, persecuted and tortured by chauvinist mobs. The Leader, deprived of its second-class mailing privileges, somehow carried on, with the letters from subscribers going to Freda Hogan's Milwaukee address, but the fury with which an implacable Administration harassed the Socialists heightened until Berger and Ameringer were indicted on enough counts to send them to jail for a hundred years.

Oscar went down to the Southwest when the indictments against him were quashed, and there headed an organizing campaign among the farmers and railroad men that renewed the pre-war march of that region toward Socialist goals. His Oklahoma Daily Leader struck fiercely at the Klan. It fought so valiantly for the embattled coal miners that he was given the editorship of the Illinois Miner, weekly paper of District 12 of the United Mine Workers of America, the insurgent wing of the union, in those days in headlong opposition to the policies of John L. Lewis. Oscar's "Adam Coaldigger" column in the Miner became famous through all the labor world. The paper had a flavor that set it apart from the run of stodgy trade-union organs filled with adulation of the union administration, stock pictures of officials, a mess of dreary boiler-plate. But running the Miner was no bed of roses. "Editing a labor paper," cried Oscar, "is like feeding melted butter on the end of a hot awl to an infuriated wildcat."

"The function of a politician," said Oscar in his column, "is to get campaign contributions from the rich and votes from the poor on the ground that he is going to defend one class from the other." "Money is like manure," he decided, echoing Francis Bacon, "no good unless it's spread around." Of two Supreme Court decisions, one favoring the railroads, the other against a child factory worker named Mary, Oscar remarked, "Too bad little Mary wasn't born a railroad."

When in 1930 the Illinois miners finally decided to wage open war on the Lewis regime, Oscar's speech at the Springfield convention of the insurgents was as moving a bit of proletarian oratory as I have ever heard. Even Gene Debs could not have exceeded Oscar that tense afternoon. "The rank and file," he said in his peroration, "is like the grass of the fields. The rains and snows beat upon it; winds and flame devour it; but one day in the early spring there is a secret stirring in the earth and behold the grass has sprung up again—green and very beautiful under a golden sun. So with you, dear brothers. You will rise again even as the grass of the field; though all men's hands be set against you, though you feel yourselves isolated and abandoned, you, the rank and file, will surely rise to spread the green mantle of democracy over this ravished American soil."

Sentimental, faintly absurd, to be comparing these harsh-featured, gnarled men from the pits with the young grass of spring? Certainly it was, yet somehow they understood and loved the speaker and his words, and cheered Oscar until the tears stood in his eyes as he looked out from the platform over his people.

That sort of thing, some latter-day "realistic" labor leader will protest, was all right for its time and place; we have to get down to brass tacks today. Ameringer, who had written of the need for expanding the industrial-union form of organization back in the nineties, using the brewery workers and the miners' unions as models, was among the first laymen to urge that coal be burned in the fields and its energy carried off over high-powered electric transmission lines. He was stirred by the stories coming out of Germany between wars of the work of Friedrich Bergius, the Nobel prize winner, in the hydrogenation of coal, and vainly attempted to set up a Bergius plant in southern Illinois, to be subsidized in part by union funds. Oscar saw in the integration, under government operation and with democratic controls, of electric power, transportation, and coal the ultimate solution of the perennial coal problem. His papers supported the Brophy plan for the nationalization of coal and, later on, the proposals for giant power centers made by Morris L. Cooke and other forward-looking engineers at a time when the mention of either was forbidden in Lewis's United Mine Workers' Journal.

Always he believed that the unions, together with consumers' cooperatives and farm organizations like the Farmers' Union, could among them create a new democratic culture for our industrial civilization. One day he walked in on Frank Farrington, the big-framed president of the Illinois Miners and Lewis's most powerful antagonist.

"Frank," asked Oscar, peering at the mine leader over his spectacles, "how many people lived in Athens at the time of Pericles?"

Farrington gazed blankly at his editor.

"Not counting slaves," went on Oscar hurriedly, "just about 350,000 men, women, and children, who made a civilization there that has never been equaled. Now we've got a population of miners and their families of about the same number right here in District 12 . . ."

"What do you want?" asked Farrington resignedly, knowing of old the oblique approach employed by Ameringer when he wanted something for his people. This time it was to have the union subsidize miners' Chautauquas in the summer months when the pits were closed. Oscar would bring to the fields the pick of the entertainment world, a good orchestra, speakers who knew the economic time of day, and technicians to talk of the larger problems of the industry in understandable language. This would be a streamlining of the old Socialist encampments at which Oscar and Walter Mills and Kate O'Hare had spoken and later Oscar and his three sons had played quartets for the farmers from all the quarter-sections. To be sure, nothing came of this proposal, just as nothing has come of Oscar's proposals for the integration of coal with water-power and transportation. But with a few honorable exceptions, what younger labor leader today is offering his membership such an intelligent combination of educational facilities?

Of his many contributions to the labor movement, Ameringer of course will be remembered longest for his precious gift of humor. He was called the "Mark Twain of labor" and later "the workers' Will Rogers." Any analysis of humor is futile, but I would not agree that Oscar's humor was that of the man who in his last years became a protégé of J. P. Morgan's or the wisecracking Oklahoma cowpuncher who showed with pride an autographed picture of Andrew W. Mellon addressed to "My good friend, Will Rogers." They tried that once on Oscar: the late Arthur Brisbane, with memories of his father's socialism, took Ameringer up to a high mountain with offers of what seemed a fortune if he would come over to the Hearst papers. Brisbane used to shake a puzzled head over Oscar's indignant refusal.

I would say that of all American humorists Oscar's bosom comrade, the incomparable Art Young, is the man with whom, in his tenderness and pity, his fierce hatred of injustice, hypocrisy, and tyranny, Ameringer can best be compared. For years I dreamed of a book of the pick of Oscar's columns illustrated by Art Young.

How all of us, "the Wise Men of the East," as Oscar derisively called us, as well as the workers, needed that cleansing Aristotelian purge of laughter! When word went around New York that Oscar was in town, we'd gather at the home of Arthur Garfield Hays or Morris Ernst or Evans Clark to make an adoring circle around the veteran editor while he recounted his youthful adventures with the counterfeit quarter (you'll find them in "If You Don't Weaken"; Freda Ameringer has some copies left at the Leader Building, Oklahoma City), the love life of the Reverend King, the founding of the Conservatory of Music at the Texas whistle stop. Heywood Broun would come lumbering in to sit fascinated at Oscar's feet and later to use the counterfeit-quarter theme in several of his columns. Oscar was a born mimic, and he would strut around the room giving us the pious front of the Reverend King about to rob the collection plate for beer money, or the aged John D. Rockefeller "chasing a little white ball around a cow pasture with a shinny-stick."

In his speeches to the workers he had the Shavian trick of stating a conventional platitude—"Capital takes all the risks," "You can't change human nature," "If all the money were divided," etc.—and turning it inside out until his overalled audience rocked with laughter. But he was never merely the clown. Two minutes after he had started on the most fantastic of his tall stories you knew that you were en rapport with a brilliant intelligence brooding over the comedies and tragedies of our common lot and holding up a mirror whose reflections we were to ponder long after the last laugh had died away. Often the tears of laughter would be mingled with those of sudden sorrow when the foremost raconteur of our times had finished.

True, he often compromised on immediate demands, on the Socialist Party "line," on short-time political issues. But never on the fundamentals. Because he did not weaken in his hatred of war and the cruel system that breeds it, in his faith in the ultimate wisdom of the common man, his belief that somehow we can make a new civilization with room in it for mercy and love and laughter, Oscar Ameringer's was a great life.

In the Wind

JAMES LOEB, JR., executive secretary of the Union for Democratic Action, recently received a form letter containing these words: "You can see that Planning is edited for the men who control the destinies of American industry. That is why we are offering this weekly news letter on post-war planning to management executives only, and that is why we invite YOU to join."

THE HODGMAN RUBBER COMPANY is mailing synthetic rubber bands to editors with this message: "Here is a typical example of an American development which was made free from political interference."

HENRY G. FLEER (coal, coke, fuel oil, and air transport) now affixes to his letterhead a gold sticker bearing the legend, "Atlantic Educational Foundation—Education for the Masses. Founded 1943 by Henry G. Fleer." This is a sample of the educational material: "Germany will succumb and is now definitely out of the war, although still maintaining a show of force. The European war is over."

AN AMERICAN GENERAL in London tells this one on himself. His staff car, emblazoned with the insignia of his rank and driven by a military chauffeur, had a slight collision with a battered old London taxi. The general got out and berated the cabby at some length, ending with the rhetorical question, "What have you to say for yourself?" The cabby looked the general in the eye and replied, "Pearl 'Arbor to you, sir."

THE CHICAGO TELEPHONE DIRECTORY lists four numbers for McCormick, Robert R., Col.: one for the residence, one for "service," one for "pvt. garage," and one for "pvt. stables." All are located on Roosevelt Road.

FROM AN ACCOUNT of an address by "Otto, archducal heir of all the Hapsburgs," in the Chicago Tribune: "There was a tremendous much befurred and feathered crowd. . . . There were a few oustanding features in this long talk. First of all there was no mention of Russia, not a syllable. . . . George of Greece was fully praised. Crown Prince Umberto of Italy also came in for much praise. . . . But when it came to Count Carlo Sforza, who hustled over to Italy to enter the political ring, Otto denounced him in no uncertain way."

FESTUNG EUROPA: Six of the nine bookstores in Bergen, Norway, have been ordered to close in order to free men for the compulsory labor service. . . . Kindergartens throughout Germany now teach children this prayer for grace before meals: "Fold your little hands, bow your little head; think of him who gives us our daily bread. Adolf Hitler is his name; him we as our savior claim." . . . Polish churches now bear signs reading "Poles not admitted."

Employment IS THE THING

COME-THERE'S WORK TO BE DONE-BY EVERYONE!
PEACE
SEAMAN

OUT of the mounting discussion of things to come after the war, one thing appears to tower over all—the problem of employment, of jobs for all.

It is the pivot of all blueprints, the crux of every design for stable peace and reasonable security. It is the least reward America could offer its returning millions of veterans, the minimum of recognition it could give the many other millions who have stood faithfully, loyally on the home front producing fabulous quantities of material for the fighting fronts.

Industry is already making its post-war terms known. Through velvety or strident voices, depending on which business group is using the microphone, industry plans to "take organized labor down a peg or two." Industry dares not openly attack collective bargaining but it is warring on the closed shop.

Primarily, and there's hardly a secret about it, industry seeks to lower wages. "Why should a free American worker be compelled to join a union to keep his job?" Do away with the closed shop, its argument runs, and production will increase, labor costs will become lower and there'll be more jobs. Big industry is less touchy on the pay envelope subject now, while the war is on, as four-fifths of its payroll comes out of government funds anyway. After the war, industry may use the whip of unemployment to bring down the entire wage structure of the country.

Industry will contend that it could not profitably run its business unless corporate taxes are drastically cut. It will oppose expansion of social security legislation on the plea of economy, and, above all, it will fight for a letdown of government regulation of business. Already, the din of "free enterprise" is filling the air, which in simpler terms means freedom from "interference" by government as well as by labor.

And last but not least, industry will demand the turning over of government-owned plants to private interests—for little more than nothing. Not less than one-third of the industrial plants working at present on war needs in this country were built with government funds.

The unions will fight against the open-shoppers and the scheme to bring down the national wage structure. The unions know only too well that low wages are no guarantee for more jobs. Wages were pretty low and breadlines were long in the days of the Great Depression. The unions will oppose overnight reduction of corporate taxes. The government will still need huge sums after the war to meet joblessness.

The unions will demand expansion of social security legislation, with unemployment benefits to cover more weeks than heretofore—to help the returned soldiers over the hard times until they get jobs. The unions will oppose the government turning over to private capital its great roster of factories. It is true that the American unions are not particularly enamored with the prospect of government going into business. The unions, however, believe that the government should, through pressure on business and through credits to new industries, help in stimulating new employment sources. The better way, therefore, is not to turn over these plants outright to private capital but to exercise through them a degree of control over private industry with a view to reviving the industries which were especially hit by the war.

The solution of these problems, on which the future of America literally depends, will be linked, in a large measure, to the outcome of the national elections next year. The demand for post-war economic security will furnish the dynamics with which that contest will be fought out. And economic security means not economic relief but jobs. America with its huge natural resources, its gigantic industrial plant and financial strength, should prove capable, under intelligent and realistic leadership, of furnishing jobs and a livelihood to all its employable citizens—if the government only is able to resist pressures of selfish business interests and reckons primarily with the welfare of the great American masses.

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

Introduction: The Time to Plan

OF THE making of post-war plans there is no end. They are pouring forth in newspapers, magazines, books, and government reports. There are public plans and private plans; city plans, state plans, national plans, international plans. Even the anti-planners are at it, striving to concoct a plan to end all planning.

Nevertheless, in sponsoring yet another post-war economic program The Nation makes no apologies, for while a measure of government planning is widely accepted in the abstract, the debate about its objectives and its methods remains red hot. Thomas R. Amlie, who has written this supplement, insists that we can be satisfied with no goal short of full employment, the total utilization of our national capacity to produce wealth for the enjoyment of our people. He is, of course, by no means a lone advocate of such a goal; nor would he claim any patent on the ways and means he proposes for its attainment. The originality of the job he has done lies rather in his examination of the political implications of a plan to promote full employment and his weighing of the forces which oppose and support it.

Mr. Amlie is especially qualified for this task since in addition to being a life-long student of economics he has had many years of practical experience in politics. As a Representative of Wisconsin in Congress for three terms he had abundant opportunity to watch the business lobbies weaving their webs; as an organizer of progressive movements, particularly in the Middle West, he has discovered how much inertia must be overcome, how many entangling bonds of tradition cut, before the common man learns to use his political power in his best interests. And now he sees the coming struggle not in the usual class terms but rather as a contest between big business and the rest of the community. Full employment is a program which should appeal to workers, farmers, and small business men alike, for all these groups would be squeezed dry by a return to the depression of the early thirties or even to the economic stagnation that prevailed immediately before the war. But they will have to forsake their sectional fox holes and combine for a grand assault on the fortress of "unfettered private enterprise" or they will be defeated in detail.

If the leaders of big business were wise they would avoid a fight on this issue by conceding the right and duty of the state to take responsibility for the maintenance of full employment. For if they win after this war, if they succeed in imposing their economic policy on the country, the responsibility becomes theirs. This some among them recognize. Even the Wall Street Journal, in commenting on a report of the National Resources Planning Board, has warned:

> In the absence of militant private initiative to avert widespread unemployment, the collectivist philosophy . . . will take charge "to make America over." This newspaper will not presume to say how the forces of private enterprise should prepare to meet the difficulties of the post-war transition. . . . But believers in private initiative must have initiative; advocates of private enterprise must be enterprising; lovers of personal liberty must accept the risks of its enjoyment.

Seeing the extent to which business is organized on semi-monopoly lines with a view to circumventing initiative outside the charmed circle and to minimizing risks, we may be skeptical about the degree to which it is likely to observe these precepts. But we can at least agree that the survival of private enterprise depends on its ability to deliver the goods. If it can drive the huge productive machine it controls only at half speed it will be ousted by competing forms of economic organization. This is true even though the average American remains a stout individualist, allergic to government controls. For while there is no large demand for socialism in this country, there is an overwhelming insistence on security. And by that is meant not merely a chance to subsist on relief or stave off hunger on a WPA wage but a chance to remain steadily at work and to earn enough to provide a decent standard of living. If this modest ideal be satisfied, there will be no strong urge toward a radical change in the economic system. But if business does not justify its faith by works, if after a brief post-war boom we find factories closing down and workless men tramping the streets, then we shall face changes in our economic system far more drastic than anything proposed by Mr. Amlie.

A year or two ago a good many business leaders would have accepted this diagnosis. But now that the political pendulum is apparently swinging in their direction they are showing an increasing tendency to insist on "economic freedom" while rejecting any responsibility for the results. It is becoming fashionable in tory circles to point a finger of scorn at the demand for security and to dismiss the idea of full employment as neither possible nor desirable. Even if we do have five to ten million unemployed, it is suggested, that is not too high a price to pay for the maintenance of "the American way of life."

Meanwhile business, we are told, is doing its own planning. This is all to the good, but we have to recognize that an aggregate of industrial plans does not add up to a national plan. Every corporation can tot up the number of men it is able to employ if working at capacity. But the moment the demand for its product falls, its plan becomes obsolete.

Only the government can influence and control total demand. There are a number of methods which it can employ, but Mr. Amlie has selected two for special emphasis: (a) the placing of a floor under the economy by means of payments to the unemployed of $100 a month subject to certain safeguards; (b) the use of a public-works program to absorb savings for which an outlet cannot be provided by private investment. The first proposal is a safeguard against the kind of catastrophic collapse which we suffered after 1929. Its efficacy has been proved by such countries as Sweden and Britain, which were able to arrest the slump of the early thirties far more rapidly than we did.

A public-works budget may be used as a governor to keep the economic machine running at even speed. Its merits and limitations have been debated at length in recent years, and we need not add at this time to the arguments Mr. Amlie musters for the necessity of public works if full employment is to be obtained. But it may be worth pointing out that if our national income is maintained at anything like its possible maximum, increased socialized consumption will vastly widen the scope of public works. This phrase may sound formidable, but in fact it describes something very familiar, for schools, parks, roads, museums, and libraries are all examples of socialized consumption.

The editors of The Nation in sponsoring Mr. Amlie's program do not necessarily indorse all its details. For instance, we feel he has underestimated the importance of stored-up purchasing power in the immediate post-war period. And even allowing for limitations of space, we think he has unduly neglected taxation as a flexible instrument of economic control which can be used to stimulate both consumption and investment. We suspect, also, that he accepts too easily the political obstacles to international investment, which, properly handled, could do much to promote both our prosperity and that of other countries. But with his general position we are in hearty agreement. The combination of idle resources and idle men is one that this country can no longer tolerate. The remedies are known, and we can but hope that their application will not be resisted to the point of proving that the Marxists are right when they contend that full employment and private enterprise are compatible only in time of war.—EDITORS THE NATION.

What Demobilization Day Holds

SOME day, perhaps long before we expect it, the war will end, and the gigantic task of demobilizing our war economy will begin. Millions of Americans are naturally concerned about that day. Shall we throw the same energies into the reorganization of a peace-time economy as we did into the conversion from peace to war? Or shall we relapse into the semi-coma of the 1930's? Will there be jobs for all, or will there be ten or twelve million unemployed? Let us face the situation honestly: a decision on basic policy must be made soon if we are not again to see the tragedy of "too little and too late"—this time on the domestic front.

WHERE ARE THE JOBS COMING FROM?

By July, 1944, it is expected that 11,300,000 men will be in the armed forces and 54,600,000 workers employed in industry and agriculture—a total of 65,900,000. In 1939 we had 44,200,000 workers employed in industry and agriculture, with perhaps 500,000 in war work and the armed forces. Thus a return to the conditions of 1939 would provide no place for 21,200,000 persons. We may assume that 3,000,000 persons, mainly women, will want to give up their jobs when the war is over. Also we shall perhaps keep an additional 2,500,000 men in the armed forces for a period of time after peace is here. This would reduce the number of workers who would be unemployed with the coming of peace to 15,000,000. Optimists in the Department of Labor cut this figure to 12,000,000, and business men believe it may be brought down to 10,000,000.

War workers who can shift to non-war work in the same factory or locality will have a comparatively simple problem, but 5,000,000 persons now engaged in shipbuilding, aircraft construction, and ordnance will find it difficult to obtain any kind of work where they are now employed. Self-employed and professional people will have a particularly hard time. In 1939 we had 6,000,000 self-employed as against 3,500,000 at present, a figure that may drop to 3,000,000 in another year. Doctors and dentists will find it easier to gain a livelihood than lawyers, retailers, and members of the service trades. A million people who were formerly self-employed may find it impossible to establish themselves again.

BUSINESS MEN ARE NOT WORRYING

These prospects do not seem to worry business men. A Fortune poll of management in October disclosed that 70 per cent of our top-flight business leaders believed there would be a general boom with full employment and either as much competition as before the war or a greater amount. In conversation business men admit that there may be a relapse to pre-war levels of activity after a few years, giving us ten million unemployed, but they consider such a situation quite normal. Recognizing that greater concessions may have to be made to the unemployed than were necessary in the thirties, they say that this is a bridge we need not cross until we come to it.

Such reasoning is dangerous. Fifteen years have produced a great change in people's attitudes. The New Deal program was designed to carry us through a period of "secular stagnation," when a third of the population had to be supported by varying degrees and kinds of relief. After the war from ten to twenty million well-fed and militant workers may find themselves jobless. The average workingman will be in a fighting mood from the minute that he receives his pink slip. A period of living on unemployment compensation will not prepare him to accept the business man's program and point of view. It will cause him, rather, to gravitate to the most advanced economic and political theories and to militant leadership.

THAT POST-WAR BOOM

Most business writers assume that when peace comes the long pent-up demand for goods and services will immediately give us a degree of economic activity equaling that of war time. These writers overlook the probability that hostilities will cease in Europe a year or two before they do in the Pacific, and that we shall therefore be partially reconverting to a peace-time economy while the war against Japan is still being fought. During this period we are likely to maintain a high degree of economic activity through the production of goods for domestic consumption as well as for war, with the result that the most urgent demand for consumer goods will have been met by the end of the war.

The prophets of a post-war boom also place great emphasis on the $64,000,000,000 of potential purchasing power represented by the $21,000,000,000 of war bonds bought by individuals, the $27,000,000,000 on deposit in savings accounts, and the $16,000,000,000 in circulation or in hiding. Their optimism, however, is greater than a careful consideration of the facts warrants. It must be remembered that a great deal of money treated as money on deposit is simply money in war-bond accounts. Most individuals who buy war bonds are thinking in terms of security. If their prospects in the post-war period look uncertain, they are going to keep their bonds, not go out and buy gadgets recklessly. The September issue of the Survey of Current Business, published by the United States Department of Commerce, recognized this fact when it declared, "The accumulation of liquid reserves is important, as it affects consumers' decisions as to the spending of current income. In the aggregate it is not a substitute for that income."

In this connection it is significant that $16,000,000,000 of currency is now outstanding instead of the usual $6,000,000,000. According to traditional economic theory, this amount of currency in circulation should be reflected in greater spending and higher prices, but that is not the case. Since the number of safe-deposit boxes rented by banks is decreasing, it looks as if people were hiding currency in their homes. Persons who will do this are likely to hang on to their savings with great tenacity. Moreover, despite the increase in wage rates, working men with families are not finding it easy to save any substantial amounts.

It is also a mistake to assume that there will be a tremendous accumulated demand for consumer goods and services. As a matter of fact, we are producing more consumer goods and services in 1943 than we produced in 1939 or 1940 and roughly the same amount as in 1941 and 1942. Persons who normally have average purchasing power are conscious of a shortage of consumer goods at the present time. Actually, the shortage is primarily due to the fact that for the past year good wages have been earned by some twelve or fifteen million people who had previously been unable to buy anything but the barest necessities. It is true that we are now coming to the point where all available stocks are about used up and that there will be an increasing desire to build up inventories. The demand for automobiles will insure a high degree of activity in the motor-car industry for many years, and the needs of millions of couples starting housekeeping at the same time will stimulate production in many other fields.

Implicit in all the optimistic forecasts made by spokesmen for business is the assumption that when the war ends we shall have a world climate particularly favorable to capitalist enterprise, just as we had after the First World War. At that time the threat of German imperial ism had been destroyed, and the United States had emerged from the war in a position of world leadership. No such favorable conditions should be expected after this war. Hardly a week goes by without bringing additional tangible evidence of the impossibility of restoring the status quo in Europe and Asia. While we shall export some capital in the post-war period, there will not be as large an outlet for savings as is anticipated.

A REALISTIC VIEW

The less optimistic writers on post-war problems predict that unless we have a plan for maintaining full employment, we may drop to 1939 employment levels a few years after the war has ended. This is rendered the more probable by the great increase in productivity per man-hour that has taken place during the war and that will undoubtedly be carried over into the peace-time operation of industry. The amount of this increase is not known, but we do know that the physical output of industry has increased 80 per cent since 1939, while the number of persons employed has risen only 18 per cent. A guess, based upon insufficient data, might attribute two-thirds of this increase to the added number of hours worked per day and one-third to improved methods of production. Industrial activity will also be checked by the estimated $50,000,000,000 worth of goods that will be in government inventories when the war ends, half of which will be usable by consumers, agriculture, and industry.

The Program of Big Business

BIG BUSINESS WAGES A "HOLY WAR"

> Either political democracy must be the master of economic monopoly or economic monopoly will be the master of political democracy.—HAROLD J. LASKI.

DURING the last few years I have often been reminded of certain movies, with a tropical setting, in which the incessant beating of war drums is used to convey to the victims the idea of inescapable doom. Wherever I turn I hear it said that free enterprise must be restored, that the American way of life must be saved from the bureaucrats. Now that the nation is forced to submit to many restrictions in the effort to mobilize its resources for total war, this cry is rapidly increasing in strength. Every measure designed to keep prices in line is denounced as a move to destroy free enterprise. Even the men charged with carrying out these measures often seem more interested in turning public indignation against New Deal office-holders in Washington than in allaying the indignation by explaining the necessity of the restrictions. A steady stream of propaganda seeks to center attention on the fight to save free enterprise from government bureaucrats rather than on the struggle against our foreign enemies. One gets the impression that the fight for free enterprise is a "holy war."

This holy war is waged not only in the news columns and editorials of papers, the broadcasts and speeches of the servants of economic monopoly operating on the political front, but also in the advertising pages of national publications. A soldier in a fox hole wonders whether he will return to a system of free enterprise. Men bailing out of airplanes with thirty-four seconds to go are anxious that the free-enterprise system be preserved. The idea conveyed in such advertising is that the important fight is not the one the soldier is engaged in but the war at home to save the system of free enterprise from government interference.

The leaders in this holy war did not spring up spontaneously; they have been bought and paid for. The public-information program of the National Association of Manufacturers cost $36,500 in 1934, or 7.2 per cent of its budget. By 1937 this expenditure had risen to $793,043, or 55.1 per cent of the budget. The commercial value of the campaign stimulated by the N. A. M. was probably well over $36,000,000—a sum that is a mere bagatelle compared with what is being spent at the present time to influence public opinion.

More than 50 per cent of the advertising in some of our better-known national magazines is at present inserted by motor companies, airplane companies, and other concerns that are completely engaged in war work and have nothing to sell to the public; they advertise, apparently, merely to keep their names before the public. Since virtually all these companies pay excess-profits taxes, as much as 90 per cent of the money paid for this advertising would normally go into the United States Treasury if it were not used to subsidize the nation's magazines in return for a friendly attitude toward the business point of view.

Of a national expenditure of $245,000,000 for magazine advertising, perhaps $100,000,000 is for institutional advertising of this kind. If none of the companies could advertise, they would be in practically the same position with respect to each other, but the United States Treasury would be a hundred million dollars better off. The daily press, the radio, and other segments of the opinion-forming industries are similarly subsidized.

Money spent to keep the radio servile has produced the most gratifying results. One of the large radio networks recently informed its commentators that cartels were not news any more, and instructed them to "lay off" Standard Oil "because they give us plenty of business." It is primarily through the instrumentality of radio that big business has been able to turn many farmers, people in small towns, and members of the armed forces against labor. To understand the effectiveness of this weapon it is almost necessary to stay on a farm or in a small town and to acquire the radio-listening habit of farmers and villagers. I recall that in the fall of 1940 I was shocked by what came over the air. News about some rather unimportant strikes was blown up out of all proportion. One evening I timed a news broadcast by one of the big Chicago stations and found that seven out of eleven minutes of broadcasting time was devoted to strikes. So much time was given to the subject over a period of several weeks that when there was no strike news the radio announcer felt called upon to interpolate, "And now we come to the strike front—there seems to be no news today."

The really important strikes of 1940 and 1941 were the strikes by the managers of big companies who were reluctant to convert to war production till after Pearl Harbor. Their unwillingness to convert and their efforts to perpetuate "business as usual" from the vantage-point of high government office were certainly a hundred times more detrimental to the war effort than the time lost through labor strikes. But no word of the business man's strike ever came over the radio, nor did any intimation of it appear in the great bulk of the nation's press.

Since so many people in rural areas and in the forces have turned against labor because of its strikes, it is of interest to see just how seriously these strikes have interfered with the war effort. The table that follows gives figures on time lost through strikes as compiled by the Department of Labor:

	Man days lost through strikes	Proportion of total
1940	6,700,000	1/12 of 1 per cent
1941	23,000,000	32/100 of 1 " "
1942	4,182,000	5/100 of 1 " "
*1943	7,500,000	16/100 of 1 " "

* First six months; 3/4 due to coal strike.

THE APPEAL TO TRADITION

The forces in society that fight change have a great strategic advantage. Through slogans, clichés, and stereotyped appeals they can call upon deep-seated emotional attitudes that exercise great influence over the minds of men long after they have lost the validity they once had. When the forces of reaction have almost a monopoly of the means of communication, it is extremely difficult to resist their well-organized appeals to tradition. Under such circumstances the optimistic liberal can merely trust in Oscar Ameringer's homely observation that if there are nine wrong ways and one right way, the people will want to try the nine wrong ways first. A man does not become a pessimist until he is ready to believe that the people will insist on trying some of the wrong ways not once but several times.

Let us examine very briefly a few of the ideas that are now being sold to the American people as inherent in the American tradition.

Private Property. Thorstein Veblen once developed at some length the reason for people's deep-seated emotional loyalty to the historical concept of private property. He pointed out that it arose in the Middle Ages when the feudal serf was first permitted to own his tools and the things he made with his own labor and to exchange these things for articles made by other serfs. Because for many hundreds of years men escaped from serfdom only through this right of ownership, they came to feel the fullest loyalty to the institution of private property. In the course of time and change, however, the right of private property came to mean not the right of a workingman to own tools and the things that he made with those tools but the right of absentee stockholders to close down factories and to deny to workingmen access to the means of production whenever the absentee owners thought operation unprofitable. When the United States Chamber of Commerce talks about the constitutional morality of private property, it is not defending the right of a workingman to have access to the machinery of production but rather the right of an owner to sabotage production.

Bureaucracy. The issue in the war at home, as Senator O'Mahoney has pointed out, is not free enterprise versus government control but free enterprise versus monopoly control. By crying "Wolf! wolf!" the economic monopolists are seeking to distract attention from themselves and to turn public indignation against the government. Only through the instrumentality of the government can full employment, with its opportunities for everyone, be achieved. If public sentiment can be turned against government intervention in any form, the only alternative is to hand over the power to economic monopoly.

Risk Capital. During the past decade we became familiar with the institution of innocents' clubs set up to further ideas derived from the political left. Now the political right also realizes the value of the device, and we have the Committee for Economic Development serving as an innocents' club for the National Association of Manufacturers and the United States Chamber of Commerce. Knowing that their own retainers have no standing with serious students of public affairs, the people who ordinarily support these organizations have hired through the C. E. D. scholars with reputations for integrity to convince the American people of the need for giving risk capital larger financial returns as a means of stimulating investment and achieving full employment.

Corporation profits in 1942 amounted to $19,000,000,000 before taxes, twice what they were in 1929, the previous peak year, and four times the average for the pre-war period 1936-39. Nevertheless, we are likely soon to see recommendations from the C. E. D. that necessary investment can best be stimulated by more favorable tax laws for risk capital. The Ruml plan, "forgiving" more than $6,000,000 in income taxes due as of last June, was an indication of this trend.

A Balanced Budget. When the government spent some three billion dollars a year from 1932 to 1941 to keep some twenty million men, women, and children alive, financial writers stressed the danger of an unbalanced budget to a point where it was literally a bogy to frighten children. The same writers today, without realizing the ludicrous spectacle they make, frankly admit that there is little to worry about in a 300-billion-dollar debt and that we can well afford to spend a trillion, or any other sum, if it is necessary to win the war. While the issue of balancing the budget is badly frayed, the American Bankers' Association is trying to have it included in the bill of goods that is being sold to the American people.

Labor Must Be Reasonable. This is, of course, the main point. If we go back to a pre-war level of economic activity, labor must be prepared to take far-reaching wage reductions. Labor can hold its wage gains only under a system of full production. Under such a system labor is not now overpaid. And a national income of $150,000,000,000 or $200,000,000,000 can be maintained only if labor is adequately paid. When business men say labor must be reasonable they mean simply that they expect industry to be operated at a greatly reduced level in the post-war period. But let us examine the realities of the business program a little more closely.

Let Business Stabilize Industry. Bulletin No. 6 of the Post-War Readjustment Series put out by the United States Chamber of Commerce comments that the jerky or lumpy nature of decisions to invest must be corrected by the action of business men themselves. There is in this statement a frank admission that an over-all policy must be adopted. Government is not to be permitted to make this policy. The bulletin states that combined action by industry would be monopoly action and unwise, and that therefore each company must learn to distinguish between solid and staple demand and momentary demand. Of course this is utter nonsense. If the government is not to do the job, then it will be done by the business organizations that represent monopoly capitalism.

THE CHOSEN BATTLEGROUND

The contention of the United States Chamber of Commerce, the N. A. M., and the C. E. D. that private investment is the only sound and moral outlet for savings is more than a slogan or a statement of principle. It is the definition of the battleground upon which big business proposes that this whole issue shall be fought out.

There is general agreement among the various schools of economic thought that our prosperity depends upon our ability to channel our savings and profits back into consumption or investment. This is very well stated in the Chamber of Commerce's Post-War Bulletin No. 3:

> Students of unemployment and business depression unanimously agree that the essence of depression is variation in the rate of real saving or investment. By real saving and investment is meant the conversion of dollars into physical durable goods. . . . There is a wide agreement among economists that any lapse in the rate of real capital formation, unless offset by increases in consumption, must lead to depression and unemployment.

Another bulletin in the same series points out that "in the 1930's we had a shortage of employment offers because there was not sufficient incentive to induce employers to invest and expand." The assumption that runs through all of this literature put out by business is that there is only one proper place for savings to go, and that is into such ventures as private business may be willing to undertake. If conditions are such that private business does not feel like going ahead, then obviously there is nothing for people to do but stay unemployed.

The following terse summation of the program of business is taken from Bulletin No. 3:

> However, this capital will go to work only if there is reasonable prospect of the security of the investment and a fair return. In short, human wants can be satisfied by labor and management only if such a process yields a fair wage to both worker and investor.

After an attempt to condemn the "over-saving" theory as merely an unsubstantiated hypothesis, the argument continues:

> Thus it may be that instead of oversavings occurring in a high-income economy and leading to depression, the problem is to create such a business climate that investments and new commitments will be forthcoming at a steady rate. This, in fact, will probably be the central core of our long-run post-war problem, once the explosive forces of the banked-up demands are met.

There we have the program of American business for the post-war period so simply stated that anyone should be able to see what is involved. Employment depends upon investment, and unless all conditions are entirely satisfactory to the 3 or 4 per cent of the people who own 80 per cent of the wealth in the country, no investments will be made, and that will be too bad. But this difficulty can be avoided if the government will make all conditions for investment so favorable that private capital will be ready and willing to go ahead. The terms that the government is expected to meet are not only difficult but impossible. None the less, big business will spare no efforts to make its own program the nation's.

Flaws in the Business Program

BASIC to big business's hope for post-war expansion is belief in the new frontiers opened by invention. Speaking at St. Louis on October 16, Wendell Willkie pointed out the many opportunities which he felt would present themselves to the ambitious man in the post-war world of free enterprise. "Television, the new automobiles, the new planes, the new houses, the new plastics, the new farm crops—an endless list of new discoveries born of war research cry aloud to be developed."

THE LITTLE FELLOW HASN'T A CHANCE

When we talk about television and electronics, it is well not to forget the Bell Telephone Company and two or three other titans in this field. I recall serving on the House Patents Committee in 1935 when testimony was taken on the subject of the control of sound-reproducing equipment in the film industry. A subsidiary of the American Telegraph and Telephone Company got into this field at an early date. A group of independents was also in the field. This independent group of companies, worth about $200,000,000, owned the German selenium process for photographing the sound on the film itself. The independent companies were probably in a stronger patent position than the A. T. and T. subsidiary. The equipment of both groups for making the picture and reproducing the film in motion-picture theaters was excellent and of comparable quality. When the A. T. and T. subsidiary threatened to bring injunction proceedings against every theater that showed films or used equipment made by the rival group, the independent group girded for battle. But the bankers to whom they applied for the necessary financial support said that they could not afford to back an association of companies worth $200,000,000 that was plunging into innumerable patent and injunction suits against a $5,000,000,000 adversary. The independent companies went down like a house of cards. The mere threat of battle from a five-billion-dollar concern rendered them hors de combat. Yet the little man is told that there is a future for him in the field of television and of electronics. Say, Mister, you ain't kiddin', are you?

I don't know what the new automobiles are going to be like. I do know that before the war three big manufacturers produced about 85 per cent of all the automobiles made. I know that these companies are today completely engaged in war work, and that of all the war contracts let up to the present time, General Motors has received $8,500,000,000 worth, or 8 per cent. I know that the three big companies have done a good job of maintaining their distributors and agencies, and I have no doubt that they have found a way of making the cost constitute a company expense and that ultimately more than 90 per cent of this cost will come out of the United States Treasury. Opportunity for "free enterprise" in the automobile field was negligible before the war and will be less than that after the war.

Planes of the helicopter type will undoubtedly become popular after the war and there may be other types of new planes, but it is hard to see what aviation can offer to "free enterprise" in the post-war period. We now have the capacity to turn out 125,000 planes a year, a number many times as great as can be needed in peace time. With two exceptions, the plane companies are all controlled by the big banks, and the understanding between them is that they will divide any post-war business equitably. Private capital knows that the airplane industry is a war industry, and 90 per cent of the vast expansion in this field has been financed by the government.

The field of housing offers a vast opportunity if we peg our national income at $150,000,000,000 or $200,000,000,000, but if we permit it to drop back to $70,000,000,000 or $80,000,000,000, then we are overhoused—not in terms of human needs but in terms of what we can afford. The pre-fabricated house exists largely in the imagination of promoters and enthusiasts. Not long ago a company employing 500 people in research alone spent a large sum experimenting with pre-fabrication. After several years they came to the conclusion that they could not develop anything to compete with ordinary frame construction. The head of their patent department, who is an old friend of mine, told me that anybody could have the results of their research, because they intended to pursue the matter no farther and had written the whole thing off as a total loss.

Production of "new farm crops" has been stimulated by the blockade in the Pacific and by certain unusual war demands. When world trade is reestablished, an efficient division of labor will favor a return to the production of standard crops. Advances in chemistry, such as the conversion of cellulose into protein, are not likely to help farming. If we ever achieve an economy of full employment, I think that I shall go back to farming as a matter of choice, but as an occupation that offers scope for free enterprise in the post-war world it holds little allure.

I do not know much about the new plastics. But I do know where the plant expansion has taken place that will dominate this whole field. The plant facilities of the Du Pont Company have been expanded to the amount of $1,114,850,000, of which sum $53,849,000 was provided by the Du Pont Company and the balance of $1,061,001,000 by the United States Treasury. In a statement before the George committee Senator O'Mahoney, commenting on this situation, said: "It took almost 100 years for a few great mining corporations and industrial organizations to gain control of the mineral resources of the country. Today its chemical resources are under even tighter control as we approach the plateau from which the promised land of the future is visible."

Somehow Mr. Willkie seems to offer us more hope when he remains general than when he becomes specific. "New discoveries" as such offer little opportunity to free enterprise in a system dominated by monopoly. We have had important discoveries "crying aloud to be developed," lo, these many years, but they have usually been tightly covered by patents, and the owners of the patents have not always been interested in their development. When they are interested, they move heaven and earth to keep others out of their preserves. I am willing to wager that the patents covering the really important discoveries that have come out of war research, paid for out of the United States Treasury, will be found almost entirely in the hands of the 100 corporations that have obtained 70 per cent of all war contracts.

In a statement transmitting his report to the Special Committee on Post-War Economic Policy and Planning, Senator O'Mahoney said:

> The investigation of the Truman committee and the activities of the Anti-Trust Division of the Department of Justice all tell the same story—that huge enterprise, in strange disregard of its own ultimate interests as well as the interest of the system of free enterprise, has been consistently endeavoring to destroy the profit-making opportunities of its competitors. Whether it be in the production of aluminum or rubber or steel or oil, many of the giant corporations which participate in holding the bulk of war contracts have done everything in their power to prevent the establishment of competitive enterprise that might possibly compete with them after the war is over.

Big business does not advocate the elimination of competitive enterprise, but in the conversion to peacetime production and in the fight for post-war business it will be in a singularly advantageous position to eliminate smaller competitors. That this process is now going on at a rapid rate is indicated by the increasing number of small business men coming to Washington to protest against being combed out, and ready to grasp at any straw to save themselves.

PRIVATE SPENDING CANNOT MAINTAIN A 200-BILLION-DOLLAR ECONOMY

The program of big business assumes that a reduction or elimination of corporation taxes is necessary to encourage business to provide full employment. A study of our income statistics show this to be false. Our total federal revenue from all sources is $40,000,000,000 a year. Let us assume that when peace comes we maintain production and continue to collect the same amount of money in federal taxes, and that the government continues to spend this sum annually. With a total gross production of $200,000,000,000 we shall have a net income of $158,000,000,000, which, after the payment of personal taxes, would leave about $130,000,000,000 of disposable income in the hands of individuals. Of this sum we may assume that $110,000,000,000 would be spent for consumer goods and services, leaving a balance of $20,000,000,000 to be saved by individuals.

Let us assume further that we have a business Administration so determined to give business a chance that it repeals all federal corporation taxes. The corporations thus find themselves with $16,000,000,000 in addition to the $8,500,000,000 that they have set aside for depreciation and other reserves. Are the corporations likely to spend this extra $16,000,000,000 in expanding their manufacturing plant when they are worried about what the government is going to do with the $15,000,000,000 worth of government plant that it financed for war production? If we can achieve a gross national production of $200,000,000,000 with our present plant, does anyone think that private corporations would see any profit in further expansion?

There would be little for the corporations to do but to pay the money over to their stockholders, in which case the federal government might recover $5,000,000,000 through individual income taxes, leaving an additional $9,000,000,000 in the hands of individuals to be spent or invested. Perhaps $5,000,000,000 might be spent, leaving $4,000,000,000 to be invested in addition to the other $20,000,000,000 already saved by individuals. We should then have individuals with $24,000,000,000 to invest in the fields that have been opened up by the war and that have been obligingly enumerated by Mr. Willkie. Will this money be invested in new plastics, new automobiles, television, new farm crops, airplanes, or other new fields? Of course some of it will be, but most of it will be saved—and the result will be depression.

By lowering corporation taxes we should simply be taking money away from the government, which is a sure spender, and giving it to corporations and individuals that appear to be more interested in getting plants out of production than in constructing additional facilities. It is all too obvious that private investment cannot maintain a gross national production of $200,000,000,000; it cannot even maintain a gross national production of $110,000,000,000 without a minimum of $5,000,000,000 a year of government deficit spending for relief and public works. The pretense that it can do so is merely a useful device in big business's campaign for political power.

We Can Have Full Production

THE graph on the cover of this supplement is based on data released by the United States Department of Commerce. According to that authority we are producing goods and services during the last half of 1943 at the rate of $188,000,000,000 a year, and have a net income of $155,000,000,000 after making deductions for business taxes, depreciation, and special reserves. This figure is considered low by the research department of an important war agency, which estimates that the gross national production during December of 1943 will be at the rate of $199,500,000,000 a year.

Statisticians may argue that these figures do not take into account the fact that the dollar is worth less today than in the 1930's—which is true. If the dollar bought as much today as in 1939, our present national income would be only about $135,000,000,000; nevertheless we are now producing goods and services at a rate 80 per cent greater than in 1939, and we are doing this with ten or eleven million of our best workers in the armed forces.

NATIONAL INCOME CAN BE RAISED

This increase is due largely to the increased number of hours worked, but the output per man-hour was 3.9 per cent greater in 1940 than in 1935, 3 per cent greater in 1941 than in 1940, and 4.4 per cent above 1941 in 1942. The increase in output per man-hour in 1943 over 1942 appears to be still greater, although final figures are not yet available. Some such spurt in productivity was to be expected as industry readjusted itself to the loss of ten or eleven million of its youngest and strongest workers. According to the War Manpower Commission, we have not yet reached maximum efficiency in industry, but are actually wasting 20 per cent of our labor potential.

The increase in production since 1939 could have been achieved just as well in the years immediately following 1929. Two studies of our physical capacity made in 1934 show this to be true. These studies were made because it was apparent that the drop in production from $83,000,000,000 in 1929 to $39,000,000,000 in 1933 was due to man's failure to manage rather than to any act of God. Moreover, it was generally understood that even in 1929 our economy had operated far short of full capacity.

The Brookings Institution study, based upon our manufacturing plant capacity and taking into consideration availability of labor and other limiting factors, arrived at the conclusion that we might have produced 19 per cent more goods and services in 1929 than we actually did. The national survey of potential product capacity made by Loeb and Associates and sponsored by the New York Housing Authority approached the problem from another angle. It sought to learn, first, whether we could provide our 130,000,000 people with adequate housing, food, clothing, education, professional care, and recreation, and then, having set standards for these necessities, to determine their value. It concluded that production could be raised at least to the $135,000,000,000 mark.

DOES PRIVATE ENTERPRISE FEAR THE MACHINE?

A few weeks ago the national organization of the machine-tool industry announced that the machine-tool producing companies intended to seek a refund of all excess-profits taxes. The reasons given were that the industry, in cooperating with the government's war program, had destroyed its market for the next ten or fifteen years; production had been at the rate of $40,000,000 a year during the eight or nine years following 1929, but had now been stepped up to $1,320,000,000. The announcement pointed out that if excess profits were refunded, the companies could keep their laboratory work up to date and in this way be in a position to produce high-grade machine tools when they were called upon to do so, perhaps ten or fifteen years from now.

If we are going back to the production levels of the pre-war 1930's, no one can take exception to the position of the machine-tool industry, but what a travesty the whole situation must seem to the industrially backward peoples of the world who still dream of some day bringing raw materials, machines, and man-power together. Indeed, we do not need to leave the United States to find people who view it in the same way. We have at least two states where the per capita income during the last fifteen years or so has been below $200 a year. In these states most of the people work part of the year at planting, tending, and harvesting the cotton crop; the rest of the time they might properly be listed as unemployed. Millions of people in the United States have no more idea what a machine tool looks like than the Russian peasants had twenty years ago. Industrialization of the regions where they live would not only raise the per capita income and the living standards of these people but further the strength and welfare of the whole country.

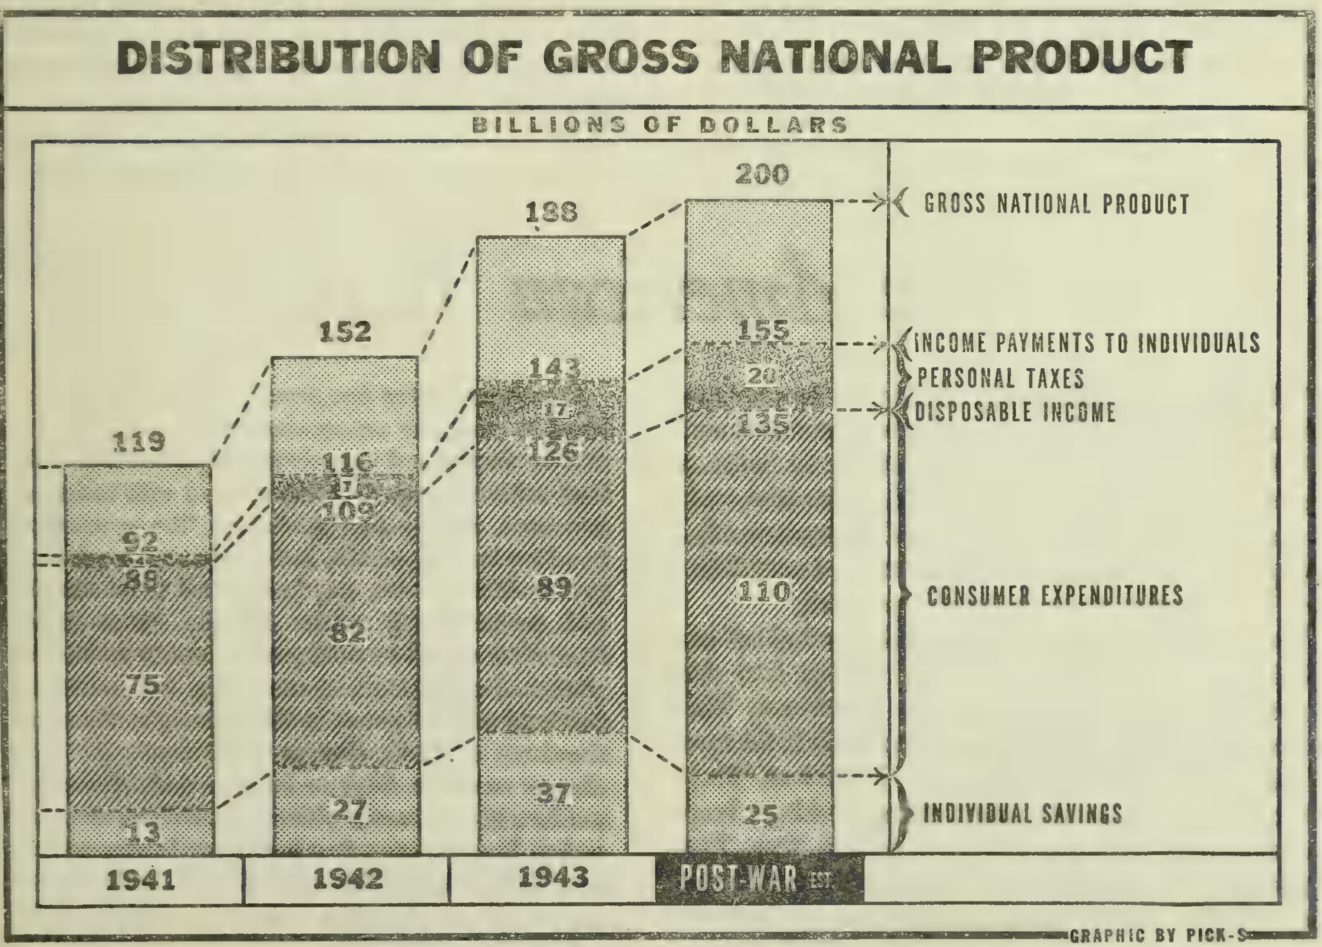
"THE INORDINATE PRODUCTIVITY OF THE MACHINE"

Thorstein Veblen frequently referred to the inordinate productivity of the machine, but one wonders whether he ever foresaw a situation in which we could, in a few years, make so many machines with which to produce goods that the manufacturers of these machines would seek a fifteen-year moratorium on their production. The irony of the situation was well illustrated when the machine-tool industry sent a spokesman to the Lend-Lease Agency the day after Mussolini fell, to see if it could not get the job of retooling Italian industry.

In Soviet Russia the output of the machine and metal-working industry rose from 1,100,000,000 rubles in 1913 to 2,200,000,000 in 1928. By 1937 it had risen to 24,700,000,000 rubles. In 1930, 20 per cent of Russian income went into capital goods. This figure finally rose to 30 per cent, and the Webbs think that it may have got as high as 40 per cent. Here we have the explanation of how Russia in a relatively brief period was able to build an industrial plant that has enabled it to bear and throw back the massed attack of Hitler's armies.

Recently I had the opportunity to spend several evenings with a well-known industrial engineer who had had three extended assignments in Soviet Russia and then one of several months in Chungking. In Russia he had served as a consultant in working out the various five-year plans. His experience made him very positive that we would have little difficulty in operating our economic system during peace time at present levels. He was also confident that with a national plan in force we could in a few years produce an income of $200,000,000,000 a year.

It seems to me that this engineer was talking sense. It is, of course, plain that we cannot shift over immediately from making $100,000,000,000 worth of war goods to making $100,000,000,000 worth of goods for peace; but, after all, the raw material that men and machines make into war-time goods can be made by men and machines into peace-time goods provided we have a plan and the will to carry it out. With the return of 11,000,000 of our most efficient workers, it should not be difficult in the next decade to reach a production level of $200,000,000,000 in terms of net national income measured in 1939 dollars. Scientific and technological advances have been extraordinarily rapid during the past few years. In the decade following peace, by utilizing this knowledge in the field of peace-time production, we should be able to achieve an increase of 5 per cent a year.



DISTRIBUTION OF A $200,000,000,000 GROSS INCOME

In discussing an economy based on a national gross production of $200,000,000,000, such as is expected in 1944, we shall be aided by a brief glance at the chart on page 635. Distribution of such a gross income would be roughly as follows: total business taxes, federal, state, and local, $30,000,000,000; depreciation and depletion, $8,500,000,000; other business reserves, $1,000,000,000 plus; capital outlays charged to current expenses, $1,600,000,000. With business costs and deductions totaling $41,500,000,000, there is left a net income of $158,000,000,000, of which $6,000,000,000 is held back by corporations for social security and special reserves. Total federal and state personal taxes will amount to $22,000,000,000, leaving a net disposable income of $130,000,000,000. Of this sum $90,000,000,000 will be spent for consumer goods and services, and $40,000,000,000 will be left over for savings.

But of course we are dealing with a war situation, in which the quantity of consumer goods available for purchase is limited. When we return to peace-time conditions the amount spent for consumption will be considerably increased, but it will not absorb all the money that now goes into savings. It is reasonable to suppose that instead of $40,000,000,000 in savings we shall have $20,000,000,000 or $25,000,000,000. In addition to the money saved by individuals, there will also be available for new factories, machinery, and equipment—that is, capital formation—the sums that are set aside by corporations for depreciation, depletion, and special reserves, totaling about $8,500,000,000.

THE SAVING HABITS OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

In 1929, $20,300,000,000 was invested in our productive system in the form of tools in the widest sense. Over the last twenty years the average has been about $14,000,000,000, the low point of $3,100,000,000 having been reached during 1932.

The idea that thrift is one of the greatest of all virtues has sunk more deeply into the mind of the American people than bankers are likely to believe. In 1932 we saved about 6½ per cent of our gross national income. In 1940 we saved about $17,600,000,000 out of a national income of about $75,000,000,000. As national income goes up, the amount set aside as savings increases much faster than the national income increases. It is the belief of most economists that approximately one-third would be saved out of any national income above the level of $75,000,000,000.

If from $30,000,000,000 to $40,000,000,000 a year must be diverted to new buildings, equipment, and machinery in order to maintain full employment, the saving habits of the American people are of great value to us. This is an advantage that was not possessed by Russia during the 1930's, when an authoritarian government decided to turn 30 to 40 per cent of that country's gross national production into capital investment. The propensity of the American people to save means that we shall have sufficient sums for large-scale capital formation without having to pay high interest. And since our people save, we must provide a place where their money can be invested. Otherwise stagnation occurs, and eventually depression of a kind that wipes out savings.

The American Way

IN THE old days the policy of helping the common man by helping private enterprise was known as the "American system." Aid was doled out to business in many ways—by the protective tariff, by bounties, and by public works (then called internal improvements). Today the protective tariff has ceased to be a useful device, but the other methods are still practiced.

The basic need at present—and this is admitted on all sides—is to reinject profits and savings into the economic bloodstream through new investment. The monopolists tell us that this can be done only if the lure of individual profits stimulates new investment. They insist that the government must, above all things, keep its hands off. But this is not the American Way. The American Way has been for the government to take the lead and give financial encouragement to private interests and enterprise. Here, for example, is what Hamilton said:

> Experience teaches that men are often so much governed by what they are accustomed to see and practice that the simplest and most obvious improvements, in the most ordinary occupations, are adopted with hesitation, reluctance, and by slow gradations. The spontaneous transition to new pursuits, in a community long habituated to different ones, may be expected to be attended with proportionately greater difficulty. When former occupations ceased to yield profit adequate to the subsistence of employment, or when there was an absolute deficiency of employment in them, owing to the superabundance of hands, changes would ensue; but these changes would be likely to be more tardy than might consist with the interest either of individuals or of the society. In many cases they would not happen while a bare support would be insured by an adherence to ancient courses, though a resort to a more profitable employment might be practicable. To produce the desirable changes as early as may be expedient may therefore require the incitement and patronage of the government.

Although Hamilton was talking primarily of the introduction of manufactures and was arguing for a protective tariff as the principal but not exclusive form of government aid, his words are equally applicable to the task of stimulating investment. Experience certainly demonstrates, as Hamilton pointed out, that new investment, if left to purely private initiative, is "likely to be more tardy than might consist with the interest either of individuals or of the society," and that "countenance and support from the government" are necessary to "overcome the obstacles inseparable from first experiments."

Indeed, while the protective tariff was the favorite form of government patronage for developing at home the industries that already existed abroad, government spending to support the general pulse of economic activity also played an important role in the traditional "American system." Hamilton started the country on the road to prosperity by refinancing at par the heavily depreciated debts of the Revolution. This tremendous expansion of the outstanding public debt was the equivalent—on a larger scale—of the payment of the soldiers' bonus in 1936. Far from being frightened at the idea of a large public debt, Hamilton declared that a "national debt, if it is not excessive, will be to us a national blessing."

At a later date government spending for internal improvements, land grants for railroads, and free land for agricultural homesteads played the same role that the expansion of the debt played in Hamilton's time. Giving away the wealth of the public domain in order to develop the prosperity of our citizens does not differ in any essential respect from the modern device of government borrowing of the people's savings in order to promote the people's prosperity.

GOVERNMENT AID FOR INDUSTRY AN ESTABLISHED POLICY

Government aid for industry has been developing without our being aware of it ever since the disappearance of "free land" in 1897. But because it has developed without our knowledge, we have failed to see its full implications or to pursue the policy aggressively during periods of crisis. The automobile boom was made possible by the public expenditure of $19,000,000,000 for motor highways. Similarly, the favorable balance of trade that we enjoyed in the '20's was made possible by government sponsorship of loans and credits abroad—bolstered partly by the Dawes and Young plans—totaling some $10,000,000,000. When the Great Depression came, we dropped our public-works expenditures and our foreign loans, and after allowing the economy to sink to starvation levels we timidly resorted to a $3,000,000,000 WPA program, largely devoted to leaf-raking projects.

We have still a frontier to exploit. This is the frontier dividing full employment and a national income of $200,000,000,000 from secular stagnation with a national income of $70,000,000,000 and a $3,000,000,000 WPA. Without $3,000,000,000 of government spending we should perhaps sink to the level of 1932, when our income was about $40,000,000,000. Undoubtedly, however, we shall spend $5,000,000,000 a year or more for relief and public works even with a Republican Administration.

A CHALLENGE TO SMALL BUSINESS

The small business man should take the lead in opposing a policy that would put us back at the production levels of 1939, for it is small business that would suffer most if this were done. Further, small business ought to take the initiative in trying to convince the public of the necessity of a full-employment program.

History has shown that reforms are seldom adopted until some vested interest finds it to its interest to collaborate in securing their adoption. In the present situation a return to 1939 levels would eliminate not only large numbers of small business men but even some of the leading companies in such diverse fields as shipbuilding, aircraft, aluminum, and chemicals. If individual business men, realizing that the program of the N. A. M. and the Chamber of Commerce holds no future for them, would organize a League of Business Men for Full Production, public sentiment could be very easily mobilized behind such a program.

It may be argued that labor organizations ought to take the lead because labor receives two-thirds of the net national income. But labor leaders have always been inclined to concentrate their attention on straight trade-union activities. The farmers should also be interested because they receive about 10 per cent of the national income, whether that income be large or small. But the farmers have been taken in perhaps more completely by the propaganda of big business than any other group in our society. Units of big business are less concerned about the size of the national income than any other group because they are usually able to show some profit, however bad the economic conditions; the managers of big business, with their regular salaries, need never worry.

But small business men, shoe-string business men, are in a completely different situation. If the national income is at a very high level they can make excellent profits. If it is reduced by a third or a half a large proportion of them are certain to go to the wall. This will be particularly true in the post-war period because their big competitors will have advantages they never enjoyed before.

If the national government undertook to maintain full employment by channeling back into the field of investment enough savings and government credit to keep everyone employed, there would be a minimum degree of interference with private business. There need be no further interference with the manufacture and sale of consumer goods. The government would be simply guaranteeing that the consumers of America would have from $120,000,000,000 to $150,000,000,000 a year to spend for consumer goods in a competitive market, with emphasis upon the word "competitive."

It may be taken for granted that if public opinion would support a program of this kind it would also insist that business men forgo all monopoly advantage. Enterprising men with new ideas would always be given a chance to demonstrate the value of what they have to offer, while the inefficient and the unimaginative would be crowded out. The situation might again become such a one as the proponents of free enterprise dream of—namely, one in which there is a steady procession of imaginative and efficient men into the field and an exodus of those who no longer have any contribution to make. Under such an arrangement there would not be socialization of the means of production, but there would be socialization of the purposes of production.

The economic monopolists, of course, would fight such a program because it would deprive them of the economic control now in their hands. But the small business man ought to recognize that only in a system of this nature can he exercise what he terms "the right of free enterprise."

Spending for High Consumption

THE United States has been a great industrial nation for so long that when people here are confronted with any kind of production problem, they naturally think first of the plant facilities that will be required. Whether it is a question of producing aluminum, tanks, aircraft, or ammunition, the first thing considered is the adequacy of the existing plant. If it is not adequate, additional facilities are built. Thus when the war broke out, our first job was plant construction. Today, after spending $15,000,000,000, the government owns 50 per cent of the country's aluminum plant, 92 per cent of its magnesium plant, 10 per cent of its steel plant, 100 per cent of its synthetic-rubber and high-octane-gasoline plant, 50 per cent of its machine-tool plant, and 90 per cent of its aircraft plant.

Altogether, our production facilities are now turning out new goods at the rate of $200,000,000,000 a year, roughly half of them being for the war effort. As a country we can produce the goods and services that make a high-consumption economy possible. But as individuals or families the majority of Americans do not have a plant that makes it possible for them to enjoy a high-consumption standard. We have the capacity to fill every home with modern furniture, kitchen equipment, radios, refrigerators, but many of these things would be grotesquely out of place in the homes of "the most poorly housed modern nation in the world." The home is where a high standard of living begins. That is where any kind of planning worthy of the name must start.

OUR HOUSING IS IN BAD SHAPE

Of 7,000,000 farm homes, only about 15 per cent have running water and electric lights. In most cases, if these burned to the ground, the insurance adjuster would have little difficulty in settling the loss for less than $2,000. In a high-consumption economy 90 per cent of our present farm homes would be as much out of place as a share-cropper's shack in an exclusive residential area.

Of 30,000,000 urban homes 2,300,000 require major repairs; 3,400,000 others lack private baths. Ninety per cent of our 24,000,000 single-family units are worth less than $7,500 a piece; the average value is less than half that sum.

When business men dream of the post-war world they see a great horn of plenty showering Americans with gadgets in return for their $64,000,000,000 of savings. But the dream is fantastic. Automatic heat, for example, is one of our greatest inventions. But in half of our 37,000,000 homes automatic heat would be ridiculously inappropriate. A really modern kitchen is a wonder to behold, and so is a well-equipped laundry. But where would the gadgets be placed in our 20,000,000 poorest houses, where there is hardly room to turn around? A house has to be designed for these conveniences if they are to be easily and effectively utilized. If all American families had adequate houses, it would be possible to conceive of a tremendous demand for comfortable beds, living-room furniture, air-conditioning equipment, F-M radios, and television receivers. But one look at our housing plant should disillusion us.

A pamphlet entitled "The Role of the Housebuilding Industry," published in July, 1942, by the National Resources Planning Board, contains a housing program which proposes that farmhouses be constructed at an average cost of $3,700, and urban houses at an average cost of $3,400. It should be obvious that a housing program keyed to this level means the continuance of a $70,000,000,000-a-year national income. It would do little to raise our national income above the level of the 1930's. And if that is to be the post-war level, we do not need a housing program at all, because we are already over-housed—not, of course, in terms of human needs but in terms of what we can afford on a $70,000,000,000 national income. That our housing plant was better than we could afford during the '30's is shown by the fact that it deteriorated steadily during the whole of that decade, seeking a level that our income could support.

During the 1930's rentals did not pay for the economic value of the shelter provided. While this fact was not generally understood by tenants, it was understood by thousands of landlords, who could not obtain high enough rentals to prevent the gradual but steady depreciation of their properties.

If we recognize that we are now producing goods and services at the rate of $200,000,000,000 a year, and if we believe that a high-consumption economy will be possible when we convert to peace-time production, let us start to think in terms of houses that would cost $10,000 or even $12,000 to build according to present standards. Such a house belongs to a high-consumption economy and would support and stabilize it. A $3,400 or $3,700 dwelling unit does not belong and would help to make a high-consumption economy an impossibility.

A $200,000,000,000-a-year economy is no longer an ox-cart economy. It is rather a high-speed-airplane economy, in which a high level of production has to be maintained to keep it from stalling. Too many of our citizens are like the mother whose son joined the air corps in the last war. When she learned of it she asked him to promise her faithfully that he would keep close to the ground and not fly fast.

OUR CITIES NEED REPLANNING

Almost half of our population lives in cities of more than 100,000 inhabitants. These cities are the despair of every person who thinks in terms of the more abundant life. Yet we must find a way to make them good places to live in, not only for people in early manhood, but for children and old people as well. That means we shall have to replan and rebuild them. And replanning must be bold and imaginative—on a large scale—in terms of square miles rather than of city blocks. But before the rebuilding can be undertaken, large areas must be freed from the bonds of debt. Creditors' claims can be amortized over a period of years. The federal government could properly absorb a large part of them in order to expedite the whole process of reconstruction. Also, through a public-works program, it might well take the responsibility for widening streets, laying out parks, and making the other improvements that are incidental to the creation of a neighborhood.

In areas where the government has contributed a large part of the value of the site, the condition might be laid down that no house built should cost less than $10,000. The cry would of course be raised that this was favoring the rich—unless it was understood that we were trying to keep an airplane above stalling speed, and that those houses were meant to set a standard that was to be adhered to in rebuilding America.

The field of rural housing opens a unique opportunity. Farm homes have never received much attention from architects. They deserve, however, very serious attention, for they must be not only places to live in but places to work in. Here would be a good field in which to try out some of the new techniques of construction.

Laboratory work in the field of construction has never been done because there is no organization big enough to undertake it. Nor would any firm be financially justified in doing it, since the ultimate findings would naturally belong to the whole building industry. This laboratory job is one that properly belongs to the government. It should be the first item on the housing program.

CONSTRUCTION AND PUBLIC WORKS

To promote a vast housing program involving the redesigning and rebuilding of our metropolitan areas, the government might have to spend $2,000,000,000 in order to encourage an investment of $15,000,000,000 of private capital. It must also spend large sums on public works. The redesigning of our metropolitan areas will necessitate new public buildings. If all our children are to be given the opportunity to go through high school, many new schoolhouses will have to be built. Much work still remains to be done on water-power, irrigation, and rural-electrification projects. By its operations in this field the government can take up a great deal of slack if unemployment develops. Plans should be made well in advance so that efficient use can always be made of available labor. A normal expenditure of $3,000,000,000 a year is contemplated.

While most of the money spent under a security work program might be considered protection against unemployment, at least 50 per cent of the expenditure, including the labor spent on reforestation, flood control, and conservation, could be considered a productive national investment.

MODERNIZATION OF OUR MANUFACTURING PLANT

After the war it will be found that many of our largest manufacturing companies have utilized the last few years to effect the complete modernization of their manufacturing plant and equipment. Smaller companies will discover that, from a competitive standpoint, they are in much weaker shape than they were before the war. Since the public, as well as the smaller companies, will suffer, the government could very properly make it one of its goals to help bring the manufacturing plant of the country as a whole to the level of the most efficient of the large plants. To this end it could grant loans for new plant construction and new equipment at between 1 and 2 per cent interest; it could also buy up more or less obsolete equipment and either junk it or export it. One billion a year spent by the government in this way might lead to an expenditure of two billion a year by industry for an indeterminate period of time.

NEW INDUSTRIAL AREAS

Magnitogorsk, Gorki, Sverdlovsk, Stalino, Zaporozhe, Kuznetsk, Komsomolsk are Russian industrial cities whose output has served to stop Hitler. Twenty years ago these industrial areas were non-existent. While ours may be the leading industrial nation in the world, we still have states with a total population of perhaps thirty million where the labor supply is only partially and very inefficiently utilized. During the next ten or twenty years we ought to build industrial cities in these states and make use of this labor. To force the inhabitants to migrate to industrial states would only complicate the problem.

Here would be an opportunity for our ablest and most imaginative engineers and architects. Frank Lloyd Wright's Broadacre City might come into existence, and Bel Geddes's Futurama after a generation might seem a commonplace. Willow Run would be an excellent place for a first experiment: here we have the world's greatest factory located in the open country where there is no place for people to live. While hardship has resulted, Henry Ford may have rendered a real service in blocking a housing program at this time, for there is still a chance to make this an ideal industrial community. What could city planners not do here, with each residential unit costing $10,000 at the minimum!

The chart that follows shows the various ways in which government investment can help to maintain a high-level consumption economy. It is estimated that a total government investment of $10,500,000,000 would stimulate private investment of $20,000,000,000.

CAN WE AFFORD IT?

A few years ago we were told by the spokesmen for business that a deficit of three billion a year incurred to feed some twenty million people would lead to bankruptcy. Now these same spokesmen tell us that we cannot afford to lose the war no matter what it costs, and that there is no danger of national bankruptcy. One eminent professor of economics at Yale has even calculated that we can theoretically carry a debt load of four trillion!

Most people will remember that when the national debt was very small we paid interest at about twice the rate of 1.9 per cent that we now pay. In fact, the theoretical justification for interest—paying people for deferring present consumption for future enjoyment—has virtually disappeared. During the last fifteen years people have been saving more money than they could invest, quite apart from the payment of interest. This suggests that if business men strike against the government and refuse to invest their capital, the government might charge them a reasonable sum for keeping their capital idle.

The problem of debt as it affects government expenditures was well summed up by Alvin H. Hansen and Guy Greer in an article in Harper's last year:

> A government debt internally held is so completely different from an ordinary personal or business debt that it should hardly be called a debt at all. . . . The internal debt of a government need never be paid. It need never even be reduced, except (1) to prevent inflation (through taxation that produces a budgetary surplus); (2) to correct too great inequalities in the distribution of wealth and income; or (3) when it has become so large that taxation to service it disrupts the functioning of the economy.

These things, the authors went on to say, were all well understood by Alexander Hamilton 150 years ago.

A Strong Floor for Our Economy

THE Beveridge Report became a best seller shortly after its publication in England. The interest of the English people in it is not easily understood if we merely translate the terms of the Beveridge plan into similar provisions for this country, stated in dollars and cents. The sum of $8.08 a week for an unemployed man and his wife seems hardly enough to cause any excitement. Nor does $15 a week for a family with four or five children. But when we realize that the latter figure comes close to being an average weekly wage in many British industries, the plan appears in a different light. Translating shillings and pounds into dollars and cents does not give us a fair picture of what these shillings and pounds will buy for living purposes. The fact of the matter is that the allowances proposed in the Beveridge plan would provide the citizens of Great Britain with an income that would buy a passable standard of living.

The Beveridge plan did not propose drastic innovation in the British social-security system. Whereas the present social-security arrangements, public and private, cost £432,000,000 a year, the Beveridge plan would cost £697,000,000 to begin with and would increase till it reached £858,000,000 in 1965. Although the final cost would be only 25 per cent above what is now provided, it probably represents the maximum that the British economy could carry.

The plan has aroused such universal interest because it covers everyone, without regard to social status or wealth, and because the nature of the protection afforded is very full. It includes compensation for unemployment, disability, and loss of livelihood, old-age pensions, allowances for children, and special assistance to take care of sickness, childbirth, and funeral expenses. Since it protects the average man against most of the uncertainties that worry him, it would be a very real floor under the British economic system.

OUR BEVERIDGE PLAN CAN BE VERY SIMPLE

I believe we should adopt a plan that would call for the payment of $100 a month to all unemployed persons. While this may seem a drastic proposal, it would not strain our economy as severely as the Beveridge plan would strain the economy of Britain.

Such a plan is an integral part of a program of full employment. The amount may seem high in terms of the national income of the 1930's, but it will not be too high if we maintain substantially full employment. There are two reasons for saying such a plan is an integral part of a full-employment program. In the first place, the plan would be evidence that the promise of full employment was made in good faith. In the second place, public opinion would be ranged squarely behind the idea of putting everyone to work as soon as possible.

BANKRUPTCY OF OUR RELIEF POLICIES

During the days of the New Deal the liberals of the country were put in a difficult position by circumstances beyond their control. They were never able to make full employment the main issue. Instead, they were forced to choose between some kind of relief for the victims of our social blundering and no relief. The low-water mark in American political history was reached on January 13, 1939, when Congress voted against appropriating the money to continue relief at the pitifully low level then prevailing. The Republicans were almost solidly against the measure.

During the last year of the Hoover Administration the relief a destitute family received averaged less than $10 a month. Under the New Deal it rose to $30 or more during September of 1934. Then the tide started to turn. People who were reasonably secure began to be irked by the necessity of taking care of the insecure. By January of 1935 relief had dropped to $26 a month. At that time President Roosevelt proposed the security-wage system averaging $42 a month which came to be the WPA program. For a while this policy was held to, but public sentiment soon began to turn against the idea of boondoggling and made work. People came to realize that the whole WPA was a travesty on the efficient utilization of labor. I recall discussing this matter with the state manager of the WPA program in Wisconsin in 1938. When I suggested that they were not getting 30 per cent value for the money spent, he declared with some bitterness that they were probably not getting 10 per cent. In a sense it was the business community that was responsible for the WPA, because business men would not permit the unemployed to contribute their labor toward their own support or countenance large-scale public building. They objected to the latter on the ground that it would entail maintenance costs and higher taxes. Construction of roads, sewers, and other types of permanent improvements not involving cost of maintenance would have encroached on the field of other vested-interest groups.

The WPA program was politically indefensible, and if we ever try again to take care of part of the people outside the normal operations of the economic system, we shall experience the same unfortunate results. The standards of relief will drop lower and lower; the presence of a large number of unemployed will have a depressing effect on the whole wage structure; scarcity for all will become firmly established; and benefit will accrue only to the people holding the economic and political controls. We must base our program on the fact that the interests of all can best be served by utilizing the labor of everyone.

The preacher may exhort the members of his flock to remember that they are their brother's keeper. But it is not a popular doctrine, and it often happens that the more regularly a man goes to church the more likely he is to vote for a budget-balancer.

People react to the idea of providing relief for the unemployed just as they react to the idea of personally giving relief to any other class of people. If a natural disaster destroys the homes of half the people in a city, other people are generous and solicitous for a few months. But then the burden of helping their unfortunate neighbors becomes irksome. This feeling is soon rationalized into such ideas as: "The people who were burned out on the West Side always were shiftless," or "If they were any good they would be taking care of themselves by this time." Reports from Germany indicate that the inhabitants of rural areas feel the same way about refugees from Hamburg and other heavily bombed cities. People with fine country homes in England did not relish having them filled with cockney children from London.

Whatever we may do, we must never permit a situation to develop again where it is to the economic interest of one class of people to trample upon the class that is the victim of social insecurity.

In the 1930's there was rather general agreement that Negroes were not to have a place in our economy. This fact was well understood by union leaders and employment officials. I was told in 1939 in Chicago that many big companies refused to hire a person who had been on relief or who had had a member of his family on relief. Let us not make the mistake of thinking that this was merely the whim of some hard-boiled personnel manager. It was the inevitable outcome of a situation in which the people who were employed came to feel that they were carrying the burdens of the jobless. Naturally they felt that way—two-thirds of the people working part-time could not produce enough to provide plenty for all.

A large number of unemployed is of course a threat to the living standards of the employed, since there is bound to be competition between the two groups, and a small number in each group will cross back and forth. During the depression days some union leaders would have erected a barrier between the groups if they could have done so. Most labor leaders tended to see themselves as the representatives of their dues-paying members and had little interest in the unemployed. This was particularly noticeable during some of the hard fights for adequate relief in Congress.

We shall never be able to achieve abundance if we contrive things so that a majority can be made to feel that they will promote their own interests by working for scarcity. We must develop a willingness on the part of the majority to strive for the inclusion of all citizens in productive labor, and we must see that the cost of failure at any point does not fall on the victims of unemployment. During the 1930's advocates of the WPA program sought to convince farmers, business men, and employed workers that it was to the advantage of everyone to give the unemployed some purchasing power, but this argument was never very effective. People simply do not believe that a man who is not effectively employed should be properly paid. For this reason the chief emphasis should be placed not on the right of the individual to be efficiently employed but on the responsibility of society to see that he is efficiently employed. If society demands of a man that he accept work but is not prepared to give him a job, it is only reasonable that he should be properly paid as long as he is ready and willing to discharge his obligation to society.

ONLY UNEMPLOYMENT CAN CHEAT THE PEOPLE OF ABUNDANCE

A program calling for the payment of $100 a month to the unemployed ought to be accompanied by certain safeguards. It is only reasonable, for instance, that a person should not be paid more by way of compensation than he normally earns when employed. Certain people should perhaps not be considered to be among the unemployed. There are perhaps a million people in this country possessing only limited capacity for work. There are others who are just natural malingerers, and of course large numbers of young people come into the labor market every year who have had no training and, what is worse, have never learned what it is to work. For these there should be something combining the features of the C. C. C. and the N. Y. A., but more diversified in scope. Its purpose should be to train people and give them necessary work experience. There should also be a long-range program of continuing public works to meet such needs as reforestation, soil conservation, and flood control. The men engaged in this kind of work should be paid a flat salary of $100 a month, plus maintenance. Every citizen, so far as possible, should be permitted to learn any type of work for which he is fitted. A public-works program should not only give each individual a chance to secure training for a better job but also pay him enough so that he might eventually be economically free to try out ideas of his own.

This provision is an essential part of the $100-a-month simplified "Beveridge plan." It would give society the means of protecting itself from people who do not want to work, and it would also insure to the individual a minimal type of employment paying enough to allow him to make another start.

The Plan for an International RFC

A PLAN to set up an International Bank with a capital of $10,000,000,000 to aid in the rehabilitation of the stricken nations of the world and to facilitate the movement of raw materials in payment for capital goods is being discussed. This plan must be carried out if there is not to be chaos all over the world when the Axis countries have been defeated. Seven out of ten Americans now realize that in our own self-interest we cannot afford to revert to an isolationist policy. The American people will undoubtedly back a program calling on them to assume responsibility in the rest of the world, for they know that if we do not sit at the council table when a policy for managing the world is decided, this policy will be against our interest. The average man understands this instinctively, in spite of all the isolationist arguments.

AN EXPORT PROGRAM REQUIRES FULL EMPLOYMENT AT HOME

A number of sincere people, seeing that the world could probably use $500,000,000,000 worth of capital equipment in the next twenty years, regard this market as an outlet for any surplus of capital this country might possess. These people think that we shall probably have a high degree of economic activity for several years after the war has ended, that during the emergency we shall have to export large amounts of food and equipment to the rest of the world, and that when the emergency is ended we shall be able to export capital goods. They foresee an international RFC that will enable us to maintain over an extended period of time what we euphemistically term "a favorable balance of trade."

I do not believe that such a course will be acceptable to our people. For the past year the isolationist newspapers in the United States have worked hard to turn public opinion against it. It is my judgment, based upon campaigning for public office, that the American people will be easily prejudiced against furnishing the rest of the world with capital equipment. In 1929 the per capita income in twelve states was less than $200 a year. In three-fourths of our states it was well under $400. It would not be difficult for an isolationist politician to go to the people of these states and point out that the machine tools, the farm machinery, or the plant equipment sent to this or the other country could to much better advantage be used to raise their own living standards. It would be particularly easy if a large number of people were on relief.

The proponents of an export program would of course point out that the machinery would be paid for in raw materials and consumer goods, but unfortunately in a depression economy such an explanation would only make things worse. Industrial workers would be afraid that they would lose their jobs if imports to pay for capital equipment were to come in from any foreign country, especially a country like India or China with traditionally low standards of living.

Only with full employment at home could we go through with a program of this kind. It would be possible to do it then because working people would not be afraid of losing their jobs. With everybody working it might seem wise to export locomotives, rails, lathes, and other kinds of capital goods in return for cocoa, rubber, tea, hemp, silk, and even processed consumer goods, and it might seem a reasonable idea to permit a favorable balance of trade of several billion dollars a year. But if we think that we could do a huge export business with economic activity at the level that prevailed between 1933 and 1941, we forget the popular resentment resulting from the failure of our allies to pay their war debts after the last war and from the loss of some ten billion dollars exported between 1920 and 1929. Similar resentment will be aroused against further export of capital after this war if we do not first embark on a program reasonably calculated to obtain full employment at home.

That this analysis of public opinion is correct is indicated by a resolution adopted by the national convention of the American Legion last September. The resolution urged that "all immigration be barred from the United States from the date of the end of hostilities of the present war until unemployment has dropped to less than 1,000,000." In the course of the House debate on repeal of the Chinese Exclusion Law, Representative Allen of Louisiana offered an amendment embodying the Legion proposal, but it was held to be out of order. Otherwise it might easily have been adopted, for the temper of this Congress is not unlike the temper of the Legion, or the temper of the American people as shown in the November election.

An Appeal to Responsibility

AS WE come closer to the post-war world and people's hopes and aspirations for this period become reasonably clear, conservative leaders realize that there can be no return to the irresponsibility of 1931 and 1932. They still hope, however, to return to the conditions that prevailed during the first eight years of the New Deal. Beyond that, they would like to weaken labor organizations and to shift as large a part of the cost of government as possible to the low-income groups. This is well illustrated by the fact that the legislators of fifteen states have memorialized Congress to limit federal income taxes to 25 per cent. Labor, for its part, is coming to realize that the rights it has won cannot be put away in cold storage and still be available for use whenever occasion may require. Freda Kirchwey, editor of The Nation, reported recently that workingmen in England are determined to keep the factories in operation after the war if they have to use machine-guns to do it. Workingmen in the United States also have a militancy today that was impossible during the pre-war period of curtailed operations.

A large part of Europe and Asia will inevitably come under the influence of the Russian idea after the fighting stops. Many of our responsible leaders are beginning to realize that the threat of Russia is not military in nature but ideological. The United States News of September 3, expressed this view succinctly:

> At bottom, however, the deep official concern is over Russia's example.
> First, Russia can make Germany work for her to replace destroyed goods. U. S. and Britain cannot do the same without interfering with private trade.
>
> Second, Russia can keep full employment, with government running everything. U. S. and Britain may face serious post-war employment problems.
> Third, Russia may give the appearance of post-war progress as undeveloped resources are exploited on a planned basis, often utilizing war-developed transport and machinery.

We did not feel the impact of this situation in the pre-war era of depression because not till 1937 and 1938 were Russia's accomplishments under its system of economic planning understood in this country, and then only by a few students of the subject. After that the menace of the approaching war absorbed our attention. In the post-war world the opinion-forming industries will not find it possible to poison the minds of the people against Russia in the way that they did before the war.

After the three-power conference in Moscow was announced, the semi-official Russian newspapers carried a number of articles by Professor Y. E. Varga, a Hungarian refugee who is now one of the leading academicians of Russia. These articles proposed that Russia should require Germany to furnish 10,000,000 laborers for a period of ten years to repair the damage caused by German armies in Russia, Poland, and the Balkans. This was something quite new and revolutionary to our mode of economic thinking. When Germany sought to send a large number of construction workers to build houses in France in the 1920's as the only way in which it could meet its reparation payments, the offer was refused. The significance of Professor Varga's suggestion will not be lost on the American people. They will see in it proof that Russia has an economic system that can provide an outlet for all the creative energy of its citizens and in addition utilize enemy man-power to advantage.

If Russia has full employment after the war while we continue to be plagued with extensive unemployment, this fact will make its impact upon the minds of the American people without regard to class or occupation. They will properly wonder whether Hitler and Hirohito did us harm at Pearl Harbor when they caused our gross output to jump from $119,000,000,000 to $200,000,000,000, or whether they did us a favor when they signed an armistice that caused us to drop back to our pre-war depression levels of production. And if the people who manage American industry can offer no leadership in achieving full employment, the people will see that this group is removed from future control. Throughout history ruling classes that failed to discharge obvious responsibilities have been harshly dealt with.

It was indicative of the spirit of our time that James Burnham's book "The Managerial Revolution" had such a vogue among business men a few years ago. So far as

A PROGRAM FOR PROGRESSIVES

American Labor believes that all Liberals and Progressives everywhere have a joint stake in the following minimum program for the war and post-war world:

¶ To wrest victory from the Axis Powers at the earliest possible moment. This is the cardinal task. All else must be subordinated to it.

¶ To insure the peace by permitting each free people to fashion the form of government and economy best suited to its needs.

¶ To encourage the free and untrammeled activity of the people's movements as the Allies advance upon the European continent.

¶ To oppose at home any grandiose plans for a new American imperialism.

¶ To insist upon an economy of abundance available to all men everywhere as a further guarantee of permanent peace. This program must assure full employment, plus a wide range of social security and decent national income levels.

¶ To continue close and constant collaboration among the United Nations, after the victory is won.

THE AMALGAMATED CLOTHING WORKERS OF AMERICA, representing 325,000 members working and living in 32 States of the Union, firmly believes that the Program of the CIO Committee on Political Action, endorsed and implemented by more than FIVE MILLION CIO members throughout the country, offers the best means for achieving the above desired ends. It envisions the mobilization not only of the FOURTEEN MILLION members of organized labor and their families, but also the MILLIONS of enlightened professionals, small businessmen and working farmers who have a joint stake in a world organized to elevate the living standards of all men in all lands in which the possibility of an expanding economy remains boundless.

The nature of the peace will be determined by the people. They have it within their power to fashion it after their own needs and aspirations. Organized and united, no force on earth can stop them short of their goal.

AMALGAMATED CLOTHING WORKERS OF AMERICA

15 Union Square New York City

I know, this was the first book on political philosophy that any substantial number of business men ever took the trouble to read. Apparently they were eager to be assured that they were performing an essential function and that, come what might, they would probably be secure as long as they continued in a useful capacity. When they try to give more thorough consideration to the nature of their responsibilities as managers they do not seem to get beyond following the leadership of the Chamber of Commerce or the N. A. M. Various polls taken by Fortune and other samplers of public opinion reveal that our business men, big and small, entertain precisely the ideas that were recently incorporated in the policy report of the American Bankers' Association.

Concerning this report the conservative Financial News of London made the following editorial comment in its issue of September 18:

> This report may be called the Bourbon Plan, on the evidence it offers of the inability of its authors to learn anything or forget anything. . . . According to the spokesmen of the American bankers, all that is needed to bring a happy post-war world is rigidly stable currencies free from any exchange restriction. And the way to achieve this ideal state of affairs is by the elimination of all form of government intervention ("obstacles to initiative and enterprise") and the termination of "deficit financing" through the strict balancing of budgets.
> Having read the abstracts from the report that are available on this side, one is inclined to rub one's eyes to make sure one is not dreaming. Is it really possible that well-informed and thoughtful people should allow themselves to be so blinded to realities by their belief in hard money at all costs?
>
> Have they failed to learn anything from their own pre-war experience?
>
> The A. B. A. lost many of its members a little over ten years ago through the widespread difficulties that affected bankers in the United States, and these difficulties were brought about by precisely those conditions whose restoration is now advocated by the survivors of the storm—who owe their survival, incidentally, to the very government intervention they are now so anxious to eliminate.
> There is absolutely nothing in the report which suggests that the bankers have realized the necessity for any measures to prevent the recurrence of the boom of 1929 and the subsequent slump.

After this glance at the problems that will confront us in the post-war world, let us look again briefly at the program that the American business man has in store for us. Here it is: (1) Reduce taxes. (2) Labor must be reasonable. (3) Observe constitutional morality in defining rights of property. (4) The government should balance the budget and refrain from interfering with business. (5) Let business men stabilize the economic system.

Do our business men who see themselves as the actual managers of the United States believe for a minute that the program they are advocating offers any reasonable hope of providing work for 15,000,000,000 men who will be unemployed if 1939 levels of production prevail? Do they believe that they will have discharged their obligations as a ruling class well enough to be permitted to continue in the positions they now hold? If they do, they ought to ask themselves seriously why it is that English financial editors, upon reading their program for the future, "simply rub their eyes" and say that this thing cannot be. Is it, indeed, possible that American business men have learned nothing since 1929?

Out of this war will come the rapid industrialization of congested India and China. It is arrant lack of realism for us to imagine that in the kind of world that is emerging, the Western Hemisphere, with a tenth of the world's population, can keep control of two or three times its share of the world's wealth without efficiently utilizing it. Only 55 per cent of the 170,000,000 people in North America can normally be said to be efficiently employed within the prevailing economy. Between the Rio Grande and Panama are 25,000,000 people, 90 per cent of whom live in a pre-capitalist environment in which they can eke out only the barest kind of subsistence living. In the United States during the '30's 11,000,000 persons, on the average, were unemployed, not counting the half of our 6,500,000 farmers who produce less than 10 per cent of the food that reaches the marketplace. Most of our colored people were excluded from participation in the economy. The situation in Canada was little different from that in the United States.

History tells us that those peoples have always prevailed that could support the largest population on a given area. But the greater efficiency that the peoples of one country seem to display in comparison with their neighbors may turn out to be short-lived, for historical change is being rapidly accelerated by the "locomotive of war."

A careful examination of our position in the post-war world should show people with a sense of responsibility that we must not attempt to return to the old order of things. Apart from considerations of national interest, our business and professional leaders ought to see that our economic forms have moved completely away from our social forms, and that a fundamental and revolutionary change is inevitable. People are going to demand that they be given a chance to function. The imperative of this period may be summed up in the term "full employment."

MARX OR KEYNES?

Russia's experience during the past fifteen years suggests that communism is one possible answer to the problem of how to attain full employment. The experience of this country and of England has shown that full employment may be achieved for the purpose of prosecuting a war. But critics contend that with private ownership of the means of production it is not possible to operate a planned economy for the purposes of peace. In reply, a large and growing number of economists would say that this contention is based upon theoretical considerations that no longer conform to reality. What the state does in time of war is not to socialize the means of production but to socialize the purposes of production to the end of winning the war. It accomplishes this by the simple expedient of becoming a coordinator of economic activities rather than just an umpire. In time of peace, these economists point out, the purpose of production ought to be to give all citizens the high living standards that our productive capacity makes possible. The state's responsibility as coordinator of economic activities would merely be to provide opportunities for the investment of savings and to make certain that those savings were channeled into investments. While followers of J. M. Keynes might disagree about the procedure to be followed, they would generally admit that this was the end to be sought and the broad way of achieving that end.

For responsible people, who feel it is obligatory to maintain full employment in peace as well as in war, there are two valid programs—the Communist program and the program of J. M. Keynes. The Communist program is distasteful to people now in a position of leadership in that it looks forward to their removal and their supercession by representatives of the proletariat. While this course has been eminently justified in Soviet Russia, the success achieved there has been at a price that does not need to be paid in countries with long traditions of democracy.

The French Revolution resulted from the refusal of the representatives of a feudal order to recognize the economic reality of a rapidly growing middle class. But after the revolution had been fought in France, it was unnecessary to fight it out in every other country. The world was not big enough for the ideas of feudalism and laissez faire capitalism to exist together. The Russian Revolution overturned the old absolutist order in Russia and socialized both the means and the purposes of production, thus permitting the participation of all citizens in the economy. In this shrinking world there is not going to be room for a system that provides full employment and full participation of its citizens in the organic processes of the economy alongside a system that is stabilized with two-thirds of the people inside the economy and one-third outside, while big business wields the real power.

During the last twenty-five years we have learned that it may be possible to by-pass the question of socializing the means of production by socializing the purposes of production. Thus we may eventually achieve, in the words of Professor Keynes, the "euthanasia of the rentier class." The many excellent and practical suggestions made by Keynes for achieving this "euthanasia" with a minimum of social disturbance are valued so highly by the practical-minded British that they have rewarded the professor with a barony.

While a majority of American economists are in essential agreement with the views of Lord Keynes, few of them would dare confess this lest they be permitted to toil no longer in their respective vineyards. The diehard conservatism of our owning-ruling class perplexes British business men, who have the realism to see that "full employment" will be the imperative of the future and that if it cannot be achieved under present leadership, then other leadership must be provided. The members of the Union League Club, if they possess the intelligence that a ruling class must have for survival, will hang the picture of Lord Keynes in the place of honor. Otherwise the picture of Marx will be hung there, but they will not be on hand to see it.

A Program for Political Action

As I watch the political alignments that are forming for the post-war period, I have the feeling that the situation is not very different from what it was when I entered the political arena some twelve years ago. At that time people were dimly aware that our national income had dropped from $83,000,000,000 to less than half that amount through man-made failure rather than through any act of God. There was also a general realization that we had operated far from capacity in 1929 and that under the right management income might as easily have gone up $45,000,000,000 as down by that amount. People expressed their feelings by voting against Mr. Hoover, who had become personally unpopular. When Roosevelt assumed office, he had fairly complete support for any steps that he might have chosen to take. There was little in the program that he sponsored, with the exception of the Tennessee Valley Authority and support of labor's right to organize for collective bargaining, that might not have been sponsored by an intelligent conservative.

Writing of this period in Harper's for October, 1939, under the heading "Roosevelt, the Rich Man's Alibi," Elmer Davis said:

> I venture to suggest that there is one class in American society (besides federal office-holders) which owes him not only affirmative but enthusiastic support; which ought to back him not merely for a third term but for life tenure. This is big business. To the leaders of industry, commerce, and finance Mr. Roosevelt has been such a godsend as they could not have dared to hope for in the dark days of 1932. . . .
>
> They [big business] ought to be the most zealous third-termers in the country. So long as Roosevelt is in the White House they are spared the painful effort of trying to think; spared, it may be, the still more painful confession that even if they tried to think no thoughts would come.

THE REAL ISSUE IN 1932-40

At the time I felt very keenly that the real issue was not between irresponsible reaction and realistic conservatism. I had the hope, with many others, that it might be possible to show that the real issue was between the stabilization of the economic system at a low level, as the New Deal was doing, and a program of capacity operation and full employment. In 1933 I joined with others in calling a conference of liberals in Chicago. Out of this conference came the Farmer-Labor Political Federation, of which I served as chairman until another conference was called in 1935, at which the Farmer-Labor Federation became the American Commonwealth Federation. I continued to serve as chairman of this organization until March of 1936, when it became plain that organized labor believed that the lines were drawn between straight unintelligent reaction, as exemplified by the Republican Party, and Roosevelt's realistic conservatism, which had given labor the right to organize; this, it felt, was a first step that must be protected at all costs. Under the circumstances it was plain that if the Commonwealth Federation stayed in the field it would only play into the hands of the Coughlinites and other third-party factions. The Federation, with its program of full production, was therefore dropped.

From the vantage-point of the physical world of tomorrow it will be hard to understand how from 1932 to 1940 there could have been a struggle between pure negation on the one side and a program calling for the stabilization of the economic system at half of its potential capacity, with fully a third of the people completely on the outside, but this was in fact the issue that was posed. The great majority of liberals, together with all leaders of labor, felt that they had no choice but to fight with might and main for what they clearly perceived to be only the lesser evil.

THE OLD ALTERNATIVES ONCE MORE

As the post-war world begins to come into perspective, it seems clear that an effort will be made again to force us to choose between the same alternatives. But liberals simply dare not permit themselves to be completely outmaneuvered again. It is true that the alternatives will not be exactly the same, but the essential strategic aspects of the choice will be the same. If a liberal President is elected in 1944 he will almost certainly have a Congress as reactionary as the present one. He will have very little chance to put across any essential parts of an affirmative program. By his veto power he might save the country from some of the more ill-considered and unintelligent acts of such a Congress, but it is doubtful whether salvage of this kind would be worth while. The people would blame the President and his Administration just as Mr. Willkie is now blaming the President, amid plaudits from certain liberals, for acts that should more properly be blamed upon the reactionary majority in Congress.

Whether we have a Republican or a Democratic President in the immediate post-war period will not be a matter of great importance. Whichever party he belongs to, the Chief Executive is almost certain to be much more liberal in his economic and social outlook than the Congress with which he will have to work. In 1938 Congress took a drastic turn for the worse when some eighty liberals and midde-of-the-roaders were defeated by outright reactionaries. In 1940, though Roosevelt was reelected, the people eliminated some twelve or fifteen more middle-of-the-roaders, replacing them with conservatives. The trend continued through 1942, when some fifty fair-to-middling Congressmen were replaced by conservatives and isolationists, the Administration retaining control of the organization of the House by only a few votes. The present Congress is considered the worst that has sat since the Reconstruction Congress in 1866. The Congress that is elected next year may be as bad as this one or it may be worse; it certainly will not be a good one.

With a liberal President and a reactionary Congress the liberals would feel called upon to come to the defense of the President's program no matter how conservative it might be; it would certainly be more liberal than the program of an ultra-reactionary Congress. This is exactly what happened between 1932 and 1940. It seems to me that historians of this period may well write that the leadership of Mr. Roosevelt was mainly responsible for the defeat of Germany and Japan. But in order to gain the support of big business for the prosecution of the war, the Administration has been obliged to make so many concessions to it that it does not seem possible that Mr. Roosevelt can now provide the leadership for an adequate program of full employment in the post-war period. In the meantime, the war program has been launched on such a scale that the defeat of Germany and Japan seems certain to be achieved whether there is a change in Administration or not. On the domestic front the political power from 1944 to 1949 will be in the hands of the Congress of the United States and not of the President. On the basis of his record from 1933 until 1940, Mr. Roosevelt in the post-war period would perhaps be able to formulate a program that would reduce

WHY CAN'T ROOSEVELT MATCH THIS?

I regard it as a definite part of the duty and responsibility of this National Government to have its plans perfected in a vast and practical scheme to make sure that in the years immediately following the war, food, work, and homes are found for all.

No airy visions, no party doctrines or party prejudices, no political appetites or vested interests must stand in the way of the simple duty of providing before the end of the war for food, work, and homes. They must be prepared now during the war. These plans must be prepared, and they must come into action, just like, when war breaks out, general mobilization is declared. They must come into action as soon as the victory is won.

On this far-reaching work, His Majesty's Government are now concentrating all energies that can be spared from the actual struggle with the enemy. The policy of waging war till victory would be incomplete and, indeed, spoiled if it were not accompanied by a policy of food, work, and homes in the period following the victory for the men and women who fought and won.—WINSTON CHURCHILL at the Lord Mayor's Luncheon in London on November 9, 1943.

unemployment to ten million under even more difficult circumstances than prevailed from 1933 to 1941. I put it in this way because I feel that President Roosevelt lost his real opportunity in March, 1933, because of his belief that proponents of large-scale public-works programs were guilty of "shallow thinking."

It is quite possible that Mr. Willkie would also be able to reduce unemployment to ten million. I base this statement not upon any public utterance by Mr. Willkie but rather upon the picture that Drew Pearson has given of him in his "off-the-record" talks to Republican leaders.

If a post-war program were left to the collective intelligence possessed by the members of Congress, it seems to me almost certain that unemployment would come to exceed twenty million.

FULL EMPLOYMENT WILL BENEFIT MANY GROUPS

In theory it ought to be possible to persuade various groups in our society which would benefit from a "full-employment" program that despite rivalry and bitterness in the past there exists the basis for cooperative political action. It should be relatively easy to persuade labor of its interest in a full-employment program, because working people know that from 67 to 70 per cent of the total national income is paid out in the form of wages. The important thing is that this sum should be around $143,000,000,000 as in 1943 and not $42,000,000,000 as in 1933. It should be possible to point out the same thing to the farmers of the country, for farmers receive roughly 10 per cent of the total national income. Though farm help may be harder to get as employment rises, the farmer's economic interest is directly dependent on the size of the national income.

Small business men, professional men, and men in the service trades, all have their eggs in the same basket. A large national income offers them the only possible guaranty against being combed out in the post-war world.

Big business men, collectively, are not primarily interested in making a profit. This group, which might more accurately be termed the economic-monopoly group, is more interested in political power than in immediate profits, for it knows that in the long run economic control depends upon political control. Even if the total national income should be reduced to half its present amount, this group would be able to survive, and to earn some profits as well as pay executive salaries. Its members would rather see a low national income with themselves at the controls than a high national income with responsibility shared with the government. Besides, a low national income would automatically solve some troublesome problems by eliminating a lot of shoestring business men as competitors and permitting further consolidation of economic power.

LABOR'S ROLE IN THE FIGHT FOR FULL EMPLOYMENT

One of the important books of the last few years is "The Tragedy of European Labor" by Adolf Sturmthal. It is Mr. Sturmthal's thesis that European labor made a great mistake in carrying over the philosophy and the approach of trade unionism to the political front. The result was that the leaders of labor were never able to think in terms of the bold and comprehensive programs that might have provided a solution to their problems; they could not act with sufficient boldness to appeal to the imagination of people outside the trade unions. As labor leaders they had always fought with employers for a little gain here and a little concession there. When they moved to the political front they continued to act in the same way. This description of European labor applies equally well to American labor, but it must be added that in Europe labor had many excuses for its failure that do not exist here.

The steady trend toward conservatism in rural America since 1936 makes it very clear that the farmers of the United States have been completely estranged from labor's cause. The constant emphasis on strikes by the press and radio is even having the effect of causing men in the service to feel hostile toward labor. Their hostility will probably vanish, however, as soon as the men are demobilized and have reestablished their old contacts.

It even appears that a majority of the members of labor unions do not have a great deal of confidence in labor's political leadership. In a Gallup poll published August 20, 1943, people in the lower income groups were asked whether they would prefer rule by big business or rule by labor unions. Of this group, which was made up predominantly of union members, 33 per cent said they would favor rule by big business, 34 per cent preferred labor, and 33 per cent were undecided. A similar result was obtained when labor-union members were asked after the passage of the Smith-Connally bill whether they believed that labor unions ought to make contributions to political campaigns. Twenty-four per cent of union members expressed themselves affirmatively, 58 per cent in the negative, and 18 per cent "didn't know." The results of these two polls tie together very well. If the members of organized labor do not think that their leaders have any worth-while political program, no purpose would be served in permitting these leaders to make contributions to political campaigns. It also follows that if the labor movement as such does not have a political program that can gain the support of its own membership, it does not have a program that can be expected to arouse any particular enthusiasm on the part of farmers, members of the armed forces, or people with a middle-class point of view.

The program that is called for now is not one that grows naturally out of labor's trade-union experiences. The program must be much broader, so extensive that it can win over not only the great majority of wage-workers but also a majority of the farmers and white-collar workers. Above all, it must gain the enthusiastic support of the generation that fought the war. An agreement can be reached if there is first an understanding of the facts involved. Those facts are: (1) that we have a productive capacity that will enable us to fix in advance the extent of our national income at any point up to $200,000,000,000; (2) that this cannot be done by letting nature take its course, but only by putting in operation a program adequately designed to accomplish its object; (3) that all classes and groups within the country, except economic monopoly, will be benefited.

PROSPECTS FOR 1944

Most of the public-opinion polls that have been taken during the past year indicate that the American people would support a fourth term for the present Administration if the outcome of the war were still in doubt; but that they would be against a fourth term by a two-to-one majority if the war were over. While the war may still be in progress in the Pacific a year from now, the indications are that the back of the Axis will be broken by then. It would be reasonable to expect, therefore, that the President himself might not fare any better at the polls next November than would other candidates on his party ticket. For 1944 would not be

VICTORY IS NOT ENOUGH

The Strategy for a Lasting Peace

by Egon Ranshofen-Wertheimer

This stimulating book opposes the comfortable belief that peace can be secured if only we avoid the mistakes of the last peace. a repetition of 1940, when so many candidates seeking reelection on the Republican ticket seemed to be completely confused about who this nation's enemies really were.

Many liberals believe that a fourth term is necessary if we are to win the peace. Unfortunately, however, it will be easy for the opposition to present the issue as if it were one between practical idealism and visionary idealism. And the Administration's program will be politically unrealistic unless we achieve full employment at home. The policies of world reconstruction advocated by Mr. Wallace, for example, presuppose a domestic program of full employment. Divorced from such a domestic program, they could not win and would not deserve to win.

The results of recent elections in Australia and Ontario suggest that a program calling for economic democracy at home and economic aid to political democracy abroad might win general approval even though the necessary educational foundation for such a program has not been laid. Waging a campaign on these issues would constitute the best kind of political education. If the issues could be posed in the 1944 campaign, it would be clear from then on that economic democracy was the alternative to economic monopoly. In an understanding of this fact lies the hope of an eventual revolution by consent.

In the time that remains it should still be possible to place on the ballot in the non-poll-tax states a slate of delegates to the Democratic National Convention committed to write into the Democratic Party platform a program that would call for "full employment" at home and a peace designed to permit the peoples of the world to achieve economic democracy. From this point the fight could be carried into the various Congressional elections in the fall.

Labor could well afford to spend a large sum to promote such a program. Win or lose, the campaign would help to define the issues on which the hopes of organized labor must finally rest. Viewed from the narrower perspective of 1944, this type of campaign would certainly have a far better chance of success than the Democratic campaign that is now under way.

EDITORIALS Freda Kirchwey, as Editor and Publisher of The Nation, carries on the tradition of independence, integrity, and courage which have characterized this journal since its founding. In her signed editorials, and in the shorter editorials and paragraphs which make up The Nation's weekly news commentary, current events are sifted, summed up, and interpreted from a boldly liberal point of view.

FEATURE ARTICLES About these, the heart of the magazine, little can be said in advance for the excellent reason that The Nation covers the news. Nation articles are carefully selected to meet the vital tests of timeliness, accuracy, interest, and clarity. Wide-ranging, searching, and hard-hitting, they have traditionally served as guideposts in a changing world.

WASHINGTON LETTER I. F. Stone's regular articles from Washington have not only reported news—they have made news. Stone has established himself as one of the ace correspondents of the capital. His weekly letter will continue to get behind the "canned" press releases and bring to The Nation's readers a real sense of the forces molding government policy.

BOOKS AND THE ARTS The candid criticism and penetrating judgments which have distinguished The Nation in the field of politics also mark its literary section, Books and the Arts, edited by Margaret Marshall. No literary school dominates Books and the Arts but all schools respect it. Its contributors are some of America's most widely respected critics.

Here, too, you will find B. H. Haggin's lively and informative column on music and records. He knows no sacred cows; there is not a musical cliché in his vocabulary. It is his refusal to be awed that has made thousands of readers turn to him as the one music critic who can be relied upon to say what he thinks, simply, precisely, and honestly.

And in Books and the Arts section Joseph Wood Krutch (on leave) raises the curtain on the season's plays and players. When Mr. Krutch writes of the theater, playgoers in the large cities take careful note of his suggestions and those outside who seldom see a play, get a whiff of grease paint and a glimpse of footlights; known as one of the most sensitive of American drama critics he is also an author of several books about the theater, the most recent of which is "The American Drama Since 1918."

Three Months after Appomattox...

In April 1865, three months after Appomattox, a peace was signed that put an end to slavery and unified the American democracy. It was then that a small group of Americans, led by the fiery young Irish-born editor, Edwin L. Godkin, founded a modest periodical and called it The Nation. Its declared purpose was to help safeguard the rights of the freed men, to discuss current topics "with greater accuracy and moderation than are to be found in the daily press," and to advocate "more equal distribution of the fruits of progress." Moved by these aims, most of the great writers of the day — Longfellow, Emerson, Whittier, the Jameses, Carl Schurz, William Dean Howells, Charles Francis Adams, Samuel Eliot, and others—became contributors to The Nation and helped make it the outstanding journal of the times.

With revisions dictated only by history, the original purposes of The Nation still guide it today. Through seventy-eight years of courageous journalism its task has been—and is now—to promote the cause of justice and good government and to support whatever means are likely to bring men more freedom and more democracy.

The King's Men

BY GAETANO SALVEMINI

ON NOVEMBER 9 the United Press reported that units of anti-Fascist volunteers which were operating in the Naples area under General Giuseppe Pavoni had been disbanded by Badoglio's orders, and that the men would be drafted into a regular Italian army under Antonio Basso, "one of the King's generals." The King's general "handles most dealings concerning relations between the Italians and the Allied authorities." He acts not only as chief of the reorganized military machine but also as "Badoglio's representative" in civilian affairs.

It is probable that the prefect whom Badoglio has chosen to govern civilian affairs in Naples—Enrico Cavaliere—is also under the jurisdiction of the King's general. Signor Cavaliere was prefect of Bari and of Palermo under Mussolini, and he, like other men who are serving in Italy today, certainly cannot be accused of having been a "premature anti-Fascist."

It is safe to say that Badoglio is acting with the full approval of London and Washington. An "Allied Control Mission" has been established to oversee the administration of the Badoglio government. "Victor Emmanuel," said the New York Times of October 24, "is the King, but the power behind his throne is the Allied Mission, and as things are shaping now, it is still going to be behind the throne when Victor Emmanuel is again King of Italy in Rome." The King was a rubber stamp for Mussolini. Now he is a rubber stamp for the Control Mission. Orders issued by Badoglio are the orders of the Control Mission.

On October 28 Robert D. Murphy, American Minister in North Africa, and Harold Macmillan, the British Minister, arrived in Naples with Badoglio to confer with prominent Italians about the future of Italy. The Italians declared that the King and his son must abdicate. Mr. Murphy and Mr. Macmillan returned to Algiers to report to their governments. The upshot of their report was soon evident. In the New York Times of November 3 the correspondent from Naples stated that "at present, as long as the Allied Military Mission sits at the King's side, he is immune." In fact, on November 3 the King paid a visit to Naples, and the Herald Tribune of November 5 described the "ovation" which he received on his tour through the streets. In a city of 900,000 people it is not difficult to gather together two or three hundred plain-clothes policemen to cheer the King lustily while protecting his person from less enthusiastic subjects. But, perhaps, on second thought, the King's reception was not quite as enthusiastic as the first report indicated. By November 10 the Herald Tribune correspondent wrote that the King had been pleased "by the lack of any hostile demonstration during his three-day visit to Naples." Whatever the truth, the Associated Press reported after the visit that "through his trip to Naples King Victor Emmanuel III apparently won the first round of his fight to retain his throne—at least temporarily."

The first round was won in London and in Washington, not in Naples. It was won on the day of so-called "unconditional surrender." The second round was won on November 9 in Italy, when the volunteers were disbanded and the control of the King's generals over Italian fighting forces was officially acknowledged. On November 10 the Associated Press made it clear that the Allied Control Mission would "prevent any group under or outside the Italian government from attempting to use troops to gain or retain power within the country."

To help Badoglio in the task of rebuilding the King's army, several Italian generals taken prisoner in Africa are being dispatched to Italy. Other Italian officers may be released after their backgrounds and their will to fight the Germans have been investigated.

In other words, the lives of American boys in Italy are not to be saved by volunteers who want to fight and who may have some conception of the true nature of the struggle against Fascism. They are to be saved by soulless bureaucrats of the old royal army, who, after covering themselves with glory in Ethiopia and Spain, have demonstrated their capacity in the present war. To be sure, the Associated Press has suggested "that Italian manpower will be diverted mainly to the task of rebuilding the country's crippled railways and highways"; so there is little danger that the King's men will turn the other way. One merely wonders how many lives of American boys will be saved by such allies. As for rebuilding railways and highways, no one is less qualified for that kind of work than an army chief. It is a job for civilian experts. But, of course, a general is sure he can do anything. If you ask a general to give birth to a child, he instantly and confidently goes to bed.

All these facts seem to imply that unconditional military surrender last September was coupled with a political deal by which the King and Badoglio were assured of their respective jobs. In return for that pledge, the two men will submit to any kind of indignity. The war of Italy against the Germans has definitely become the private business of Mr. Churchill, Mr. Roosevelt, the King, and Badoglio.

One may ask how these events can be reconciled with the solemn declaration issued in Moscow on November 1, according to which the "Foreign Secretaries of the United States, the United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union have established that their three governments are in complete agreement that Allied policy toward Italy must be based upon the fundamental principle that Fascism and all its evil influence and configuration shall be completely destroyed and that the Italian people shall be given every opportunity to establish governmental and other institutions based upon democratic principles."

The answer is that words have lost their meaning not only in London and Washington but also in Moscow. The same solemn declaration told us that "the Foreign Secretaries of the United States and the United Kingdom declare that the action of their governments from the inception of the invasion of Italian territory, in so far as paramount military requirements have permitted, has been based upon this policy." These peculiar words were published on November 2. On the following day the King went to Naples to "enhance his prestige." On November 9 Badoglio—that is to say, the Allied Control Mission—gave orders that no Italian volunteers should be allowed to help save the lives of American boys.

White Terror in Paraguay

THE following details about the white terror in Paraguay have been received from the Argentine League for the Rights of Man:

"The information we have received sets forth the alarming condition of the well-known anti-fascist leader Augusto Cañete, who has been imprisoned for several months in an unhealthful cell in the public jail of Asunción. The cell, which has no roof, is flooded when it rains, and the prisoners often have to spend several days in water up to their knees, unable to lie down to sleep. With Cañete is the labor leader Cirilo Aguayo, cofounder of the Latin American Federation of Labor.

"Recently Alfredo Alcorta, student leader and ex-president of the Federation of Secondary Students, was arrested. For three consecutive days he was kept tied to a table and subjected to beatings with rulers, fine chains, and sabers. He is now in danger of losing an eye.

"Also in prison are the young students Arsenio Ibañez, Rafael Quintana, and Victorino Baez, all of whom have been beaten and subjected to electric shocks. Two boys, Julio Díaz and Britos Paris, were nearly asphyxiated.

"Besides these prisoners, many persons are interned in concentration camps in the Chaco area—Fort July Fourth, Ingaví, Isla Poi, Peña Hermosa, and others. They are subjected to forced labor, with insufficient food, and many of the sick lack medical attention."

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

IF THE Stockholm Aftontidningen was as reliably informed as it claimed to be on November 4, a German general for the first time in this war has rebelled. It was only a little rebellion, but—. The rebel was a tank general named Oswald. He seems to have held some command in France. The civil administration demanded that he arrest a number of trouble-makers and have them shot. He refused—in these words, it is alleged: "Soldiers are neither policemen nor murderers." He was discharged from his post by a certain General Heyl, and it is not known what became of him.

On October 27 a jubilee was held in Cracow. The Government General of Poland celebrated its fourth year with great festivities. The Governor General made a speech. He said that Poland was the eastern bulwark of the Reich and that nothing could influence him to act differently. "Despite the opposition and the acts of violence which have occurred in this territory the German leadership will go on as hitherto."

But at the same time he told the Poles of a "magnanimous gesture" to be made by the Germans. A Chopin museum would be opened in Cracow. Even in the midst of a war the German administration concerned itself with culture. The gratitude of the Poles may have been somewhat affected by a slight act of pillage which was coupled with this magnanimous gesture. For the occasion was used to announce that the latest research showed Chopin to be, not a Pole with a mixture of French blood, but the scion of a "German-Alsatian family." The true name of the family was not Chopin but Schoping!

Germans usually announce the death of members of the family by paid notices or obituaries in the newspapers. War deaths are handled in the same way. The newspapers contain pages and pages of such black-bordered announcements. But there are, one might say, two parties represented in these notices. In some the text ends with the formula: "He died for his Führer and the Fatherland." Others are silent about the Führer. This omission of the Führer from the obituaries of the fallen is about the only open political act now possible in Germany.

The Swedish newspaper Nu has taken the trouble to engage in some statistical research on this point. It has examined the files of the Völkische Beobachter for the last two years and noted the number of death notices with and without mention of the Führer. It found that in the winter of 1941-42, while the victories were continuing, 90 per cent of the obituaries contained the words "He died for the Führer," or something similar. At the beginning of 1942, after the first hard Russian winter, this dropped to 40 per cent. At present the Führer is mentioned in only 20 per cent of the notices.

"Since my last visit to Germany about six weeks ago," reported the correspondent of the Swiss Nation on November 4, "the atmosphere of panic among the population has in no way abated." On the contrary, many people, he declared, are demanding peace at any price.

> People sum up their unhappy existence now in such words as, "It would be better to end the war as soon as possible before all our cities are in dust and ashes and Germany is completely ruined"; or, "If all our cities are erased, even the greatest victory will not help us." Whenever the talk is along this line, one hears two expressions used—Ausradieren (erase) and Totale Vernichtung (total destruction). Interestingly enough, both these phrases were coined by Hitler himself.

The same correspondent makes these observations about German reactions to Russia:

> Whereas formerly the Moscow radio was not so well liked as the London radio, even by workers, increased attention is now being paid to Moscow. As the Russian armies draw nearer to Germany, Russian broadcasts become more important. This does not mean that people who listen to Moscow are Communists. Communism has been too long described to Germans as an invention of the devil. Former German Communist leaders now in London or Moscow have largely lost their political power. Even people who have been bombed out of their homes and who, having lost all, might be expected to have the greatest sympathy with the Communists would prefer an Anglo-American victory. Their attitude is: "Stalin cannot conjure up decent new homes for us, for half of Russia itself must be rebuilt. England and America have gold and raw materials, and it will be to their interest to sell us their surplus products. They would be obliged to see that tolerable conditions prevailed in Germany so that the German people, with the products of their own labor, could buy English and American goods."

All this shows that the mass of the people in Germany are convinced that the war will finally be lost. Confirmation is found in another Swiss paper, the Aagauer Tagblatt, which on November 4 carried a dispatch from Vienna about the Nazis there. For a long time they were "bitterly disappointed," but "now they are trying not to lose the chance of participating in the new developments. Such 'reinsurers,' as they are commonly called, are numerous. They seek out former acquaintances, to whom they explain their changed views. And they try to secure their future by doing little services, such as making regular financial payments to the liaison men of resistance organizations or giving warning of impending arrests."

BOOKS and the ARTS

Flow Gently, Sweet Kaftan

AS AMERICANS, fighting for a just cause, we are of course bound to win the war. As the natural heirs of all that Moses, Jesus, Beethoven, Carrie Jacobs Bond, Adam Smith, the Marquis de la Fayette, the Marquis de Sade, Lincoln, Chester A. Arthur, and F. W. Woolworth fought for, we are just as sure—in the popular phrase—to win the peace. Just how, though, is hard to tell, no matter how faithfully you nail your nose to the news behind the news and the flaps of your ears to the vox humana of the commentators. Still every so often, a straw in the wind turns up, usually in one's eye, which seems to suggest a good deal. There is, for instance, a picture-article in Life for October 18 which may be recommended to your special attention. It would be missing the main point to attack this article. Like much of journalism and most thumbprints it is more profitably amenable to study than to criticism. Its photographs and captions are an accurate, rich, essentially impersonal embodiment of popular moods and meanings far more important, more interesting, and more depressing than a magazine article can, of itself, ever be.

The subject of the article is "Europe's Clothes." The subtitle reads: "The U. S. will dress liberated peoples in outfits that will make them look like Americans." The rest of the article is devoted to specifying just what that will mean. American manufacturers are even now preparing this clothing—which will be distributed by the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Committee—for 10,000,000 people of "liberated" Europe. It will be "sold, bartered, or given away in cases of dire need." It "will cost $54,000,000"—an average of $5.40 per subhuman.

There is nothing in this article about what the ill-dressed liberated European man will wear; possibly he is not expected to survive—which might in turn help explain the look of the clothes for women. In any case the article is devoted purely to the prospects for women, young girls, and children. Heaven can wait.

"The dresses and pants and coats," Life indicates, "will clothe Europe in America's image." This rather sensational statement is followed neither by "The Star-Spangled Banner" nor by a penitential novena but by: "This will be all right for the hard-pressed Europeans, but it may disappoint some of the post-war American tourists, who, instead of finding quaint garb on the rues and Strasses and vias of the Continent, will find everybody looking just like Main Street."

Now the Europeans who get these clothes will be in no position to care, much, if all they get is potato-sacking; which considerably qualifies one's own right to care. That sort of concern is one of the nastier luxuries. On the other hand we may properly question whether anyone except the recipients has the right not to care. And one more look at those dresses and pants and coats makes the whole question too purely academic to bother about, anyway.

The captions begin, with almost unqualified uniformity, with the word "no." There will be no hem on the dresses. No zipper. No hooks, no snaps, no metal fasteners. No snap. No crackle. No pop. No button openings. No full linings. No squat, no stoop, no grunt. No pockets—a subtle touch. No fitting ("dress is loosely designed to fit a variety of shapes"—all of them, it appears, as unflatteringly as possible). There will be "no frills on kids' clothes"; and there will be "hardly any leather" in the canvas-and-composition shoes which look, at best, like discards from a push-cart mark-down, at worst like smoked alewives.

Half of these clothes are designed for cold climates, half for warm; none, in short, for the north temperate zone in which most of Europe lies. They are "designed to allow for national difference in shape and size." The same styles are used as often as possible for boys and girls. Teen-age girls are to be permitted no dresses; they will wear blouses, skirts, and half-wool, half-rayon sweaters, which were, probably, unconsciously derived from Garbo, the one European derivation, but which, more likely, are given the girls because their busts are not so large, even allowing for national differences in shape and size, as to make the garments a disturbance of the hard-won peace and, of course, because plenty of our very nicest Bennington girls look like models for Peck and Peck.

Barring the sweaters, all these garments are, as Life says, American in style; if you can call it style. The pathetic thing is, some of them do have a little. Some designers among all the merry butchers who dreamed up this future evidently had the idea, however blurred, that it might be kind of cute if, at no extra expense of course, these dresses were pretty enough not to break your heart to wear. The best looks like the once-best "basic" dress of a quite poor girl which an even poorer friend with a roughly similar figure has borrowed for a very special date which she knows will be nothing very special. Another, because it is one-piece, is allowed buttons up the back. Still another, an obvious pregnancy-dress, though this is not mentioned—we are not winning this war, after all, for the sake of Europe's birth rate—is a glaring print whipped into "not much of anything"—no buttons, fasteners, or cuffs; all the spare cloth goes for a rainy day. "But," Life adds with a brave little smile, "it's pretty." One is compelled to doubt that the writer, the designer, or the presumptive wearer can possibly believe that.

Outside a few rather piteous efforts at either common sense, prettiness, or both, these clothes could only have been designed by persons with a profound hatred for living. And even the attempts are defeated; needlessly so. It is open to question whether anything a machine turns out for direct human use is productive of any human good; but with any care whatever for the product on the part of those who manipulate the machines, it is possible to make fabrics which do not look heartsick, waterlogged, and insulted the minute they leave the loom, and to turn those fabrics into clothes which do not look as if they had been patterned with a meat ax and assembled with awls. These things must surely have been made by machines which long ago turned from a long lifetime of accumulated shame over their work to a concentrated, shoddy malignance toward the inferiors who squirt oil at them and the still deeper inferiors who permit them neither rest nor integrity.

It is seldom possible to see so concentrated a lack of heart, kindness, hope, intelligence, adequacy even to a simple job—far less "winning the peace"—as is revealed in these pictures. The famous crying Czech woman who heils Hitler is very free, compared to this—or compared to herself when, by purchase, barter, or the good fortune of dire need, she accepts one of these insults. We may rightly wonder whether, among the discarded sketches which never got into production, there were not a few which had some real life, imagination, charm, kindness at least of visible intention. We may still more pointedly wonder why they were discarded; the wonder must be purely rhetorical. It is easy to imagine that somewhere in the course of this disgrace some half-sensible human being suggested that qualified people from the different nations and regions which were to be clothed be called in, asked for help, put in charge. And it is only too easy to imagine how that suggestion was received. Every honest photograph betrays it: the bottomlessly vindictive contemptuousness of the Victorian benefactor for his victim; the half-explicit, immensely strong implicit desire to degrade and to gain dominion over him; the sleep-walking genius for the details by which dominion and degradation are accomplished; the boundless scorn—and terror and hatred—for the person who even mildly objects. He is, after all, the sort of post-war American tourist who is disappointed because he will not find sheer black mottoed panties, dirndls, and spaghetti skirts on the rues, Strasses, and vias of the Continent. The very photographs, the very models, brilliantly conspire to disappoint his decadent type, and to reassure every solid American who might fear that we are getting soft with these lousy foreigners who dragged us into their lousy war. The backgrounds and the lighting suggest the Arctic porcelain of cheap hotel washstand china; the poses have the queasy rigor of bodies in contact with such material; the models are either expressing their proper honest wretchedness or have been ordered to wipe off their silly grins, this is serious, and Europeans don't have teeth anyway.

It could be worse, of course. Always there is that joy one may feel in embracing the lesser of two evils. These clothes are, after all, hardly different from the dead average which has for years been fed to the bleaker levels of our own working class—what is bad enough for me is plenty good enough for you—and are, after all, made on the presumption that we will win the war. One shudders to imagine Americans feeling all right if the Japanese were in a position to send us muslin pajamas, pareus, and nostril-bones. But even assuming that we do win the war, and supposing that they had borne out, in any direction, the ideas of sentimentalists of our kidney—or yours—it could have been much worse. They could point proudly to the fact that there are three superfluous square inches of lint in mademoiselle's skirt—costing only an extra .003 per wearer—which creates a swirl in walking and makes all the difference in the post-war world. They might have tried dressing Europeans in the all-American image of what they wear—high heels, spade beard, and opera cloak for Frenchmen, hatboxes and knee-strangling checker skirts for midinettes (or is it bidets?); Chico Marx hats, garlicky kerchiefs, and hand organs for Italians; steel-rimmed glasses, knickers, and edelweiss-tufted homburgs (or is it hofbraus?) for deserving Germans; rhumba pants and black cigarettes, stogies, mantillas, and molar roses for male and female Spaniards, respectively; backscratchers and Liggett's sandals for our little yellow brothers who, despite their embarrassing pigmentation, are bearing up with such wonderful patience until we get ready to shoot a rubber-band-propelled whizbang boy's-club bomber, now and then, across the Pacific.

They might have gone American in Hollywood style. They might have modeled on Esquire, Harper's Bazaar, Mademoiselle. They might have sent dungarees, under the impression that a garment so pukka at Bryn Mawr could not but enchant the junior misses of Yugoslavia. Some of the Rational Dress diehards of around 1900 might have got in control. The return-to-religion people might have made the whole Continent look like a combination of an orphanage, a mixed-marriage paradise for those who truly understand one another, and an ad for breakfast food. Really tight-lipped utilitarians might have prescribed coveralls for one and all, with a jingle specially composed by Hindemith—gratis, for the cause—to put the idea over; adding the inducement that they would help reduce the manifold political and economic frictions in post-war-torn Europe. Those with a true and sensitive imagination for the heart of a people might so easily have won through to the throne and bestowed on each nation costumes of that period in which it reached its apogee—bakelite armor, nylon panaches, light-alloy excaliburs, invisible sans-culottes, and so on. If one had the ear of any truly creative force in the State Department one could suggest to him a scheme so much simpler than this slow, sickening murder-by-inches: we could infantilize all Europe overnight with the help of a hundred million snugglebunnies. What one would do with the ear afterward had best not be committed to print in a time when solidarity of purpose is so indispensable to those, at least, whose purposes one despises and dreads; but one is forced to realize, as always, that gloomy as things look, they would be ever so much worse if tyros like ourselves had our way. Democracy grinds slowly, but who wants a worm, anyhow? Or, as ten million grateful Europeans must surely find it in their hearts to say: Don't bite the hand that feeds you; go straight for the throat.

THE MORAL FRONT

THE BATTLEFIELD of this war is the human spirit. It is there the war will be won or lost. The armies of Nazism will be defeated, but if we are to win the war the ideas of Nazism also must be defeated. And this can be done only by positive, aggressive democratic action.

Modern war is a political act. Those who say, "Win the war first and then we can think about the peace," have missed the point. If their counsel prevails we shall lose the war. That was the essential cause of Woodrow Wilson's failure. He conceived the war in purely military terms, and as a defense of democracy by force of arms, and believed the peace could be arranged at a conference table after the military victory. This time we cannot afford to wait. We must fight on the moral front with as much vigor as on the military front.

ARCHIBALD MacLEISH distinguished poet and Librarian of Congress, will discuss the moral meaning of the war in the next issue of paigns of the Italian Socialists of the period before the First World War, and was a friend and confidante of Mussolini in his early pseudo-Socialist phase; she was a member of the Socialist minority who kept up the Zimmerwald peace movement in Europe in the teeth of the belligerent nations; joined the Bolsheviks in 1917, returned to Russia after the Revolution, and became first secretary of the Comintern. She remained on good terms with Lenin, but was unable to stomach the splintering tactics of the Comintern leaders and the provocative methods of the Cheka, and was eventually eliminated in a way that seems today relatively amiable and mild, at the end of 1921, in the days before critics of the official line were forced to appear at public trials and confess themselves guilty of treason.

She was, however, depressed and ill when she crossed by sea to Sweden; and to fortify herself against seasickness in the midst of a storm that came up she began to recite to herself and to translate into other languages poems that she had learned in her girlhood. Later, as she tells us in her autobiography, "My Life as a Rebel," too ill for political activity and "so weakened by work and undernourishment that I had felt like an old woman at forty-three," she began to compose poetry of her own "in various languages with the greatest facility. I seemed to be overwhelmed, carried away by a flood of rhythm." She wrote poems in all the languages she knew: Russian, German, French, Italian, and English. It was her method of recovering from collapse, and it has proved one of the consolations of her years of disappointment and retirement.

These poems have now been published in a volume which, though hardly a first-rate work of literature, must be unique as a literary curiosity and has its place in the revolutionary record. It is also a symptom of the pressure, in our time, of the need for an international language. We have lost medieval Latin and eighteenth-century French, and have not yet arrived at Basic English; and in the meantime we have to talk all the languages at once, like Marx and Engels in their correspondence, like Joyce in "Finnegans Wake," like Eugene Jolas in his polyglot poetry, and like Angelica Balabanoff in these poems. She developed a habit of writing the same poem in each of her five languages, and these pieces are not translations because there is no original: they are quite distinct treatments of the same theme. They are all written in the same kind of meter, very irregular, a little vague. The author is so completely internationalized that the versions in her native Russian do not even seem much different from or better than the others. She has relatively little sense of the metrical differences of the various languages, and it is hard to tell whether or not she even allows for the metrical value of the silent final e in French.

These poems are thus, in many cases, better for the platform than they are to read. Anyone who has heard the author recite them knows what effectiveness she can give them, and their usefulness as perorations before audiences of various nationalities seems to have supplied one of the motives that have impelled her to make so many versions. At any rate, they constitute a document that is worth while to reflect on at this moment. If anyone has been wondering what has become, in this climax of hideous mechanical warfare, spy-

My Uncle Abraham Reports...

by Ben Hecht

I have an Uncle who is a Ghost.

But, he is no ordinary Ghost like so many dead uncles.

He was elected last April by the Two Million Jews who have been murdered by the Germans to be their World Delegate.

Wherever there are Conferences on how to make the World a Better Place, maybe, my Uncle Abraham appears and sits on the window sill and takes notes.

That's how he happened to be in Moscow a few weeks ago.

My Uncle Abraham sat on the window sill of the Kremlin and listened with great excitement, to one of the Finest Conferences he has ever attended since he has been a World Delegate.

He heard every word that Eden, Molotov and Hull spoke.

Last night my Uncle Abraham was back in a Certain Place where the Two Million murdered Jews met. It is the Jewish Underground. Only Ghosts belong to it.

When the Two Million Souls had assembled, my Uncle Abraham arose and made his report to them as World Delegate.

"Dishonored dead," said my Uncle Abraham. "Fellow Corpses and Ghosts from All Over. Of the Moscow Conference I have this to report. The Conference made a promise that the world was going to punish the Germans for murdering all the different peoples of Europe—Czechs, Greeks, Serbs, Russians, French hostages, Polish officers, Cretan peasants. Only we were not mentioned. In this Conference, which named everyone, only the Jew had no name. He had no face. He was like a hole in Europe on which nobody looked."

A Ghost from the Lime Kilns of Warsaw spoke.

"Why is this?" asked this Ghost, "why is it that we who are dead are without a Name in the Conferences of Fine People?"

"This I do not know," said my Uncle Abraham. "I can only report what exists. Jews do not exist, even when they are dead. In the Kremlin in Moscow, in the White House in Washington, in the Downing Street Building in London where I have sat on the window sills, I have never heard our name. The people who live in those buildings—Stalin, Roosevelt and Churchill—are afraid to speak of us. Why, I don't know. We were not allowed by the Germans to stay alive. We are not allowed by the Four Freedoms to be dead."

A Woman Ghost from the Dynamite Dumps of Odessa spoke.

"If they didn't mention the two milion murdered Jews in the Conference, isn't that bad for four million who are still alive? The Germans will think that when they kill Jews, Stalin, Roosevelt and Churchill pretend nothing is happening."

And from the Two Million Ghosts came a great cry.

"Why is this silence? Why are they afraid to speak of Us?"

My Uncle Abraham raised his hand.

"Little Children," my Uncle Abraham spoke: "Be patient. We will be dead a long time. Yesterday when we were killed we were changed from Nobodies to Nobodies. Today, on our Jewish tomb, there is not the Star of David but an Asterisk. But, who knows, maybe Tomorrow—!"

This ended the meeting of the Jewish Underground.

My Uncle Abraham has gone to the White House in Washington. He is sitting on the window sill two feet away from Mr. Roosevelt. But he has left his notebook behind.

Help prevent 4,000,000 people from becoming Ghosts

There are four million Jews still alive in urope.

They can be saved. Experts agree on hat.

Sweden and Denmark have just proved t by saving 6,000 Jews in a few days.

This Committee considers it a sacred duty o do all humanly possible to save them. Our offices and representatives in Washngton and in London, in Palestine and n Turkey, are steadily working in this irection, trying to get large-scale government action. This action will have to express itself in the creation of an Intergovernmental Agency to save the Jewish people of Europe and in declaring the doors of Palestine and other countries under United Nations control open for escaping Jews. For it is now strictly a race for time against death. Every day that passes dooms thousands who can be saved.

This Committee is asking the American people for a half million dollars with which it hopes—and believes—results can be secured effecting the rescue of the four million martyred Jews in Europe.

We need your financial help immediately. By your support will be determined the speed, scope and effectiveness of our work to save the Jewish people of Europe.

pervaded police states, and streamlined political pressure groups, of Socialist internationalism, humanitarianism, and intellectual courage—well, here they are in this book. Baffled and driven underground, in the case of Angelica Balabanoff, by fascism, Communist chicanery, and war, they have burst through another outlet into expression. It is a relief at the same time as a surprise to find someone who has never doubted the dignity of the working "masses," and who still wants to educate and lead them rather than manipulate and drive them, who feels pity for their human sufferings instead of contempt for their animal helplessness.

And here you have, also, the present emotions of one who has given her life to the more generous Socialist ideals and has not been discouraged in her loyalty. In one of the most touching of her poems Comrade Balabanoff writes:

> J'ai cherché la vérité
>   Et je l'ai adorée,
> C'est à elle que j'ai immolé
> Ce que je suis et ce que j'ai été
> Et je meurs oubliée . . .
> Courbés sous le joug invisible
>   De leur misère,
> Je les vois tous les jours résignés et paisibles
>   Gravir leur calvaire . . .
> Tandis que mon coeur embrasse
>   Leur souffrance infinie
> Il se serre avec une atroce angoisse
>   Et ne bat plus . . .
> Je meurs saluant la mort,
> Comme un voyageur arrivé au port
> Après une longue traversée
> Qu'il n'a ni voulue, ni aimée . . .

All the King's Horses

THE LEGACY OF NAZISM. By Frank Munk. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THE DISPLACEMENT OF POPULATION IN EUROPE. By Eugene Kulischer. The International Labor Office. $1.50.

IN AMERICA a price and profit economy may survive the war with some modifications. In Europe Humpty-Dumpty has not merely fallen off the wall; he has been kicked, beaten, racked, gouged, and eviscerated, and not all the international bankers, economic experts, social workers, and graduates of the army school of civil administration can hope to put him together again.

If anyone has any illusions on this score let him read Dr. Munk's study. He describes it modestly as "a sniping expedition into a large village," but it is in fact a thorough reconnaissance of a huge, complex economic area now in enemy occupation. As a collection of data it is invaluable, even though it might have been improved by more systematic organization, while the opinions it expresses, if sometimes open to debate, are always suggestive.

Dr. Munk does not pay much attention to the actual physical destruction that has been caused by the war. Horrifying as it is, he thinks it may prove to be the most easily remedied of the evils wrought by the New Order in Europe. He points out, however, that bombs and shells are not the only instruments of "disinvestment" at work. Total war with its concentration on the needs of the military machine has meant a progressive deterioration of all forms of capital goods, from pots and pans to railroads. In this country too we are experiencing in a mild form this depreciation of accumulated wealth, but with our immense capacity for production we regard it as almost a blessing since we can look forward to a huge replacement market after the war to keep industry busy. In the less advanced European countries, however, the rebuilding of their modest pre-war stock of capital goods will be a long and painful process.

Even so, this is not one of the major problems created by totalitarianism. Much more difficult to handle will be the institutional changes that have been imposed on Europe in the last ten years. Take, for instance, the tragic movement of peoples back and forth across the Continent in accordance with the exigencies of Nazi economy or "race politics," or both. Dr. Munk devotes a chapter to this subject, which is also reviewed in statistical detail in Dr. Kulischer's monograph. The latter reaches the conclusion that at least 30,000,000 Europeans have been torn from their homes and "transplanted, deported, and dispersed." The repatriation, resettlement, and rehabilitation of this vast army, millions of whom will be suffering from overwork and undernourishment, is an essential preliminary to reconstruction. It is not hard to imagine the burdens it will impose on a broken-down transport system and disorganized food supply.

The psychological shocks suffered by European society have been even more devastating than the physical ones. Treated like animals, men have had to live like animals. "The individual is compelled," writes Dr. Munk, "to live in a twilight zone of amorality, to hide his true feelings, and, above all, to conceal his hatred of the invaders. . . . An understanding of the fact that all nations after the termination of Nazi domination will exhibit an abnormal social psychology is indispensable to any post-war planning." This is one of the many arguments developed in this book against any effort to reconstitute laissez faire economy in Europe after the war. That economy was already undermined before Hitler's advent, for as this book notes, the spirit of enterprise in Europe—and, we may add, not only in Europe—had been largely stifled by business devices to restrict output in the interest of preserving existing property and existing income.

The only hope for Europe is an expansionist economy, and we cannot expect to found that on the basis of a capitalist class steeped in the principles of monopoly. Besides, the capitalist class in Europe has been either bought up or wiped out by the Nazis. Even in Germany itself hundreds of thousands of small business men have been forced into the factories. In Eastern Europe the Jews, who as a class of small entrepreneurs and middlemen played an important part in the economy, have been liquidated. In other countries the Germans have usually gone about their depredations with some show of legality, but the results are much the same. With the aid of the revenues produced from "occupation costs" they have bought control of the key industries. Only those business men who have been willing to collaborate have had much chance to survive. Meanwhile German banks have thrust out tentacles in all directions; so that they now control all the financial business of Europe, while the whole Continent is littered with worthless German currency and I. O. U.'s. When the Third Reich collapses, militarily, morally, and economically bankrupt, the new order and the old will vanish together.

A new start cannot be made except on a planned basis. That is Dr. Munk's conclusion, but for his specific proposals I must refer the reader to his book. Here I can only mention his rather disparaging discussion of the many suggestions that have been made for promoting greater political and economic unity in Europe. He sees nationalism as the predominant element in resistance to the Nazis and believes that after the war it will be a stronger force than ever before. Consequently, he argues, any attempt to enforce unity by outside pressure will only heighten the nationalist fever. It is, I fear, undeniable that wounded and infected nationalisms are likely to prove one of the worst legacies of Nazism, but Dr. Munk is perhaps more than a little complacent in his insistence that the disease must be allowed to run its course. The reconstruction of Europe's economy cannot be accomplished in a series of watertight compartments, and planning of the kind advocated by this book will prove still-born unless it is Continental in scope. This does not mean that a United States of Europe is the only solution, but there must be some check on the autarchic tendencies which were so manifest before the war. KEITH HUTCHISON

Charting the Paths of Progress

THE PILLARS OF SECURITY. By Sir William H. Beveridge. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

CRITICS of the celebrated Beveridge Report who complained that Sir William had taken a too restricted view of social security should be effectively silenced by the present volume. The scope of subjects covered is breath-taking. In addition to summarizing and explaining certain aspects of his report, which he describes as an attack on the giant evil of Want, Sir William devotes considerable attention to each of the other four giants—Disease, Ignorance, Squalor, and Idleness. Other essays are devoted to such diverse topics as reorganizing the British government for total war, the five economic standards adopted by British church leaders, the massacre of the Jews, and the problem of small nations.

It is obviously impossible to summarize Sir William's thoughts on all these matters within the compass of a brief review. But let no one think that in discussing such matters as the conduct of the war or the organization of the peace the author of the "Report on Social Insurance and Allied Services" is getting beyond his depth. Sir William, as an experienced civil servant, has an extraordinary grasp of the basic principles of both political and economic organization. And his vast technical knowledge is brought into sharp focus by a social philosophy which is remarkable for both its clarity and its steadfastness of purpose. This unusual combination of qualities gives a stamp of great authority to his discussion of the diverse subjects covered in this volume.

posed a comprehensive public medical service, providing free treatment of every kind—dental, ophthalmic, general, specialist, consultant, and nursing. Dealing with the giant Ignorance, Sir William stresses not only the conventional educational reforms—greater equality of education, raising the school age, and the provision of better teaching and equipment—but adult education. "All of us old people," he says, "are very ignorant of many things we ought to know. I believe that adult education on a greatly extended scale is almost as important as more education for the young." Four stones are selected for the attack against the "Goliath Squalor." They are: a planned use of land, a sane use of transport, the use of sensible architecture, and a reorganization of the building industry along efficient lines. Sir William's proposals for attacking the giant Idleness are not greatly different from those advanced by our own National Resources Planning Board. He believes the essence of such an attack lies in national planning for full employment. Such planning, he insists, can be carried out in peace as well as in war, and it can be developed without infringement on essential liberties. But it cannot be developed without giving up something—that something being what he describes as "our darling vice of not looking ahead as a nation."

Readers who are looking for a blueprint for a post-war Utopia will not find it in this book. No drastic reorganization of our political, social, or economic structure is proposed. The virtues as well as the limitations of private enterprise are recognized. Sir William's program, if we must label it, is a reformist program. But its sanity and sound humanitarianism should commend it to forward-looking people of all political persuasions. MAXWELL S. STEWART

IN "The Innocent Voyage" Richard Hughes uses the old device of leading the reader into fantasy along "a bright trail of fact" that seems natural. By the time one arrives at the central situation—that of a group of children on a pirates' ship in 1860—it too seems natural, and the realistic behavior of the characters preserves the illusion. Mr. Hughes's fantasy is a relentless critique of the child as monster, and every element, from the ominous tropic setting to the Victorian manners of the children, is used with great skill and fine psychological understanding to create the atmosphere of a vivid nightmare, in which innocence plays the role of Evil and tough pirates become the pathetic victims of sly, unwitting fiends otherwise known as children.

Paul Osborn's dramatization (Belasco Theater) claims only to be based on the book. The "bright trail of fact" is missing—and I hardly see how it could be accomplished on the stage. More important, he makes many concessions to the view of the child as little darling, and since one such concession would be enough to shatter the sinister spell woven by Mr. Hughes, this version lacks the nightmarish unity of the original. The rich material elements, and the superficial drama, of the book have been taken over; the fearsome spirit has been domesticated and made respectable, but it breaks through often enough—and mainly in the acting of Abby Bonime, who plays the part of Emily—to add spice to what is essentially a spectacle in gay colors bearing the unmistakable, spare-no-expense imprint of the Theater Guild.

Abby Bonime indeed is so nearly true to the original that she and she alone provides the element of the monstrous (the other children, while they are extremely well trained, behave rather than act and are never anything worse than brats). And her acting makes Mr. Osborn's ending, which is quite different from that of Mr. Hughes, surprisingly effective. In the book the child never confesses to the murder of the Dutch captain (who has turned into a Swede for some reason or other) even though she knows that her beloved pirate captain will go to the gallows for her act. In the play she does confess—in a burst of hysteria which makes her story even more unbelievable than it intrinsically is, and just as damning to her friend as silence would have been.

Oscar Homolka as the pirate captain and Herbert Berghof as his mate give performances which make one reflect upon the virtues of a tradition of acting—which scarcely exists any more in this country. And if they produce the effect of being baffled rather than terrorized by their charges it is because the play prescribes it.

The settings and costumes are those of a "period" piece; no attempt has been made to invent a furniture of fantasy. Perhaps this is just as well, though one wonders if a less literal treatment might help to evoke, by a frontal and immediate attack on the visual sense, the primary illusion which Mr. Hughes creates with words. ART

MARC CHAGALL: Oils and Gouaches, at Pierre Matisse Gallery through November 27. LIONEL FEININGER: Oils, Water Colors, Drawings, Etchings, and Woodcuts, at Nierendorf Gallery through November 30. JACKSON POLLOCK: Oils, Gouaches, and Drawings, at Art of This Century Gallery through November 27.

CHAGALL'S art turns from the main stream of ambitious contemporary painting to follow its own path. It is pungent, at times powerful, but opens up no vistas beyond itself. Chagall's position, curiously enough, resembles that of Odilon Redon in the late nineteenth century. The present exhibition, composed entirely of work done in 1943, indicates a crisis in the painter's career. He is no longer mellowing in Paris; he is being challenged by events and by the imperatives of his artistic development. The soft, blandishing French tones, the harmonic suffusions, that have characterized his painting in the last fifteen years or more—never enough, however, to submerge his native robustness—are on the way out. Returned is something of the flatter, less tonal brushwork of his earlier period, its harshness too, but all much less crude, being modulated by everything Chagall has since discovered about the orchestration of frank colors. A new yellow plays a role, along with more ambitious or more surrealist subject matter—crucifixions and monsters. Usually when an artist exhausts one phase it takes time and error to assimilate the next. Chagall's two or three new major efforts—major in size and pretension—abound in patches of interesting painting, but none is fused into a complete and organic work of art. The variables of defined form are not related with sufficient visual logic to the murky, indeterminate fond that is the constant against which they appear. Yet lack of success in the new is worth any number of successful repetitions of the old. The most achieved picture at the show, the gouache "La Nuit se mêle au jour," happens to repeat Chagall's previous success with royal blue. I would gladly trade it—considerations of size and effort being irrelevant—for the large and unresolved "Crucifixion" with its yellowish malaise.

The Feininger exhibition covers the artist's work from 1911 to 1938. What began as a German marriage of expressionism with cubism evolved after 1915 into a province of Paul Klee's art. Until then Feininger's heavy and obtuse color oppressed his more genuine talent as a draftsman. Klee's influence seems to have lightened and thinned his color and perhaps made him realize that his eyes—like Marin's—conceived instinctively in darks and lights. The best pictures are those altogether in black and white and gray, as the pen-and-ink wash "Feininger am Kai," or those in which the palette is narrowest, such as the water color "The Barque," with its mere black, sky blue, lavender, and white. Feininger always paints with honesty and grace. He is not important in a large sense, but he has a very definite and secure place in contemporary painting.

There are both surprise and fulfilment in Jackson Pollock's not so abstract abstractions. He is the first painter I know of to have got something positive from the muddiness of color that so profoundly characterizes a great deal of American painting. It is the equivalent, even if in a negative, helpless way, of that American chiaroscuro which dominated Melville, Hawthorne, Poe, and has been best translated into painting by Blakelock and Ryder. The mud abounds in Pollock's larger works, and these, though the least consummated, are his most original and ambitious. Being young and full of energy, he takes orders he can't fill. In the large, audacious "Guardians of the Secret" he struggles between two slabs of inscribed mud (Pollock almost always inscribes his purer colors); and space tautens but does not burst into a picture; nor is the mud quite transmuted. Both this painting and "Male and Female" (Pollock's titles are pretentious) zigzags between the intensity of the easel picture and the blandness of the mural. The smaller works are much more conclusive: the smallest one of all, "Conflict," and "Wounded Animal," with its chalky incrustation, are among the strongest abstract paintings I have yet seen by an American. Here Pollock's force has just the right amount of space to expand in; whereas in larger format he spends himself in too many directions at once. Pollock has gone through the influences of Miró, Picasso, Mexican painting, and what not, and has come out on the other side at the age of thirty-one, painting mostly with his own brush. In his search for style he is liable to relapse into an influence, but if the times are propitious, it won't be for long.

RECORDS

NOTHING in the first movement of Beethoven's Quartet Opus 59 No. 3 prepares you for the strangeness, the "remote and frozen anguish" of the second movement; and his Trio Opus 97 ("Archduke") offers another experience of this kind. Though the first movement has its involvements in the development section that bring agitations, urgencies, tensions, as a whole the movement has the calmly, serenely reflective character of its beautiful opening theme—the theme from which is derived the wonderful passage for cello answered by violin in the development (to be heard just before the end of side 1 of the old Cortot-Thibaud-Casals recorded performance, and a little more than halfway on side 2 of the new Victor set). The second movement is the scherzo of the work, unusual only in the spacious and varied treatment of the charming theme of the opening section, with a somewhat ominous middle section that is broken into repeatedly by a wildly boisterous episode. Both of these movements are in line with everything Beethoven has written previously; neither of them contains anything that prepares you for what comes now at the beginning of the slow third movement: the two statements of the piano, echoed by violin and cello, which constitute the theme for a series of variations, and the first communication, as far as I can recall, of what you will get repeatedly from the later works—the sense of experience mastered, suffering endured, profound lessons learned, all-comprehending resignation and inner illumination achieved. This is communicated in the theme, and—after the involvements that follow—with even more overwhelming effect in the last variation, which begins quietly as a restatement of the original theme, but digresses with new wide-ranging and profound implications, and expands into a coda which brings last involvements, final summations, and great conclusions. Then a transitional chord takes you to the finale, which leaves profundity behind for a wistful sort of gaiety.

The new Victor set (949, $5.50) offers a performance of the work by Rubinstein, Heifetz, and Feuermann. This does not stand comparison with the Cortot-Thibaud-Casals performance (discontinued by Victor, but still in the H. M. V. catalogue): it moves swiftly, smoothly, and on the surface, where the old performance is more spaciously reflective and probes more deeply with richer inflection; moreover, in the new performance you hear three virtuoso soloists playing together well, but not the wonderful ensemble team that Cortot, Thibaud, and Casals got to be; and in the new performance, finally, you hear Feuermann, a first-rate cellist and distinguished musician, but not Casals. However, when I heard the new version by itself a year ago (on test records) I found it excellent; and so, I am sure, will you.

The sound of the performance on the records is spacious but not bright; and the strings come off much better than the piano, which is dull and wooden and is often blanketed by the strings. On a Scott 23 with the light, wide-range Brush pickup there are disturbing buzzes and rattles which are much less perceptible when the heavy, limited-range Astatic Trutan pickup is used. And the surfaces of my review copy are a little—on a couple of sides more than a little—noisy.

On a single disc (11-8489, $1) is Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," a fine work by a minor master. The performance by Monteux with the San Francisco Symphony is superb, and its recorded sound has the spaciousness and richness of color that have been heard from Victor's other recent recordings of this orchestra. With the Brush pickup there are a few disturbing buzzes and rattles that are almost imperceptible with the Astatic Trutan.

On another single disc (10-1058, $.75) is the Johann Strauss "Tritsch-Tratsch" Polka, enjoyable as played by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under Fiedler, and well recorded. The reverse side offers a typically cute "pops" concert number—Lloyd del Castillo's "Cuckoo Clock"—which is also well played and recorded.

A reader, writing to me about Columbia's new recording of the Beethoven Quartet Opus 59 No. 1 (which I expect to review shortly), objects to the use of the Busch Quartet instead of the Budapest, and to the spreading of the performance over eleven sides, as against the ten sides required by previous performances. He noticed the same thing in the case of Columbia's recent recording of Beethoven's Quartet Opus 95. "The old Busch version of this took up four sides. The Budapest records occupy six sides, and for the extra sides and extra money the listener suffers a quite indefensible splitting into two of the last movement." And he wonders why and how artists are persuaded to lend themselves to this sort of thing.

Beethoven's Opus 59 No. 1 is one of the works which the Budapest Quartet recorded for H. M. V. (Victor did not, however, issue it here), and which by the terms of the contract it could not record again for another company. Similar terms in its present contract with Columbia will prevent it from recording for another company the performances of works that Columbia has recorded so badly; and we will get no better recordings of these performances unless Columbia itself decides to do them over again and does them better. In the second place, the Busch Quartet seems to assume that if it plays twice as slowly as anyone else it will produce something twice as profound; and I suspect that this tendency accounts for the eleventh side in Columbia's new set of Oput 59 No. 1. If the Busch Quartet doesn't play too slowly it plays too fast—one example of this being the way it rushed through Opus 95 on four sides; and it is probable that the more spacious performance of the Budapest Quartet required an additional side. Whether it required two more sides I don't know: as the recording is cut the fourth movement would not fit on one side; but there is the question whether Columbia could have cut narrower grooves and got the entire movement on one side. But even if Columbia is innocent in this instance the practice my reader objects to is one which record companies are guilty of; and I know of one instance right now. That brings me to the third point: only a very few artists are powerful enough to exact in their contracts the veto power which enables them to prevent the companies from issuing defective recordings or indulging in otherwise objectionable practices.

The same reader, thanking me for my remarks on the New Friends of Music audience, asks me to "get in a little advance criticism of the behavior of the Y. M. H. A. audiences at the Budapest Quartet concerts. Compared with the Y. M. H. A.-ers the New Friends people are models of listening decorum." B. H. HAGGIN

Where Are Those Idle Savings?

Dear Sirs: George Richmond Walker wrote a most interesting article in The Nation for November 6 entitled Tax Idle Savings! He assumed in this article that there is a vast fund of idle savings withheld from investment, so vast, indeed, that if "the tax on it were now in effect, the Treasury could borrow the funds it needs to finance the war without further recourse to banks and without any of the nagging, the parades, or the ballyhoo." In other words, these idle savings amount to billions!

Now Mr. Walker is the man I've been looking for since the panic of 1929 when the theory of "underinvestment" was born. At last I have him. During all these years I have been trying to find out how much of this idle money really existed and who owned it. Certain "old-timers" in the investment business are also very much interested in these funds. Mr. Walker, no doubt, is the man who has the figures or he would not have written his article. Will you ask Mr. Walker to reveal the amount of these funds, where they are hoarded, and, in a general way, who owns them?
OTTO S. MAYER

New York, November 5

Here Are the Figures

Dear Sirs: I cannot provide Mr. Mayer with a list of prospective customers, but—.

What is idle money? If a man works six days a week we regard him as fully employed, but if he works only three days a week he is half employed and half idle. Likewise with money. According to the governors of the Federal Reserve System the average rate of turnover of demand deposits during the period 1920-29 in 100 cities excluding New York was 34.8. In 1942 the rate of turnover had declined to 18.4, and in 1943 the rate has been even lower. This means that if money were working as hard as it was during the '20's our present volume of business transactions could be financed with about 53 per cent of our present money supply. In New York City the rate of turnover has declined from an average of 77.4 during the '20's to 16.3 in 1942. Money has become very lazy in New York.

Again, during the '20's the national income was about three times our money supply. Thus in 1929 currency and demand deposits together totaled about 27 billions and the national income was around 81 billions. At the present time the national income is running at the rate of about 150 billions, which indicates that we need a working money supply of around 50 billions. Actually it is about 84 billions, including government deposits. On this basis our excess money supply is in the neighborhood of 34 billions.

If Mr. Mayer wants further information I refer him to the reports on saving issued by the Securities Exchange Commission and by the Department of Commerce. The Federal Reserve Bulletin for October deals with the ownership of bank deposits. The booklet by Professor Slichter on "Present Savings and Postwar Markets" issued by the Harvard Business Review may also prove useful.

An English Trooper Comments

Dear Sirs: Being in the fortunate position of receiving copies of The Nation quite regularly from America, I was particularly interested in Reinhold Niebuhr's article entitled England Teaches Its Soldiers, which appeared in your issue of August 21. I myself have been "subjected" to the educational program in the British army for some time.

The first thing I would like to point out to Mr. Niebuhr is that he must not forget that we only started our educational scheme proper some three years ago and that it really didn't get going till the winter of 1942. The first we read about it was in the autumn of 1941; there were notices up saying that correspondence courses in various subjects—from algebra to zoology—could be arranged for us via the War Office, and that books would be put at our disposal. But just at that time, I am afraid, we were too busy in the London docks dealing with the blitz. So it took two years of war before we got going; is not Mr. Niebuhr a bit too hard on the American army authorities?

Last winter we were particularly fortunate; being stationed near one of the Scottish university towns we were given all possible facilities to attend evening classes free of charge and had visitors from the university coming regularly to our camp to give lectures on history, constitutional law, literature, etc. The attendance at the lectures was voluntary, always a sure sign that there is enough genuine interest to keep up a good-sized audience.

Great praise must go to the ABCA (Army Bureau of Current Affairs) people mentioned in your correspondent's article. We have a weekly ABCA period, and this as well as the popular Brains Trust of B. B. C. fame has done wonders to start and stimulate discussions in the army. Our last but one ABCA discussion was on post-war problems, which led to the subject of British agriculture in our last period, and our next one will be about government control—a very topical subject just now, after Churchill's speech in the Commons on the coal situation. All these discussions are led by our sergeant major, whose only function is to set the ball rolling. Whereas discipline is very strict in our unit, there is no distinction of rank in these ABCA talks. And a sergeant major is surely the last person one might think of as urging his men to air their opinions.

Need I state that this goes to show that the army definitely does want us to use our brains? Of course no one can as yet foresee the results of this educational crusade, but it is not likely to be harmful to the community after the war, is it?

Teachers and the Public

Dear Sirs: In her discussion of low wages for rural teachers in the Middle West, in The Nation of October 23, Alice A. Tollefson committed the conventional error of placing full responsibility for conditions on the incompetence of the teachers.

Indubitably, there are hundreds of poorly prepared teachers whose primary interests are not in the classroom. For the employment of these unqualified men and women as teachers, the blame rests squarely on the shoulders of an apathetic public that is more concerned about "saving" money than having its children properly educated.

When public opinion accords to education the dignity which is its due, and pays to teachers a wage that will enable them to live the life of educated, self-respecting human beings, the type of teacher of which your correspondent complains will vanish from the schools.

The public gets exactly the kind of teachers it pays for, and why shouldn't it? RALPH JOHNSON

Erratum

Dear Sirs: I should like to note the following error in fact which appeared in my article, Unions, Restricted Clientele, in The Nation of August 14, 1943, pp. 178-80:

On page 178 I included the Commercial Telegraphers' Union among the American Federation of Labor affiliates which exclude Negroes by a provision in their constitution. I have since learned that the bar to Negro membership was deleted from the constitution of the Commercial Telegraphers' Union in 1935 and that this union now has Negroes in its organization.

The Shape of Things

THE BEATING OF A SOLDIER—A HOSPITAL patient—by an American general is an incident so shocking to public sentiment about the army that its belated revelation has released a rather disproportionate amount of emotion. We do not take our stand with those who demand a court martial for General Patton. Such action on top of the unofficial but very real punishment he has already suffered would be merely vindictive. A more debatable question is whether Patton should be continued in responsible command in an active theater. The incident occurred halfway through the Sicilian campaign, and Eisenhower, rather than swap generals in the middle of a battle, gave Patton another chance. Since then the Seventh Army has apparently been held in reserve, and when it again goes to the front it may be under a new commander. The argument in favor of retaining Patton is that good combat generals are rarities and he has proved a brave and aggressive leader. But courage and drive are not the only attributes of generalship; cool judgment and emotional endurance are still more necessary. The story of the unhappy hospital scene suggests rather strongly that the general was afflicted by battle shock even more than the man he struck. A private in that condition has to be taken out of the line not only for his own sake but for that of his comrades. Can a general subject to loss of emotional control be safely left in an enormously responsible position? And if he is, will his men retain their confidence in him? These are the questions to which Generals Marshall and Eisenhower must still find answers, and in this difficult task they need the assistance of a medical board rather than a military court.

BRITAIN'S POLITICAL MANEUVERS IN THE Near East begin to fall into a pattern that suggests something other than the Four Freedoms. Between the French and the Lebanese a truce has been reached which involves neither a compromise nor an understanding. The French have simply been forced to yield all along the line. In making the settlement General Catroux suggested pointedly that the British had intruded without warrant into a political situation that concerned only the French and the Lebanese. But while the British sternly curbed the imperialist inclinations of the French in Lebanon, farther south in their own mandate of Palestine they proceeded according to somewhat different principles. The village of Ramat Hakovesh was subjected to a house-to-house search for arms in the course of which all the male inhabitants are reported to have been rounded up and confined within a barbed-wire inclosure. One Jewish civilian is said to have been killed and eight others injured. Ten Palestinian newspapers were suspended for printing what British authorities called "highly tendentious" accounts of the raid. A group of Polish-Jewish soldiers, fleeing from the intensely anti-Semitic Polish army, had taken refuge in the town, and feeling ran high over the British use of Polish soldiers to conduct the search. Ramat Hakovesh sustained repeated attacks by the Arabs in 1936, and here as in other parts of Palestine the British are accused of rank discrimination in the matter of arms. No Arab communities have been searched for weapons, Arabs are permitted to carry hunting rifles, and a number of notorious Arab terrorists have recently been allowed to return from exile. The feeling is inescapable that what the British want is an Arab federation friendly to the empire. Neither Jews nor Frenchmen, it seems, will be allowed to block the way.

AT THE MOMENT WHEN THE ATTACK ON General de Gaulle reaches a new crescendo of fury—an attack in which he is charged by reactionaries with the sin of reaction, by anti-Russians with belittling the Moscow pact, and by those who will not preside at the liquidation of the British Empire because he will not preside at the liquidation of the French—at this very moment a new champion of French democracy steps forward. None other than Marshal Pétain. The Marshal is a man with the courage of his convictions. Convinced that Hitler was almighty, he did not hesitate to scrap the constitution of France, liquidate its Parliament, and supplant Liberté, Egalité, and Fraternité with the drivel of fascism. Impelled to alter this conviction, the Marshal now, with equal boldness, and beautiful timing, proclaims himself the herald of the Fourth Republic, promises a constitution, and offers his new democracy as an alternative to a revolutionary clash with the Free French when the day of invasion arrives. The move is clever in a sordid way because collaborationists like Frossard, De Monzie, and Georges Bonnet, who prompted the Marshal to this scheme, well know that there are those in England and the United States who would gladly trade a De Gaulle for a Pétain. But it is late in the day. Without an army, a navy, or even the most tenuous hold on the people of France, Vichy's trumps are gone. It is bad enough to sell democracy for a mess of expediency, but it would be utterly senseless to sell it for the mess that is Vichy.

SEIZURE OF THE GILBERT ISLANDS IS NOT, IN itself, a major strategic operation. At most, the islands were merely outposts in the Japanese defensive system. They were not heavily guarded, and their possession does not give us a decisive advantage for future offensive undertakings. The chief significance of the attack lies in its demonstration of growing American naval and air strength. We have no specific information about the number of ships taking part in the Gilbert attack, but dispatches speak of the fleet as one of the most powerful ever assembled in the Pacific, and from the number of enemy planes destroyed, it evidently includes a number of aircraft carriers. The speed with which the Gilberts were overpowered suggests that our forces can similarly seize the Marshalls, Wake, Marcus, and even the Carolines, provided sufficient time is allowed to consolidate each gain. This threat of an attack directly across the Pacific when plans are known to be ready for a drive on Burma and operations against Rabaul are progressing, fully justifies the reports out of Tokyo predicting an early crisis in the war. The Japanese cannot counter our attacks without risking a substantial part of their navy. And if their fleet is destroyed, they will have lost the war.

THE TAX BILL JUST ADOPTED BY THE HOUSE may well go down in history as the "Congressman's tax bill." Publication of the new table of surtax rates reveals a reduction of 1 per cent in the rate applicable to incomes ranging between $6,000 and $12,000. Since a Congressman's salary is $10,000 a year, the majority of the members of the House will benefit directly by this change. In contrast, the new bill provides a sharp rise in the taxes levied on single men and women with incomes of $1,200 and less—with the heaviest increase falling on those with the lowest income. In an effort to justify their failure to provide sufficient tax revenues to stem the tide of inflation, the Republican members of the House Ways and Means Committee declared that the Administration's request would have imposed "entirely too great a burden on taxpayers generally." And the committee as a whole argued that the $2,000,000,000 provided by the bill was as much as "can be reasonably borne by the taxpayer without unduly disturbing our economy." These assertions make interesting reading in the light of a poll of tax experts recently conducted by the Tax Institute. Two-thirds of the experts—including tax economists, business men, tax lawyers, accountants, bankers, corporation tax agents, and heads of research agencies—were fully convinced that the government could and should raise at least $10,000,000,000 in new revenue by taxation. Since practically all the testimony before the Ways and Means Committee pointed the same way, it is clear that Congress alone must bear responsibility for the inflationary effects of its decision.

THE TREASURY'S PLAN FOR A WORLD BANK for Reconstruction and Development would serve two purposes. It would encourage resumption of the gold standard by making some of our own huge hoard available to other countries, and it would provide a means of financing American exports in the post-war period. The United States, by all economic logic, ought to supply the whole instead of a mere one-third of the $10,000,000,000 of capital required, but this would hardly win the approval of Congress and, in any case, would diminish the bank's international standing. The plan, prepared by Harry D. White of the Treasury, calls for an initial subscription of 20 per cent, partly in gold, partly in the local currency of the subscribing country. Few countries have enough gold to make any considerable subscription, and it would be better for us if those that did have some gold kept it to finance reconstruction purchases, most of which would naturally come from the United States. Our own country, as Mr. Stone points out this week in his letter from the UNRRA conference in Atlantic City, has to get rid of some of its gold and is badly in need of post-war markets. The World Bank would be a blessing both for the Treasury and for American business, though the plan will probably be attacked as another proposal for "TVA's on the Danube."

THE TERRIBLE PUNISHMENT THAT IS BEING meted out to Berlin by the R. A. F. has again raised hopes that the German fortress can be cracked by the use of air-power alone. In an eight-day period the weight of bombs dropped on the German capital was nearly equal to that which fell on London during the entire 1940-41 Blitz. Moreover this tremendous attack has been pressed home at relatively light cost. New German defensive tactics have been countered by new British technique, and the Luftwaffe, a large proportion of which is concentrated to guard the home front, is showing signs of strain. But while we do not minimize the strategic significance of the present Anglo-American aerial offensive, we doubt if it can be regarded as more than a preliminary bombardment which must be followed by actual storming of the walls. Provided that the present tempo of attack can be maintained, Berlin itself may be knocked out by the end of the year. That would be a major victory, for, apart from its importance as an industrial and communications center, the city is the symbolic and administrative heart of the Third Reich. On the other hand, Germany is a large country whose industries have been widely dispersed. Many of its vital centers are still almost untouched and between it and invasion from any direction are thick cushions of non-German lands and peoples. So long as these outer works hold the inner fortress is unlikely to yield unless the bombings lead to general and uncontrollable panic.

Let Them Vote, But—

THE laws of politics being what they are, a Congressman would no more dream of opposing the right of soldiers and sailors to vote than he would of sponsoring a measure for compulsory polygamy. It does not follow that, in a given set of circumstances, he would not do everything possible to make that right meaningless. Thus some blend of the Worley bill in the House and the Green-Lucas bill in the Senate, designed to facilitate voting in the armed forces, is certain to get through, but its efficacy will depend on the extent to which Administration leaders can curb the effort of hard-shell Republicans and poll-tax Democrats to emasculate it. The blunt truth is that the soldier vote, by and large, is considered favorable to the Administration. Under the inept soldier-vote law passed in 1942, only 28,000 votes were cast by the services in the last election. By the fall of 1944 there may be as many as 10,000,000 men and women, including the merchant marine, in uniform and away from home. Their votes could very well be decisive.

Opposition to the Senate bill is varied and usually accompanied by a substitute proposal which would wreck it while leaving the wrecker still waving the flag. Senators Eastland of Mississippi and McKellar of Tennessee want the boys to vote, of course, but think that arrangements should be left to the individual states. In other words, as Senator Green of Rhode Island pointed out, "every unit in the field would have to be provided with information as to the laws of all the states, since the men in the service are not distributed according to geographical regions." Moreover, the state laws are in no sense adapted to the war emergency. A New York fighting man, for example, would first have to write to his secretary of state for an application blank; the secretary would mail the blank to him, and he would then fill it out and mail it back to the secretary, who in turn would send him a ballot, which in due course he would fill out and mail back to the secretary. Should the voter happen to be stationed in the Solomons—and stay put for the entire process—the five-way transaction might with luck be achieved in something like three months.

The question of constitutionality is another major battleground on which the opposition can take a patriotic stand. Senator Moore of Oklahoma wants the soldiers to "revere the Constitution" and feels that they would prefer to lose their vote rather than have that document interpreted broadly enough to cover a contingency which its creators could not possibly have foreseen. The constitutionality of the measure is in fact arguable, but it should be noted that the bill is merely a revision of the 1942 law, which was similarly open to question and was duly passed by both houses and signed by the President. Defenders of the measure rest their case on special war powers whose necessity overrides a literal reading of the Constitution which in any case violates its spirit.

Senator Brooks of Illinois, besides objecting to the inclusion of the merchant marine in the bill, considers the omission of printed names on the ballot a New Deal plot, since "the name of the President might be more readily remembered among the service men than that of his political opponent." But if the mailing of ballots has to wait for all the nominations to be made, many a soldier in Australia and many a sailor on the high seas will lose his vote—which may be exactly what Colonel McCormick's favorite Senator has in mind.

Numerous other objections have been advanced, most of them of the same caliber as the contention of the New York Daily News that "any top sergeant or chief petty officer who happened to be all slopped up with zeal for the New Deal could scare quite a few votes into the New Deal column." The few sober and obviously genuine objections to the bill have already been heeded and the measure modified accordingly. Senators Green and Lucas have both assured their colleagues that if the minority leaders object to either of the Republican appointees to be named by the President to the four-man War Ballot Commission, they will vote with the minority against confirmation. Going farther, the sponsors of the bill have accepted Senator Vandenberg's amendment that all decisions of the commission must be by majority vote, thus assuring the assent of at least one minority member.

Precautions against political intrigue have been taken, and the matter now resolves itself into the simple question of whether or not it is desirable for every soldier, sailor, merchant mariner, and woman auxiliary who is over twenty-one to have a voice in the 1944 election. It may well be that the Administration has political reasons to take the affirmative. Even accepting this over-cynical interpretation, there is more justice in upholding the soldier vote because it might favor the Democrats than in denying it for the same reason.

Mosley Is a Symbol

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE most important British action last week was not the bombing of Berlin; it was the freeing of Oswald Mosley. The effects of Mosley's release were less spectacular but they carried far greater meaning for Britain's future. The demonstrations and resolutions of censure were only the beginning, a warning of the mood of suspicion and rebellion which burns very close to the surface of the British working-class mind. The government will do well to heed it.

Superficially the affair was insignificant, and the government's act was in the purest British tradition. Sir Oswald and his wife and a number of his followers had been held in prison for more than three years—held without trial under a war-time security regulation. The conscience of the government was never easy about these administrative arrests, and Mosley was allowed many unusual privileges. He and his wife were housed in four adjoining rooms in Holloway Prison and permitted to have their own furnishings and radio. And when Mosley's health failed, Herbert Morrison, the Home Secretary, ordered him released.

Immediately questions were asked. Other prisoners had to put up with the hospital facilities provided by the institution; why not Mosley?—Well, because of his peculiar status; he had never been properly convicted.—But then should he not have been let out long ago?—No, because at an earlier stage of the war he might have been able to do some harm. Now he couldn't; and anyway the security officers would keep an eye on him.—But how about his wife, who was jailed as a fascist in her own right? Why should she come out? She's not ill.—Well, no, but after all she is his wife, and if he is not a danger neither is she. As a matter of fact, several other imprisoned fascists have also been released.—Because they are ill?—No, they are not ill, but they are considered harmless.—Then would Mosley also be released, even if he were not ill?—Oh, no. Mosley is being released because he is ill. That is the only reason.

And so British justice, nicely tempered with nonsense and a bad conscience and respect for upper-class privilege, ejected the country's leading fascist from jail—and found itself the object of fierce attack by all of organized labor and much of the unorganized public.

Why? What has generated so much anger over so normal and so English a procedure? What is all the row about, anyway? The row is only incidentally about Mosley, even though the marching workers carry placards denouncing his ugly record. The row is about something quite different. It is a popular vote of no confidence in the political behavior of the Churchill government. It is notice served on the government, including the Labor ministers, that the workers no longer trust its political intentions. The fact that Herbert Morrison has done a good job will not save him in the eyes of the workers. For the freeing of Mosley symbolizes the thing the workers fear—betrayal of the democratic aim for which they fight and work.

It is difficult to believe that Herbert Morrison expressed his own convictions as a person and a Labor minister in the matter of Mosley. More likely the decision was forced through by the Tory majority in the government, and the Home Secretary had to carry it into effect or resign. But by taking responsibility for the government's act he may well have forfeited his own political future. For the anger of Britain's workers has been clearly expressed. The Trades Union Congress, the National Executive of the Labor Party, and the National Council of Labor, a body representing the two other organizations and the cooperative movement, have all condemned the action of the government. Alone among the official labor bodies, the Parliamentary Labor group has indorsed Mosley's release by a vote of fifty-one to forty-three. But this narrow margin in Morrison's favor, in a group whose freedom of action is inhibited by Labor's collaboration in the government, is small consolation. Herbert Morrison faces the opposition of every important working-class organization in Britain, as well as the open hostility of the rank and file.

For British labor is still fighting a war against fascism. To the ordinary worker Oswald Mosley is as much a fascist as Hitler, and as much an enemy. That Mosley is less dangerous seems to him beside the point. What concerns him is the meaning of the fight, and he finds that meaning dissolved, washed away, lost, in the soft justice meted out to a rich and titled fascist.

The Miseries of Midas

BY I. F. STONE

Atlantic City, November 26

WHAT Will Congress Do? "I don't think we've done anything here," a member of the American delegation said anxiously in the Claridge cocktail room the other night, "to which Congress could take exception." This is the shadow which haunts this first session of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation conference. The other issues which divide or worry representatives of the forty-four United Nations in the UNRRA dwindle beside the question of whether Congress will authorize the necessary appropriation to start the new organization going. The various "hows" are far less important than the "whether." If Congress makes the appropriation, hungry people can be fed, devastation alleviated. Nothing else really matters.

Boondoggling Abroad? The chances are that the UNRRA will get its money, but increased grumbling may be anticipated about "boondoggling abroad." The announcement by the Treasury of plans for a World Development Bank may be expected to increase the irritation of the small-minded and provide new material for xenophobic demagogy. The truth is that we have grown so rich we've got to give some of our wealth away or choke on it. Charity has become an economic necessity. We have so much of the world's gold that unless we find some way to use it, it will lose much of its value. Its value depends on resumption of the gold standard. But other nations cannot go back to the gold standard unless they have enough gold. The many devices worked out during the past decade for clearing international payments and arranging trade without gold make it easier than ever to abandon the gold standard permanently. If that happens, we can use our gold to fill our dental cavities or adorn our fingers.

A Midas in Misery. From this point of view, the UNRRA is but one of many steps we must take to maintain our wealth by arranging to dispose of our surpluses. The World Bank proposed by the Treasury would make gold and gold credits available to the rest of the world to buy the excess products of our farms and factories. (Hold on to your seats a moment while I dwell on the fantastic character of the economy in which we live. The gold-buying policies of the Roosevelt Administration were a device to give goods away abroad. Its economic value in stimulating business at home lay in the fact that foreigners of course took goods, not dollar bills, in return for their metal. Now through the World Bank we propose to reverse the process, lending them back some of the gold with which to buy our exports again. This is how the merry-go-round of world capitalism operates.)

Food Surpluses, Too. It is pretty generally understood that our industrial capacity has been vastly expanded by the war; recent cries of anguish from the machine-tool industry provided the most dramatic example of our need for reviving markets abroad. Less understood is the fact that there has been a comparable expansion of agricultural production. Technological improvements, soil conservation, and enlarged acreage have pushed food production up enormously. Although one-fourth of our food is being used for military and lend-lease purposes, domestic food consumption per capita has reached the highest level in a generation. In 1941 and 1942 it was 10 per cent above the 1935-39 average, and it will remain 5 per cent above in 1943 and 1944. As the war ends, we can either plow this increased production under or give it away. We spent a half-billion dollars a year restricting farm output during the '30's. It would probably cost us three-quarters of a billion to push production back to the old levels now. That three-quarters of a billion multiplied by two is just about the amount we are being asked to put into the UNRRA, which will probably last two years after the war is over.

The Advantages of Charity. Shipping surpluses abroad instead of restricting output maintains a higher level of employment and economic activity at home. The process is no different from that whereby Britain before the First World War and the United States before the Second World War lent money abroad to make it possible for other countries to build railroads and factories and buy consumer goods. A large amount of this business was actually a gift, for many of the loans were wiped out in periodic economic crises and never repaid. But on net balance this foreign lending was profitable in maintaining economic activity. The difference between this older process of lending and what is being organized now through the UNRRA, World Bank, and other proposed devices is that the risk is socialized, like insurance, and power rests with governments rather than great private bankers. Unfortunately, though we are the world's greatest, if not the only, creditor nation, we still have a debtor-nation psychology.

What Will the Brass Hats Say? Next to Congress, the UNRRA's greatest hurdle is the ambitious attitude and covert hostility of the military. Under the basic UNRRA agreement the army decides when, where, and how the UNRRA shall operate. Interdepartmental committees began work on the problem of relief for liberated countries under the general chairmanship of Assistant Secretary of State Dean Acheson in June of 1942. The committee on food under H. A. Tolley more than a year ago recommended immediate action to buy and stock food for liberated countries. The Office of Foreign Relief and Rehabilitation (OFRRA) under Governor Lehman submitted a detailed program of purchases to the War Food Administration last May. But no food has been bought. The OFRRA asked $300,000,000 and was given an allocation of $75,000,000 for the quarter beginning July 1, but this was canceled late in August because of military hostility. The army is not equipped to feed civilian populations and in Italy has been handing out too much in some areas, including meat, and too little in others, where it has provided mostly flour. Military power over procurement machinery in this country and over transport facilities abroad leaves the UNRRA dependent on the military, and the ideal situation would be one in which they worked together. Brass-hat contempt for civilians is the psychological "block."

Other Difficulties. As this is written, the Soviet delegation is still holding its cards close to its vest. Barring action from that quarter, the UNRRA will be dominated by Britain and the United States, exercising power through the Combined Food Board, an Anglo-American-Canadian body. The smaller nations are split into those which have no money and those which have. The latter—the Dutch, Norwegian, and French—have won the right to appeal over the head of the UNRRA and Lehman, its director general, to the Combined Food Board and thus obtain more than their fair share of scarce world supplies. The State Department and the British Foreign Office have an understanding to maintain the supremacy of the Combined Food Board and restrict the UNRRA's power. Confusion has also been created because no one yet knows whether Lehman's old OFRRA will be merged in the UNRRA or remain in Leo T. Crowley's new Foreign Economic Administration. The infant UNRRA has an adult collection of headaches.

Finland Waits Too Long

BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

SECRETARY HULL was apparently wise enough to disregard the advice of those benevolent meddlers who urged him to plead Finland's cause at the Moscow conference. Although he saw Hjalmar J. Procope, Finnish envoy in Washington, on the eve of his departure for Moscow, there is no evidence that he sought to obtain easy terms for Hitler's halfway ally. If he did, the attempt was futile, for the Kremlin's stand on the question of a separate peace with Finland has stiffened if anything since the conference.

On the twenty-sixth anniversary of the Bolshevist Revolution Stalin, in one of his typical tirades, dealt caustically with the belated attempts of some of Germany's satellites to break away from the Axis. Referring specifically to Finland as one of the "participants in the Hitlerite coalition," he said:

> The leaders of these vassals, until so recently still obedient to their master, now recognize that the time has come to answer for their robbery, and they are taking to the bushes and trying to find a favorable moment to slip away from the robber giant.
> On entering the war those who would share in Hitler's gains decided in advance what pieces would fall to whom: to whom the cakes and the buns, to whom the bumps and the bruises. Of course, the bumps and the bruises were reserved for their enemies; for themselves, the cakes and the buns. But now it is clear that Germany and its vassals won't get the cakes and the buns; instead the Allies reserve for them the bumps and the bruises. . . .

Elsewhere in his speech Stalin spoke of the "Karelian-Finnish Republic" as one of the Soviet territories which the Red Army was going to liberate in short order. This is a revealing clue to the minimum demands which a victorious Russia may be expected to make on a defeated Finland.

The "Karelian-Finnish Soviet Socialist Republic," to give it its official name, did not come into existence until after the Peace of Moscow (March 12, 1940), which ended the war between Finland and the Soviet Union. It was formed from the former Karelian Republic, a subdivision of Russia proper, and territory ceded to the U. S. S. R. by Finland. Stalin's reference to it, therefore, clearly indicates that in dealing with Finland he will insist, at the very least, on the boundaries established in 1940. (At present a large part of the Karelian-Finnish Republic is occupied by Finnish troops.)

Coincident with this reaffirmation, by Stalin himself, that the Karelian-Finnish Republic is to be regarded as an integral part of the Soviet Union, comes news from Moscow of intensified political activity by Otto Wilhelm Kuusinen, the Finnish Communist leader who headed the Terijoki puppet government after the Soviet invasion of Finland in December, 1939, and later became chief executive of the Karelian-Finnish Republic. A few weeks ago Kuusinen published in Moscow a pamphlet entitled "Finland Unmasked" which concluded: "The vital interests of both the Finnish people and the people of Soviet Russia call for the creation of reliable guaranties which would preclude a repetition at any time of Finland's bandit attack on the U. S. S. R." As head of one of the Soviet Union's sixteen constituent republics, and even more as one of the vice-presidents of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet, Kuusinen has considerable weight in the councils of the Kremlin, and the prominence given his views by Pravda and other Soviet papers suggests that he will be influential in deciding Finland's fate.

At this juncture, and in particular after the Moscow conference, it is hard to see what the United States or Great Britain could do to save Finland from being converted into a Soviet protectorate on the model of, say, Outer Mongolia if Stalin decided that the future security of Russia's northwestern border necessitated such an arrangement. The Finns have only themselves to blame for this situation, for they have ignored, or deliberately spurned, literally dozens of attempts made by American and British diplomats to take them out of the war while there was still time.

As long as Russia stood to benefit from Finland's withdrawal from the war, Allied intervention in behalf of Finland had a good chance of success. Only a few months ago the Finns could have had a fairly good separate peace for the asking, including perhaps even an adjustment of the 1940 frontiers. Unfortunately all moves in this direction were blocked by the Finnish militarists, who stubbornly refused to evacuate the Soviet-Karelian territory held by them. With the shortsightedness that so often characterizes military leaders, the Finnish General Staff insisted that military occupation of Soviet Karelia was Finland's surest guaranty of future independence.

There has been little if any fighting along the Karelian front for more than a year. At times it has appeared as if the Soviets, concentrating all their attention on the central and southern sectors of the 2,000-mile front, were completely uninterested in the barren northern tracts where the Finnish army was intrenched. But the virtual armistice on this front never had the political implications which some uninformed commentators have attributed to it. The Russians were simply biding their time in the sound conviction that, once Hitler's armies had been beaten, the Finnish sector would crumple. That moment is near today.

Hardly any other nation has banked so senselessly on the time element as the Finns. They hoped that by holding their ground where the high-water mark of the German drive had left them and fighting a purely defensive war they would place themselves in an advantageous bargaining position. If there had ever been a chance that the war in Russia would end in a stalemate and a compromise peace, that might have been a sound speculation. But only those who are profoundly ignorant of Soviet Russia could imagine that Moscow would settle for much less than complete recovery of the 1941 boundaries.

Ironically enough, the Finns, like the Rumanians, the Hungarians, and other Nazi satellites, hoped almost as much from the Moscow conference as did the United Nations. There is a widespread belief in Nazi-controlled Europe that the principal objective of the United States as the guardian of democracy and of the Atlantic Charter must be to save Hitler's small-time vassals from the consequences of their collusion with the Axis. President Roosevelt's recent message to Congress and even more the outcome of the Moscow conference have somewhat subdued, but by no means blighted, these hopes. Mr. Procope in Washington is still pulling wires—in the State Department, in Congress, in the press.

Whatever the Finns' cultural achievements and their lonely heroism in 1939, it is absurd to speak of the Finland of 1943 as a "democracy" waging a "private," "defensive" war against a "totalitarian giant"—the expressions used by Finland's apologists in this country. In no country which has admitted Hitler's legions, be it an occupied or an "allied" country, can democracy survive. Finland today is in the grip of a high-handed secret police and of a thoroughly Nazified military clique headed by Marshal Mannerheim. Only in the last few weeks has any serious attempt been made to remove the despotic chief of the Finnish secret police, Anthoni, and to replace him with a more "democratic" official (see the New York Times of November 8).

The silence of the Moscow declarations on the subject of Finland, coupled with Stalin's contemptuous remarks, have at last jolted the Helsinki government from its hopefully waiting attitude. In the last few weeks feverish activity has been noted in the Finnish capital. Three of the country's leading diplomats—T. M. Kivimäki, Minister to Berlin, Onni Talas, Minister to Rome, and Georg A. Gripenberg, Minister to Stockholm and a nephew of Marshal Mannerheim's—have been recalled for consultation. The Foreign Affairs Committee of the Finnish rubber-stamp Diet is in almost permanent session, and according to the usually well-informed Stockholm Social-Demokraten, Finland's ace trouble-shooter and three-times peacemaker, Juho K. Paasikivi, is "standing by" for another trip to Moscow. Now that the sands are running out in Finland's hour-glass, the bankrupt politicians of Helsinki are moving heaven and earth in a last-minute attempt to stave off disaster.

All signs point to a coming Finnish peace bid—much too late to accomplish anything. But the official press still insists that as long as the Finnish army has not been eliminated Finland will never accept unconditional surrender.

What, then, has Finland to offer? The Germans, according to reliable reports, have already removed the bulk of their troops from the Finnish front, leaving only a few skeleton divisions to cover the retreat. So Finland can no longer offer to immobilize, or at least force the withdrawal of, a sizable German force. There is as yet no evidence that the Finnish army will be voluntarily withdrawn to the 1940-41 boundaries. Nor is there, thus far, the slightest indication that the three men primarily responsible for Finland's present plight—President Risto Ryti, Finance Minister Väinö Tanner, and Field Marshal Mannerheim—are prepared to resign. All three are absolutely unacceptable to the Kremlin. In the circumstances, it will take almost a miracle to make Moscow even consider a Finnish request for a separate peace.

The Moral Front

BY ARCHIBALD MacLEISH

WE HAVE had a great deal to say about the plain meaning to our enemies of the Moscow conference. Its plain meaning to ourselves is certainly no less obvious and no less encouraging. The Moscow conference offers the first clear indication that we have learned at long last to read the history of the First World War. We do not propose, regardless of what we may have said on this subject in the past, to "win the war first" and talk about the peace afterward. We do not propose to divide the war from the peace as Wilson divided them. We propose instead to create the peace in the process of fighting the war and as its principal objective.

Down to November 1, 1943, we were apparently reading the history of 1917-18 to mean, in the words of the current epigram, that it is a mistake to win a war and lose the peace that follows. From which we concluded that history's lesson for us was the lesson that we must win the war first and then make sure to win the peace as well. Which meant in practical terms that this time we must be as smart as Clemenceau, or this time we must keep the President at home, or this time we must say our unmistakable say to any little band of Senators who might set themselves up against the people's will. It does not seem to have occurred to us that the epigram was merely an epigram: that you cannot win a war and lose the peace; that if the peace is lost, the war is lost. The real lesson of 1918 was the lesson that if you wait to win the peace until you have won the war, you will win neither.

The fundamental mistake of Wilson's leadership was that he attempted, as some of our contemporaries, here and in England, have attemped in the present war, to "win the war first." Wilson believed that once the war was won, he could sit down around a table with the men of good-will and draft a better world. It was this split in Wilson's thinking between the war and the peace which produced the tragic irony of his failure.

On December 4, 1917, in one of the greatest speeches of his great career, Mr. Wilson made that fissure evident. Answering his own question, "When shall we consider the war won?" the President told the two houses of Congress:

> First . . . this intolerable Thing of which the masters of Germany have shown us the ugly face, this menace of combined intrigue and force which we now see clearly as the German power, a Thing without conscience or honor or capacity for covenanted peace, must be crushed, and if it be not utterly brought to an end, at least shut out from the friendly intercourse of the nations; and, second, . . . when this Thing and its power are indeed defeated and the time comes that we can discuss peace—when the German people have spokesmen whose word we can believe and when those spokesmen are ready in the name of their people to accept the common judgment of the nations as to what shall henceforth be the > bases of law and of covenant for the life of the world —we shall be willing and glad to pay the full price for peace, and to pay it ungrudgingly.

First the German Thing must be destroyed, and then a just peace would be made. The assumption was basic. It was repeated more than once "Let it be said again," said the President, "that autocracy must first be shown the utter futility of its claims to power or leadership in the modern world." "Not until that has been done can right be set up as arbiter and peacemaker among the nations." The war would end when the German people, putting aside the German Thing, admitted the wrong done and agreed to repair the damage, in so far as they could repair it, and to accept a settlement based upon justice. When this had happened, peace would be discussed. Peace would be "made."

The echo sounds very near. It was a speech a man might make today. It was a speech, indeed, which men have made today. And not in passionless imitation but in belief and hope. Wilson was never nobler than when he declared the reasons for his confidence that a just peace could be made. The "voices of humanity" were in the air. "They grow daily more audible, more articulate, more persuasive, and they come from the hearts of men everywhere." "Statesmen must by this time have learned that the opinion of the world is everywhere wide awake and fully comprehends the issue invoked." "The thought of the plain people here and everywhere throughout the world, the people who enjoy no privilege and have very simple and unsophisticated standards of right and wrong, is the air all governments must henceforth breathe if they would live." No representative of any self-governed nation would ever again dare attempt "such covenants of selfishness and compromise as were entered into at the Congress of Vienna." We have heard sentences like these in our own time. But with us men speak not of the Congress of Vienna but of the Conference of Versailles. The tragedy of our time is the reenactment in so short a space, not of the sufferings only, but of the hopes of men.

Wilson's mistake was not, as some of us seem ignobly to have concluded, that he hoped too much. Wilson's mistake was that he hoped too little. Like all decent and humane men, he hated war. He refused therefore to admit even to himself that a war could be an affirmative political action. A war to Wilson, however offensive its military strategy might be, was by its nature politically defensive—politically a means of countering your enemy and nothing more. Political affirmations belonged, in Wilson's world, to the conference table, after the war was won. And to us also, before the Moscow conference, they seemed to belong to the conference table. To us also a war was not capable of political meaning but only of military effects. To us also the final wisdom was the reminder that first we must stop our enemies and that only then would what we proposed to do be determined.

And yet the record of 1918 was there for anyone to read. Mr. Wilson's preliminary conditions were fulfilled to the last syllable. The German people did, as Mr. Wilson had said they must, renounce the German Thing. They did admit their responsibility for the war and agree to make good the damage. Upon the basis of these German acts peace was discussed, as Mr. Wilson said it would be discussed. Everything happened as he said it must happen. And there was no peace. There was instead a conference beside which the Congress of Vienna need not blush, an exhibition of political pettiness, particularly in this country, which equaled if it did not surpass previous exhibitions, a sick and uneasy armistice of a generation or less, a second German Thing worse by far than the first, and a Second World War as much more deadly than the first as the first was more deadly than anything that had gone before it. It was not the peace that was lost. It was the war that was lost. And why? Because our arms were inadequate? No, our arms were successful. Because we divorced, in our minds and in our words, the military war from the political peace.

But there is more in the record of 1918 than the lesson that you cannot win the war first and the peace afterward. There is also affirmative proof that if the peace and the war are made together as parts of a common action, both can be won. Mr. Wilson did accomplish one of his principal objectives, the objective which he put in his Mount Vernon speech of July 4, 1918, as the foremost of the ends "for which the associated peoples of the world are fighting and which must be conceded them before there can be peace." That objective was "the destruction of every arbitrary power anywhere that can separately, secretly, and of its single choice disturb the peace of the world. . . ." The arbitrary powers which had made that war were destroyed. But they were not destroyed at Versailles; they were destroyed as a political consequence of the actual fighting.

In his reply to the German request for an armistice of October 12, 1918, the President, through the Secretary of State, called the attention of the German government to the Mount Vernon declaration and stated: "The power which has hitherto controlled the German nation is of the sort here described. It is within the choice of the German nation to alter it." The effect of that declaration and of the subsequent declaration of October 23 is now history. On November 9 the Kaiser abdicated. He would be a bold man who would contend, with the chronicle of Versailles before him, that the autocratic governments of the Central Powers would have been destroyed if this objective like the others had been left to the council table to debate.

The lesson of the last war, I most earnestly submit, is not that Senator Lodge was a vain and petty man, or that Clemenceau was as vindictive as he was blind, or that President Wilson should have stayed at home. The lesson is that you cannot run a modern war in two sections like a fast express—a war action followed by a peace action. Because if you do, neither section will arrive; and for this reason—that a modern war is itself a political action, is indeed the most expressive and assertive of all political actions. To deny it—to believe, or to pretend to believe, that the military war has no political implications and can have no political effects—is to frustrate the war effort and to defeat its purpose. A modern war is an action of entire peoples which absorbs their total will and every interest of their lives. It must be worthy of the effort it demands. If it is not, if it is presented as a military action only, it may be brought to an end, but it will not be brought to achievement. For it is not possible to summon up that will of millions of men and women a second time, after the announced and asserted end has been accomplished, to push still farther forward to the real objective.

There are those who resent being told that this war is a war of ideas, but neither they nor any of us can escape that fact. This war, whether we like it or not, is a war for the moral and political domination of our time and of the time after. Those who made it, made it in the belief that they could impose upon men their conceptions of society, rightly estimating that if they could succeed, everything else—economic advantage, territorial advantage—would follow. They struck—they dared to strike because they were restrained by no respect or reverence of their own—at the heart of human power, at the essential principle of faith. Whether we admit it to ourselves or not, this war is a war fought by our enemies on that level and in those terms. And as things now are, we run the risk of losing the war itself to enemies our armies have defeated; of seeing the moral revolution of our enemies overthrow the moral order we defend even though our enemies themselves have been destroyed.

By the mere action of making their war at the political and moral level our enemies have won terrible victories already in the field they chose. Their initial advantage—and it was an overwhelming advantage—was precisely that they were willing to challenge the moral sense of civilized mankind. It is no new thing in the chronicle of the human spirit to see the scoffer, the derider, the blasphemer, win victories against belief and faith. What is new is to see a government, a nation, committing itself to a great war in the cause of contempt, the cause of blasphemy, the cause of the worthlessness and ignobility of man. But in one case as in the other the initial advantage is the same. The advantage is the advantage of daring to deride, daring to despise. The advantage is the fact of the attack, the fact that the forbidden words are spoken.

It is foolish to talk of the Nazi propaganda in this war as though it were the dissemination of evil. If it were only that, it would be weak indeed. What is dangerous in the propaganda of our enemies is the fact that it is an attack against the good. There is no need to use the propaganda agencies of a great power to disseminate evil. Evil existed in the world, all forms and kinds of evil, long before Hitler and Goebbels and the rest. What the moral and political attack can do is to break down the moral preconceptions, the implicit and accepted beliefs, which hold the social infection of evil in restraint.

The obvious example is the Nazi racial propaganda. There was no need for the Nazis to set up radio installations to infect the world with racial hatreds. The seeds are very old. They are scattered everywhere. But the seeds in a healthy and sane society germinate, if at all, in little pockets of corruption which are sealed off from the common healthy life by the virulence of their poison and by the cleansing current of the common public decency and the common self-restraint. In a free society which is strong the infections of racial hatred are checked by the inner sanity and order of the nation. It is this sanity, this restraining order, which the Nazis have attacked. Our enemies know—know better, apparently, than we—that the basic strength of a free society is its belief in the dignity of man as man, of every man, no matter what his tongue or race. They know that this belief depends for its vitality upon its practice. They know that its practice rests upon the inner social discipline which alone restrains its violation. They know that once the unspoken restraints are publicly broken down, once the weave of common agreement, common self-discipline is broken, the entire garment will begin to ravel out.

And it is this precisely that they intend. They have used racial hatreds not for the sake of racial hatreds but to destroy the moral order without which the democratic world cannot survive. They have won victories already, as every honest man who is willing to face the facts admits. The great and terrible question of this year is whether we shall permit them to win further victories—to win the final victory they propose; whether we shall permit them, though defeated in the war itself, to win their moral victory over the democratic order which many millions of us still believe the war is fought and suffered to defend.

What the final answer to that question will be no living man can know. But of one answer even the living can be certain. We cannot win this war in the political and moral field unless the war is fought there. But to fight the war there means to fight the war there. It does not mean to fight the war as a purely military operation, leaving the moral and political issues for a conference on the peace. No conference, no treaty of peace, can restore by articles of agreement the authority of a moral order. Only a great and overwhelming affirmation of the faith of mankind, of the conscience of humanity, can give force and power to belief.

If we fight and win this war as a purely military operation devoid of political and moral objectives, our victory will, it is true, have meaning. Any victory has meaning in the memory of mankind. But the meaning of our victory, if we fight the war on those terms, will be only this—that our military skill and our man-power and our resources of industry and wealth were superior to those of our enemies.

Really to win this war—to win on the dangerous and threatening level where the war is truly fought—our victory must mean far more than that. It must be a victory not only for our wealth and strength but for our conscience and our truth against the lie which has attacked them. It must be a victory which will discredit, in actions which every eye can read, the pretensions of our enemies, a victory which will mean to all men everywhere that democracy is strong and living and cannot be overcome.

To those who mistrust words and their uses, the definition of our objectives in this war will seem a trivial thing. It will seem to them unimportant whether this war is fought for unconditional surrender first and a pious approval of international cooperation afterward, or fought literally and precisely for the Four Freedoms and the world the Four Freedoms imply. It will seem to them irrelevant whether our actions in the war prove to the world that the war is one for the reaffirmation of democracy or only a war to be won. But words are not trivial or irrelevant things, even in the midst of fighting. It makes a difference to the entire future of the world how we answer for ourselves the question Wilson asked —"When shall we consider the war won?" It makes a difference to the future of the world and of this country and of ourselves, each one of us, whether the victory we set ourselves to win is the moral and political victory the President defined twenty-three months ago when he told us for what ends we fought or the purely military victory to which many voices on both sides of the Atlantic have attempted to commit us.

It makes the difference between peace and war.

Early in 1918 the editor of the Manchester Guardian said to an American observer in England: "Things are moving very fast and are going wrong. There is no one to look to but President Wilson, but the danger that confronts us is that the President may find the control of his ideas taken out of his hands." History never altogether repeats itself. But no one. I think can read these words in the autumn of 1943 without a recognition, like the recognition of a dream, that we have passed this way before—and must awake. It is possible to believe—indeed, it is necessary to believe—that there has been an awakening and that the declaration of Moscow is its outward form.

THE FORMAL ABDICATION of the Kaiser removes an important legal obstacle to the reconstitution of Germany on other than a monarchical basis, if that is desired. What the new form of government will be, however, is wholly a matter of speculation.—December 7, 1918.

KARL LIEBKNECHT has been humanity's witness at the heart of Germany. Eager, earnest, unquenchable, he has shouted into the unwilling ears of German ministers and judges what we have said in the safety afforded by Allied bayonets. And now the fortunes of war have taken this man from jail and set him on high. Three years ago he raised his voice alone; now great masses of men look to him for direction.—December 7, 1918.

THE BRITISH LABOR PARTY, with some 300 parliamentary candidates in the general election now in progress, has made its campaign on a platform of thoroughgoing social reorganization. A published summary of the more important provisions of the platform includes a special tax on capital, free trade, no tariffs, immediate nationalization of all lands, immediate nationalization of vital public-service systems, better housing conditions, free public education, freedom for Ireland and India, "hands-off" democracy with immediate withdrawal of troops from Russia, no conscription, equal rights for women, a peace of reconciliation with no secret diplomacy and no economic war, the charter of labor to be incorporated in the principles of a league of free peoples.—December 14, 1918.

THE REVOLUTION IN RUSSIA is the break, in the north, of that better day which has been predicted so often by all the prophets and looked for so long by all the children of men; all: the day of the redemption of His people: "When the proud were to be scattered, the princes put down from thrones, and those of low degree exalted; when the hungry were to be filled and the rich were to be sent away empty."—"CHRISTIAN" [LINCOLN STEFFENS], December 21, 1918.

THE DEATH OF EDMOND ROSTAND, which took place on December 2, will neither eclipse our gaiety nor darken our wisdom. But it robs our time of a talent of almost alien brightness and colorfulness, as blithe and as unrelieved in its splendor as those Mediterranean shores by which the poet was born and to which his imagination always returned. —LUDWIG LEWISOHN, December 21, 1918.

BY WAY OF CONTRAST with the amiable and liberal utterances lately exchanged by Italian diplomats and American statesmen, it is interesting to read in recent dispatches from Paris that the representatives there from Yugoslav countries are "becoming disturbed." Perhaps the failure of President Wilson and the representatives of Italy to discuss the Italian claims "in detail" may be the cause of this seemingly unreasonable state of the Yugoslav mind.—December 28, 1918.

Diary of the Future

BY VERNON BARTLETT

[This is the fifth instalment of "a cautionary tale . . . a rash attempt to write history before it has happened," by a distinguished British journalist and member of Parliament. Previous instalments have described the chaotic conditions in Europe following Germany's collapse and the growing political tension in Britain. The scene now shifts to Washington.]

V. The Peace Conference Opens

SEPTEMBER 13. Back in Washington. I was here in May, 1943, and I don't like the change in the atmosphere, even though it is fun to meet so many old friends. The gap between Congress and the Executive is wider than ever. The very fact that the President has fought so consistently to assure that the United States shall shoulder responsibilities consonant with its material wealth and influence turns thousands of Americans against the acceptance of these responsibilities.

I hadn't anticipated so much bitterness against Europe. Very few people admit the right of these small countries to feel as nationalistic as the big ones do. The Yugoslavs have just had a political crisis, even though their government was backed by America and Britain. This seems to have made the State Department nearly as angry as it was over the De Gaulle business in 1943. Never were the United Nations so little united, and Walter Lippmann foresees a terrific row between the great and small powers.

September 15. Lippmann was right. The President seemed tired when he opened the Peace Conference, but made, I thought, the best speech of his career. But from the appointment of Darlan onward, some of his advisers have used Europeans whom most Europeans hate and despise. General de Gaulle, who has a good many snubs from the State Department to forget, and who has a very retentive memory, came out as the spokesman of the smaller European nations, each of which has had its contribution to make to civilization. He received an embarrassing amount of applause. The second surprise came when the Soviet delegation staked its own claim to leadership. Anthony Eden, who is so much better than he sounds in his speeches, was obviously hampered by the uncertainties of the crisis at home. (If Polish influenza had not kept the Prime Minister away, we should have had a much more forthright speech, but one doubts whether it would have been so liberal or so delicate in its dealings with the Soviet Union, France, and the lesser European states.) One had the feeling that the conference was getting a little out of hand, and the breakdown of supplies in Europe lessened the authority of the great powers.

September 16. Alan Moorehead of the Daily Express has just arrived here from Warsaw, Budapest, and Bucharest. His account is too terrible to be printable. Years of undernourishment and hardship have so weakened resistance that the Polish influenza is killing even more people than the Germans killed. Its ravages are particularly marked in Germany itself, where it is helped on by a kind of "despairing apathy."

This confirms an article by John Gunther about the breakdown of distribution arrangements in Europe. In Eastern Europe, where the need is greatest, there is still sporadic fighting between the advancing Russians, a few Polish bands, and a few German regiments, commanded by men whose fear of communism is so fanatical that it prevails over the general apathy. According to Gunther, this very fanaticism is only another symptom of bewilderment and despair. At one moment the Poles and Germans are allied against the Russians; at the next they are murdering each other. In either event, no distribution of seed or livestock is possible, and the plight of the peasants is heartbreaking.

September 17. The conference, after a stormy plenary session, has appointed a Directing Committee which, after a stormy private session, has appointed six commissions. This, I think, is more sensible than it sounds, although the composition of the Directing Committee is the result of a piece of unnecessary bullying. It is, after all, the fate of Europe that is being decided, and the European states have to agree upon two delegates to direct the conference with three other delegates representing the United States, the Soviet Union, and Great Britain. Naturally enough, one of these two delegates will be a Frenchman. How one other man is to represent the interests of such diverse states as Poland, Czechoslovakia, Belgium, Norway, and Holland nobody knows.

The sensible decision is to make the commissions technical rather than political, as far as possible. A delegate to each commission will be appointed by each European government, but he will not be able to bind his government. That can only be done by the full delegates in the plenary conference. What created a bad impression was the insistence by the great powers that the plenary sessions would be expected to accept almost without discussion the majority reports of these commissions. This was not a very polite way of telling the European governments that their technical advice would be welcomed but their political interference would not, and upon men like General de Gaulle it had the effect that anybody could have foreseen. He is being given a leadership over Europeans he could never have won on his own merits.

The Juridical Commission has to advise on the fate of war criminals, on the establishment of a permanent European Court of International Justice, and on the preparation of a new Declaration of the Rights of Man—a praiseworthy American proposal to overcome the old objection to international interference with the national sovereignty of any state. The Transport Commission has to overcome objections to the international ownership and control of all transport. It has the initial advantage that every government needs supplies from the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, and the UNRRA has been able to take over transport for the purpose, but the final enemy will not be the governments so much as the big private interests. Big business in London and New York is already actively organizing opposition to a procedure which, if successful, would ultimately be extended to Britain and the United States.

The most bitter discussions are expected in the Commission for German Reeducation—some delegates wanted the deletion of the prefix "re." This is bound to be political, despite its name, for every government will have to make up its mind what sort of Germany it wants, and which side it is on in the unconfessed international civil war—on the side of privilege or on that of the common man. But perhaps the most important commission will be the Economic and Financial Commission. So few people understand the fundamental difference between "Bancor" and "Unitas"—I certainly don't—and protagonists of the Keynes scheme or the White scheme are as bitter and intolerant as the narrower and more fervent protagonists of some religion.

The Restitution and Reparation Commission is likely to have less trouble; it will easily reach agreements even though they may not easily be enforced. Every delegation has a formidable list of national treasures stolen by the Germans, and none is likely to protest that his neighbor is exaggerating.

The restitution of economic wealth is, of course, a much more complicated business. France, and other countries in which the state is to have much more control than it used to have, won't do so badly; all stocks and shares in French enterprises standing in the name of German individuals or the German government will simply be transferred to the French state; and it will become a matter of French internal politics, after the new constitution has been adopted, to decide which of these industries shall go back into private hands and under what conditions.

Czechoslovakia, Austria, and to a lesser extent the other occupied countries have assets as well as claims. It is only now, when the war is over, that one can appreciate the extent to which Hitler had to transfer and to disperse German industry. Austria has become one of the highly industrialized states of Europe, and the collapse came so quickly that very few of its factories were badly bombed. The development of Upper Silesia, too, will greatly benefit Poland, and the number of small industries in the overpopulated and impoverished region between the Baltic and the Black Sea will help to raise the standard of living there—if this cursed Polish influenza leaves enough population to do the work.

The last of the conference commissions is the Armaments Commission. Here again there will be a great fight between the public and private interests. There is likely to be agreement on only one point—that Germany must be disarmed; that has been done anyhow under the military occupation.

American and British aircraft companies seem equally determined to keep out any government control so that they may compete with each other after the war is over. That being so, it will be very difficult to build up an International Police Force. President Benes and other Europeans who followed the long and depressing discussions on disarmament in Geneva between the two world wars have, I believe, prepared a very complete plan for an International Air Police which would both disarm Germany and discourage any aggressor in the future. The document is confidential for the moment, but Slavik, who has been working on it, considers that the whole conference will turn upon its acceptance. Frankly, I don't believe the present British government will accept more than the part that deals with the unilateral disarmament of Germany.

September 22. Great argument still going on as to whether the conference should sit in secret. Eden and Richard Law arguing in favor of publicity, the former because he remembers the extent to which the vain attempts to keep things secret in Geneva gave a wonderful opportunity to every delegate with an ax to grind, and the latter because he remembers the fiasco of the exclusion of the press from the Food Conference at Hot Springs sometime in 1943. The President, on the other hand, is said to be opposed because he wants as little material as possible to be available to the isolationist papers.

Their wrecking tactics are appalling. In particular, their virulent attacks on the Russians are having a very bad effect. Already Mr. Molotov has made an official protest to the State Department and was apparently entirely unconvinced when Mr. Hull emphasized that the Administration had no influence over the newspapers. His reminder that the President himself was the object of constant and merciless criticism brought such a reply from Molotov about the irresponsibilities of the democratic system that the two men separated on the worst

Is There Something You Could Have Done to Save Millions of Innocent People—Men, Women, and Children—from Torture and Death?

Nazi Massacre of Kiev's Jews Told by Witness

Victims Stripped, Lined Up at a Gulley, Shot; Babies Merely Thrown in Alive

(By United Press)

German troops massacred Kiev's Jews during the first days of the Nazi occupation of the now-liberated Ukraine capital, robbing them of their clothes and jewelry and lining them up naked at the edge of a gulley, where they were shot, the Russian Tass News Agency reported yesterday.

Tass quoted an eyewitness story written for the Moscow newspaper, "Izvestia" by Dmitri Orlov, a resident of Kiev.

"Several days after the Germans entered Kiev (on Sept. 20, 1941) I went to Lvovskaya Street. An incessant procession of people was streaming through it, and both sidewalks were lined with German patrols. . . . The Germans were driving the Jews to Babyi Yar gulley, beyond the city.

"I also stealthily made my way to that place. I was able to stand the sight of what I saw there only for ten minutes, and after that everything went black before my eyes.

"The Germans forced the people to undress, and then methodically gathered their clothes and loaded them on trucks. In separate trucks they put underwear.

"Then they tore from the naked people—there were men and women among them—rings and watches, if they had any, and ranged them up, shivering from the cold or from mortal terror, at the edge of the gulley and shot them.

"The Germans did not waste any bullets on little children, but simply hurled them alive into the gulley.

"Those who were waiting their turn stood silently. Some sang or even laughed. I could see that those who laughed were already insane.

"And this thing lasted three days. All those whom the Germans had not, as yet, driven to their death knew what was in store for them. The old men put on mourning clothes and gathered in their homes for prayer. Then they went to Lvovskaya Street. The invalids were supported by others, and some were even carried. And all of them were killed."

With the irresistible advance of the heroic Russian armies, regaining their native soil, the monstrous treatment the Germans mete out to Jews receives new confirmation. Stories of horror which must shake the conscience of humanity—if civilization is to survive—are being published by eyewitnesses. One of these horror stories is reproduced on this page. Have courage and read it!

Perhaps you will recoil. It may disturb your sleep at night. But it may also fill you with anger, with zeal to do something to stop such atrocities, to rescue the Jews who survive.

Not because they were Poles or Dutchmen, not because they were peasants or officers—just because, and only because, they were Jews, more than two million men, women and children have been deliberately murdered by the Germans.

The Jews of Europe have suffered more fatalities from atrocities than all the European Nations combined. In the face of such a tragedy it is folly, indeed it is sinful, to debate whether Jews are a religion, a nation, or a race—to insist on calling them "refugees"—and thus to remain passive to their disastrous plight, ignoring it and surrounding it with silence.

They are a specific group of human beings whom our common enemy has publicly threatened to exterminate entirely. This Committee believes it is an inescapable duty of all Americans to actively oppose Hitler in this respect also, and to do all that is humanly possible to save the four million Jews who are still alive in Europe.

These Four Million Can Be Saved!

Experts agree on that. Sweden and Denmark have just proved it by saving six thousand Jews in a few days.

They are safe for only one reason: the doors of a neighboring country were unlocked.

And because of that fact, the escaping Jews found the resources and energy to reach these doors of safety. What Sweden did so simply, so humanely, other nations are being urged to do, must do if their consciences are to be clear for the peace to come!

Read what this committee has already accomplished, what its further plans are.

Our Program of Action!

AT THE EMERGENCY CONFERENCE HELD IN NEW YORK ON JULY 20-25, 1943, EXPERTS FROM ALL PARTS OF THE UNITED STATES FORMULATED A PROGRAM OF EFFECTIVE ACTION THAT CAN AND MUST BE TAKEN NOW TO SAVE THE JEWISH PEOPLE OF EUROPE. THEY URGED THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE UNITED NATIONS TO ADOPT A PLAN EMBRACING THE FOLLOWING OUTSTANDING MEASURES:

1. To create a Governmental Agency specifically charged with the task of saving the Jewish people of Europe.

2. To seek guarantees from the Axis-satellite countries, through the International Red Cross, neutral countries, or the Vatican, to insure Jews the same treatment given to other nationals.

3. To relieve the starvation and disease which are decimating the Jewish people in Axis-held territory.

4. To insist that the Axis-satellite countries, which now seek to gain the good will of the victorious Allies, withhold their Jews from Hitler's slaughterhouses and permit them to leave their borders.

5. To urge neutral countries—Sweden, Ireland, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland, and Turkey—to grant the Jewish people temporary asylum.

6. To request neutral countries to grant transit facilities to all Jewish people passing from Axis-controlled lands to any United Nations territory, regardless of whether the persons involved be refugees, immigrants, or repatriates.

7. To obtain from the Governments of the United Nations temporary asylum with the understanding that after the war these refugees will be removed from their territories if they are not wanted.

8. To insist that Great Britain, pending this tragic emergency, open the doors of Palestine, where 600,000 Jews have expressed their desire to share their homes and food with their suffering brothers, thus putting an end to the discriminatory immigration laws that exclude only Jews from their own country.

OU SLEEPING?

THIS COMMITTEE CAME INTO EXISTENCE TO ACHIEVE THE RESCUE OF THE JEWS OF EUROPE

Here Is Part of Its Record

Our offices and representatives in Washington and in London, in Palestine and in Turkey, are urging the respective governments to undertake large-scale action to save the four million Jews in Europe's death trap.

We brought the problem of the Jewish disaster to the masses of American people by nation-wide advertising in the leading newspapers in this country and through national radio-broadcasts, as well as through books, periodicals, and leaflets.

We organized mass expressions of public opinion demanding immediate action, through a mass petition movement, mass rallies and dramatic pageants.

We organized the pilgrimage of five hundred Rabbis to Washington.

We requested and obtained the week of compassion and prayer by six thousand Christian Churches.

We initiated the movement to pay tribute to Sweden and Denmark.

We organized the protest against the omission of the Jewish disasters from the Moscow statement on atrocities.

Now, we are able to state with satisfaction that the President, at his press conference on November 6, and Secretary Hull, in his historic appearance before the joint session of Congress, specifically mentioned their concern with the Jewish tragedy. The ring of silence around the catastrophe of the Jewish people was broken.

More than that. In all our activities, we put forward as the first and most immediate demand, the creation of a specific Governmental Agency with the task to effectuate the rescue of the millions of Jewish people still alive in Europe.

Now a Bipartisan Resolution Has Been Introduced In the Senate and House Demanding the Creation of Such an Agency

This resolution recommends to the President: ". . . The creation by the President of a commission of diplomatic, economic and military experts to formulate and effectuate a plan of immediate action designed to save the surviving Jewish people of Europe from extinction at the hands of Nazi Germany."

This resolution was introduced by leaders of both Parties: in the Senate by Senator Guy M. Gillette and eleven of his colleagues; in the House by Congressmen Will Rogers, Jr. (D.) of California, and Joseph Clark Baldwin (R.) of New York.

The hearings of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House have opened. We hope that hearings of the Senate's Foreign Affairs Committee will begin soon. Prominent men from all walks of American life are testifying, urging this resolution's passage. Wendell Willkie declared this resolution of "paramount importance. The urgency of the situation demands immediate action. The bill deserves the wholehearted support of every American."

You Can Do Your Part, Too!

Wire or write to your Senator and Cogressman. Write also to the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House. Demand their cooperation!

You can do your part, too, to carry out our tremendous plan of activities. You can help us mobilize public opinion from coast to coast. You can help us keep alive our headquarters in Washington, London, Palestine, and Turkey to continue our work for a people in deepest agony and despair. For each day dooms thousands that can be saved. This is strictly a race against death!

This Committee is asking the American people for substantial financial support with which it will be enabled to carry on its work for the rescue of the Four Million martyred Jews in Europe.

We need your financial help immediately—NOW! You can sign your name below and enclose your contribution to speed the effectiveness of our work to save the Jewish people of Europe. Whatever you give is evidence of your conviction that human life is worth saving!

of terms. Edgar Ansell Mowrer is convinced that this incident, small in itself, might be decisive in Moscow, where Stalin is said to be making up his mind whether or not to come into the war against Japan.

September 23. Conference overshadowed by the news from Burma. The British attack on Rangoon and Akyab has failed. I once flew over the territoy from Akyab to Bangkok—mountains rising to upward of 12,000 feet covered with thick jungle and populated by pigmies with blowpipes and poison darts. Since that flight I have always doubted whether we could reconquer Burma except at the cost of very extravagant losses. In no other terrain is mechanized warfare more handicapped. The most serious part of the Burma defeat is the unanimity with which the American correspondents state that the British fought half-heartedly. Some of them are reported as saying that they had no interest in winning back territory that wasn't theirs anyway and that they didn't see why they couldn't go home now that the war against Germany was over. A Herald Tribune editorial states quite bluntly that Americans have too often accused the British of an imperialism which, in fact, had ceased to inspire them even before the First World War. Partly for that reason Great Britain had become almost ashamed of its empire, and the men of its younger generation were in no mood to defend it.

Talked to G. about this, since he has had much military experience in India and Burma during this war. He is furious that the G. O. C., yielding to pressure from Whitehall or Washington, should have attacked at a time when the desire to get home was inevitably first in the soldier's mind. He claims that nothing has been done to give the ordinary soldier or airman "a general political picture" of the war. Especially just after the defeat of the Germans a course of political training was needed before we carried out an attack outside Europe.

September 30. Ribbentrop has died in Sachsenhausen concentration camp. The last thing I heard of him was a typical example of his stupid arrogance. Each Allied government has been asked to submit its list of war criminals, and if the conference agrees, these are to be handed over to the respective governments to be tried by courts martial. Ribbentrop is, of course, on every single list, and topped only by Himmler—Hitler being dead before the lists were sent in to the conference secretariat. His perverted vanity is such that he has been boasting in camp because he is considered a greater criminal than Goebbels, Streicher, Ley, and the others.

Now Freddie Kuh has come along with the story that Ribbentrop was deliberately murdered by other Nazis at Sachsenhausen who considered him a traitor. They were presumably less angered by his readiness to compromise with the Allies—many of them would do that in order to save some remnants of their system—than by his denial of the Nazi faith. It's rather confusing, and I'm not sure in my own mind that Ribbentrop ought not to have been made the puppet head of Germany and compelled to sign the provisional peace, and then dealt with, in due course, as one of the worst of the war criminals. Otherwise, as at Versailles, the signature may be that of some relatively progressive and democratic German who will also be signing his own political death-warrant. The men who started the war will again escape the odium of admitting defeat.

In the Wind

SWEET CHARITY: The Treasury's objection that a sales tax would fall most heavily on low incomes puzzles Dr. Harley L. Lutz, professor of public finance at Princeton. The "small-income group," he writes in the Tax Review, is "so vague as to size and location as to be almost an abstract statistical concept. . . . If an adjustment of some sort be necessary on the basis of need, by all means let it be made. But it should be confined to those who need it, and determination of the cases should be a responsibility of the local welfare departments."

THE REVEREND GEORGE W. COOKE of Rochester, New York, makes this objection to John Roy Carlson's "Under Cover" in a letter to the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle: "Has it come to the place in this country where, unless we accept the philosophy of Marxian atheism, the 'New Deal,' and other social 'crackpot' ideas, that we are compelled to hold our speech?"

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST has instructed all his editors not to review or otherwise mention the movie "North Star," but to accept advertisements of it nevertheless.

SPECIAL FOR WAR WORKERS! From an advertisement in the New York Times: "The Antoine Hour. In the privacy of a studio. Antoine will study your features and personality . . . he will give consultation lessons to his clients . . . he will create individual coiffures from the most informal to the most glamorous . . . he will make an exciting, drastic change in your looks and personality. Appointment by letter only. $50 an hour."

FESTUNG EUROPA: The average life expectancy of workers condemned to forced labor is six months. . . . The manager of an Oslo insurance firm was surprised to learn recently that a local Nazi official had been put on his pay roll as personnel director at a salary of 11,000 kroner a year. Previously the work had been done by a girl for 2,000 kroner. . . . Bird life in Holland is threatened with extinction. Hungry people have been stealing their eggs.

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

The Breakdown of Vichy

BY JULES MOCH

[Jules Moch was elected to the French Chamber of Deputies as a Socialist in 1928 and later held important posts in the two Blum governments. He was one of the eighty deputies who voted against Pétain and capitulation. Arrested shortly after the armistice, he was kept in prison until the end of 1941. After his release he took an active part in the resistance movement until last February, when he was forced to flee the country. He then went to London and is now a commander in the Fighting French navy.]

THE fall of 1943 finds the mood of the French people one of increasing hostility toward Vichy. The so-called "New Order" is disintegrating. Some of its most faithful servants are looking about for excuses to sever their connection with it. Various measures ordered by Laval or imposed by Hitler explain the acceleration of the break-up.

The law drafting Frenchmen for compulsory labor in Germany has aroused universal anger. Hundreds of thousands of young men have taken to the woods in defiance of the mobilization order. Families which rallied to the old Marshal because they hated communism or feared a new Popular Front have made a complete volte-face now that their younger members face the danger of being shipped to the Reich. An official Vichy document gives the quotas set for certain cities between May 8 and 21, 1943, and the number that could be rounded up for deportation:

	Number Called	Number Sent	Percentage Sent
Aurillac (Cantal)	66	26	39
Beziers (Herault)	101	11	11
Carcassonne (Aude)	89	67	75
Le Puy (Haute Loire)	78	35	45
Macon (Saône et Loire)	349	7	2
Montlucon (Allier)	108	45	41
Narbonne (Aude)	50	34	68
Nîmes (Gard)	450	28	6
Toulon (Var)	200	4	2
Valence (Drome)	109	3	3
	1600	260	16

The rural population has complied no more willingly with the decree requiring men to do guard duty along railroad rights of way to combat the systematic sabotage of German supply lines. Farm owners are particularly irked by the order as the number of agricultural workers held as prisoners of war in Germany has created an acute labor shortage.

An idea of the extent of the sabotage is gained from a report recently received from France listing 336 operations carried out by underground organizations between April 15 and June 1, 1943, against the occupation and its allies. The operations, which were of course but a fraction of the total number of acts of sabotage committed in the whole country during the same period, were classified as follows:

Derailment of trains and destruction of rolling stock	96
Destruction of telegraph and telephone lines	66
Stoppages in factories due to explosions or sabotage	33
Destruction of trucks and garages	10
Canals and locks put out of operation	3
Destruction of model airplanes	2
Destruction of windows in government buildings and homes of collaborators	23
Bombs in establishments occupied by the enemy	18
Seizure of gasoline, enemy food stocks, and ration tickets	19
Liberation of prisoners by force	1
Assassination of policemen	6
Execution of traitors	12
Attacks on enemy units	40
Miscellaneous operations	7

The tax on metals is extremely unpopular because the French people regard it as a means of building up metal stocks for the German war effort. Complaints about the food scarcity are mounting as underfed children succumb to disease. (The German army of occupation is still disposing of the lion's share of food. Mediterranean cities report that thousands of tons of oranges are unloaded from Spanish boats directly into German trucks; not a single orange is left for the French.)

The militia created by Laval to counterbalance Doriot's gangsters and to support his regime "meets continuous hostility from the people," according to an official Vichy report. "The occupation forces," according to another Vichy document, "are imposing more and more severe restrictions; their arbitrary actions and mass arrests have aroused growing enmity."

Each social class has reacted in its own way to post-armistice conditions and made its own contribution to the evolution of this mood. At first the industrialists had a different attitude from the merchants, who were hard hit from the beginning. The big business men believed in collaboration and began to figure out ways of profiting from it, though often, to rationalize their position, they said they favored collaboration only in order to help the hundreds of workers in their factories. Soon, however, the more intelligent of them realized that any hope for profit was illusory owing to the lack of raw materials, the disorganization of transportation, and the widespread corruption of the Nazis. Later the transfer of French technicians to Germany and the huge drafts of man-power almost drove them out of business. Many of them then became as anti-Nazi as their workers.

The middle bourgeoisie, whose influence has been compromised by political failure and the rise to power of a "mafia" of new men, hopes for the collapse of the government and is undermining whatever authority Vichy still has. It sulks and criticizes and contributes in some degree to the underground resistance.

Career officers, dismissed from service when the army was dissolved in November, 1942, after having served the Marshal for two years, now dream of revenge. Reactionary as a group, they at first accepted the defeat which rid them of the Republic, and denounced the "treason" of De Gaulle. Many of them were rallied to the Allied cause in November, 1942, when Darlan and Giraud placed their movement under the banner of the Marshal. Those who are still in France are now openly hostile to the politics of collaboration, which deprived them of professional employment. Many have joined the resistance movement and through their new contacts gained a new political perspective.

The majority of the clergy took a decided stand against collaboration after the passage of the anti-Semitic laws and particularly after the deportation of Jews. Several bishops made truly noble protests against these acts. Many religious establishments offer asylum to Socialists and Communists who are being hunted by the Laval-Hitler police. If some priests still defend the "New Order" as the protector of the church, most of them believe that such support compromises the Catholic cause and fear that after liberation it will result in a fierce wave of anti-clericalism. The resistance of Catholics to Vichy has sealed their union with the Republicans who form a majority of the population. This entente holds great promise for the reconstitution of the Republic.

With the exception of the municipal officials, some police officers, and the bureau chiefs in government ministries, the civil-service employees have not been purged, probably because there were no competent men to replace them. Teachers and postal workers are keeping very quiet to avoid dismissal, but they retain their left views and hope for an Allied victory. A large number of them are working in our secret organizations.

Even the police force—or rather the police forces, for Vichy has created a dozen new special departments—has become infected. Many young men have entered it in order to escape service in Germany. "Eighty per cent of its effectives," wrote a high Vichy official, "are Gaullist and reveal their sentiments without the slightest embarrassment. They rejoice in the possession of weapons which will enable them to do good work when the great day comes." When I was in prison with other members of the Blum government in 1940-41, I found that many of our jailers were in sympathy with us. And if I avoided arrest on several occasions after my release from prison, it was because policemen affiliated with our organizations warned me in time.

The French peasants, knowing that they owe their lands to the Revolution, are solidly Republican. In their view the Marshal is trying to wipe out 150 years of history; he is a "Coblentz émigré of 1792." They are also intensely nationalistic, and the occupation of French soil has fanned their old hatred of Germans. The countryman clings to his liberties and dislikes laws which oblige him to declare how many acres he has under cultivation, how many bushels of wheat or gallons of wine he has produced, how many chickens he owns and how many eggs they lay. Vichy's regimentation has made him an enemy of the New Order even though he suffers less than city dwellers under rationing and can often sell his produce at a comfortable profit on the black market. Moreover, it is easier to listen to British broadcasts in isolated farmhouses than in the city. In one mountain village which I visited to see a comrade who was in hiding I found that 106 of the 136 homes had radios, and that of these 106 families 102 listened to the Free French and B. B. C. broadcasts every evening. Peasants are the more ardently Gaullist because Vichy has not obtained the freedom of the war prisoners, whose absence handicaps the rural economy severely.

The workers to a man are on the side of the resistance forces. Vanguard Republicans all, they have been the principal victims of Vichy and Berlin—hunted down for their opinions, imprisoned, deported. As their wages have not risen in proportion to the increased cost of living, they cannot even obtain the necessities of life. It is not surprising therefore that since 1940 they have been active in the underground organizations and that the victories of the Red Army arouse equal enthusiasm among Communists and non-Communists. The worker believes that the failure of his hopes for social change in 1919 made possible the Second World War. He does not intend to make the same mistake twice. Militantly Gaullist as he is, he is also ardently revolutionary.

Thus aside from a small group profiting from the occupation—the several hundred ministers, high functionaries, police officers, and prefects risen from nowhere, and the several thousand mercenaries of Déats, Doriot's, and Laval's fascist bands—no one in France defends collaboration any longer, or even Pétain himself. The price of French resistance has been thou-nds of executions, hundreds of thousands of intern-ents and imprisonments, and 750,000 deportations to ermany. Nevertheless, it continues to flourish, sound-g its battle cry in underground newspapers which ousands of young men distribute throughout the coun-y at the risk of their liberty and even their lives.

In one of these heroic bulletins, No. 34 of Défense la France, dated June 20, 1943, the fighters on the me front of France wrote: "Born of the Fighting ench and the resistance, the greatness of France will e again in the world. We want France to become, more an ever before, the land of great men, of bold individ-ls whose personalities transform the world, the land of nts, of scientists, and of philosophers, of heroes, lonizers, and martyrs. France's greatness is to conquer en rather than territory; to make men equal to great eas and great causes; to nourish men who will bring manity more light and more love. It is to convince the orld that the true greatness is that of the spirit."

This is what the Free French, in their prison-country, e saying to the world, and by their words they are viving the tradition of the immortal France of 1789.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

ON NOVEMBER 13 Goebbels returned to a subject which for some weeks he had left alone. In s weekly article he again advised the English to make ace with Germany, pointing out to them in great de-l that their true enemies were the Russians and the mericans.

> The British Empire is fighting today in alliance with partners who wish to succeed it against an enemy whose interests lie in regions which have no vital importance for England. Where are the traditional farsightedness and clarity of English foreign politics? . . . England need only recall the magnanimous offers which the Führer made again and again to London before the outbreak of this world conflagration to see clearly what a mistaken policy it was to refuse all those offers. Perhaps the English people will consider the question more soberly when the fifth winter of war begins.

He added:

> We know that a hue and cry will be raised in London because we broach this matter so openly. But Germany, in the fifth year of war, stands so firm that it can afford to speak out.

Now neither in London nor elsewhere has any hue d cry been raised. Indeed, not the slightest notice has en taken of Goebbels's effort. Yet what a commotion uld have been caused if this almost humble appeal to gland's "traditional farsightedness and clarity" had en made two years ago! The world's newspapers would have been full of it for weeks. The present lack of response is another illustration of the fact that what we may call the German propaganda potential is exhausted. With the wind of success in its sails Berlin could set the world by its ears with the stupidest stuff. Under present circumstances Goebbels's sly peace offer didn't rate a couple of lines in the newspapers.

The Nazi propaganda potential is almost as completely played out at home as it is abroad. "No official communiqué, report, explanation, or exhortation can now pierce the people's apathy," declared the Journal de Genève on October 27. And in the Lausanne Gazette of the same date a Swiss recently returned from Germany reported that propaganda had no effect any more on the German people, "for the simple reason that they are no longer interested in official utterances."

> If you go into a cafe [he said] you will sometimes see a queue waiting for the daily allotment of cakes made of potato flour and Ersatz cream or on the chance that some ice cream made with saccharine will be obtainable, but no one waits for the news broadcasts or a newspaper. The last time Hitler spoke, after a long silence and at a particularly critical moment, more people probably listened to him in the outside world than in Germany. At the announced hour in Berlin I saw thousands of people crowding into suburban trains to escape a possible air raid and hundreds of others standing in line outside the Gloria Palace cinema on the Kurfürstendamm. In the enormous Cafe Trumpf next door only seven guests and the orchestra heard the Führer's harangue.

The estimate of a Swedish correspondent that at least a hundred persons a day are now executed in Germany seems somewhat too conservative. In general only the local papers record the executions. If one could look through them all every day, one would undoubtedly arrive at a higher figure. In most cases routine reasons are given: "spreading rumors," "listening to the enemy radio," "undermining morale" are the most frequent, though often the crime is some act connected with rationing. Thus a rationing official in Stuttgart and two shopkeepers were executed because they had embezzled a total of 900,000 ration points; a post-office employee in Düsseldorf because he had stolen packages containing tobacco. Occasionally the reasons vary from this norm. Three persons from a village near Brunswick were beheaded "for having been insolent to a bombed-out family." On November 4 announcement was made of the execution in a small town near Bielefeld of two married couples described rightly or wrongly as Communists. They had been sentenced to death for "committing high treason by holding illegal meetings and giving instruction courses." This was the first official admission that there is not only individual opposition in Germany but an attempt to form cells of resistance.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Revolution and Neurosis

LIKE "Darkness at Noon," Arthur Koestler's new novel, "Arrival and Departure" (Macmillan, $2), is essentially a novel for intellectuals, for that section of society for whom the rise and decline of the radical movement, in its broadest aspects, is perhaps the prime fact of the last decades. I do not mean that it lacks dramatic interest, or that it is particularly difficult to read. I mean, simply, that its drama is largely philosophical and that its suspense is more a matter of wondering where the theoretical cat will finally land when it stops jumping than of concern for the human fate of its hero; this may not diminish its fascination and, given the emptiness of current fiction, may even mark it as something of a literary event, but it does deprive it of the emotional overtones and wider references of the very best novels. Even the fact that Mr. Koestler deals with psychoanalysis and devotes a large part of his novel to the description of a case of hysterical paralysis, while it may increase the popular appeal of his book, does so as it were under false pretenses. For psychoanalysis is only the new armor in which Mr. Koestler has chosen to dress science for its old battle against faith.

Faith wins, but the manner in which Mr. Koestler conducts the fight—and by my reading of the book "Arrival and Departure" is more fight than novel, however disarmed and disarming its author may appear to be—is as tricky and unconvincing as it is brilliant. Mr. Koestler is investigating the problem of the relation between neurosis and conduct, specifically the relation between unconscious guilt feelings and the radical impulse. He tells the story of Peter Slavek, a middle-class intellectual and dissident Communist who has suffered terrible physical tortures in his service to the radical cause. The European war has begun, and Peter has escaped from his own (unnamed) country to Lisbon (also unnamed), where he intends to join the British forces. While he waits in Lisbon for his papers, he has a brief love affair with a girl, Odette, who is awaiting passage to America. Peter, too, is offered the possibility of escape to America, and respite from the old struggle. But his devotion to the political cause for which he has suffered so much is in such conflict with the desire to follow love and find peace that, not knowing which way to move, he "resolves" his conflict by becoming paralyzed in one of his tortured legs. It happens that a family friend, Dr. Sonia Bolgar, a psychoanalyst, is in Lisbon, and she cures Peter of his paralysis by uncovering the childhood roots of his need for martrydom and showing him that his devotion to the cause of the weak springs from guilt at having "accidentally" killed the younger brother of whom he was jealous. Having regained his health, Peter is now free to seek personal freedom and follow Odette to America. But at the last moment he rejects this escape and refuses to join Odette; instead, just as he had originally planned, he goes off to fight against fascism with the British.

Now at first glance—and accepting the identification of revolutionary activity with anti-fascist activity as an expedient, literary or political, which for present purposes we need not pause over—what Mr. Koestler seems to be saying is that a revolutionary can be psychoanalyzed and still continue to be a revolutionary—a very proper and useful thing to say. For "revolutionary" we might even substitute "painter" or "priest" or "mathematician," and I daresay that psychoanalysis itself would be the first to thank Mr. Koestler for exempting it from the wearisome accusation that it destroys or invalidates the volitional nature of human activity. But then what shall we make of Mr. Koestler's fable of Pythagoras, which is intended to remind us that if Pythagoras had been analyzed and shown that his interest in triangles was an obsession with his wife's fidelity, he would never have discovered the Pythagorean proposition? No synopsis can indicate it, but actually what Mr. Koestler is saying all along the line is quite the opposite of what the general movement of his book promises. His hero, for instance, is not a political idealist who also happens to be a neurotic; he is a neurotic whose guilts are clearly shown to be the whole source of his political ardor. Yet when these guilts are presumably removed, Peter continues to function according to his old political pattern, and not, apparently, on any new basis. The only difference between "his first crusade, which had ended with his breakdown on Sonia's couch," and the second, on which he departs at the close of the novel, is that "the first time he had set out in ignorance of his reasons; this time he knew them, but understood that reasons do not matter so much." In other words, Mr. Koestler, at some pains to recognize neurosis and grant psychoanalysis its healing powers, ends up by saying, not that Peter, cured of his neurosis, is free to act unneurotically, but that Peter, with the knowledge that he is neurotic safely under his belt, is free to continue to act neurotically; and this is tantamount to saying that, at least in political conduct, it makes no difference whether or not our motives are neurotic. Or, to put it another way, while Mr. Koestler seems to give determination and volition each its due place in human activity, actually he refuses to make any distinction in value between determined conduct and volitional conduct—which is surely an unfruitful attitude in a novelist.

But the point is, of course, as I have said, that Mr. Koestler, for all his impressive talents as a novelist, is writing not as a novelist but as a polemicist. His book is an elaborate structure of argument fashioned to support the foregone—mistaken—conclusion that psychoanalysis is at odds with revolutionary activity. To the revolutionary mind, even at its most dissident, Freud persists as the arch-enemy, and Mr. Koestler's method of combat is first to take the enemy into camp and then help him commit suicide. Nor is his true antipathy to psychoanalysis disclosed only in the broad errors of argument which I have suggested: while appearing to be utterly fair to the analytical side, in detail after detail he does his best to prejudice the reader against it.

hus, though he grants Dr. Bolgar the ability to cure Peter f his gross paralytic symptoms, he also shows her as a erson with "roots in the air" and no social principles—uite as if rootlessness were a prescribed psychoanalytical osition—and he also makes her a nymphomaniac Lesbian! r the only other patient of Dr. Bolgar, besides Peter, to hom we are introduced is a Nazi whom she has "adjusted" o Nazism. One cannot help wondering why, if analysis is o little a threat to the revolutionary impulse as in theory Ir. Koestler maintains, he is at such extremes to discredit it.

And I suppose that with this much unease and sophistry ehind us, we should have been prepared for the contrived nd desperate mystical note on which Mr. Koestler concludes is novel. Having given us "scientific" proof that it is all ight to be a radical, Mr. Koestler finds it necessary to reject ne science which, he believes, questions this right in favor f an imperative taken from religion. "Arrival and Departure" nds on a statement of faith—a poor little bastard-of-pragnatism kind of faith, but evidently enough to support acion. "If one accepted a faith, one should not ask because f what—the 'because of' should be taken for granted, beond questioning. He who says 'because of' will be open to lisillusion. He has no firm ground under his feet. But he vho accepts in spite of his objections, in spite of the imperections which are manifest to him—he will be secure." It is n these weak but willing words that Peter Slavek sums up vhat we must take to be Mr. Koestler's position as he coninues in the political struggle.

I know no novel of recent years so interesting in theme s "Arrival and Departure." To be sure, its intellectual preoccupation limits its range as a novel; and the movement nd conclusion of its argument give us much to quarrel with. But these objections cannot constitute a whole judgnent of a book which leads us to such high controversial ground and offers so courageous a challenge.

DIANA TRILLING

Mr. Matthews on Fascism

THE FRUITS OF FASCISM. By Herbert L. Matthews. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

WHEN the United States entered this war, Herbert L. Matthews, who from 1939 on had been the New York Times correspondent in Rome, was interned for five months by that same Benito who in better times had bestowed upon him the cross of a Knight of the Italian Crown. Rumor has it that in the leisure of his internment Mr. Matthews read Gibbon's famous history, and felt a commendable desire to become the Gibbon of Mussolini's Decline and Fall: that is, to sum up his long experience of Fascism, this time not as a reporter but as a historian. The result might have been provocative, coming as it does from a sincere and repentant sinner who, by his own admission, had been "an enthusiastic admirer of Fascism once."

"The Fruits of Fascism" is "a book with a premise, an argument, and a conclusion. The premise is that Fascism is an impractical and evil way of life; the argument is twenty-three years of Fascist history; the conclusion is that Fascism has failed." Apart from the complaint Aristotle might have against Mr. Matthews's syllogism, the reader will soon notice that the substance of the book is really summed up by the author on page 164: "While Italian genius could work out the system of Fascism, it could not carry it through in practice." The fact is that Mr. Matthews reassembles the materials he gathered in his years of sin, and that, though he is now as much of an anti-Fascist as any of us, he still clings to what may be termed the Badoglio interpretation of Italian history. For such converts Fascism is still a commendable domestic experiment, to which, inexplicably enough, a crazy foreign policy was added after the Ethiopian campaign. "The tragedy for Italy was that she needed long years of peace to conclude such programs, and the Duce's foreign policy inevitably tended toward war." But where Mr. Matthews's first studies in Fascism ended in praise, this one records a series of disappointments. It is not that the author finds much more to blame in Fascism now than he did years ago; it is just that the sum comes out differently. The fault lies not so much with the experiment as with the experimenters.

As to Il Duce, he too has failed, it is true, but his greatness can hardly be denied. He was a "modern Icarus" with "no streak of cowardice"; he "hates oratory"; he stands comparison with Augustus, Napoleon, and the libertarian tribune of fourteenth-century Rome, Cola di Rienzi. (It must be true that a hero is sung by the bard he deserves. Cola di Rienzi had Petrarch, Napoleon had Stendhal, and Mussolini has—Marinetti.)

The epigraph to "The Fruits of Fascism" is borrowed from Gibbon: "An enlightened age requires from the historian some tincture of philosophy and criticism." What puzzles me is how, having taken Gibbon's adjuration for his own, Mr. Matthews could write a full-length "history" of Fascism without quoting one anti-Fascist work. Salvemini's very name—let alone his books—is utterly ignored. So are Rosenstock-Franck's important studies of the corporate state, Daniel Guérin's solid analysis of Fascist economy, A. Rossi's critical account of the rise of Fascism, etc. The source most often listed in the index is G. A. Chiurco's five-volume "History of the Fascist Revolution"—a half-literate storm trooper's super-official account. (Its publisher once proudly boasted to me that not one copy of the book had ever been sold to a private purchaser.) Anti-Fascist journals of the last two decades—Stato Operaio, Giustizia e Libertà, among others—a knowledge of which is simply indispensable to the historian of Fascism, are never mentioned.

Is it any wonder, then, that Mr. Matthews solemnly absolves Mussolini of the accusation of having founded Il Popolo d'Italia with French money; that his account of the Matteotti murder is cautious and confused ("Mussolini . . . had apparently not been consulted"); that misspellings are not infrequent; that he calls "an aristocrat, a lawyer, a poet . . ., the finest type of Fascist" Minister de Vecchi, an irresponsible moron whose brutalities in the golden years of castor oil used to disgust even his accomplices, and who once, as governor of Rhodes, ordered all the roses of the island to be cut, because "roses are un-Fascist and effeminate."

"The Fruits of Fascism," sincerely meant as the author's warning to America, is really one more example of how fruitless a complete innocence of socialist thought can be in dealing with contemporary events. "No apologies will ever be made by me for my love of the Italian people," declares Mr. Matthews obligingly. I believe that he does like the Italian people. I am not sure that he respects them. I cannot forget that when General Clark's army entered Naples, Mr. Matthews, reporting in the Times, found the starving Neapolitans' delirious reception "to say the least, not very dignified." Today he might have to apologize to the guerrillas of Lombardy and Piedmont for having written that "there is no man in the world less revolutionary than the Italian of today." He may have to bow to the Roman, too ("the Roman, indifferent, blasé, cynical, goes his way through the years and the centuries"), for on entering the Eternal City with the Fifth Army he will see and hear about the twelve-day struggle of the workers of the Trastevere district against Nazi tanks and machine-guns.

PAOLO MILANO

Coal-Diggers

MEN AND COAL. By McAlister Coleman. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

THE coal miners have struck four times this year; each time they were impervious to President Roosevelt's back-to-work pleas, each time they awaited a signal from John L. Lewis. I drove through several mining towns in western Pennsylvania on the morning that Mr. Roosevelt had designated for resumption of work during the first walkout. At 10 a.m.—the White House deadline—the newspapers and milk bottles were lying untouched on the porches; the editorial pages quivered with futile rage; the miners were using this historic hour to catch up on their sleep. "Mac" Coleman's book is a warm, colorful account of how American miners got into that mood—a mood in which they frankly told the commander-in-chief and the rest of the nation that they were taking orders from Lewis, nobody else. Now that the furor over the coal strikes has subsided, a great many people would profit from reading Coleman.

Most journalists have written about the coal-diggers as if there were only one and his name was Lewis. In a large section of this book Lewis is a secondary figure; the miners themselves emerge from anonymity. Coleman has talked with them, eaten with them, lived with them; he has discovered the sources of their discontent and their defiance. But this isn't a social worker's manual on backward areas. In its early and best chapters it articulates better than anything else I have read the miners' view of their own world—their sense of isolation from the rest of the country, their pride and humor, their conviction that any luxuries they extract from life will be wrested by shows of strength and solidarity. In recent months the coal operators have assumed all sorts of patriotic postures while the miners were raising hell; Coleman makes clear that much of the hell-raising can be blamed on the long, sordid era in which the coal magnates, aided by press, police, and other agencies, imposed their feudal will upon the miners. He recalls the classic retort made by one operator to charges that the miners were suffering: "They don't suffer; why, they can't even speak English."

The mines in which they work and the communities in which they live shape the outlook of the miners. Work is tough, dangerous, insecure; life is dreary and unrewarding; changes for the better have been slower and less continuous than in any other key industry. When the union was rebuilt after 1933 the miners vowed they would never let it collapse again. It was in this atmosphere that the strikes occurred. The miners read newspapers for comics and war news, not editorials; they listen to the radio for music and gags, not profound thoughts—unless Lewis or F. D. R. is on the air. They buy war bonds, send their sons to war; they strike under a traditional slogan—"No contract, no work." The government has no lines of effective communication to them. They listen to Roosevelt, but Lewis is their union president. Having been treated so long as a group apart, lacking kinship with others, they cannot be awed by "outraged public opinion." Public opinion is the miner next door.

Coleman has provided new and authentic insights into the thinking of the miners. He has also rehearsed the history of the Miners' Union and of Lewis, and some of these sections are open to much more detailed debate. Although Coleman records some of Lewis's worst follies—his dreary post-war record, his war against the progressives, the development of his ruthless machine—the portrait is on the whole sympathetic. One wishes that he had explored the U. M. W.'s last real election contest, in which honest, idealistic John Brophy contested Lewis's rule. Similarly, the petulant, savage war waged by Lewis against Philip Murray is passed over too lightly. Coleman sets forth but does not elaborate what seems to me a basic question provoked by his book: why has the United Mine Workers' union done so little to brighten the lives and enrich the environment of its members? Once upon a time, even in the dreariest coal town, the U. M. W. was a democratic, vital institution. It might have transformed whole communities. But Lewis clung rigidly to the methods of a "business unionist."

There are a lot of other questions about Lewis's early and recent conduct of the U. M. W.—and of his own affairs—which Coleman touches sparingly or disregards. But this is a good book about miners; by writing intelligently and feelingly about them Coleman has explained a good part of Lewis's strength and the government's weakness in the recent crisis.

JAMES A. WECHSLER

The Roots of Russia

ANCIENT RUSSIA. By George Vernadsky. Yale University Press. $5.

THIS book ends where Russian histories usually start: the last event recounted is the seizure of Kiev by Oleg in the year 878. Professor Vernadsky believes that what he calls "the historic roots of the Russian people" extend into the Sarmato-Gothic era (200 B. C.–370 A. D.), and even into the age of the Cimmerians and Scythians (1000-200 B. C.). Accordingly, he devotes a substantial section to each of these periods. To complete the time span, there is also an admirable chapter on the prehistory of the area which the Russian empire eventually came to occupy. The Huns and the Avars, the Khazars and the Bulgars, and the other peoples which successively or simultaneously controlled the Eurasian plains in the middle centuries of the first millennium receive ample attention; so that it is only in the last third of the book that one comes to matters with which it might be expected to deal, such as the Varangian question, the Russian Kaganate, the distribution of the Russian tribes, the career of Riurik.

Cultural developments are not neglected, but interminable migrations and wars make up the bulk of the story. Professor Vernadsky has brought a large erudition to the telling of this involved and on the whole rather dreary tale. He is thoroughly familiar with the sources, as well as with the investigations of other scholars in the field, including the most recent research. He has all the available data at his finger tips and is able to make fresh approaches to old problems. Unfortunately, as our author is well aware, the evidence upon which the historian must rely is meager and dubious. He likens his task to that of "restoring a broken vase out of fragments of which only a few remain intact." He is compelled therefore to rely upon guesswork and, indeed, is perhaps a little too free with his conjectures, which are not always convincing. Moreover, a surmise once made is apt to reappear a little farther on in the guise of a certainty. Another flaw in the work is its lack of concentration. Although the author insists that he wanders far afield only in order to bring back spoils that will enhance his picture of Russia proper, the fact is that he tends to dwell a good deal on irrelevant matters, with the result that the scene is cluttered rather than illumined. Nevertheless, here is a valuable introduction to an obscure and difficult subject.

The present volume is the initial contribution to a history of Russia conceived on a grand scale. There are nine volumes to follow, the first five to be written by the author of the work under review, and the remainder by Professor Karpovich of Harvard. The progress of so ambitious and important an undertaking will be watched with keen interest.

AVRAHM YARMOLINSKY

DRAMA

"WINGED VICTORY" (Forty-fourth Street Theater) is both a pageant and a play. The script was commissioned by the army, which gave Moss Hart every facility for research and observation, including the use of an army bomber. Mr. Hart studied hard, flying 28,000 miles in the process, and then wrote his play—in six weeks. This is all very efficient, and Mr. Hart's exposition of an airman's education is undoubtedly authentic. But the process of education, even that of a flier, is not in itself dramatic. To offset this difficulty Mr. Hart raises six men from as many family backgrounds into sufficient relief to provide a story and individual interest. He also introduces their wives and sweethearts, and he pulls out all the emotional stops in a long tale that begins in a back yard in Ohio and ends on an island in the South Pacific.

Inevitably the piece has an official, well-filtered air. It also exudes a sheltered collegiate atmosphere which makes the ugly fact of war seem more rather than less remote. It gets off to a particularly unconvincing start in the first scene, which three young men in a small Ohio town are waiting be summoned for training. One of them is married; all e presumably eighteen or over. All of them have a passion r flying which one does not question, but when an airplane asses over they act not like young men, however adolescent, ut like boys of twelve or fourteen. And there is a difference.

From there on, Mr. Hart's characters behave like college oys rather than high-school kids, and that is an improvement; it is well known that young Americans in army camps o act like college boys. But a dramatist should know also iat this behavior is in part at least a defense; and in this ontext even horse play takes on irony and a kind of dignity. 'hese overtones are missing from Mr. Hart's play. The raw eality of war is never made manifest, and the last scene, in hich he tries to picture a night of terror in the South acific, is the most unreal of all.

What we get, in short, is an authorized version of life in ie Army Air Force with all the terror and the boredom left ut—and most of the horse play as well. The production is andsomely mounted and well directed, though its pace hould be quickened—the speeches of the chaplain and others vould be no less realistic for being shorter. The acting is ompetent, but there are no outstanding performances, partly ecause of the limitations of the play itself. The burlesque f the Andrews sisters is the funniest thing in the show. ts raucous spirit is authentic, and a few more such outbursts vould add reality as well as fun to Mr. Hart's otherwise far oo tame and well-behaved version of military life.

As pageant, "Winged Victory" is lavish, colorful, and nformative. As play it is feeble and at times boring. There re touching episodes, and the G. I. cast itself makes an rresistible appeal to the affections. But for all one's willingness to be moved, the deeper emotions are not tapped, and ne ends by wishing that Mr. Hart knew less about air training and more about human nature.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Film Notes

"THE CROSS OF LORRAINE" is a melodrama about French soldiers in a German military prison. Tay Garnett, who made "Bataan," directed it, and did an even better job. Half a football team worked on the story, yet except for a foolish coda it is one of the most edged, well-characterized, and naturally cinematic scripts of the year. There are no performances below pretty good in the whole of a large cast; I especially like Hume Cronyn as a born appeaser, Gene Kelly as his opposite, Jean Pierre Aumont as a man in the middle, Sir Cedric Hardwicke as a priest, Joseph Calleia as a leftist, and Tonio Selwart as a Nazi. There is some second-rate theatrical, literary, and merely political mannerism, but a surprising amount of it comes to life. There is also a good deal of shock and brutality, for which Mr. Garnett seems to have a special talent. Some of the camera work is very good.

"Cry Havoc" is a sincere fourth-rate picture made from a sincere fifth-rate play about nurses on Bataan. By fourth-rate I mean it is incomparably less offensive than "So Proudly We Hail." In fact, in spite of many very bad things in it and its intrinsic staginess, I was often touched by it, simply because the members of the cast (Margaret Sullavan, Ann Sothern, Joan Blondell, Ella Raines, and several others) seemed to care a great deal about the thing they were re-enacting.

"Government Girl," a comedy about war-time Washington, is Dudley Nichols's first shot at directing. Some of it is awful, especially some of the things gentle little Miss De Havilland has to do for the laughs of the canaille. But some more of it has a crude energy and lack of timidity and polish which are a pleasure even when nothing much else is doing. And here and there—especially with the surprising Sonny Tufts and other men—Nichols gets down some sharp, nasty, funny comment on business men and politicians.

RECORDS

WHEREAS Nos. 2 and 3 of Beethoven's "Rasumovsky" Quartets Opus 59 have the dramatic intensity and vigor we associate with Beethoven in his middle period, No. 1 has a first movement which is quietly reflective and expansively lyrical, an extraordinary scherzando second movement which is delicate, graceful, relaxed in its wonderfully mingled lightheartedness, capriciousness, and wistfulness, a quiet and deeply affecting slow movement, a finale which is gracefully lilting. All these qualities are realized in the performance by the Roth Quartet that Columbia has had in its catalogue for several years—a performance itself relaxed, lyrical, delicate, graceful, and also beautiful in physical sound. On the other hand, the performance by the Busch Quartet newly issued by Columbia (Set 543, $6.50) is full of excessive accentuations, inflections, and clippings of phrase-ends which are crude and harsh; the performance, then, is almost totally lacking in delicacy and grace; in addition its physical sound is made unpleasantly brash and coarse by the recording, and even worse by the noises of the defects of side 10 of my copy; and on several sides there is wavering of pitch. As for the eleven sides of this version, as against the usual ten, my guess was wrong: the Busch Quartet does play the slow movement more slowly than the Roth, but not too slowly, and in fact quite well—better than the other movements; and it is the second movement that is on three sides—with considerable blank space on each—as against the Roth version's two.

Schubert's Sonatina Opus 137 No. 1 is a work of little consequence which, however, one might like to listen to for Szigeti's playing if the sound of the playing were not made so unpleasant by the recording (Set X 238, $2.50).

Well recorded, on the other hand, is the beautiful sound of Risë Stevens's voice as she sings Divinités du Styx from Gluck's "Alceste" and Ah! mon fils from Meyerbeer's "Le Prophète" with good musical style; the orchestral accompaniment conducted by Leinsdorf is, however, insufficiently audible (71486-D, $1). Voice and orchestra are better balanced on the older Victor record of Divinités, but Traubel's powerful voice is clouded by a strong tremolo.

Columbia has issued its recording of Beecham's performance of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Set 538, $4.50). The work is delightful; Beecham plays the first and third movements superbly; for the second, unfortunately, he adopts one of his occasional over-deliberate tempos; and one feels a little of this holding back in the whirling finale, which otherwise is excellently done. The recorded sound is bad in the first and last movements—dull, poorly balanced, noisily confused in fortissimo with the Brush pickup, merely a little brighter with the Astatic Trutan; it is quite good in the second and third—well-balanced, clear, normal. There is a great deal of wavering pitch in my copy; and there are noises from surface and processing defects. The old Victor set, as incompletely as it reproduces Koussevitzky's marvelous performance with the Boston Symphony, is still the one to get of this work—though I have had reports of bad surfaces in recently bought copies.

As it happens, Columbia's record classic this time is Volume 1 of the Delius Society (Set 305, $7.50), offering superb performances by Beecham with the London Philharmonic which were recorded in England with the rich-

Two Men and a Bargain

a parable of the solid South

In this parable Lillian Smith, co-editor of SOUTH TODAY, has thrown new and startling light through the darkness which shrouds the South . . . a MUST for readers who are interested in the South and its intricate racial, economic and religious patterns.

From—North, South, East and West people write:

"'Two Men and a Bargain' is poignant, powerful, dramatic, true." VIRGINIA

"I know that there are differences between the North and South and I know something about the causes of those differences. Nevertheless I am persuaded that the problems which you are revealing are basically American or should I say basically human rather than sectional . . . your publication is one of the most important and hopeful signs of the time." NEW YORK

"I don't know when I have ever read such a clear, simple, helpful, truthful and yes, beautiful statement of a sickness and a cure." ILLINOIS

"It gives me great satisfaction to be able to introduce South Today to people in other parts of the country who want to know 'what can be done' and who need to catch a glimpse of southern convictions clearly and courageously stated." GEORGIA.

" . . . a brave document and should be read by every true American who believes in a clean wholesome way of living." CALIFORNIA

" . . . you are striking sledge-hammer blows at injustice and discrimination, and though the monument of prejudice is large you are sure to crack it if you but keep on." TEXAS ss of sound and cleanness of defini- n that are lacking in the American :ording of the Mendelssohn sym- ony; though I must add that on some the sides of my copy of this repress- g the sound wavers a little in pitch. ne orchestral works are the Nocturne 'aris," written in 1899; the finale of e opera "Koanga," written between 95 and 1897; "Eventyr," inspired by orwegian legends, and first performed 1919; and an Interlude and Serenade om the incidental music for "Hassan," ritten in 1923. In all of them there the characteristic gorgeousness of und which is enriched, elaborated, btilized in the later ones; and where- when I heard them last I liked the rst two better than the others, I now nd them all equally pleasant to listen . But the two songs on the last side— To the Queen of My Heart" and Love's Philosophy," well sung by the nor Heddle Nash—I still do not care or.

Unaware of Leonard Bernstein's inch-hitting for Bruno Walter with ie New York Philharmonic, I listened some of Schnabel's performances at ie Frick Collection. He played with onderful rhythm and humor and grace Beethoven's Bagatelles Opus 33 and ie scherzo of Schumann's G minor onata; but the occasional tendency to verload a phrase with significance dis- orted the exquisite form of Mozart's ondo K.511 and made its delicate con- ent ponderous, and it over-sentimental- zed the lovely slow movement of chumann's Sonata and some of the lower passages in the finale.

Later in the afternoon Toscanini's roadcast performance of Debussy's Ibéria" with the N. B. C. Symphony eemed to me the best I had ever heard rom him—relaxed and plastic in the irst two movements, and integrating all he changes of pace and style in the ast movement as it seemed to me I had iever heard him do before. It may be hat he was doing the same things as ie had always done and that it was I who was hearing them for the first ime; but I have heard performances rom him that were astoundingly dif- erent—a first movement of Beethoven's Ninth, for example, that was taut and elentlessly driving, another that was elaxed and spacious; so perhaps this erformance of "Ibéria" did surpass all nis others. And he did a magnificent ob with Gershwin's "American in Paris," which I think is the best of Gershwin's ambitious works.

A BOOKLET and a BOOK

Both by Dr. B. LIBER
the well-known mental specialist, Adjunct Professor of Psychiatry.

1) Hitler's Mind

Books and articles regarding this subject have appeared. But this is the only unbiased, complete though brief, scientific work, written plainly, explaining how Hitler's mind works. Next to the general causes, this booklet is indispensable for understanding the war and the world's events in the last years. It is an enlarged, more popular version of a study published in a medical journal. Opinions of prominent readers: "Important document," "Admirably restrained," "Clear, easy to grasp," "Great Contribution toward victory."

The Shape of Things

SECRETARY MORGENTHAU DESERVES HIGH praise for his valiant fight for the Administration's $10,500,000,000 tax program. His criticisms of the feeble substitute passed by the House were unanswerable. He pointed out, for example, that the taxpayer would have to make as many as eighteen different computations before he could fill out his return for the House version of the Victory tax, and that at best no more than $161,000,000 would be derived from the 9,000,000 married couples affected by this tax. Mr. Morgenthau also criticized the increased corporation taxes proposed by the House on the ground that the change would only affect a few companies and these not the most prosperous. He answered the Republicans' allegation that income-tax payers could not stand a further increase by pointing to the fact that personal incomes had risen $80,000,000,000 since the start of the war, while personal income taxes had gone up only $19,000,000,000. Although Mr. Morgenthau failed to budge the rock-ribbed Finance Committee, he made it clear that the responsibility for our reckless and irresponsible program of war financing lies directly at the door of Congress. On the other major sector of the anti-inflation front, the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, prospects seem slightly brighter. Led by Senator Taft, several influential opponents of the subsidy program have proposed compromises which would, in effect, permit a continuation of the present program but would prevent the roll-back promised by the Administration. While acceptance of this compromise would avert an immediate collapse of the stabilization program, it would add new force to labor's demand for a revision of the Little Steel formula.

LAST JULY AND AUGUST, HAVING NOTHING better to do while Congress was in recess, Senator Butler of Nebraska made an intensive study of Latin America. Covering twenty countries—at an average of three whole days to a country—the Senator, who happens to be a Republican, found out that while the Good Neighbor policy had really meant something in the days of Hoover, Coolidge, and even James G. Blaine, under the New Deal it has degenerated into "rich uncleism," upsetting the whole economy of Latin America and exposing this country to hate, suspicion, and contempt. Butler has prepared an unsolicited 176-page report to show that despite our investment of six billion dollars in "boondoggling," Mexico today is "extorting tribute" from us, Peru is defaulting on old debts while contracting new ones, Paraguay is preparing for war against Argentina, Brazil is displaying a lack of reciprocal spirit, Argentina is using American money to compete with our own Standard Oil Company, and all the Latin American states are hoarding lend-lease war materials for eventual use against each other.

*

FORTUNATELY THE SENATOR'S REPORT IS more colorful than accurate. The Senate Appropriations Committee has all the figures available, and its acting chairman offered to go over them with Butler in advance of his presentation. Threatened with facts, the Senator hurried to the floor to tell all before it could be made generally known that we have spent not six billions in Latin America but approximately two, that of this amount well over one billion was for critical war materials, and that all items of expenditure have been approved by the two Congressional appropriations committees. Actually the Senator could not afford to change his report, however ignorant, because he had already compressed it into an article for Reader's Digest called Our Deep Dark Secrets in Latin America. (Note: the Digest plans to publish the piece in its South American edition together with refutations which its North American readers have not been privileged to read.)

*

WITHIN THE PAST WEEK A SPANISH Republican committee, under the name of the Junta Española de Liberación, has been set up in Mexico City. Created in the name of unity and apparently claiming recognition as a provisional governing group, the new junta seems destined to accentuate existing factional divisions. Indalecio Prieto, former Minister of Defense, is the leading figure in the movement, although for tactical reasons he has declined to head the committee. The junta claims to represent five parties and other organizations, but already the validity of its pretensions has been challenged. Some of the organizations represented in the junta are themselves divided and the dissenting factions are protesting the adhesion of their groups. Other important organizations have been left out altogether or have refused to join. It is known that the two powerful Spanish labor bodies, the U. G. T. (General Workers Union) with a predominantly Socialist membership, and the C. N. T. (National Workers Federation) which represents the workers of syndicalist tendencies, are outside the junta. So is the Communist Party. So are other elements represented in the Negrín Government. The position of the government was explained in detail by J. Alvarez del Vayo in The Nation three weeks ago. United action among Spanish Republicans is essential if the struggle against the Franco regime and the maneuvers of the Monarchists is to be effective. But there is little use applying the word unity to a new alignment which serves only to organize and crystallize existing political differences.

*

EVEN SYMPATHETIC FOLLOWERS OF THE career of Senator Gerald P. Nye regard him as a man who has traveled far on very little. Judging from the new line of argument the Senator has worked out, we would say he has traveled too far. "The American people," Nye told a press conference recently, "ought to become more isolationist if this peace becomes the incubator of a new world war." What follows? That Senator Nye wants us to see to it that the peace does not incubate a new world war? Not at all. "Every nation," he continued, "must retain its sovereign rights to be able to declare war whenever the people see fit." In other words, the Senator no longer thinks of isolation as a means of avoiding war but rather of war as a means of promoting isolation. Nye has long traded on a reputation as a pacifist and a liberal, an honest man who opposed American participation in the present war out of real conviction. But now the pacifist in him cries out for the divine right of sovereign states to make future wars, while the liberal in him, having denied the anti-fascist nature of this war, is determined that the war shall not disprove him by becoming anti-fascist. "The German people," he insists, "must be given the right to go back to fascism after the war if they want it." And together the pacifist and the liberal that make up the person of Senator Nye advise the world that "fascism essentially is not militaristic or aggressive." A million graves from Badajoz to Stalingrad testify to the enormity of that lie. When the Senator comes up for reelection next year, we hope the voters of North Dakota will agree that, whether faker or fool, Gerald P. Nye is ripe for retirement.

SOME OF GENERAL CLARK'S MEN WHO ARE now inching through the hills before Rome will not live to read about the concern for states' rights which 42 Senators have found more precious than soldiers' rights. Others will come home one day, but not more than a handful will ever read the devious debate which led the noble 42 to deny them the privilege of voting while at war. That is fortunate for the Senators, because their rejection of the Lucas-Green bill to guarantee the vote to the fighting forces was a day's work in which selfishness was compounded with hypocrisy. The measure was done to death, as Senator Guffey maintains, by "an unholy alliance" of Republicans, who knew the soldier-vote would favor their opponents, and Southern Democrats to whom states' rights and the poll-tax take precedence over every other consideration. It may well be that a few Senators voted to leave the soldiers' balloting to the necessarily ineffectual control of the states out of a genuine concern for constitutional law, but the comments of the victors reflect the real spirit of the debate. "The bill for establishing a Federal ballot commission," says Senator Moore, "was a bold last-ditch effort to herd our American boys into polling booths the world over and vote them en bloc for the New Deal." The oil millionaire from Oklahoma does not explain why a full vote would constitute "herding" or how the men could possibly be voted "en bloc," but it is easy to see what was on his mind. Nor is it hard to fathom the motive of Senator Eastland, who announced jubilantly that this vote "has put an end to any chance for the enactment by Congress of anti-poll tax legislation." There are 42 names here for service men to remember.

Cairo and Teheran

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

POLITICAL events are moving on two levels. One is the diplomatic level, and here great strides are being taken toward coordinating the strategy and aims of the great Allied powers. The start made at Moscow has been carried further at Cairo and Teheran. No longer will Britain and the United States plan joint action without regard to Russia's moves. No longer will Russia conduct its separate war in suspicious and hostile isolation. No longer will China, like a very poor relation, be expected to suffer and do its duty but not to ask for an equal voice in the councils of the Allies. The personal meetings of the four leaders have ended a long and dangerous period of political anarchy. This is a bad blow for Hitler; no tricks of Axis propaganda can blur the clear and ominous fact that his major enemies are at last planning and fighting together. Even the incredible stupidity of the censorship, which not only threw the press of the Allied world into total confusion but gave all the advantage to the propaganda agencies of our enemies, could obscure the valid achievements of the two conferences.

The agreements reached, or announced, are less important than the fact of the meetings themselves. But in Asia, at least, they are sufficiently concrete and bold to provide effective political ammunition. Today, for the first time since the war began, the world can see the outlines of the peace to come: Japan is to be stripped down to the dimensions of a Far Eastern California; China is to emerge as Asia's great power, its lost territories fully restored.

For Europe the announced plans are necessarily much less definite; we can scarcely ask to be told how or where the great unified assaults on Hitler's Fortress will be launched; it is enough for the present to know that plans have been concerted for the destruction of German military power, and that "complete agreement" has been reached on "operations to be undertaken from east, west, and south." From this wording we can safely assume that the second-front issue has at last been satisfactorily settled. In the political field the Teheran declaration goes no farther than to promise "concord" after the war and an effort to enlist "the cooperation and active participation of all nations, large and small," in the task of eliminating "tyranny and slavery, oppression and intolerance." Those are good words to throw into Axis Europe; they are not embodied in specific promises.

In both areas large gaps remain to be filled in. What about Hong Kong? What about the Pacific islands, large and small? What about Burma and Malaya and Indo-China? And, indeed, what about India? These territories, whether "liberated" by Japan or, like India, still under Western control, are useful weapons in the Axis arsenal as long as their future is uncertain. It is easy to sit down around a table and dispose of one's enemy's ill-gotten possessions. To do so without calling attention to one's own is difficult. As to Europe, it is unfortunate that no program for the future of Germany, at least as definite as that proposed for Japan at Cairo, could have been announced at Teheran. Hitler's slaves will be pleased to hear again that tyranny is to be abolished. They would have been roused to greater hope and stouter resistance if they had been told how this was to be accomplished and what sort of Germany was to emerge from the destruction of the Nazi power. But in spite of these unsettled items of business, unity between the chief Allies has become a working reality; and their intentions have been roughed out with broad strokes.

But events are moving on another level—the level of fighting and dying and carrying into effect policies that will provide the substance of the world order projected at the three conferences. Global plans and sweeping agreements are necessary as a basis for common action. Without action they are as empty of meaning as Hitler's promise of a fascist millenium.

Japan is to be shorn of its power and its empire. But the Allies are still nibbling at the vast perimeter of Japanese power. China is to be restored and strengthened. But meanwhile its internal economy is in chaos; the people are hungry; reactionary and defeatist groups sabotage the war or manipulate it for their own ends; and civil tension threatens to break out into open fighting. The substance that can give meaning to the promises made at Cairo lies in battles still to be fought on a hundred Pacific islands; in the reconquest of Burma; in the swelling total of American ships and planes. China needs rice, it needs medical supplies and war equipment.

Chiang Kai-Shek needs powerful backing to help him overcome the ruinous inflation. Most of all, perhaps, he needs help in ending the bitter, demoralizing struggle against the Chinese Communists; if Russia's acquiescence in the Cairo agreement implies a policy of internal reconciliation in China, one great element of present and future danger has been eliminated. The promises made at Cairo will increase the prestige of Chiang and his supporters in the government, and improve the morale of the country as a whole. The tough job of making them come true is still to be done—from the Gilbert Islands to Sinkiang.

On the level of concrete policy and action in Europe, even more difficult problems lie ambushed. The decisions reached at Cairo and Teheran must find their meaning in the performance of the Allied powers in every struggling country on the Continent. It is hard not to fear that the vague character of the Teheran declaration reflects the too obvious differences that have marked Allied political strategy throughout the war. The conferees in Iran understood the need of unity, but did they accept its political implications? While they talked, the Partisans in Jugoslavia were setting up a new government in opposition to the Royal Government recognized by the Allies—Russia included. While they talked, popular demonstrations in Italy against the King and Badoglio proved that the policies of the Allied authorities were undermining the prestige and influence of moderate democrats such as Sforza and Croce. While they talked, Gil Robles, former head of the powerful conservative bloc in Spain, announced from his place of exile in Portugal that Franco's government has not only supported Hitler with troops and open declarations of loyalty, but has placed bombs on British ships in Spanish ports and reported to German submarines the movements of Allied convoys—a complicity known to the British Foreign Office, a complicity long since exposed in these pages and now confirmed by testimony which may appear more convincing to our conservative rulers in London and Washington.

Scattered events such as these have a common meaning. They mean that the political problems of Europe are multiplying, assuming shape and solidity, and demanding from the "liberating powers" a clear and concrete stand on the issue of popular control. Since Russia has quite consistently taken a sympathetic if not a propelling interest in the forces of resistance on the Continent, such events raise the question whether the three great leaders were able to "concert" their plans for the political rebuilding of Europe as completely as for the destruction of German power. This we can only discover as time reveals the substance—the solid political meaning and effect—of the diplomatic unity reached at Cairo and Teheran.

Curbs on Snoopers

THE NATION commends the Civil Service Commission for the instructions it issued on November 3 to personnel engaged in investigating government employees. We regard the issuance of these instructions as a victory for the United Federal Workers, which recently raised the whole question of government investigations with the commission, and for those few publications which have called attention to the odd queries put by government sleuths. In this category is not only The Nation*—readers will recall the Washington Gestapo articles we published last July 17 and 24—but publications ordinarily as far removed from political concerns as our clever contemporary, the New Yorker. The commission says that these instructions, "with two or three minor exceptions," merely reaffirm the policies it has followed since August, 1942. But it obliquely admits that complaints have been received and by implication blames "a very high rate of turnover" in its staff. In Washington, as in an older Peking, face must be saved.

The commission does not say what the "two or three minor exceptions" are, but we suspect the new regulations embody considerable change in allowable questions. For this the commission deserves credit. The instructions bar questions as to a government employee's affiliations with unions, with pro-Loyalist groups such as the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, with cooperative bookshops like the Washington Bookshop which handle leftist literature, with the Lawyers' Guild, the American Civil Liberties Union, the Socialist Party, the League of Women Shoppers, and the Harry Bridges Defense Committee. "Do not ask any question whatever," the instructions say, "involving the applicant's sympathy with Loyalists in Spain." The investigators are not to ask about the printed matter read by the applicant. "This includes especially the Daily Worker and all radical and liberal publications. . . . Citizens are free to read anything they like." The instructions embody some approach to standards applied in judicial proceedings: husbands are not to be asked about wives and vice versa, leading questions are to be avoided; an effort is to be made to prevent the investigator from gaining information that may hurt the applicant's reputation. Questions about mixed parties with Negroes and intimate personal questions are not to be asked. Finally, "Do not ask general questions regarding the political philosophy of the applicant, such as whether he believes in capitalism or what his opinion is regarding certain events of a current or historical nature." We think the FBI owes it to the country to make its own instructions in the field of policing opinion available to the public. Publication is some protection against investigators who exceed their authority.

After reading the Civil Service Commission's instructions, it is easy to understand both the bewilderment many investigators may feel and the outcry from the right in Congress. The investigator must determine not merely whether the applicant for government employment believes in the overthrow of the government by force and violence but whether he has followed the Communist line. Though this is possible, and the commission tries to lay down some rules for achieving it, an investigator needs a high degree of political sophistication to make a determination of this kind without overstepping the bounds. The kind of men employed by the commission and the FBI are unlikely to possess any such degree of understanding. The whole process of ferreting out facts about a man's opinions, and doing so by secret investigation without a judicial hearing, cannot easily remain within constitutional limits, even if the doubtful assumption is made that it was there to start with. What enrages some people in and out of Congress is the fact that those who fathered the Hatch act never intended the process to be kept within such limits. The spirit in which it was passed found expression when Busbey of Illinois, complaining of the new instructions, said, "The issue is this: are we going to permit long-haired New Deal bureaucrats to set up a complete Marxist dictatorship. . . .?" The act was passed as a means of hounding leftists out of the government, and it will be hard indeed for the most conscientious investigatory official to combine its enforcement with observance of the Bill of Rights.

The commission's own report shows how heavily weighted the results are against the left. It says that from July 1, 1940, to August 23, 1943, a total of 27,842 government employees were rated ineligible. It says 744 "were rated ineligible solely on loyalty grounds." One wonders in how many cases this was the determining, though not the sole, factor. The commission gives us no clue, but it does say that of this number 313 were found to be pro-Axis and 461 "members of the Communist Party or active in support of those basic principles of the Communist Party, which gave evidence of adherence to the Communist 'party line'." This alternative category is so loose that it is easy to understand why some investigators have asked the barred questions. The basic problems involved are not easily solved, for in war time the government has a right to weed out of its employ persons opposed to the war effort. Very few on the left are in that category. But the Hatch act, as an item of peace-time legislation, was aimed at the left, and if some elements in Congress have their way, it will be broadened after the war. A fight for its repeal is the only safe course for those who wish to exorcise the small but cancerous growth from our national life of a European-style political police devoted to the eradication of "dangerous thoughts.",

The Oslo Students

THE wholesale arrest of Oslo University professors and students is the latest move of the Nazis and their Quisling puppets to secure complete control of the educational and intellectual life of Norway. In no sphere has the opposition of the Norwegian patriots been more determined. Faculties and students alike have defied every attempt at Nazification. More than a year ago the resistance of the elementary and high-school teachers led to the arrest of more than 1,500 of them. In an effort to break them, some 800 were shipped beyond the Arctic Circle to forced labor on German fortifications. But "reliable" substitutes could not be found and the schools remained closed for months, until the Nazis backed down and allowed most of the old teachers to return.

The same difficulties were encountered by the invaders in the realm of higher education. In September, 1941, they arrested the rector of Oslo University, Dr. S. A. Seip, because of his "negative attitude" and installed in his place Dr. Adolf Höel, one of the few Norwegian scholars to turn traitor. But they could not "reform" the faculty, which remained subbornly Norwegian. At the end of August, 1943, Ragnar Skancke, Quisling Minister of Education, being unable to purge the faculty, sought to dilute the student body by directing that only those candidates who had received the personal approval of Höel be enrolled.

The entire faculty—with one exception—immediately announced that they would refuse to continue their teaching if this directive were not rescinded. In a coldly dignified letter they reminded Skancke that a year earlier they had adopted a resolution stating: "The university is responsible for the maintenance of scholarly standards in research and academic instruction in our country. If we are to adopt the attitude that external considerations —political or otherwise—are to be given priority to proficiency in the subject, it will lead to the decay of research and a breakdown of the standards which our university has hitherto maintained." The new regulation, they declared, violated this principle and would make "the university an institution essentially different in character . . . in conflict with its instructors' basic concepts."

As a result of this protest eight professors and forty student leaders were imprisoned. But the tension continued. A few days ago a fire broke out in an auditorium which the Nazis were using, and this incident was used as an excuse for the arrest of 1,200 students and faculty members. The real reason, however, was revealed by the Nazi police chief, Rediess, who contended that during the whole occupation the Oslo students had formed a hostile group active in underground resistance to the Nazis. The certainty that this accusation is well founded redounds to the honor of the University of Oslo.

The Indian Skeleton at Atlantic City

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, December 3

THE pressure of events is making it harder than ever for the Administration to maintain its docile silence on India. A series of recent events has rendered our tacit partnership in Churchill's imperialism all the more ignominious. The latest was the announcement from Cairo of freedom after the war for Korea. Earlier there was the Lebanon affair, where we meekly and quickly followed the British lead in rebuking the French for doing on a more moderate scale in the Levant what the British are doing in India and elsewhere. The Atlantic Charter is being applied, with much fanfare, to a French mandate in the Near East and at least to one Japanese possession in the Far East, but is still in suspension in British Middle Asia.

The closing days of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation conference at Atlantic City provided another instance of the way in which India haunts the Anglo-American entente. India is asked to give 1 per cent of its national income to relieve the hungry in liberated areas, but it was denied the right to speak of its own starving millions. Sir Girja Shankar Bajpai, "India's delegate" to the conference, with a propriety becoming in a servant of the British Raj, declined to raise the question. It was, the British delegation assured the press, outside the scope of the UNRRA. J. J. Singh of the India League of America threatened to disrupt these convenient diplomatic niceties by disclosing to the correspondents last Friday that the Chinese, Mexican, Chilean, New Zealand, South African, and Australian representatives were prepared to support India if the question of the famine were raised. Dr. T. F. Tsiang, head of the Chinese delegation, made a public statement supporting Singh. There was talk of a resolution whereby the UNRRA would ask the Combined Shipping Board to allocate some extra tonnage for food shipments to India, and it looked as if some unpleasant realities were no longer avoidable. There was reason to believe that Governor Lehman, director general of the UNRRA, would have welcomed discussion of the Indian question.

There followed a hurried series of conferences between the Dominion delegations and Colonel John J. Llewellin, the chief British delegate, and a sudden announcement to the press by Colonel Llewellin that any resolution on India would be "out of order." No one had the temerity to ask how the British delegate, representing one nation out of forty-four, could take it upon himself to decide this question in advance. Colonel Llewellin and Assistant Secretary of State Dean Acheson dominated the proceedings, and it behooved the other delegates to behave. I doubt whether Acheson was happy over this brusque solution of the Indian problem, and at the closing session, with British approval, he was permitted to make a statement expressing sympathy with the people of India. Sir Girja rose to accept Acheson's little floral wreath with an appropriately brief statement, and the skeleton was back in the closet. But American officials here realize only too well that it will not stay put.

Every American official back from India brings the same message. There have been three official missions to India, and all brought back conclusions unpalatable to London. Colonel Louis Johnson, the President's first emissary, was accused by the British of having been "hypnotized" by Nehru. The Grady report was shelved because its proposals for expanding industrial production in India would have conflicted with British colonial policy. Indian henchmen of the Raj attacked it as "American imperialism." William Phillips, the second emissary, had one session with the President and another, at the President's request, with Churchill. The gossip is that the President was friendly but felt his hands were tied. As for Churchill, the talk around town is that Phillips got nowhere with him. "Phillips said Churchill simply refused to discuss the question; all he did was rant," was the version I picked up. If some of this gossip is unfair, the British and American governments have their own secrecy to thank for it. I was told that Phillips implied in talks with friends that he was not allowed to see Gandhi and Nehru because they were ready to discuss possible terms of settlement. I cannot vouch for this information and merely report what I heard from what I consider a fairly good source.

There is widespread dissatisfaction in the government with the Indian situation. Inside the State Department pro-British elements, fighting to give Britain a square deal after the war on such questions as shipping, are hampered by the use that anti-British and Irish Catholic sources inside and outside the department make of India. War-production and export agencies, worried by the situation in the hungry machine-tool industry, wonder why we cannot ease the inflationary situation in India by exports of machinery for production of consumer goods. Agencies like the OWI and the Office of Strategic Services, which deal with questions of political warfare, feel that we are being compromised in the East by Britain's Indian policy. I have heard of the embarrassment felt by OWI officials in India on the receipt of posters showing how we were feeding the people of Sicily. India's treatment at Atlantic City and the discussion bound to take place at New Delhi when the Indian legislature is asked to ratify the 1 per cent contribution will not make the OWI's task easier. The best propaganda now would be some additional food shipments, and I have found general agreement among officials dealing with shipping that it is nonsense to talk of a shipping shortage in connection with food for India. With some 50,000,000 tons available, much of it inadequately utilized, a few hundred thousand tons of shipping could easily be allocated to ease the famine.

The obstacle to acceptance of the recent Canadian offer of 100,000 tons of free wheat for India, and to purchases from the bumper crop glutting the Argentine, is not shipping but politics. The British position, as I get it here from British sources, is that the famine is due to hoarding, maldistribution, and inflation rather than to an actual shortage. Shipments made under pressure from public opinion would imply embarrassing admissions in British domestic politics, revive hopes of American interference in India. I have no doubt in my own mind, after talking with American, British, and Indian authorities, that hoarding, maldistribution, inflation, and the hostility of Indian interests to effective food and price controls have played a much larger part in the present situation than Indians like to admit. Farm blocs are the same the world over. The real point, it seems to me, is that only a true national government of Indians could hope at a time like this to squeeze from the peasantry the necessary driblets of food by which urban India is normally fed. Conversely, the present government of India could hardly be expected to antagonize the large landowners, who are among its few supporters, by instituting really vigorous controls.

Many factors, some accidental, play their part in the present shortage, but the basic cause is imperialism. Britain has drained India of goods, paying for them in blocked sterling accounts in London against which paper is issued in India. India's new-found "wealth" in sterling is only a reflection of its impoverishment by the war effort. The one genuine solution for inflation would be greater production in India of consumer goods, but this would cut into Britain's post-war market. The other way to make the situation bearable would be to give India a responsible and representative government and make its people feel that this is their war. In normal times the heavy burden of debt and taxes forces the peasant to turn a portion of his scanty crop into cash. With the rise in prices this burden is reduced, and it is difficult to hold him down to a near-starvation diet. If Gandhi and Nehru were in office instead of in jail, they might appeal to his idealism. That task is beyond the power of the Viceroy and his kept Indians.

The End of a Flying Fort

AN AIRMAN'S LETTER TO HIS WIFE

BY LIEUTENANT E. S. BENDINER

Somewhere in England, 1943

DEAR ESTHER: I know that I began to tell you all about the Brevet Club some days ago, but I was interrupted by a bit of duty. Between then and now I have fallen into the sea, and been daringly rescued, and what with one thing and another I don't feel much like rattling on about polite society at the Brevet.

The whole story is pretty melodramatic, and I feel silly telling it in the first person. But, in as unpurple language as I can manage, this is what happened.

The mission was the longest, deepest penetration into Germany ever undertaken by Forts, and in talking it over among ourselves and with Carlson and the chaplain just before take-off, I remember that I was advocating with considerable heat that this time we couldn't possibly choose to bail out or make for Switzerland or do anything but return to England because in scarcely any time at all the baby would arrive. (I've been bragging in public again.)

Just after the target we were heavily attacked. One engine was hit, half of our oxygen supply was knocked out, and the copilot was wounded in the leg; so that we had to drop out of formation and fight our way across Europe by ourselves. As it developed, we didn't so much fight our way out as sneak out, running for every cloud cover we could see. The spot decision right then was up to Fawkes. He could have asked for a course to Switzerland. The lovely snowy, blue-and-white peaks of the Alps were plainly visible, towering almost up to our altitude, although quite a way off. He might have decided to bail out over France. Either of those decisions would probably have meant internment or imprisonment for the duration. The last choice, the one he took, was to head for home, even though our gas was running so low he knew that we would probably have to ditch. It was a dangerous choice, but I think it was a fine one, not only because subsequent events proved it wise, but because he took it as the plain course of duty.

In any case, he asked for a course home, and I was honestly glad of it, even though with fighting and one thing and another I was a bit vague as to our precise position at the time. We dived down into the loveliest, heaviest cloud imaginable and stayed in it as long as possible, while I feverishly worked away trying to establish our position and improve on the course I had originally set. The cloud gave out, and for a time we sailed at low altitude over the grain fields, the forests, the towns, and the rivers of France. Some of these checkpoints seemed to bear out my theoretically estimated position and some of them contradicted it. It was beautiful country; it seemed to be of a different color from England or Holland or Belgium.

We were playing hide-and-seek in the clouds over France. And in the open spaces our gunners were anxiously watching German fighters who were looking for us but who miraculously failed to see us before other clouds came up to hide us. But ground radio was tracking us all the time, and we had to shift our course to clear what I thought would be heavy flak areas. We could see flak on both sides of us, largely to signal fighters we thought. Actually we were hit by flak as we neared the coast, partly because I didn't change course in time and partly because we had to strike out directly for the coast or go down, out of gas, over France.

Just before we crossed the coast Fawkes called up and suggested that anyone who didn't want to take his chance in the water could still jump. None of us did. I could see water ahead, but we ran up along the coast to avoid a large seaport and the heavy coastal flak. Duke, our radio man, was sending out an S. O. S. and asking radio stations to take a fix on us. They did, and he reported it to me, but it seemed to me to be way, way off, and Duke asked for another which was just as bad. I realized then that no one in England knew where we were. I gave Duke our estimated position, but he couldn't get it through.

We were over the sea now, and our four engines ran out one after another. When I left the nose, two of them were already motionless—a most disconcerting thing to see in an airplane. Back in the radio room we all took our previously assigned positions, bracing ourselves for the shock. I crouched behind the radio man's armor plating, gathered sundry odd bits that I thought I would like to take with me, talked to Mike, who was crouched next to me. Up to the last minute Mike retained his faith in Tondelayo and couldn't believe we would really have to ditch. He asked me whether we were headed toward England. I said we were but I knew we couldn't make it. We chatted like that and looked up, through the open hatch of the radio room, to the great gray swirling clouds and the blue sky, all the time wondering how near the water we were and when the shock would come.

When it came we lit lightly at first and only a bit of spray seemed to come in. Mike stood up, and we all yelled to him to get down. But it was too late. After skipping along the water, the ship finally plunged in and threw Mike forward so that he gashed his forehead. Then the green-gray water rushed in. I felt nothing so much as surprise. We had been through drills in preparation for just such an eventuality, and so far everything had gone pretty much as planned. But in all our drills there had been nothing like this torrent of ocean that ran through our airship. I tried to stand, but the water knocked me down, and when I did get up, some of the precious things that I had gathered were floating around the floor.

Everyone was on his feet, everyone excited and clambering toward the hatch, but everyone shouting that there was plenty of time and to keep calm. Mike stood next to me, and I saw that his head was bleeding badly. A piece of floating B-17 had clipped me and scratched my forehead. For an awful moment I thought that Mike and I, who were wedged in a corner, would never get out. But Mike finally did. By that time the water was up to my chest and rising rapidly. Our bombardier, Bob, was still in there. I hoisted myself up on one side while he made for the other. I remember that I failed to make it the first time, and I could hear Mike hollering outside, "Where's Benny?" Then I clambered out. The wings were already under water.

I clung to the fuselage for a second or so and watched Fawkes and the others, who had extracted one of the rubber dinghies and were maneuvering it away from the wings of the sinking plane. Then I plunged into the water. The dinghy was scarcely more than a stroke away from the ship, but I had overlooked one detail that might have proved disastrous. I had neglected to inflate my Mae West. I clung to the raft while Larry, our engineer, kept shouting: "Hold on, Benny, hold on"—as if I thought of doing anything else or going anywhere else just then. When I turned around, Tondelayo had vanished, and our dinghy and the other one holding the rest of our crew were the only things left on an apparently limitless sea. After a bit of floundering about, I managed to hoist myself into the tossing dinghy. All this took much less time to live through than it does to record. Tondelayo went down in something like forty seconds.

Whatever Rickenbacker and other shipwrecked mariners may pretend, there is at least one aspect of life on a raft that, far from being heroic, is damned undignified. The Channel was as rough that day as it ever gets, and the swell was dark and towering and fearful to look at. It was far worse to feel. We all promptly became violently seasick. All, that is, except Bob and one gunner, who increased our embarrassment by remaining obtrusively and volubly gay. There is, however, a measure of providence in the seasickness that plagues the shipwrecked. First, it gives you something to do which relieves the monotony; secondly, the prospect of death is never so welcome at any other time. One almost hopes for it.

But before giving way to utterly abandoned retching and writhing, we paddled with our hands toward the other dinghy so that we could lash the two rafts together. In between spasms, when I could lie with my head back and not feel too sick, I could watch the endless seascape and the barren sky. Bob was cranking our portable radio frantically but in vain, because we had lost the kite to carry our aerial up; we knew then that we could send out no signals at all. From time to time Larry would bail out the water that swept over us in great salty waves just as we thought we might begin to dry out in the sun. Larry would bail a little, get sick, bail some more, and get sick again. I tried to help, but as soon as I'd lift my head I'd get sick. So I was no help at all. For five hours we tossed like that, and in my lucid moments I would speculate on the direction of our drift. It was impossible to tell with any certainty, although I knew what winds had been prevailing all afternoon. In one such lucid moment I looked down at the few things I had brought with me. One of these was my Mercator's chart. Now, darling, there is nothing quite so useless on a broad, broad ocean as a Mercator on a raft that one can't steer. I finally threw it overboard.

Toward the end of the afternoon we were all resigning ourselves to spending a night on the water. I, at least, was convinced that no one in England had any idea of where we were. Earlier we had seen a flight of bombers go over, but they were very high and couldn't possibly see our signals. It was a little more than five hours after we ditched that we sighted a squadron of fighters about three or four miles from us. Larry had the flare pistol out and ready to shoot. But Duke shouted that they might be Germans. Some of us shouted for him to shoot, and some urged him not to. He hesitated for a second or two, and then—counting a quick majority, no doubt—he fired it. The fighters were already past us then, but one blessed pilot was looking back for some unknown but providential reason. We saw them continue on a short distance, and then one peeled off and the others followed.

They came in low over the water toward our flare—a magnificent affair of parachute and red balls of fire and smoke, like a Fourth of July celebration. Those Spitfires were the most meaningful, beautiful things I have ever seen. They swooped down and circled about us, and sick as we were we stood up and waved and yelled at them and came very near to upsetting the dinghies altogether. One circled up high above us to radio our position back home, while the others continued to swoop over us by way of sustaining our morale. It was wonderful. We could cheer and laugh and get sick again and then laugh some more. I have never been so happy and so miserable at the same time.

After a while the Spits left us, but we were sure that help would be out to us in no time at all. And then after a while another Spit did come out. We set off another display of fireworks, and he too came over and began a slow circle above us. We were very glad to have him, and we were sure that we were practically saved, but the sun set and the swell seemed to grow more ominous and still no rescue. We knew that the Spit would run out of gas soon. And he did. So after a final swoop he left us. The moon came up, big and yellow over the water. It was a lovely night full of stars—a few of which I fruitlessly recognized—but lovely night or no, we all continued to be sick. We strained our ears listening for motors. We saw lights where there were none. We told each other that we would be sure to be rescued that night, but I think that each of us said to himself in private that it was unlikely.

We had been in the water about nine hours when Mike suddenly shouted that he saw a light. Fawkes saw it too when we rode the crest of the swell. We shot up another flare and then waited. Presently we heard the dull sound of a motor, and a beam of light shot out near us but not quite on us. Dinghies are pitifully small things to spot on the ocean. We fired another flare into the wind so that it fell back directly over our heads, and the beam swung around and picked us up in its path. Then while the light came nearer, an awful thought struck me, and most of the others, I suppose: What if the vessel were an enemy ship? To have traveled all that distance across Europe alone, to dive our ship into the ocean, to spend nine agonizing hours in a dinghy, all to avoid capture, and then to be picked up by the wrong ship—that would be too bad. But in a little while we heard someone answering our shouts. "Ahoy," said a voice behind the light. Then apparently our collective Minnesota, Pennsylvania, and New York accents made themselves known and the voice answered jubilantly: "Okay, Yanks, we're coming."

We clambered aboard the boat, I, of course, fumbling awkwardly up the swaying rope ladder. And there were a dozen happy angels dressed in blue R. A. F. uniforms and turtleneck sweaters, saying "bloody good show" and things like that. They had hot soup and dry clothes ready for us. But I couldn't swallow the soup, and since I paused on deck for one last mighty heave of my innards into the sea, I came too late for the clothes. But I stripped to the skin, and they wrapped me in big, warm, fleecy blankets.

It was a long voyage home, and we dodged minefields all the way. The skipper told us things that would have made us even more jittery had we known them before. We had drifted from our original position, some twenty miles off the French coast, to well within the patrol lanes of the Germans and in easy shelling distance of their coastal guns. By morning we would have been in enemy hands.

When we hit the coast town of ——— there was an ambulance waiting at the end of the stone wharf. But Bendiner had no pants, nothing but a couple of blankets. I was panicky. I had read a lot about this particular town, and it hurt my dignity to think that I would make my triumphal entry pantless. But I did. I clambered up the ancient stone steps of the wharf, clutching my blanket and looking like a refugee from a raid on a Turkish bath. It was very embarrassing. Those who were hurt were taken to a hospital; the rest of us—the cut on my forehead had healed long before—went to the local officers' barracks of the Royal Navy, where gold-braided commodores served us rum and Scotch and hot soup and bully beef. They fussed about us and sought in a thousand ways to make us happy. But still I had no pants.

At last some kindly naval lieutenant dug up an outfit for me, and I happily regained my dignity. As a matter of fact they were civilian clothes—slacks and a sweater—so that for that night and the next day I felt like a civilian and looked like Donald Budge. You know how much I like the British. My stay as a guest of the Royal Navy and the R. A. F. has made me an Anglophile for life.

We're back now at our base, and I expect that shortly we will be shipped off to spend a quiet recuperative week at a seaside resort. Some of the boys, who have been watching me furiously pounding away here, have become curious, and I have showed them most of this letter. They are now anxiously waiting for the last page to roll off the press so that they can find out whether or not they were saved.

All my love,

ELMER

Unrecognized Allies

BY KURT R. GROSSMAN

ON OCTOBER 13, 1942, at a Columbus Day celebration in New York, Attorney General Biddle announced that the 659,363 Italians living in the United States would be freed from the stigma of being classed as enemy aliens of this country. After October 19 their activities would not be restricted. "I wish to emphasize," added Mr. Biddle, "that in thus removing the label of alien enemy from Italians, we do not forget that there are other loyal persons now classed as alien enemies. Their situation is now being carefully and sympathetically studied by the Department of Justice." Unfortunately this study, which was started more than a year ago, has not led to any such result as that reached in the case of the Italians. There has been no change in the official status of the tens of thousands of German "enemy aliens" who have given their loyalty and trust to the nation which has harbored them.

Of the 314,715 aliens who, in conformity with a Presidential proclamation, registered in February, 1942, as enemy aliens of German origin, the greatest number are refugees who were forced to leave their homeland by the cruel treatment meted out to them there. The majority are Jews. A not inconsiderable minority are non-Jews who would not tolerate the brutality of the Nazi regime. Jews and non-Jews alike fought against the New Order at a time when European statesmen still placed their faith in the policy of appeasement and no "arsenal of democracy" had as yet been set up in this country.

Whatever sins refugees may be accused of, they have certainly not embraced democratic convictions in order to enter on a comfortable life of inaction. Undaunted by the loss of their livelihood, their comforts, and their cultural inheritance, the majority of them have never ceased to fight against Hitlerism, and in the war against Hitler's Germany they are on the side of the United Nations. It is their tragedy that here in the United States they have been "forgotten allies."

The number of Germans who registered as enemy aliens in February, 1942, has been increased by about 3,800 others who have come to the United States since then, making the total roughly 320,000. This total has been reduced by the naturalization of an estimated 22,500 and by the induction into the army of from 8,000 to 9,000. Thus some 290,000 Germans in this country are still regarded as enemy aliens. Of these, 70 per cent, or about 200,000, may be classed as "refugees oppressed by the Nazis."

The status of enemy aliens was defined by the President's Proclamation Number 2526:

> All alien enemies are enjoined to preserve the peace toward the United States and refrain from crime against the public safety, and from violating laws of the United States and territories thereof; and to refrain from actual hostility or giving information, aid, or comfort to the enemies of the United States or interfering by word or deed with the defense of the United States or the political processes and public opinion thereof; and to comply strictly with the regulations which are hereby or which may be from time to time promulgated by the President.

To date not a single case is on record of a refugee who has offended against the principles of this proclamation. An article in the Philadelphia Record which analyzed the background of seventy-two spies and saboteurs showed that sixty-one were German born and that forty-seven of these had become citizens. Seven others were born in America of German parents. Not one was an immigrant recognized as a refugee; nor has any refugee from Nazi persecution been among the 4,144 German enemy aliens who have been arrested since the war began.

Not long ago Edward J. Ennis, director of enemy-alien control, said that refugees had increased America's population by 0.2 per cent, but that the cultural enrichment they had brought to this country was "much greater than is expressed in this figure. The refugees had proved that the confidence the government had placed in them was well justified." Similar conclusions were reached by the Tolan committee, which after investigations on the West Coast recommended "the immediate creation of hearing boards to pass upon and certify the loyalty of German . . . aliens" (H. R. Report 2124, May, 1942).

The cultural enrichment of which Mr. Ennis spoke is to be found in many different fields. The Office of Foreign Experts is accumulating material supplied by specialists some of whom are enemy aliens. More than 6,000 refugee doctors are serving the United States as an important war reserve. Outstanding chemists, physicists, and engineers are contributing their knowledge to the war industries. Several hundred professors are teaching at American universities. Writers of the rank of Bruno Frank, Franz Werfel, and Heinrich Mann are indirectly strengthening the war potential of the United States by their literary services. Journalists are employed in the Office of War Information, and the special knowledge of alien enemies is also made use of by the Office of Strategic Services. Even in the prosecution of spies and saboteurs the government uses the expert knowledge of an enemy alien, a leading authority on German penal, administrative, and police law.

The great masses of unknown refugees have proved themselves no less loyal. A statement made by the Christian Council for Refugees from Germany and Central Europe in its last report on German refugees in England applies equally well to the refugees in America:

> The great value of alien labor has been stressed over and over again by ministers and the press. The International Labor Branch of the Ministry of Labor is making strenuous efforts to utilize to the full in the national interest this important source of man- and woman-power. It has been stated authoritatively that nearly 95 per cent of German and Austrian adult refugees are now engaged either directly or indirectly in the war effort.

Some 16,000 refugees collected $48,500 to buy the fighter plane "Loyalty" for their new country. Hundreds have sought to make themselves useful through the Immigrant Victory Council, "which watches for opportunities and duties in civilian defense." Others have contributed repeatedly to the Red Cross blood banks. The sons of many of them are serving in the armed forces with courage and ability.

In contrast to the refugees in England, those in this country have declared their intention of becoming American citizens. They consider it an honor that, individually or by general enactment, they have been deprived of their German citizenship and lament the fact that the President's proclamation renewed their citizenship connections with a Germany which persecuted and outlawed them.

German refugees do not ignore the difficulties that might prevent them from being treated as leniently as the Italians. They would not want the United States to neglect any precaution for lack of which the war might be prolonged even for an hour. But it appeared from Mr. Biddle's Columbus Day speech that this factor of security required consideration in the case of the Italians exactly as in that of the Germans. The Attorney General said explicitly:

> Of course, this reclassification of the Italians does not mean that dangerous or disloyal persons are no longer subject to apprehension or internment. We still will take no chances. It does mean that the regulations applying up to now to alien enemies no longer apply to Italian aliens.

Nothing has occurred during the past year to make the policy of exempting Italian aliens from restrictions appear mistaken. And there is no reason to suppose that the military or political security of the United States would in any way be endangered by granting the same privileges to German refugees.

A NEW APPROACH to birth control appears in the program of the Realistic Peace League of America, which is sending out postcards bearing this message: "Mothers, Next War Is Cooking! We took Puerto Rico with 950,000 population. Gave freedom from want; now 2,000,000 population. Our sentimentality caused 1,050,000 increase. Now Tugwell is there stimulating the birth rate so we will feed more millions! But that's only the beginning. The whole world is to get freedom from want. Does Lehman ask gimme nations to hold down? No, he tells Americans to sacrifice so Asiatics, Africans, and Europeans can breed like rabbits on our food! Overpopulation largely caused this war and will be, by our folly, the main cause of the next!"

AN ANONYMOUS HANDBILL makes this contribution to peace planning: "We have the sewing-machine, the steamship, the airplane, the telephone, because a very few persons dared to imagine something considered impossible. . . . Peace is taken for granted. Let a million imaginations play around this idea, and methods for its realization will emerge. As an individual, will you just keep on imagining?"

AT A MEETING of the Niagara Frontier Manpower Mobilization Committee in Buffalo, Ray C. Neal, industrialist, made "a plea that the committee ask the government 'to stop this post-war planning propaganda,' " according to the Buffalo Evening News. "It's doing harm, he said, by causing people in war jobs to apply already for peace-time employment."

POETS' CORNER: A reader of the New York Daily Mirror offers a poem which the editor thinks "hits the bull's-eye—or, rather, the Bear's-eye—neatly." The poem is to be sung to the tune of "Pistol-Packin' Momma." It describes the meeting between "straight" Mr. Hull, "fat Molotov," and Anthony Eden with "his perfumed hair," and ends,

Pick that pistol up, "Unc,"
If they don't come clean,
And we will all be with you
To slug them on the bean.

NEWS BROADCASTS had fewer listeners in New York during October than during September, according to Broadcasting, despite an increase of 15.3 per cent in total radio listening time. This was the first decrease since Pearl Harbor.

FESTUNG EUROPA: In Norway representatives of the Nazi police regularly attend church services to check sermons. . . . One of Prague's largest halls was filled to capacity at a secret midnight concert of works by Dvorak and Smetana. Three weeks later the ban on Smetana's music was lifted. The Nazis had discovered that he was a German.

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Freedom of Worship in Italy

BY GAETANO SALVEMINI

LAST week the Royal University in Naples was the scene of the first public demand for the abdication of King Victor Emmanuel. A small crowd gathered to honor Benedetto Croce, but when he pleaded for the people's support of a regency, the reaction was sudden and violent. Croce's voice was lost amid shouts of Viva la republica, and a similar outburst greeted Sforza's reference to the "new fascism at the Badoglio capital." When representatives of various political groups in the audience attempted to speak, the meeting broke up in turbulent arguments and even fist fights.

The Naples meeting was but one more indication of the rising temper of the Italian people—and of their stubborn opposition to every remnant of the old regime. So far the AMG has kept silent as to the political destiny of the country; its continued support of Badoglio and the King is the one clear political fact that emerges. "AMG in Italy," said the New York Times on September 25, "is still operating sotto voce as far as the outside world is concerned. Every so often the AMG tells of its accomplishments in Sicily, but not a peep comes from the AMG in Italy." On November 4 the Associated Press declared that "the Italian situation is still far from clarified, no less in the minds of the AMG officials than in those of AMG critics at home."

Under such circumstances an uninformed individual can catch only an occasional glimmer of light and wonder what that glimmer may presage. All in all, it is safe to conclude that the AMG does the best it can in the matter of repairing material damage, and that when the men on the spot are left a free hand in dealing with personal matters, they often display sense, humanity, and resourcefulness. The danger arises when bigwigs and brass hats take up problems of general policy.

A dispatch from the Associated Press published in the New York Spanish daily, La Prensa, on August 14 said that General Alexander, Military Governor of Sicily, had had a cordial talk with Cardinal Laritiano, Archbishop of Palermo. It reported further:

> The ecclesiastical authorities cooperate with the Allied Military Government. As a consequence General Alexander suggested that the priests and nuns should help in taking care of the children in the region devastated by war. He suggested also that wherever possible the public schools should be reopened and go on in their educational work under the direction of the ecclesiastical authorities [italics mine].

This "story" would not have reached the headquarters of the Associated Press in Washington, and subsequently the offices of La Prensa, if the censors in Palermo, Algiers, London, and Washington had not passed it. We may therefore assume that it was true. If La Prensa was the only paper to print the item, that was, perhaps, because someone in Washington anticipated the criticism which the news might evoke and instructed the English-language press to kill it.

To understand the full significance of the report, one must recall that under the pre-Fascist regime in Italy a network of secular schools extending from kindergarten to university was created by the central and local governments. Over this system the church had no control. Side by side with these schools, maintained by taxpayers' money, private schools were allowed to exist, and not a few of them were under clerical jurisdiction. The government did not interfere with clerical schools, but if their graduates wished to carry on a legally recognized profession or to enter public employment, they had to obtain a certificate of studies from a public school.

Mussolini compelled the elementary and secondary public schools to teach Catholic doctrine for two hours a week and gave legal authority to the certificates issued by the clerical schools. He did not put the public schools under the supervision of the clergy because such action would have aroused violent protests from his own followers, not to mention the gagged but ever-present liberal opposition. General Alexander must surely have known how strongly Italian intellectuals and all anti-Fascist elements would object to having Sicilian schools placed under the supervision of the clergy.

On October 8 a dispatch from Naples printed in the New York Herald Tribune provided another indication of AMG policy:

> All schools remain closed, but the AMG will permit Catholic schools to reopen soon. The religious schools have received priority because the AMG feels that Catholic textbooks and teachers are less imbued with Fascist doctrines.

The belief that Catholic textbooks and teachers are less tainted with Fascism is ridiculous. Books sent to this country by the Fascist government for use in Italian-language parochial schools are stuffed with Fascist propaganda, and the church has never objected. As for the teachers, if one excepts a minority of Fascist firebrands, those in the Italian public schools are generally anti-Fascist. In fact, on November 13 the New York Times carried a report from Italy which said that "it was feared the Germans might close some Italian universities on the ground that the professors were teaching anti-Fascist doctrines." "The Milan newspaper Fascio," the Times continued, "controlled by the Germans, urged authorities to take the radical measure of closing all universities necessary to prevent anti-Fascist professors from infecting our youth."

If Italian youth is to be saved from anti-Fascist infection, it will be necessary to close not only all universities but all secondary and elementary public schools as well, and not only in northern Italy but also in the south. The monopoly granted by the AMG to clerical schools in Naples—and probably elsewhere—can have but one result: public education, which the church has always hated, will disappear, and young people there as in Sicily will have to take their instruction from the church or forgo it entirely.

An Associated Press dispatch printed in the Daily Oklahoman on July 18 said that "parish priests in Sicily are taking the place of Fascist municipal officials in small towns and villages captured by the Allied armies." This too is strange news, and one wonders why the people of Oklahoma were privileged above citizens of other states to read it. Parish priests have never acted as municipal officials in Italy, nor have they on the other hand particularly distinguished themselves as anti-Fascists. Yet they have been selected by the American and British authorities as if no one else in rural Sicily were capable of doing the job.

One more item, reported from Naples by the New York Times on October 11, is worth quoting:

> Mass was celebrated today at the Cathedral of San Gennaro in the presence of Alessio Cardinal Ascalesi, with Lieutenant General Mark W. Clark and other high American officers in attendance.

General Clark and other officers, high or low, are entitled to attend mass at any time they wish. But attending mass officially with one's retinue in the presence of a cardinal is not a religious observance. It is a political act.

Who is Alessio Cardinal Ascalesi? He is a man who has been discredited throughout Italy by his unbridled greed for money and his consistent servility to Fascism. Cardinal Ascalesi made no protest against the bombing of Ethiopian villages, and he had nothing to say when Mussolini sent his planes to share in the glory of raiding London. But in March, 1943, he violently condemned the bombing of Naples and called upon God to grant victory over the "bestial" and "atheistic" enemy. Surely it is preposterous to suppose that American authorities must work hand in glove with Fascist cardinals and bishops in order to maintain order in a country where four-fifths of the population have no desire to take political dictation from the Catholic clergy. Surely someone in Naples could have told General Clark that he should decline—if for no other reason than respect for his own "bestial" and "atheistic" country—to attend mass in his official capacity in the presence of Cardinal Ascalesi. To Italians such a gesture could only imply that General Clark had been instructed to encourage some brand of clerical Fascism in Italy.

On the eve of the American and British landings in Sicily Mr. Roosevelt felt it necessary to address the Pope and tell him that "respect for religious belief and for the free exercise of religious worship is fundamental to our ideas." A few weeks later General Alexander, a Military Governor of Sicily, announced that "proper steps will forthwith be taken to stop the operation of all laws which discriminate on the basis of race, color, or creed," and "freedom of religious worship will be upheld." More recently the Moscow conference declared that "freedom of worship" will be restored in Italy.

To Catholic minds the phrase "freedom of religious worship" has a vastly different meaning in a country where the majority of the population are not Catholic from what it has in a Catholic country. In the first case freedom of worship means the freedom of Catholic worship pending the time when the rest of the population can be converted to Catholicism. In countries where the Catholic faith is predominant, freedom of religious worship means, not equality of rights for all churches, but the right of the Catholic church to be regarded as the sole legitimate religious organization, with other churches outlawed or, if that cannot be brought about, merely tolerated. Where the Catholic clergy are unable to control the secular government, they vindicate the freedom of the church by invoking liberal principles; where they acquire direct or indirect political influence, they do what they can to curtail other people's religious freedom, in accordance with their own Catholic principles.

When Messrs. Eden, Hull, and Molotov pledged themselves to "restore" freedom of worship in Italy, what did they mean? Mussolini never challenged the right of the Catholic church to conduct worship freely, even when his relations with the Vatican were passing through crisis. He simply refused to let the Vatican become master of the ship. Mussolini was to be the only master. Thus it is unnecessary for the AMG to "restore" the freedom of Catholic religious worship in Italy. Let us hope that the phrase does not mean that all the demands of the Catholic church are to be complied with, that even those rights and privileges which Mussolini withheld, starting with the right of controlling the schools, will be "restored" as they existed a century ago.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

NOVEMBER 11 was the twenty-fifth anniversary of Germany's capitulation in the First World War. The occasion was utilized by the Nazis to whip up the spirit of the people, and in the process the party had recourse to some rather anachronistic devices—it went back to the triumphal ceremonies of the first victory year. In practically every German city there was an enormous parade with flags, posters, music, and speeches. In Frankfurt-am-Main the summons to take part in the celebration was displayed for days beforehand on all the placard pillars and in the newspapers. The notice concluded:

> We will never capitulate! Gauleiter Sprenger will speak. Everybody must come! Nobody must stand aloof! Frankfurt will parade under the motto: "We will be masters of our fate."

On the morning of the great day came a last appeal:

> You too will join us today! Come to the meeting at 10:30 at the Horst Wessel Platz. The people of Frankfurt will make it clear that November, 1918, can never happen again, that cowardice and treachery have no place in our community, that the home front faithfully backs the battle front. We will fight until victory is won.

In Mannheim-Ludwigshaven on the same day the celebrations took an unforeseen course. Dr. Ley, leader of the Labor Front, had been announced as speaker. The preparations had been even more intensive than at Frankfurt. Precise regulations had been laid down for the march of the factory workers and other organizations. Gigantic posters had been put up over the streets and on buildings, bearing the slogans: "Victory at any price!" "Führer, lead us, we will follow"; "Work, Fight, Trust"; "Our motto—victory."

Then, when everything was in readiness, the arrangements were upset by another severe air raid. But there was still time to adapt the scenario to the new situation. How this was done was reported by the Swedish newspaper Eskilstuna Kuriren on November 15. Herr Ley, of course, directed his remarks chiefly against "Anglo-American barbarism," and recalled Hitler's words that people who have been bombed out of their homes are "the vanguard of revenge against England." But the main feature was the arrival of 30,000 workmen "with spades and pickaxes over their shoulders." After the ceremonies were ended, they "started in to clear away the debris and extricate the victims."

A struggle is going on in England at present over whether seventeen-year-old boys shall be employed in the coal mines. In Germany fourteen-year-olds have already been sent to the pits.

The first news that such a step had been taken came from the speech of a Youth leader who boasted that for several months "many fourteen-year-old boys" had been working in the coal mines of Upper Silesia. Then on November 19 a long article in the Reichsarbeitsblatt, the organ of the German Ministry of Labor, stated that the employment of fourteen-year-old boys was to be organized on the broadest possible basis in the industries in which labor was scarcest. Among these, the building and transportation industries were specified and, above all, coal mining. The writer of the article, a high official in the ministry, declared that there would of course be no infringement of the constitutional right of every German lad to choose a trade for himself. No fourteen-year-old would be "forced" into the mines. "Persuasion" would be used with both the parents and the boys. "They will be persuaded to subordinate their own wishes to the needs of the present and the future." Nazi officials are known to have strong powers of persuasion.

For the first time an Allied propaganda item, a leaflet dropped from a plane, can be shown to have forced the Nazi authorities to change a ruling, or at least to have contributed to such a result. The leaflet dealt with the fact that no évacués from bombed cities are allowed in the neighborhood of Berchtesgaden, the Führer's residence—that, indeed, all the roads are barred in a wide circle around the village so that neither raid victims nor persons walking for pleasure can approach it. The calm and security of the Führer and of other party bigwigs who have built villas in the vicinity are not to be disturbed, the leaflet declared, by annoying and suspicious characters like refugees.

The Nazis' first reaction was a speech by Gauleiter Giesler on October 5. Something called a Berchtesgaden Cultural Heimat Meeting was arranged, and there Herr Giesler poured out his rage at the "deceitful enemy propaganda leaflets dropped in northern Germany." He denied that évacués who had approached too near to Berchtesgaden had ever been shot. And he boasted of Berchtesgaden's large contributions to war charities. He mentioned, for example, that several sanitariums for convalescent soldiers had been set up.

But the "deceitful enemy leaflets" were not disposed of by this one speech; and on November 1 the Stockholm Aftontidningen printed a dispatch which carried the story to its conclusion. It said:

> In view of the irritated temper of the people the regulation closing Berchtesgaden to évacués has been rescinded. The public had called the closed zone the Berchtesgaden Hundeschutzpark (dog preserve). Now huts are being built for évacués, little other accommodation being available. Party leaders and officials are still exempted from the obligation to receive bombed-out persons in their homes

BOOKS and the ARTS

AENEAS AND AUGUSTINE

BY ROBERT FITZGERALD

I HAVE always wished that the narrator of Thornton Wilder's "Cabala" had finished the play he was supposed to be writing around the life of St. Augustine. Perhaps before too long Major Wilder could be persuaded to get the manuscript out of his scholar's trunk and interline its pages with fresh dialogue, suitable for a Jed Harris production. There is surely a part in it for Miss Bankhead, a part that might engage her powers more fully than that which Major Wilder bestowed on her last season. It would be a momentous first night, and one of diabolical paradox, for of all the intense intellects that ever came into this world Augustine was perhaps the most scornful of the theater and the other professional arts.

This, I think, is an aspect of him, admittedly incidental to theologians, upon which we might reflect to some purpose, now that Mr. Sheed has brought out his new translation of "The Confessions" (Sheed and Ward. $3). It is a sensible and vigorous translation into plain English, much more readable than Pusey's version of 1838, even though Augustine's subtler meanings are sometimes better rendered in the old-fashioned English of Dr. Pusey. Take, for example, the passage in Book II, Chapter 1, in which Augustine says, silvescere ausus sum variis et umbrosis amoribus. Sheed: "I sank to the animal in a succession of dark lusts." Pusey: "I dared to grow wild again, with these various and shadowy loves." Here I feel that although something may be said for the greater violence of Sheed's statement, there is little to be said for his rendering of silvescere and no excuse whatever for his omission of the idea of "daring." As a precise record of emotion, and as one of the marvels of Latin prose, the text suffers somewhat from this sort of treatment.

The odd thing is that Augustine, one feels, quite possibly would approve Sheed's blunt, clear, Roman Catholic rendering rather than Pusey's donnish and delicate Anglican one. For the remarkable Bishop of Hippo (now Bône, in Algeria) ended with small reverence for the art of which he was a master—the literary art, or, as it was then practiced, rhetoric. We are well situated for comprehending this, having been aware in our own time of a continuous tension between the "literary" and other conceivably more valuable kinds of writing. We have, indeed, seen certain anti-literary efforts comparable in splendor to Augustine's, though none, I think, of comparable coherence. We are even so familiar with a prejudice against Vergil that Augustine's revulsion from his boyhood pleasure in the "Aeneid" may not strike us as surprising. It is this that I should like to dwell on for a few moments here.

He is saying that his early lessons, in reading and writing, were worth more to him than the later ones, quibus tenere cogebar Aeneae nescio cuius errores oblitus errorum meorum, "in which I was forced to memorize the wanderings of Aeneas—whoever he was—while forgetting my own wanderings." Mr. Sheed translates colloquially and correctly here, conveying the impatience, the conscious boorishness of the Latin sentence. This little passage on Vergil is more interesting, because at first sight more perverse, than Augustine's famous objection to Tragedy. One can feel in accord with him there, seeing that the common run of drama in performance—and the theater is second-rate in our time as it was in his—does trouble us with a suspicion that the mummers have taken us in. But to cast out the "Aeneid" because Aeneas's wanderings are not ours is a procedure that, taken literally, could leave us without literature entirely.

Turning again to the poem that Augustine had apparently loved enough to regret with such asceticism, I had no need to go beyond the second book to become convinced of its glory as a work of art. The conviction came upon me precisely at line 558 in Book II. Augustine may have felt a like conviction, for he reproves himself specifically because mihi erat . . . dulcissimum spectaculum vanitatis equus ligneus plenus armatis et Troiae incendium, "the Wooden Horse with its armed men, and Troy on fire . . . were sheer delight." It is difficult to review in a few words the progression of effects by which, throughout that book, Vergil had created the scene of sad night and gliding disaster; the surprise, the street fighting, the flames and slaughter; the terrible energies, the noble deaths in his Asian city taken by storm. One becomes finally aware of the more-than-life dimension of this action, and simultaneously, with a shiver, of Vergil's own awareness of it, when Pyrrhus has dragged old Priam by the hair and killed him, and:

> hic exitus illum
> sorte tulit Troiam incensam et prolapsa videntem
> Pergama, tot quondam populis terrisque superbum
> regnatorem Asiae, iacet ingens litore truncus, > avulsumque umeris caput et sine nomine corpus. . . .

> So he was taken off,
> As luck would have it, seeing his city afire, seeing > Troy, that once held sway over so many lands and peoples,
> The pride of Asia, fallen. The mighty trunk lies prone,
> Head and shoulders severed, nameless, beside the ocean. . . .

The torso, the huge form there, is the permanent sculpture of the classic age.

Now Augustine, all historians agree, saw that age brought to an end; for he saw what one may imagine that Vergil glimpsed in a vision: the end of the fourth century, the incursions of the barbarians and the humbling of the Roman cities: Rome herself in 410 and Hippo, by the Vandals, while the great bishop himself lay dying. Surely the Vergilian language was still lovely in the ears of cultivated Italian, Spanish, and Gallic people; the verses of Ausonius prove that it was still alive. But the specifically Roman adventure of the human spirit—that had been played out, and the imperial synthesis slipped apart.

Miss Rebecca West, in her admirable little biography of St. Augustine, insists on his un-Roman Numidian stock; on the fact that even among provincials his social rank was definitely inferior. Ambrose, the Roman gentleman and bishop of Milan, successfully snubbed him. Miss West interprets the saint's temper as a combination of barbaric African vitality and the inflamed pride of the outlander, rather like the Anglo-Irish "squireen's son." Hence, she suggests, his readiness to throw over Rome for the City of God, and hence his rudeness toward Father Aeneas. This is a brilliant if somewhat imperialistic view of the matter.

By way of modification, it may be said that in his irritation at the "Aeneid," and in certain qualities of his own style, Augustine is related to a very old line of Latin expression—a popular, Republican Roman strain. I am thinking of Cato, the comic poets, and Catullus, the writers of Latin as the people spoke it, not as the later orators drew it out after their Greek studies at Rhodes, or as the fashionable amorists of the capital polished it in elegiacs. Vergil, too, was a sophisticate; he had a Greek model; and if Book II of the "Aeneid" shows us that Rome under the principate was capable of real grandeur, self-conscious but still austere, Book I reminds us too often of the darling Hellenism that softened late Roman art.

It was the goldsmith's, the cameo-cutter's period; a plague of cute cupids had settled over Rome. The opening scenes of the "Aeneid" are touched with this sort of charm. Aeneas's mother, Venus, resembles less the deep goddess of Lucretius, hominum divumque voluptas, than a costumed huntress at the Petit Trianon with knees erotically bared. I suspect that one reason for our common American dislike of Vergil may be that in school we begin his poem at the beginning, thus forming a first impression that it may take years to correct. Well, Cato had growled against Hellenism at the time of the Punic Wars, two centuries before Vergil, six centuries before Augustine, and by Augustine's time it was certainly no longer a novelty.

But larger matters than any of these were, and are, implied in St. Augustine's discourtesy to the literary masterwork of Rome. There is no doubt that the thirteen books of "The Confessions" are themselves a work of genius, perhaps the first created in Christendom. Only once before in Latin, I believe, had thought risen to the level of passion; but the intellectual quality of Lucretius is mechanical compared with certain efforts of Augustine. And I must here question Miss West's judgment, and even more decidedly that of Mr. Sheed, in regarding the first ten books of "The Confessions" as self-sufficient. The earlier "tutorial edition" of Mr. Sheed's translation was truncated, it seems to me, by the omission of Books XI, XII, and XIII. The reason given, of course, is that only the first ten are "autobiographical." If they were merely autobiographical, one might agree as to the superfluity of three final books upon "God, Creation, Time and Space, Spirit and Matter." The fact is that the entire work is concerned with these subjects and is indeed formally and continuously addressed to the first of them.

Instead of the old Aegean heaven of Vergil with its sunlit gods, pouting or smiling, we have at the opening of "The Confessions" an extended evocation of a Creator whose attributes are all superlative, all infinite. Twenty years a rhetorician, Augustine seems to have let his pen run at high speed through eloquent exercises of antithesis and chiasmus: apud te rerum omnium instabilium stant causae et rerum omnium mutabilium inmūtabiles manent origines et omnium inrationalium et temporalium sempiternae vivunt rationes . . . "before Your face stand the causes of all things transient and the changeless principles of all things that change, and the eternal reasons of all the things of unreason and of time." The questioning, echoing prose pursues at every turn the exact relationship between this intellectual God, directly perceived as neither Hebrew awe nor Greek speculation had quite perceived Him, and the confiding human consciousness. And this is the work of "The Confessions": to locate the writer and his experience with reference to an intimate yet immeasurable reality or, to use the proper term, Being.

In place, then, of the fictive hero cast upon the African shore we read about an actual child that came kicking into the sensuous world, not a child but an ego disguised as a child, for he says, ecce infantia mea olim mortua est et ego vivo, "that infancy of mine died long since, yet I still live." And in a few quick pages we are introduced with painful clarity to how the needy newcomer felt and from what he desperately drew his life; how far from innocent he was, and how he learned. Described for us in Book II, quite as terrifying as the excess of Troy's ravagers, is the excess of adolescent delinquency—the acte gratuit that interested Gide and has devastated Europe, "a demonstration" as Miss West says, "against order, the cherished work of the adult." And in Book IV, far different from the pathos of Dido's death for love, are the beautiful fiery sentences that Augustine found for his grief at his friend's death, a passage as permanent as anything in Latin, being permanently true:

> Quo dolore contenebratum est cor meum, et quidquid aspiciebam mors erat, et erat mihi patria supplicium et paterna domus mira infelicitas, et quidquid cum illo communicaveram, sine illo in cruciatum immanem verterat. expetebant eum undique oculi mei, et non dabatur; et oderam omnia, quod non haberent eum, nec mihi iam dicere poterant: 'ecce venit,' sicut cum veniret, quando absens erat . . . et si dicebam: 'spera in deum,' iuste non obtemperabat, quia verior erat et melior homo, quem carissimum amiserat, quam phantasma, in quod sperare iubebatur.

> At this grief my heart was utterly darkened; and whatever I beheld was death. My native country was a torment to me, and my father's house was a strange unhappiness; and whatever I had shared with him, wanting him, became a distracting torture. Mine eyes sought him everywhere, but he was not granted them; and I hated all places, for that they had not him; nor could they now tell me, 'he is coming,' as when he was alive and absent. . . . And if I said, 'Trust in God,' my soul very rightly obeyed me not; because that most dear friend, whom she had lost, was, being man, both truer and better than that phantasm she was bid to trust in. (Pusey.)

I will not carry the parallel columns any farther. There are some passages in "The Confessions" that must seem mere curiosities to us, particularly the discussions of Manichaeism; with others we can feel little sympathy. I myself simply have not the virtue necessary to agree with Augustine—and the church—as to the virtue of his fascinating mother, who strikes me as a perfect horror of early piety. Some of us may discourse well about the psychology of his struggle toward conversion, a struggle, in the end, largely for the renunciation of sexual pleasure. But as to the truth with which he rendered his life and emotions no one will disagree. One reason for it might be that he wrote for an auditor whose perfections included perfect Truth.

The subject of "The Confessions," indeed, would have been but half treated if Augustine had told only of himself; the other, vaster term would have remained without definition. Contrary to Rebecca West's opinion, therefore, it was artistically sound for him to conclude his work with a prolonged effort at exploring the metaphysical.

We vaguely hold to the notion that in Augustine's age, in the words of Rostovtzeff, "men had grown weary and unwilling to seek further. They turned greedily to a creed that promised to calm the troubled mind." However true this may be, the last books of "The Confessions" show Augustine "seeking further" at a furious rate; by contrast, the Vergilian temper seems weary and resigned. The ascent begins in Book X, with great rhetorical magnificence. I wonder if St. Francis of Assisi's celebrated prayer, nine centuries later, was not an echo of Augustine's address to those other creatures of God, the earth, the air, the sea, and the stars: interrogavi terram, etc. There is a thousand years of Ionic, Eleatic, Platonic, Aristotelian, and Alexandrian metaphysics, and three hundred years of Christian theology, behind Augustine's discussion of Time in Book XI; it is highly refined, but I suppose that on this topic there is not another flight of thought so arrowy before Kant, whose perception Augustine anticipated.

"He matched the self of which man is certain," says Miss West, "against the most extreme uncertainties man recognizes in the universe, as if he were cheering two cocks fighting in a pit. It was a spirit very necessary in that period when—as happens in all periods of extreme political and economic disorder—the proper philosophical skepticism as to the infallibility of man's mental instrument had suffered a morbid degeneration into hysterical coma. . . ." We are only too familiar with the state described. If we are also familiar with honesties as religious as Augustine's—and I shall mention here not only the work of James Joyce but the American effort of James Agee and Walker Evans in their "Let Us Now Praise Famous Men"—that is our present good fortune and a token of grace.

Whitman's Due

WALT WHITMAN: AN AMERICAN. By Henry Seidel Canby. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.75.

"WHAT?" you exclaim, "another book about Whitman? But is there anything left to say?"

And yet, haven't the other accounts of this man been somewhat tentative and exploratory? Unless you except Bliss Perry, who has yet treated Whitman in the sensible way, fully informed and warm-hearted and cool-headed, that is his due? Who has put together his crudity and grandeur, his egotism and affection, his ignorance and wisdom, and made them cohere? Who has made him look quite believable?

For one thing, there hasn't been time. It is less than a hundred years since Walt's "barbaric yawp" first sounded above the roofs of the world. At that time we were not sure that any of the Muses had crossed the Atlantic, or that they should be given naturalization papers. We had to get over our sense of shock at seeing an American, obviously able-bodied and not a college professor, spending his life in writing what he called "pomes." And it did not help that these effusions were composed in what he thought was an American lingo, or that they dealt with American themes. They committed the impropriety, not to say the sacrilege, of trying to connect beauty with serious matters such as business and politics. Moreover, they did not come in the recognized poetical packages. They were as innocent of rhyme and meter as their author was of a necktie. They spoke in plain terms about plain things such as locomotives and cab-drivers, not to mention other matters which were—unmentionable. And so the Anthony Comstocks had to be heard from. We had to listen to the pundits of Boston and the poetasters of the Century Club. We had to wait for the opinions of the English critics about the bull in our china shop. All this took time. It has taken so much time that not even today has Whitman come home to the audience for which he wrote. We have not accepted his invitation:

> Take my leaves, America!
> Take them, South, and take them, North!
> Make welcome for them everywhere,
> For they are your own offspring.
> Surround them, East and West!
> For they would surround you.

Yet Whitman comes nearer to us, or we approach him more closely, year by year. For a long while he has been shaping the minds by which he is to be understood, as Marcel Proust used to say that every creative artist and thinker must do. And recently this approach has been hastened by outward events. We are reading Whitman more because we need him—need his vision of what America is at the core and what it must therefore become. We need his faith in democracy, if only to answer the doubts and fears that he had long ago. For this reason a good book about Whitman comes just now in the nick of time.

Mr. Canby has made not a photograph but a portrait. His book is an interpretation of the record open to everyone. "Now," he says, "when it is so necessary for Americans to feel the strength and continuity of their own traditions, a new life of Whitman should be not so much a final mopping-up of unpublished letters and fragments as an attempt to set in order and make use of all pertinent information." In his opinion, "the clues to the so-called mystery of Walt Whitman are not to be found in unrevealed scraps of personal experience but in the unique history of the electric America in which he matured, an America charged with spiritual idealism, double-charged with intellectual and physical energy." He holds that although Whitman was certainly not representative of America in the nineteenth century, he was in a high degree symbolic of his time and place in "its expansiveness, its moral conflicts, its essential quality of continual revolution, its struggle for fraternity, its large hopes." To Whitman's assertion that "America is democracy" Mr. Canby adds his own, that "Whitman is democracy," leaving us to recall that things equal to the same thing are equal to each other.

This book is written not in a mood of hero-worship but with that warmth of affection which Whitman somehow awakens in all who come close to him, even by means of the printed page. Mr. Canby is at some pains to dispel certain parts of the Whitman legend for which there has never been found any warrant in fact. He makes it clear that Walt was by no means freakish, lazy, dissolute, or inclined to claim the alleged licenses of the "artistic temperament." That he posed a good deal, always dressed for his part, wrote many of his own blurbs and reviews, and talked too much about himself is what everyone knows, but his biographer thinks it more important that he was a good son and brother, that he had a genius for friendship, and that love, in all the senses the word can bear, was the vitalizing essence of his life. He treats Whitman's attitude toward sex with good sense and moderation, using all the knowledge about this matter that we have, or need. He emphasizes what may be called the normalities of Whitman's career, such as the modest success he attained in journalism and his close acquaintance with practical politics. Some of his best pages are those that deal with Walt's work as a nurse, or rather as a hospital visitor, in the years of the Civil War. It was by means of that work, he believes, that Whitman discovered the deeper meanings of love, of democracy, and of America.

Mr. Canby's book is least satisfactory in what it says, and does not say, about Whitman's style. To mention a small matter first, one does not see what he can mean by asserting that the characteristic movement of Whitman's verse is "trochaic" when even the examples he cites are obviously dactylic. One wishes that there might have been something said about the effect Whitman gives, when at his best, of finding his words far below the surface of his conscious thought. In this connection, too, it might have been pointed out how admirably the structure of his best longer poems grows, as it were, from within. Too obvious for mention, perhaps, because it is of poetry's essence, is his constant recourse to the concrete, the actual, the specific; and closely related to this is the way in which his thought often shoots up from the seed of fact into an Ygdrasil of meanings that embrace the world and fill the sky. Thus his "Passage to India," in which he comes nearest to greatness, begins with the Suez Canal and the Union Pacific Railroad but ends with a prophecy of the soul's destination.

Whitman's style, both in prose and verse, is often magnificent, but one can guess why Mr. Canby has here paid it comparatively little attention. The important things about Whitman, at any rate to us at the present time, are of another sort. He helped to set free not our verse alone but our thoughts and moods. He assisted mightily in the effort, still going on, to swing poetry away from its aristocratic past and to make it a common possession. In the place of solitude and all the wealth of meaning that word was given by Emerson and Thoreau, in the place of self-reliance, "rugged individualism," and isolation in all its aspects, he helped us to put the ideal of solidarity. And there can be no doubt what advice he would give his country, if he were living now, upon its greatest present problem. "I do not seem able," he said in later life, "to bring myself to love America, to desire American prosperity, at the expense of other nations."

Surprising as this remark may be coming from a man who had once been almost ludicrously chauvinistic, it represents the considered opinion of Whitman's maturer years. And the bridge by which he passed from his boasting about "These States" into an all-embracing internationalism was, simply, his love for mankind. In one of the most deeply characteristic of his utterances he said: "I want the people: most of all the people: the crowd, the mass, the whole body of the people: men, women, children: I want them to have all that belongs to them: not a part of it, not most of it, but all of it: I want anything done that will give the people their proper opportunities—their full life: anything, anything: whether by one means or another, I want the people to be given their due."

More than fifty years have passed since those burning words were spoken, and the political party to which Whitman belonged has done something on the task he set. He could not have told us how it is to be completed, but today there are many thousands serving on his Ways and Means Committee.

ODELL SHEPARD

Partisans vs. Chetniks

MY NATIVE LAND. By Louis Adamic. Harper and Brothers. $3.75.

LOUIS ADAMIC tells us that since the summer of 1942 he has been receiving weekly bundles of "memoranda, underground papers, clippings, and official documents" which reveal—to his satisfaction, at least—the true state of affairs in occupied Yugoslavia. On the basis of these and other anonymous sources, supported by quotations from the Russian or Communist press and radio—Inter-Continent News, the Daily Worker, the Free Yugoslavia radio and Radio Tiflis—he has written a 507-page tract against the Mikhailovitchevtsi and in favor of Partizanstvo. Though he has included four appendices, he has neglected to provide an index; and in a book as full of controversial material as this one the lack of an index is a serious defect.

Mr. Adamic is writing here as a pamphleteer, not as a historian, and it is perhaps unfair to ask that he substantiate his every assertion. Nevertheless, I wish he had been a little more careful about his facts, many of which are demonstrably mistaken, and a little less eager to bend his somewhat dubious source material to fit the purposes of his argument. It is easy enough to demolish the Mihailovich legend without making a legend of the Partisans, which is what I am afraid Mr. Adamic, by inductive reasoning and wishful thinking, has done. Granting that the Mikhailovitchevtsi have become pan-Serbian nationalists, to compare Mihailovich himself with Gamelin, and his followers with the Spanish Falange, is hitting, it seems to me, below the belt. Moreover, since he was born in Slovenia, Mr. Adamic writes from a strongly Slovenian and therefore pro-Croatian point of view and ignores the many arguments in favor of the Serbian cause. I think he minimizes unduly the pertinent if unpalatable facts that it was the Serbs alone who fought the Germans in the beginning, and that Serbian irregulars were carrying on guerrilla warfare long before the Liberation Front came into being. If the Partisans accuse the Mikhailovitchevtsi of treason now, the Mikhailovitchevtsi with equal cause accused the potential Partisans of treason then. Mr. Adamic himself admits that the collapse of Yugoslavia was probably "not a wholly unwelcome occurrence" to many of the Slovenes and Croats who are leading the Partisans today. For my part, I find it difficult to forget that Croatian Communists, like their comrades in France, refused to fight for their country until after the Germans invaded Russia. Mr. Adamic explains such defection as "a new morality, a new patriotism"; and—cynicism aside—he may possibly be right, for the old Yugoslavia, like the old France, was in many ways intolerable to people who yearned for a real new order, not a restoration of the old. On the other hand, if, as Mr. Adamic believes, the Liberation Front will lead straight to sovietization, will it not create a counter-force of equally democratic opinion in favor of Balkan federation but opposed to making Yugoslavia a Russian province? On which side will lie patriotism then?

The Serbian position of the moment, at least as represented by Mihailovich, the government in exile, and the American Serbobran in Pittsburgh, has admittedly reached a chauvinistic phase. It is inconceivable that the decrepit leaders of the exiled government will be acceptable after the war to any but the most reactionary elements in Yugoslavia. Even King Peter—though he is too young to have done much harm as yet—will be unacceptable to an overwhelming majority of Croats and Slovenes, if not of Serbs, because of the sorry records of Paul and Alexander. One proposition no longer denied by anyone, be he pan-Serb or ultra-Croat, progressive or reactionary, is that Yugoslavia cannot and will not be recreated if the Karageorgevich dynasty is restored.

But is sovietization the only answer to the disreputable dynasties of which our Metternichs of the State Department and Foreign Office are apparently so enamored? Will Russian imperialism be any more acceptable to the Balkan peoples than the Anglo-Saxon variety? I seriously doubt it. Though the Russian philosophy undoubtedly has much to commend it, to Russians, I still think the bulk of the Balkan peoples—and Greeks must be considered as well as Yugoslavs—would prefer to emulate American history if our leaders would but give them the opportunity. The stumbling-block, of course, is that our legitimist truckling to the House of Savoy in Italy—to say nothing of our apparent preference for Franco and Badoglio over Tito and De Gaulle—is rapidly causing our would-be allies among the peoples of Europe to despair of Anglo-Saxon ideals. Nevertheless, those ideals are still alive and vibrant, in the Balkans as everywhere else; and what the Communist leaders of the Liberation Front are offering the Yugoslavs today is not collectivization, dogma, and regimentation but a Bill of Rights, freedom of speech and assembly, separation of church and state, and a popular, representative government within a nuclear Balkan federation. This excellent program, I submit, is closer to the Anglo-Saxon tradition than it is to what Russia has to offer, at least on the basis of its immediate past. What our leaders have been unable to see, and what Mr. Adamic makes abundantly clear, is that Russia through the Partisans has been stealing our democratic thunder by our default. Mr. Adamic believes that the Atlantic Charter and the United Nations are little more than fictions. Here again he may be right; if he is, then sovietization may be the simplest if not the best ending of the Balkan tragedy. But I very much fear that in the process the Balkan peoples will once again have been cheated of their legitimate aspirations. LEIGH WHITE

Reading, Writing, and Rules

THE READER OVER YOUR SHOULDER. A Handbook for Writers of English Prose. By Robert Graves and Alan Hodge. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THE obvious weakness of most handbooks on writing is that they are turned out by people who don't know how to write. The average manual, while explaining grammar, outrages idiom, and while inculcating correctness, murders style. Indeed, it does rather well if it does no worse, for most authors of handbooks don't know what they are talking about, and are hardly better mentors than models. They would rap my knuckles because I said "people" rather than "persons" in the first sentence of this review, and they will rap yours if you use "apt" for "likely" or say "those sort of things." They will tell you that "enthuse" is not a word, never dreaming that "motivate" is not one either. They point out that "balance" does not mean "remainder"—though no harm would be done if it were allowed to—but not that "affable" doesn't mean "friendly"—though a fine distinction is lost by letting it.

I was therefore exhilarated by the sight of this book: at last two writers, one of them famous, had taken over the job from the pedants. But, everything considered, they had better hand it back again. "The Reader Over Your Shoulder" is, in its own way, a very interesting book, but as a manual—and its subtitle proclaims it to be one—it is an absurdity. Its presentation is both confused and confusing; its contents are wantonly heterogeneous and often shamelessly irrelevant. To call it a handbook is like calling a peddler's pack a filing cabinet. The book's nature would have been better advertised had Mr. Hodge's collaborator been a Mr. Podge.

Mr. Hodge and his collaborator have, to be sure, sound and even benevolent intentions. They would foster better writing, not to save the writer's soul, but to preserve the reader's sanity. Realizing the speed at which a modern reader travels, they want the modern writer to befuddle, mislead, and distract him as little as possible. They want to banish the flabby, the imprecise, the otiose; they seek not only the right order of words but the right sequence of sentences and the right marshaling of paragraphs. They plead for logic and clarity in writing, and they hope for grace.

But these champions of order fail to exemplify it. Their book's arrangement violates all the rules they lay down for prose arrangement. There is very little coherence, partly because there is very little unity. For one thing, Mr. Graves and Mr. Hodge don't bother to get down to rules until they have wallowed in irrelevancies. For another, they shuttle capriciously between very elementary problems of writing and quite advanced ones. And what, all the time, they have up their sleeve is a packet of Horrible Examples from the prose of some fifty well-known contemporaries, to the dissecting and rewriting of which they devote the last 239 of their 446 pages. But all that in good time.

The book opens with chapters on the nature of the English language and on the qualities, good and bad, in several centuries of English prose style. These chapters have a certain interest and value, though they merely skim the surface and, what is more serious, slide out of bounds. Thus, into a handbook on writing Mr. Graves and Mr. Hodge introduce much factual matter about writers ("[Jeremy Taylor] was born in 1613 and became rector of a village in Rutlandshire . . .") together with much comment about literature ("[Defoe's characters] have few qualms of conscience while engaged in their felonies"). Irrelevant or not, all this might just squeak through in a book that assumed a certain cultural awareness in its readers. But Mr. Graves and Mr. Hodge assume, on the contrary, that their readers are absolute ignoramuses, and refer to "Demosthenes, the most famous orator of Athens"; while elsewhere they act as though their readers were positive illiterates: "Parenthesis-signs," our authors remark, "are always used in pairs"!

At page 127 Messrs. Graves and Hodge are in a mood to confide their "own principles for writing prose . . . twenty-five concerned with clarity of statement, and sixteen with grace of expression." Most of these rules make excellent sense, but a number of them are laboriously expounded, and a few are sheer pedantry. We are told, for example, that no paragraph should begin with "but." Well, what is commonly regarded as the great classic of American prose begins a paragraph with "But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate . . ."; and even if it didn't, Mr. Graves's and Mr. Hodge's reasoning would be just as unsound.

Their rules enunciated, Mr. Graves and Mr. Hodge have a dandy time applying them to the wayward prose of various politicians and military men, and of such distinguished writers as Wells, Shaw, Eliot, and Hemingway. They concede that many of the things they find fault with are trifling; the point is that they are so numerous: "Though a single fly-spot does not make a dirty window-pane, twenty or thirty do." In any case, Mr. Graves and Mr. Hodge drum up plenty of business for the window cleaners. But though this section of the book makes very good sport, it does not—in the handbook sense—serve too useful an end. For one thing, our authors go in for the worst sort of hairsplitting. They would, for example, amend Eliot's "English criticism is inclined to argue . . ." to "English critics are inclined to argue": surely this is worse than puristic, it is downright repressive—it robs prose of so valid and immemorial a tool as personification. Again, Messrs. Graves's and Hodge's breakdown of their Horrible Examples becomes insufferably tedious, from both the great number and the frequent over-niceness of its points; it wearies a reader far too much to benefit him. Finally, it is foolish of our authors, no matter how modest their intentions, to rewrite the offending passages: their own versions have necessarily the neutral quality of a translation, since they wash the color out of an Eliot while permitting none of the color of a Graves and Hodge. Surely prose that lacks character is no more exemplary than prose that lacks clearness.

I don't suppose there is anybody who can't somewher profit by reading this book. But I can conceive of no on for whom it will prove a really serviceable manual. As reference book it is hopeless: far from following dictionar principles, it doesn't even have an index. As a textbook it i almost as hopeless, because it lacks logical development. A a compendium, it omits many obvious matters for discussion including my own pet abomination, the verbal junk-jewelr of every age—such things, in our own age, as "vis-à-vi Hitler" or "militarily." Finally, as a carry-all, it accommodates no class of traveler comfortably. Its subtitle would apply equally to Santayana and to any British M. Jourdain who had to write a letter. Beginners are far better served by such a book as Maxwell Nurnberg's "What's the Good Word?"; writers of all classes are infinitely better served by the justly famous Mr. Fowler. Indeed, the more I see of other manualists, the more my admiration for Fowler grows.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Education and Wisdom

LIBERAL EDUCATION. By Mark Van Doren. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

IN A sense "Liberal Education" is a war book. At any rate, the author states in his preface that the war was its "immediate occasion." It was written in the conviction that the present disruption of liberal education in the United States is temporary, that never again will the American people be satisfied with the pre-war "college of liberal arts," and that now is the time to do our educational thinking for the post-war period.

The book is brilliantly written. This of course would be anticipated by anyone who is at all familiar with the work and talents of the author. It is also a serious book. This is one of its greatest merits. From the first page to the last Mr. Van Doren presents education as an extremely serious matter, whether viewed from the individual or the social standpoint. He presents education too as a most arduous and exacting undertaking. All of this is timely and true.

On the negative side "Liberal Education" constitutes a vigorous and uncompromising attack on a trend of more than a century in American higher education—the trend to "liberalize," to use the word of the period, the inherited classical curriculum of the colleges. This trend may be said to have been inaugurated by Thomas Jefferson with the founding of the University of Virginia in 1819. Here for the first time the "elective principle," as it came to be called later, was introduced. The students were allowed some freedom of choice in the subjects pursued. In the same year George Ticknor, a friend of Jefferson and a teacher of modern languages, joined the Harvard faculty. From that time until he severed his connection with the college at Cambridge in 1835 this powerful advocate of "modern studies" fought with some success to soften the rigidity of the traditional curriculum. In these years many other colleges, notably Amherst, Bowdoin, Brown, and Union, moved in the same direction. The trend reached its culmination in 1894 under the leadership of a nephew of George Ticknor, President Charles W. Eliot of Harvard. In that year the only bsolute requirement remaining in this college was Fresh- an English. Although such an extreme application of the lective principle has been extremely rare, the Harvard ex- mple, combined with forces working in American life and cholarship, influenced profoundly the practices of American olleges.

The weakness of the elective principle has been apparent rom the time of its first appearance. And it has generally unctioned merely as one among several principles guiding he construction and administration of the college curriculum. t served a useful purpose in breaking the "cake of custom" nd in opening the way for the introduction of modern ubjects. To the extent that this was its only purpose its doption constituted an evasion of responsibility by educa- ional leaders. Instead of confronting squarely the problem of creating the best possible education for youth, they yielded o pressures of subject-matter groups and passed on to the tudent the supremely difficult task of making educational choices and thus of building the curriculum. Mr. Van Doren s quite right in viewing this as a case of professional abdication. It might be compared with the action of a physician who places all of his medicines "without prejudice" at the discretion of his patient.

On the positive side the author declares that educators must confront the very problem which the advocates of the "elective principle" avoided. They must answer without equivocation the two most fundamental questions in education: "What things shall be studied, and in what order?" Mr. Van Doren then asserts that "a system of education which avoids those questions and concentrates on the problems of administration or teaching method, or which broods in public upon the metaphysics of student life, has lost its aim." With this thesis all serious students of education must agree.

However, when the author proceeds to state without qualification that "the search for a curriculum is the search for one that is worthy to be uniform and universal," many who are as deeply devoted to the cause of liberal education as he will refuse to follow him. Life demonstrates every day that the human mind may be disciplined and liberated in many and diverse ways. The aphorism adapted from Lucretius that "one man's meat is another man's poison" is as applicable to the process of education as to any other department of life.

Of those who follow the author through his advocacy of the "uniform and universal curriculum," many more will leave his company when they see the curriculum he proposes. He conceives the educational problem essentially as that of training the human mind. In the concrete this means "learning the arts of investigation, discovery, criticism, and communication." The best materials devised for this purpose in the whole history of education are the trivium and the quadrivium, or the seven liberal arts of grammar, dialectic, and rhetoric, arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy. But these liberal arts cannot be practiced in vacuo. Nor should they be practiced with second- or third-rate materials. The entire logic of the book therefore leads as straight as an arrow to the St. John's College curriculum—to the one hundred or more "great books" from Homer's "Iliad" to Veblen's "Projective Geometry".!

By this time it is obvious that we are almost back to our starting-point. The elective system in its extreme form was an evasion of professional responsibility. Recourse to the "great books," like the rigid classical curriculum of the eighteenth century, is a similar evasion. In the last analysis it belongs in the same category, though on a more pretentious plane, as the doctrine of following the pupil's interests or of counting and computing averages of human activities. For a limited number of students it would doubtless constitute a valuable program of studies. But if the plan were ever generally adopted, one can easily foresee the consequences. After its novelty had worn away, after the initial enthusiasm of the instructors had been dissipated, and after the sense of intellectual snobbery generated in students by its esoteric emphasis had been lost, it would degenerate into a lifeless routine. Comenius, the great Moravian educator whom Mr. Van Doren quotes frequently and with approval, once characterized schools of his time with a similar emphasis "as slaughter-houses of the mind . . . places where minds are fed on words."

The beginning of wisdom with regard to education is recognition of the fact that the problem of education is not to be separated from the problem of civilization. Only as we confront the latter can we succeed in confronting the former. And the problem of our civilization is certainly quite as much a moral as it is an intellectual problem.

GEORGE S. COUNTS

An Accuracy of Abundance

JOHN STEUART CURRY'S PAGEANT OF AMERICA. By Laurence E. Schmeckebier. American Artists Group. $5.

JOHN STEUART CURRY was born in Kansas in 1897 and is now Artist in Residence at the University of Wisconsin. His native state, the sunflower state, is geographically the center of America, and as noted by Reginald Marsh, the Hereford bull "Ajax"—completed as an oil in 1940—is "good beef" and is also John Curry. The bull has "the solid weight of sculpture," "the mass is insistent"; "as he grazes he leans," head sideward to tear the grass, his legs planted with a certain "deadly earnestness."

Mr. Curry's factual understanding of animals is daringly honest; as portrayed in the "hip slouch" of a tired horse, the sitting crouch of a frightened horse, in "The Stallion" "as he prances forth from the runway into the arena." Curry has always had an admiration for hogs, we are told, and this admiration has a counterpart in his respect for elephants. "With an elephant's as with a pig's eyes," he says, "you don't see the eye at first," "then suddenly you become conscious of its gleaming presence in the shadow of the ear."

Animals are eternity not less than subjects of a different kind; yet Mr. Curry's symbolic demands for national repentance should in themselves be enough to make him glad to have been born. "The trembling terror of the fugitive," his feet prehensilely flattened like bark to the tree; John Brown towering above "free-soil and pro-slavery forces," "a man who, when the nation was stagnating and threatening to disintegrate, pointed the way to renewed strength"—there with a vengeance, we have "the shock of vital subject matter." We have it also in the drawing "Corn Stalks," in which the plant's hard-veined, stiffly fluting ribbons seem a portrait of Mr. Curry's statement, "My whole life was made up of sensations. I used to go out in the garden and pull tomato vines to pieces so that I could smell them."

His biographer calls him "a factual romanticist"—poetry being fact plus imagination, or as Wallace Stevens puts it, "an accuracy of abundance." The brown thrasher fronting the sun from the well-furnished osage-orange bough is the farm's Magnificat. "Flora" is both a person and spring; "Chris L. Christensen" is a friend to art and the genius of agricultural research. "Love Is Like a Bird"—like "two lovers swinging through the air in the dove-shaped gondola of a rickety Ferris Wheel"; love has a "stocky cylindrical form" with sow's ears, biting at a snake in defense of hapless young; love is like a coffin in "The Return of Private Davis." One does not envy Mr. Curry the life he has led, but one envies him the heart for such a life, his patience with fakes, failures, and victims; his courage, reverence, compassion, humility, his will to storm the stars. Struggle has been his release—exteriorized in man's conflict with emotion (the "religious" subjects), with the "elements" (tornado and flood scenes), with "beasts," and with man ("battle scenes and athletic contests").

Artist in Residence has a pleasing sound; this one, however, has been and in feeling is a farmer, to whom as to the seaman weather is more than weather; it is life and death. And besides the twister, the flood, lightning, and erosion, there are the plagues—"the parched earth," the "dust storm," "the blazing sun" before which "floats the cloud of hoppers." Mr. Curry feels that painting should be true to "the still small voice" of "birth, training, environment, and faith." He has worked to achieve "solid form, controlled movement, and clear space," the subject "so organized that it fits into a design that gives it authority"; as where a predominating form arranges the lesser mass—the awning of the merry-go-round, for example, in the crowd at the "State Fair." There are moments when the needful technique ceases to operate: when the paint has a worked-with look ("The Light of the World"), or the line strays ("Performing Tiger"). No one, however, could be more conscious than John Curry of what he regards as his "seemingly insurmountable shortcomings." He is indefatigable like the badger, and Paris for him was not a luxury but a place in which to learn to draw; when he felt that he could achieve better results by using oil with tempera, he changed to that method; his working note, "Wrinkles go at right angles to muscles," savors of mastery, nor is it pulling the heavens down about his ears to say that in his "Stallion" the white of the eye, the white bobbins, and white underglaze conduce to a Piero della Francesca clear splendor of actuality. But he has said in words as with pigment, "Great art is within you," "There is no borrowed coat of perfect fit"; and Professor Schmeckebier's generous diminishings of the immortal great to advantage him result in automatic resistance. "Ruben's" for "Rubens's," "pig's" for "pigs'," and faulty indexing might be charged to bad proofreading. As writing, however, the pull of the meaning in one direction is against the pull of the phrase in another, the unnecessary word blurs what would have been clearer without it, and even supposing

Professor Schmeckebier to be foreign, his wording throughout the book is dangerously inexact.

"Kansas," Mr. Jewell says, "has found her Homer"; but Mr. Curry is modest. Jealousy and animosity are not in him. He thinks of painting as something that can be enjoyed "here and now by you and you." He feels that America's intensity need not always be a "tragic prelude." He thinks of the artist as a self-devoted servant, not a hireling. Surely, as one who would be "more completely than ever a servant of the people," he has found freedom. MARIANNE MOORE

The Perpetual Debate

MAJORITY RULE AND MINORITY RIGHTS. By Henry Steele Commager. Oxford University Press. $1.50.

ONE of the perennial issues in political philosophy is the relation between the power of the majority and the rights of the minority. Treated as a purely theoretical problem it is a special case of the relation between political authority and moral legitimacy. But in the thick of social struggles it has never been considered as a purely theoretical problem. Depending upon the interests involved, majorities have been cried up or down. Spokesmen for the democratic movement in the past have counterposed the rights of the majority to the tyranny of the minority. Since minorities have also been tyrannical toward other minorities, democratic majorities, fighting against clerical and feudal minorities, have insisted upon constitutional safeguards for all individuals.

Today we can observe an ideological pendular swing in the other direction. Many democrats and liberals are asking: What is to protect minorities from the tyranny of the majority, particularly in a collectivist state? Instead of answering, "A more enlightened majority," some say the wisdom of a minority, others the sacredness of natural law, and still others judicial protection through the power of courts to nullify legislation abridging personal rights.

Mr. Commager's book is an eloquent, forthright, and cogent appeal for the unqualified acceptance of the majority principle as expressed through the democratic process. It is thoroughly Jeffersonian in spirit and meets squarely, although a little too briefly, all the arguments that may be raised against the position on the political and historical level. Both its dedication and its subject matter suggest that its subtitle might very well be "The Vindication of Felix Frankfurter." Justice Frankfurter has been very severely criticized by liberals for his opinion in the Gobitis case. According to Mr. Commager, it is Frankfurter's liberal critics who are deficient in understanding the character of the democratic faith, whereas Frankfurter himself, in upholding the authority of legislative majorities, is continuing the tradition of Jefferson and Lincoln.

The nub of Commager's contention is that if the majority cannot be trusted to defend individual rights, neither can the minority. If and when the majority errs, it is better that its mistakes be set right by the unimpeded educational processes of democracy than corrected by the fiats of judicial nullification. In the words of Felix Frankfurter, "Where all the effective means of inducing political changes are left free from interference, education in the abandonment of foolish legislation is itself a training in liberty." Commager is more consistent than Frankfurter in realizing that ultimately this line of thought calls into question the very existence of the Supreme Court as an agency of legislative nullification.

The issue is of such primary importance that it deserves to be scrutinized more closely and disentangled from a number of other issues which are usually involved with it. First, it is not the bare fact of a majority which is significant but a majority reached through democratic process. This process is characterized by a whole set of conditions, too numerous to list here, but they explain why a majority vote has no legitimacy in the eyes of a democrat if it is cast under the shadow of bayonets, or when opposition is absent. Second, this does not entail a belief that a democratic majority is always right, as so many critics charge. The reasonableness of the democratic process does not lie in any specific piece of legislation but in the rationale of the method by which majority decisions are made. The democratic faith is that men are sufficiently reasonable to discover, in the face of evidence and the give and take of free discussion, a better way of solving their common problems than through anarchy or despotism, which Lincoln properly regarded as the only alternatives to democratic majority rule. Part of the faith in the democratic process is that errors may be corrected by more of the same process, only better. Finally, although it is compatible with, it by no means logically requires, a belief in the objectivity of moral standards, the conception of natural law or of divine law with which discussions of democracy are often confused. From the assumption of the existence of God no one can logically affirm or deny that He speaks through the voice of the democratic majority or the voice of the clerics. Natural rights which are not taken as absolute even by those who believe they are inalienable must be interpreted in respect to their meaning and limits of application. It is not clear that a democratic majority is less reliable in interpreting them than a court dignitary.

After all, there are three possible courses open to anyone who believes that a democratic majority is guilty of what De Tocqueville called "legitimate tyranny and holy injustice." He may obey a bad law on the ground that such obedience is a lesser evil than the possible consequence of bringing all law into disrespect by violating the bad law. He may refuse to obey the will of the democratic majority but accept punishment willingly, in fact, insist upon it, while seeking to remove or revise the law by democratic process. Or he may appeal to heaven or to conscience, secede or revolt. But in the last case, even if he believes himself justified, he cannot honestly call himself a democrat.

Although these general considerations are pertinent to an understanding of majority rule in a democracy, it is of course true that historical conflicts between majorities and minorities may involve interests some of which will not submit to the arbitrament of the democratic process. The goal and method of a democratic program, among other things, should aim at introducing such institutional changes that those who lose in the process of democratic struggle may still be able to lead lives of usefulness and dignity. In time, then, loyalty to the democratic method of reaching decisions may take priority over loyalties to any one of the things we hope to win by it.

CALLING THE BLUFF OF NAZI INVINCIBILITY

BLITZKRIEG AND BLUFF

By Major Erwin Lessner

The author, an international strategist who, in 1939, predicted the fate of the Maginot Line, our invasion of Italy, other developments since borne out by events, now takes you behind the headlines of today . . . and tomorrow! Blasting the legend of Nazi invincibility, he reveals how and why Hitler's horde is coming apart at the joints. He knows whereof he speaks because he was on hand when much of the Nazi bluff was still working.

MUSIC

KURT ATTERBERG'S Symphony No. 6, which Toscanini performed at his fourth N. B. C. Symphony broadcast, struck me as a work which would be getting quite a few performances these days if Sweden were a combatant instead of a neutral in the war (it is, of course, right for huge, powerful Russia to make token payments of friendship to Nazi Germany when other nations are fighting against Germany; but for little Sweden to do anything like that after Nazi Germany has knifed Russia into the war—that is villainous and forfeits Swedish music's claim to the interest of our musical public). I was struck, that is, by its resemblances to the music of Shostakovitch: the music is that of another facile mind with nothing real of its own to say but with a slick technique which serves it fluently as it hops from one thing, one style, one trick to another—now flowing lyricism like Shostakovitch's, now this lyricism harmonically distorted like Shostakovitch's, now a harmonically distorted grimace like Shostakovitch's, now a stroke of smart-Alec humor like Shostakovitch's, and even battle music in the first movement, which is a sort of small-scale version of the first movement of Shostakovitch's "Leningrad" Symphony. In its entirety Atterberg's Symphony No. 6 is on a smaller scale and less solemnly pretentious than any of Shostakovitch's, including the First, which it resembles most; but that would make it the proper expression of the suffering and heroism and ultimate triumph of a smaller nation, if Sweden were in the war; and as, say, the "Malmö" Symphony it would get a smaller but still a considerable number of performances which it is not likely to get as merely the Symphony No. 6.

Atterberg wrote his symphony in 1927; and it is quite likely that he had not heard Shostakovitch's First Symphony, which had been written in 1925. I am inclined to believe that the resemblances resulted, rather, from the fact that each composer was acquainted with the music of western Europe. And whereas you would expect the distortions and grimaces of this product of a decaying capitalist civilization to appear in the music of a composer in capitalist Sweden, you would not expect to find them in the music of a composer in a young socialist state; and you would also expect at least some of the music critics and the general public in this socialist state to be aware of this and to speak of it. True, Shostakovitch was rebuked for his "formalism" in 1936; but the meaninglessness of criticism as practiced in Russia was demonstrated when—Shostakovitch having completed the appropriate retirement for "inner self-criticism"—the same old distortions and grimaces, with a few brassy concluding affirmations tacked on, were praised as evidence of his having embarked on the new and right course of "socialist realism."

I have been given an explanation of WQXR's procedure in broadcasting the living performances of the New Friends of Music concerts in the normal way, and broadcasting only recorded performances of the works on Frequency Modulation. When a concert is broadcast the union very properly requires that the performers be paid an additional fee, which varies with the transmitting power of the station. If the concert is broadcast also on FM another fee must be paid to the performers; however, for FM the union prescribes one fee regardless of the transmitting power of the station; and WQXR considers the fee too great for the size of its FM audience.

Letters to the Editors

The Farmer and the Plow

Dear Sirs: Clarence Armstrong no doubt was right when he said in your issue of November 13 that the editors of The Nation are not farmers or they would not have published Mr. Lord's review of "Plowman's Folly." Had they been farmers they would have had their eyes closed to any improvement; and I suspect that Mr. Armstrong—if he is a farmer—is one of those who has eyes but sees not. It was probably due to the fact that the editors are independent and forward-thinking people and not tied to the traditions of the past that they saw in it something that is going to receive considerable attention in the future.

The vastly increased demands that the people of this country and the people of other countries are going to make upon food and other products of our farms is going to bring to a close our system of soil squandering. Otherwise our farms will be taken over by more capable hands. We will have to do what Mr. Armstrong says is impossible—we will have to learn how to eat our cake and have it. Under proper tillage land should become more productive every year it is farmed. And this without the addition of much foreign matter in the way of commercial fertilizer. Nature has provided us with the raw material, and it is up to us to learn how to use it.

Contrary to Mr. Armstrong, most thinking farmers are conscious of the limitations of the plow. But their attitude has been that since there is nothing better in sight there isn't anything that they can do about it. I remember my father years ago referring to the old horse-drawn plow as an imperfect implement but one that we would have to put up with until something better was invented. After tractor-drawn plows came into use he remarked that the motive power had been vastly improved but that the plow itself was as unsatisfactory as before. He had hoped that with the increased power a better system of turning up the soil would go with it.

Without going into details I will enumerate only two of his objections: (1) it increased the dangers of erosion; (2) it turned the organic matter on the surface down as a blanket at the bottom of the furrow. This blanket was undesirable, for (a) it interfered with the natural flow of soil water upward in dry weather; (b) it caused a temporary "taking up" or "locking" of a considerable part of the available nitrogen in this blanket.

"One of the chief objects of tillage is the deep and thorough incorporation of organic matter in the soil" (L. H. Bailey, p. 83, Vol. I, "Cyclopedia of American Agriculture"). The plow fails to do this thorough mixing. Organic matter thoroughly mixed improves the texture of the soil, assists in the flow of soil water, and does not make an undue claim upon the available nitrogen.

What is needed is an implement that will not only loosen up the soil but will distribute the organic matter evenly throughout the tilled surface and not leave the surface too much exposed. The disk harrow has been proposed as such an implement, but it has not received the trial it deserves. Nor are there proper types on the market. This is probably due to the fact that the average American farmer has been interested in getting all he can out of the soil today without a thought of tomorrow and, as Mr. Lord says, farms himself out of a farm in fifty years.

That Coal Settlement

Dear Sirs: In commenting on the coal-mine settlement in the issue of November 13 you end with the somewhat alarming note: "The most serious cause for apprehension in connection with the settlement lies in the fact that it will undoubtedly strengthen Lewis's prestige not only within the United Mine Workers but in the labor movement as a whole."

The coal settlement is an accomplishment! And in the future, when passions have died down and tempers have cooled, the true picture of the significance and importance of the controversy will be realized and made clear—even to those who were most bitter and determined to prevent an agreement.

As for Lewis's leadership, it is for workers to appraise that, not for interests, groups, or individuals who have posed in various lights and instances as "friends" of labor. Real unionism calls for genuine leadership—"leaders who have their eyes on labor's ball and are not always looking to the sidelines for applause from politicians, professors, social workers, and all that fringe of parasites who have tried to hang on to the labor movement to help their personal or political careers."

Lewis's niche in the labor movement already is established; your files can attest to that. And workers can, and do, remember and distinguish.

Army Education

Dear Sirs: Reinhold Niebuhr's article on army education in England was excellent. Recently we took matters into our own hands at this American camp. We were unable to get our Special Service officer to do anything about discussion groups. The Red Cross opened a club here not long ago. The girl in charge called me in and asked me to start a discussion group. We got in touch with Frederick Kuh, who came down to inaugurate the series. We hoped for fifty. Only a hundred could be seated in the crowded room and fifty more were turned away.

Kuh talked on Post-War Germany. He did a fine job and was agreeably surprised at the caliber of the questions. So many fellows are starved for an opportunity to get some information on day-to-day political maneuverings as well as the plans shaping up for the post-war world. We have arranged for Harold Laski, Kingsley Martin, Ed Murrow, and Colonel Walter Eliot to come to subsequent forums. I believe there is a growing interest among the fellows in things political. I know my Nations, PM, New Statesman, Tribunes, etc. get an ever-widening circulation.

The education pamphlets prepared by the army rest quietly on the desks of the various adjutants at this field. I understand the program sponsored by Agar is still not compulsory in the Air Corps.

There is still very, very much to be done in the way of army education. F. D. R. may pay a high price because he failed to inspire his soldiers with the Four Freedoms. They could have been inspired and educated so that on their return they would have demanded fulfilment of the various promises to the world and to themselves. Instead, most of the boys in England, for instance, will return hating the English and anxious for the kind of world described in the Nash-Kelvinator ads.

It is not correct to say that one can expect no more from the soldiers than from the civilians at home. Living under special conditions—with plenty of spare time and nearer the actual war—we could have been taught many things about the world as it is today and as it must be tomorrow if we or our kids are not to go to war soon again. It's when men are complaining—as they all inevitably do—about army life that they are ready to hear about ways and means of creating a world of full production in which war will not reoccur.

I am afraid the opportunity has been lost to do a mass job, but it is never too late to give the interested individuals an opportunity for further development.

The Shape of Things

NOT SINCE RECONSTRUCTION DAYS HAVE sectional feelings run so high in the halls of Congress—and never, we believe, have they been so strictly spurious. When Senator Guffey denounced the "unholy alliance" between certain Southern Democrats and certain Republicans to kill the Green-Lucas soldier-vote bill, he touched off an explosion out of all proportion to the dynamite involved. After all, Southerners have many times in the past teamed up with Republicans, as they have every right to do, and the charge has never before sent them bellowing in defense of their honor, as when Senator Bailey, "the poet's eye in a fine frenzy rolling," swore last week that "by the eternal gods, there are men in the South, and women, too, who will not permit men in control of our party to betray or to insult us in the house of our fathers." The hard fact is that the Southern gentlemen in question—and as I. F. Stone points out elsewhere in these pages, the Southern contingent in Congress is far from unanimous on the subject—did a dirty day's work when they voted to leave the balloting of the armed forces to the states. It can't be done that way, and the Senators know it. Their bluster and hollow oratory, their threats to withdraw from the party and forgo the patronage which they have enjoyed beyond their due, are childish attempts to becloud the issue. The House has not yet accepted the craven measure of the Senate. We hope that from every city and village in this country messages pour in on its members conveying the simple conviction that the right of our men on the battlefield to vote is paramount to the poll tax, paramount to political considerations, and paramount to a lawyer's narrow reading of the Constitution.

THE WPB PRODUCTION SCHEDULES FOR 1944 as outlined to the National Association of Manufacturers by Charles E. Wilson must have come as quite a shock to those who have been anticipating an early return to business as usual. Mr. Wilson declared that the war in Europe will tax both our capacity for sacrifice and our capacity for industrial production "beyond anything we have experienced so far," and added that "foolish optimism would only play into the hands of Japanese strategists." He pointed out, however, that the program for 1944 would be more complicated and difficult for the public to understand because some industries, such as shipbuilding and aircraft manufacture, will be called on for a supreme effort at a time when others are being reconverted for essential civilian production. Aircraft tonnage for 1944, for example, is expected to increase nearly 40 per cent above the present levels, while output of ordnance, signal equipment for the ground army, and small arms ammunition is to be drastically reduced. Mr. Wilson's final warning to the N. A. M. against a "right-wing reaction" that would "imperil the entire structure of American life" and play into the hands of the enemy deserved far more emphasis in the press than it obtained.

THE OFFICIAL TURKISH STATEMENT ON THE Cairo conference by Foreign Minister Menemencioglu has thrown cold water on the assumption that Turkey was ready for immediate entrance into the war on the Allied side. While the tone of the statement left no doubt that the conference between President Inonu and the Allied leaders was extremely cordial, it clearly implied that Turkey was unprepared to take the risks of war under present conditions. Whether arrangements were made for the leasing of Turkish bases or other assistance short of war is, of course, another matter, and one about which the Germans are anxiously fishing for information. It may be assumed that Roosevelt and Churchill did not make the journey to Cairo merely for the purpose of acquainting President Inonu with Allied plans. But there are so many ways in which Turkey can be of help to the Allies that the Germans are left guessing as to what actually went on. The first tangible results of the talks may be seen in the sudden panic in Bulgaria, where pro-Russian and pro-British elements appear to have created a major crisis over the question of continued Bulgarian assistance to the Axis. Although the presence of German troops makes Bulgaria's withdrawal from the war unlikely, particularly in view of Italy's experience, it is not inconceivable that both Turkey and Bulgaria might swing into the Allied camp in the event of a major Balkan invasion.

THE NEW PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT SET up in Yugoslavia presents the Allies with an uncomfortable dilemma. So far they have tried, hopefully, to pretend it didn't exist, but this form of primitive magic cannot be expected to work long. The cabinet established under the presidency of the distinguished liberal, Dr. Ivan Ribar, is backed by Tito's Partisan army. And the Partisans, as both the State Department and the Foreign Office acknowledge, are now receiving more assistance from the Allied commands than is the official army of General Mihailovich. Also, the new Provisional Government is on the soil of Yugoslavia, while the Royal Government is in Cairo—a long way from home. When the Allied armies land in force on the western shores of the Adriatic, they will find the new government functioning on the spot and will be forced to deal with it or with none at all. It is, in fact, difficult to believe that Dr. Ribar's cabinet was created without the knowledge and consent—or something more—of the Allied officers now on the staff of Marshal Tito. For once military expediency coincided with the will of the people and outweighed the dictates of formal diplomacy. So the diplomats will have to get out of an uncomfortable situation as best they can. Their probable course was indicated by Secretary Hull when he said that the policy of the Allies is to aid any group effectively fighting the Germans and that "internal political questions" could wait until later. The practical objection to this policy is obvious. Too many guns, too much ammunition supplied to Mihailovich are used against the Partisans, not the Germans. This serves to prolong the civil war and reduce the strength of Tito's army—which is fighting the Germans. The Allies may for the moment continue to recognize King Peter, but they cannot afford to send military supplies to his fascist Minister of War.

GENERAL MACARTHUR'S CONFERENCE WITH Lord Louis Mountbatten indicates that for the first time in the war all sectors of the Pacific front are being closely coordinated for early offensive action. As a result of the Cairo conference Chiang Kai-shek has agreed that the Chinese troops now in Burma shall be directly under Mountbatten's command. In the South Seas the Australian troops under General MacArthur and the American sea and ground forces under Admiral Halsey seem to be working closely together in a major drive aimed at Rabaul. The intensification of air activity over the Marshalls and Nauru suggests that the land offensives from the west and south are being carefully coordinated with a major naval push from the east. Tokyo is reported also to fear an air attack from Chinese bases. While it is still too early to say which drives are major and which diversionary, the mounting strength of American sea power in the mid-Pacific strongly suggests that the naval drive is the one that most bears watching. The direct route across the Pacific not only is the shortest but it involves the fewest obstacles. And it has the advantage of placing tremendous pressure on the Japanese navy to come out and fight.

IF READER'S DIGEST IS ON THE HUNT FOR A lively piece, packed with information and that warm human interest which is the hallmark of the Digest article, we commend to its editors the speech by Senator Guffey as set forth in the Congressional Record for December 7. The speech is designed to convey the tender sympathy which Guffey feels for a Senatorial colleague because of "the unfair and humiliating position in which an American periodical" has placed him. The victimized Senator, Butler of Nebraska, made a sixty-day tour of Latin America, Guffey says, under the auspices of this periodical and accompanied by one of its research men. While on tour the Senator faithfully recorded many acute and unimpeachable observations, such as "Mexico is a land of beautiful mountains, colors, contrasts, and resources"; in Honduras "banana plants grow to a height of twenty feet"; Chile is "long and narrow"; and Colombia "is full of mountains." In the meantime the research man was compiling monumental inaccuracies designed, says Guffey, to damn this country's Good Neighbor policy and discredit the Administration. The research man told Butler, for instance, that we have given Latin America six billion dollars as a Good Neighbor handout. What he neglected to point out, Senator Guffey contends, is that this figure includes "the operating cost of running the Panama Canal, our annual purchases of sugar from Cuba, and the military payrolls of our armed forces stationed in various parts of Latin America." This welter of misinformation, Guffey charges, was thrown together by a talented rewrite man on the periodical's staff, some for use in the magazine and some for a Blue Network address prepared for Mr. Butler, an "innocent conduit for unconscionable lies." On second thought, we withdraw as impractical the suggestion with which we started this paragraph. Reader's Digest happens to be the periodical involved, and what if several million readers were to feel that Guffey makes out a strong case?

THANKS TO GOVERNOR SALTONSTALL'S determination, the people of Boston can look forward to an end of the anti-Semitic hoodlumism which has recently given the city an ugly name. Against the pressure of a highly organized campaign, in which the American Federation of Labor incidentally disgraced itself, the Governor has replaced Police Commissioner Joseph F. Timilty with Colonel Thomas F. Sullivan, a man who has served his community with competence and integrity for more than twenty-five years. A Catholic and a Democrat, Colonel Sullivan commands the respect alike of Back Bay Republicans, Boston liberal circles, and machine politicians. He has pledged the full facilities of the police department in a drive to wipe out racial violence and has called on citizens to report clashes resulting from bigotry. Much as we wish him well, we cannot help feeling that the new Commissioner has more of a job ahead of him than he appears to realize. According to PM, he has already gone on record to the effect that anti-Jewish violence in Boston is largely "kid-stuff" and has declared his intention "to arrest the defamation of the most patriotic city in the U. S. A." If the Commissioner lives up to his pledges—as we have reason to believe he will—and if he acts on the understanding that this sort of "kid-stuff" has its origins in the stream of printed poison now trickling out of shady printing plants throughout the country, he need give no further thought to the "defamation" of Boston. On the contrary, other police chiefs will be sent there for lessons in civic decency.

GOVERNOR DEWEY HAS BEEN PETITIONED BY the New York City C. I. O. Industrial Council and other groups to pardon Morris U. Schappes, who was convicted of perjury as a result of his testimony before the Rapp-Coudert legislative committee three years ago. Despite pressure from that witch-hunting committee, Mr. Schappes did not deny that he was a member of the Communist Party; he did declare that he knew only three other party members on the City College teaching staff. Since this testimony was at variance with that of three other committee witnesses, he was convicted of perjury. The Supreme Court has refused to pass on his appeal, thus closing the door to further legal action. Governor Dewey is not being asked to set aside the conviction but to issue a pardon on the ground that the punishment he has received already is sufficient in view of the indications that the harsh sentence imposed upon him was punishment for being a Communist rather than for the crime of which he was convicted. We do not condone perjury, but we believe that there is serious doubt as to the legality of the whole Rapp-Coudert proceedings and considerable question whether Mr. Schappes received the kind of impartial trial which the Constitution guarantees to everyone, Communist or not. As in the Browder case, which it parallels in many ways, these doubts would seem to justify executive clemency.

LAST WEEK WE REPORTED THE FORMATION in Mexico City of a Spanish Republican committee, the Junta Española de Liberación, under the leadership of Indalecio Prieto. Since then the junta has appointed representatives in London, New York, Buenos Aires, and other capitals, and is obviously hoping to establish itself as a provisional government of the future Spain. We expressed doubt about the validity of its claims as a representative body, pointing out the absence of important political groups among the exiles. In order to get a more exact understanding of the committee's composition, however, we asked for a report from one of the most balanced Spanish leaders in Mexico, Antonio Velao, Minister of Public Works in the Negrín government and a member of the Republican Party. Señor Velao has sent us the following cable:

> The pact concluded between Prieto and Martínez Barrio [former president of the Cortes] has grouped around them the forces they previously controlled without adding anything new. Outside the pact remain all elements representing the proletariat and all those supporting the [Negrín] government. The only novelty has been the apparent reconciliation between Martínez Barrio and Prieto. [These two leaders during the past year have been in bitter opposition.] As I predicted they are trying to present themselves as moderates who have no contact with the left.

Smuts Thinks Aloud

STATESMEN are often criticized for their tendency to hide their real thoughts, but when one of them starts thinking out loud he is apt to find himself dodging brickbats rather than bouquets. This has been the experience of Field Marshal Jan Smuts, the elder statesman of the British Commonwealth, who in a recent extemporaneous speech propounded a number of ideas which, as he admitted, were "of an explosive nature." The reactions were sharp and various. His references to France were denounced as insulting in Fighting French quarters; his lack of reference to China was interpreted by many commentators as a snub to that great country. The British government found it expedient to deny that he had expressed its views.

There is no doubt that some of the Marshal's phrases were tactless and many of his propositions extremely debatable. Nevertheless, we regard his talk as a useful stimulant to long-range political thinking. Like many other people, he is troubled by the problem of power in the post-war world. The League of Nations, he feels, broke down because its organization emphasized universalism and equality and gave insufficient scope to leadership. After this war he believes that only three great powers—Britain, the United States, and Russia—will be left, and he suggests that they "must retain the leadership . . . and be responsible, in the first instance, for the maintenance of security and for the preservation of world peace; and this primary responsibility will not be affected by any duties resting on the rest of the United Nations."

Believing, as he does, that this trinity of nations holds the key to the future, Smuts is concerned about the coming distribution of power among them. On the one hand, Russia will have risen, meteor-like, to "a position which no country has ever occupied in the history of Europe," while its strength will be magnified by the disappearance of Japan in the Far East. On the other, aloof from Europe yet unable to disinterest itself in Europe's fate, will be the United States, with its massive industrial development and enormous resources. In between will be Britain, rich in prestige but materially poor. For as Smuts truly asserts, Britain will have "nothing left in the till" when the war ends. It has liquidated the major part of the foreign assets which played so important a part in its economy and has gone into debt all round the globe. In its European aspects particularly and vis-à-vis Russia, Britain will be comparatively weak.

Smuts does not advocate any form of Anglo-American union as a remedy for this situation, suggesting, and we think rightly, that such a combination would "stir up international strife." He favors instead the maintenance of the Anglo-American-Russian triumvirate with the strengthening of its weakest link. To achieve this end his tentative suggestion is an invitation to the smaller democracies of Europe—he does not specify more exactly—to take advantage of the elasticity of the British Commonwealth system and become associated with Britain. These countries, he points out, have learned that neutrality is dead and that standing by themselves they are bound to fall under the domination of some great power. If they join the Commonwealth, however, they can retain all the attributes of sovereignty while securing the advantages of mutual defense.

The idea of some kind of political association between Britain and Western Europe is not new. We need only recall Churchill's offer of union to France in June, 1940. That proposal was made in an effort to rally the French in their darkest hour, but it remains a plan which after the war could be backed with very solid political and economic arguments. Together the two countries, with their colonial possessions, would form a very powerful unit, especially if other Western European states became associated with them.

At the present time the outlook for closer relations between Britain and France does not appear very propitious. There is a certain coolness between them to which Smuts has added by his declaration that France will not for a long time, if ever, resume the status of a great power. Goaded by the many slights which have been put on them by their Allies, the Fighting French are in no mood to react enthusiastically to this "realistic" appraisal of the future prospects of France.

Nor is this the only obstacle to the Smuts plan. A major question that arises is how such a branching out of the British Commonwealth would be viewed in Washington and Moscow. The chances are that both would strongly disapprove, though for different reasons. Yet neither this country nor Russia can well afford to see Britain unduly weakened, for that would divide the world into American and Russian spheres of influence—a process which would surely result in a new and more colossal conflict.

Republicans All

AFTER eleven carefree years as carping spectators, Republican leaders are suddenly face to face with the startling possibility that they may ride into power in 1944. Within six months they must work up enough of an idea of what they stand for to present some sort of program to a waiting electorate; and in little more than a year from now, should they win at the polls (a purely hypothetical proposition and not a prophecy on our part), they will actually have to be responsible for preventing inflation, for demobilizing the armed services without producing disastrous unemployment, for achieving the turnover from a war economy to a peace economy without vast dislocations, and perhaps even framing a peace that will not mock the gigantic sacrifices made in the war. Solving problems of this magnitude—and heaven help a victorious Republican Party, as well as the rest of us, if they are not solved—will be a very different kind of occupation from the irresponsible nose-thumbing that has passed for Republican statesmanship in Congress.

These dizzying thoughts seem to have engendered something close to panic in the higher reaches of the party. Generals are bobbing up on all sides, each hoping to take the lead in the creation of official policy and at the same time avoid specific commitments that might alienate special-interest groups. Thomas W. Lamont has been urging Wendell Willkie to turn his attention to a constructive domestic program now that (like Dorothy Parker's actress who ran the gamut of emotions from A to B) he has led the party "from isolationism to Mackinac." As far as issues go, Mr. Willkie has been lying low since that achievement, but former Governor Landon is not so shy. Speaking with the authority of a man who swept Maine and Vermont in 1936, Landon told a group of Republican Senators, first, that adoption of similar declarations on foreign policy by the two major parties "would accelerate the danger of a drift toward one party in this country"; and, second, that Republican indorsement of the Moscow pact at this time would be "disastrous for the country."

Four days later Herbert Hoover explained to newspapermen that what Landon meant by these remarks was, first, that he was not at all opposed to the Moscow agreements, which Hoover himself approved; and, second, that, like Hoover again, he was not at all opposed to identical foreign-policy planks for the two parties but only wanted to wait and see what the Democrats had in mind on the subject. On the off-chance that Hoover's clarification might cause some confusion, Arthur Krock of the New York Times ventured to straighten things out. He explained that the Hoover interpretation coincided with what Landon had been saying in private conversation though not with what he had released to the press.

Completing the circle of confusion, Willkie then observed that he would abandon any effort to lead the Republicans in 1944 if Landon's views on the Moscow declaration really represented the thinking of the party. Obviously he doesn't believe they do, because he continues openly to seek the nomination, whereas Thomas E. Dewey, who is Landon's choice, is not even a candidate—officially. All of which should be considered in placing an estimate on Landon's conclusion that "in contrast to the hopeless split among the Democrats in every state, the Republican Party is united." There the matter—and Governor Landon—might well be allowed to rest.

Amateur Political War

IT IS true, as was said in these pages last week, that not even the incredible stupidity of the censorship could obscure the importance of the meetings at Cairo and Teheran. The talks between the leaders of the great powers fighting the Axis—so anxiously awaited, so long delayed—were an event too big and packed with meaning to be seriously affected by bungling attempts to control the news. But the bungling was serious just the same. It showed that the Allied governments, successful today in the military field, are dismally inefficient in both the strategy and the technique of political warfare.

Of course Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill are at a disadvantage in handling the apparatus of political war. The Axis governments, and those of Russia and China as well, can use the press as a firmly coordinated part of their propaganda machine. The heads of the British and American governments are limited by democratic concepts. In both countries the press and radio are relatively free. Within certain moderate boundaries they follow their own variegated notions of how the war should be reported and explained. They have accepted the need of censorship applied to actual information whose publication might help the enemy. Beyond that point they are willing to cooperate but not to take orders.

This being the case, the military and even the civilian authorities are tempted, too often, to keep the press and radio at a distance. Naturally, the results are deplorable, as Cairo and Teheran amply demonstrated. From the point of view of the war it would be better to have a coordinated press than a quarantined one. To cut off or cripple this vast apparatus of public information and instruction is, in political war, as fantastic as it would be to leave behind all means of transport in landing an army on hostile shores.

What the political leaders of the democracies must do, whether it seems to them a nuisance or not, is to trust their press and radio, to work with them, to build them—as free, volunteer corps—into the structure of the political war machine. Dr. Goebbels has little excuse for laughter these days; but he must have smiled to think that neither Elmer Davis nor Brendan Bracken was even permitted to attend the two great Allied conferences. From the very beginning of their collaboration the President and the Prime Minister have played the game of political warfare like gentlemen rather than professionals. They seem not to understand that the whole great enterprise to which they have committed the lives and resources of their countries will fail if the minds of the peoples of all countries are not won.

The New Secessionism

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, December 9

NOT all the Southern Democrats are "Cotton Ed" Smiths or Rankins, but Senator Guffey's charge that an "unholy alliance" of Southern Democrats and Republicans killed the soldiers'-vote bill had enough truth in it to sting, and the Smiths, Byrds, and Baileys are talking secession from the party. Their going would be good riddance, and their followers—if they ever screwed up the courage to sacrifice the federal patronage they now get—would be much fewer than they imagine.

It is not fair, however, to bring in a blanket indictment of Southerners based on the Congressional attack on the soldiers' vote, price subsidies, and the Farm Security program. A Southern Democrat, Worley of Texas, chairman of the Privileges and Elections Committee, was sponsor in the House of the soldiers'-vote bill which the "unholy alliance" defeated in the Senate. A Southern Democrat, Barkley, Administration leader in the Senate, spoke with much feeling and ability in support of that measure. Another Southerner, Russell of Georgia, chairman of the Senate appropriations subcommittee in charge of the Farm Security bill, has been putting up a strenuous fight for the FSA appropriations that were defeated in the House. Two Southerners, Bankhead of Alabama and Marvin Jones of Texas, fathered the Farm Tenant Act which the FSA administers. The Administration is depending on three Southerners—War Mobilization Director Byrnes, Economic Stabilization Director Vinson, and War Food Administrator Jones—in its fight against inflation. Their loyalty is unquestioned, and their weaknesses are, in fact, the obverse of their virtues, for their political value is found in the middle-of-the-road position which enables them to act as a link between the Administration and the Democratic right wing.

What we see in Congress in the fight against the soldiers' vote, price control, and Farm Security is not a Southern plot. It is a coalition of well-to-do farmers and reactionary industrialists anxious first to defeat Roosevelt and, secondly, to boost their war profits. Among them are some elements not only prepared but happy to do this at the expense of the war effort. Representatives of the Southern planter class, intrenched in positions of power through a combination of the poll tax at home and seniority in Washington, are in the vanguard. In the second rank, safely out of sight, are rich and powerful food-processing corporations, expert at mobilizing well-to-do farmers and small business men, and possessing a sinister political maturity, as shown by the role some of them played before the war in organizing and financing such proto-fascist groups as the Associated Farmers. I am sorry to add that this coalition is making skilful use of labor's grievances. The seventy-four-to-four vote in the Senate today for the Truman resolution to grant the railroad workers an eight-cents-an-hour increase is a victory labor will yet regret. For, like the Ickes deal with John L. Lewis, it makes it very difficult to hold the cost-of-living line elsewhere.

Walter Reuther of the Automobile Workers and Russell Smith of the National Farmers' Union effectively exposed the forces behind this coalition in their testimony yesterday before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. Reuther named the powerful processors working with the anti-New Dealers and the farm bloc against the price-control-subsidy program. Your home-town newspaper probably omitted the firms Reuther cited in his attack on the Food Industry War Committee under Clarence Francis. I report them here for your enlightenment: General Foods, Swift, California Packing, H. J. Heinz, National Biscuit, Pillsbury Flour, Borden's, and Grocery Manufacturers of America, Inc. Among them they control most of the famous brands on your breakfast and dinner tables. They are out, as Reuther proved from their own statements, to fix the wages they pay and the prices of the raw materials they buy but to allow "flexible ceilings" on their own products. And how will prices be controlled? "Competition and the innate honesty of the American business man," one of their spokesmen said, "will keep consumer prices from rising."

Allied with these processors, as always, are the Grange, the Farm Bureau, and the "kept" cooperatives of the farm belt. But these, as Smith showed, speak only for the well-to-do farmer. "The fundamental from which all discussion of farm prices must start," this Farmers' Union representative said, "is the relative unimportance of price rises to the majority of farmers. Two-thirds of the nation's farmers sell but 17 per cent of the commercially sold agricultural products. Thus, the one-third of farmers, those who are already in the best financial position, sell 83 per cent of farm products. . . . Those farmers most in need of better incomes receive only about seventeen cents out of every dollar of a farm-price rise." The other side of this picture is the extent to which the farmer, who last year spent 43 per cent of his income on family living expenses, is hurt by a general price increase. The small farmer, like the worker, needs a subsidy program which will ease pressure on marginal producers while holding the general cost-of-living line.

The darkest spot in this picture is at the same time its one hope. The combination of well-to-do farmer and reactionary business man finally showed its hand in defeating the Lucas-Green soldiers'-vote bill. The constitutional arguments against it are nonsense. A government that can conscript a man can arrange to let him cast a vote. (Daniel Webster in 1814 used the same arguments against conscription that are now advanced against the soldiers'-vote bill.) A government which can interfere with state debt and tax laws to protect soldiers can interfere with election laws to the extent needed to allow him to vote. Congress decided the constitutional issues a year ago when it passed the soldiers'-vote bill of 1942, waiving state registration and poll-tax provisions. But that bill was passed just before an election, and the Republicans were afraid to join hands with poll-tax Democrats against it. This year they feel strong enough to get away with the Eastland-Rankin substitute, which will have the effect of depriving most soldiers of the franchise. Their hope is that by disfranchising the soldier they can finally defeat the New Deal and so smash social reform in 1944 just as prohibition was put over in 1918. A phrase used by "Cotton Ed" Smith during the final debate Friday told more about their state of mind than pages of speeches on states' rights. Tunnell of Delaware explained that in his state—as in many others—there would be no session of the legislature in time to repair the absence of uniform federal arrangements for a soldier vote. Smith wanted to know why they couldn't have a special session "to provide an opportunity for the precious boys to vote." The sneer is revealing, and the one hope is that the "precious" boys and their families will be roused deeply enough to prevent passage of the Eastland-Rankin bill in the House, to force passage of the Lucas-Green soldiers'-vote bill, and to give the younger men in the armed forces a chance to express themselves at the next election. The fear seems to be that if given the vote the soldiers will cast it for the New Deal. I hope the fear is not unfounded.

Winston Churchill in War and Peace

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, November 30

NO CITIZEN of Great Britain with any love for his country is likely to underestimate the debt it owes to Mr. Churchill. He took over the command of its fortunes when they were at a lower ebb than at any other time since Austerlitz. Save for the support of the other members of the Commonwealth, for a year our people stood alone. After the collapse of France men stood waiting to see Britain surrender. On any showing—numbers, equipment, the power to take the initiative, skill in the art of war on land, preparation, organizing technique—the advantage was on the German side.

Labor welcomed Mr. Churchill as Premier, but for some time his accession to power aroused no enthusiasm among the cohorts of his own party; when he entered the House of Commons for a debate, the applause he received on the Tory benches was formal. Yet within a few months his energy and his courage had awakened among the people a spirit of resolution which no enemy could break. He brought a unity of heart to the nation, a determination to die rather than to surrender, which, as in the weeks of the Battle of Britain, made a Nazi victory unthinkable. To the outside world, the fate of Britain might seem to hang by a thread; to its own citizens, confidence in triumph was born in the hour when, beyond its shores, defeat seemed most inevitable.

That is Mr. Churchill's triumph, and it is no other man's. Admit, as he would be the first to admit, that our people, in the air and on the sea, in field and factory, achieved the impossible, it was still by reason of his consummate leadership that they achieved it. Disaster made no difference; and not since the grim days of Bonaparte had a Prime Minister so dread a tale of disasters to tell. Night after night our cities were relentlessly blitzed; day after day men and women, red-eyed with fatigue, staggered half dead to their work. There was in that year a spirit of courage and fellowship and unbreakable faith which may have been equaled in the historical record but has never been surpassed.

Mr. Churchill saw, little by little, the awakening of the world to what was at stake. He laid the foundations of that Anglo-American partnership which the treachery of Japan sealed at Pearl Harbor; he achieved on June 22, 1941, one of those supreme gestures which make man the master of his fate when, in his sonorous utterance, he wiped out at a stroke the long and miserable tale of Anglo-Soviet misunderstanding and atoned so amply for his errors of 1917-20. Persistence, faith, unremitting zeal—these he displayed in a measure that made us all forget his faults and remember only that, if we followed him, the doom of Hitler and Mussolini was not a dream for which we could ache but an event which we could fulfil.

I do not underestimate the debt we all owe to the Russian people and, not less, to the iron will of its inflexible leader. I measure with a humble gratitude the contribution, first in resources and then in men, of the United States, and the degree in which the foresight and magnanimity of their President made their mobilization both possible and effective. If anyone says that we have bought time with millions of Russian lives in one theater of war and with millions of Chinese lives in another, I respectfully assent. If I am asked to agree that without Stalin and Chiang Kai-shek, without Franklin Roosevelt, and, if I may so phrase it, without the spirit which has come to the common peoples from a tradition as old as Pericles—if I am asked to agree that without these Winston Churchill would have failed and Hitler and his gangsters would have bestridden a beaten London as they bestrode a beaten Paris, I assent at once. But I assent adding—and as an Englishman adding with pride—that he did not need to hear the call of their voices; rather, in a long and bitter campaign, it was Mr. Churchill who called upon them, in speeches that have become a part of the imperishable testament of British freedom, to take their stand by his side. It is his glory that he understood the challenge of the enemy, and did not shrink from the battle implied in that challenge, when others sought to pretend that they could discern in the savage nightmare of a gangster's barbarism the principles of a creative compromise. When the last word is said against Mr. Churchill, this can always be said in his behalf, that from 1933 there was never a moment when he was willing to betray by pretense what we all knew was a cause entitled to demand all that we have and are.

II

I say this of Mr. Churchill partly because I think it is his due and partly because it is the perspective in which any proportionate analysis of his position must be set. His greatness in these years has been in the fulness with which he has symbolized the resistance of the nation to those forces which sought to destroy not merely its independence but the very idea of freedom—the condition upon which that independence remains possible.

But it is important to remember that Mr. Churchill's greatness has a special context of its own. In essence he remains a Whig aristocrat of the eighteenth century. What little of liberalism there is in his composition is the aristocrat's compassion for the misery he sees before him, not an intellectual adaptation to a world in which he sees both the inevitability and the validity of change. Freedom, for him, is set in the background of a half-articulate assumption that his class has a permanent lien on power. That is why he has never understood the meaning of the Russian Revolution. That is why he was so tragically wrong in the Spanish civil war. That is why there were long years in which he wholly misconceived the nature of Italian Fascism. It is because Mr. Churchill is, at bottom, an eighteenth-century Whig that he has no intimate grasp of what is happening in India, that he so badly mishandled the general strike in 1926, that he can see the value of measures of social relief but not the necessity of measures of social transformation. The world he likes to dwell in is still the world of the panoplied magnificence of which we read in diaries like that of Greville. For him the soldier who wins a great battle—he is not the descendant of Marlborough for nothing—the orator who hears the music of Parliamentary cheers, the statesman who "shapes the whisper of the throne," each of these is the inner and ultimate source of historical change.

He has loyalty and magnanimity and imagination, all of them the aristocrat's virtues. So he keeps men in his service whose incapacity he himself suspects, much as a great lord keeps on the footman when he is past his work. So he salutes Stalin, because the man who fights on his side can be forgiven almost everything if he confronts the immediate danger with courage. So he can see, as a narrow, business man's mind like Mr. Chamberlain's could never see, that in danger is an exhilaration which takes ordinary men beyond themselves to a level of action where heroism becomes just part of the normal day's work. And he has generosity. For all his impatience and gusts of anger and reckless hostility to new ideas, he likes a man who stands up to him, and respects the critic who fights for his point of view. Like the aristocrat, too, he thinks in the rhetorical terms of drama, with a sense, always, at the back of his mind that the phrases he uses must be matter which, a century from now, the historian will find quotable. He cannot understand the man who shuns the conflicts of the market-place, the brooding, philosophic type who looks beyond the moment to grasp the causes of things.

History for him is the dramatic movement from peak to peak. It is a gorgeous pageantry, a spectacle in which the crowd cheers the great heroes and hisses the villains. The slow, patient accumulation of knowledge which issues, at long last, in the sweeping generalization means nothing to him until the great moment when the decisive conquest can be displayed, when the map of the hinterland announces that the geographer can stand, like Cortez, in proud mastery on the mountain summit he has climbed. He would have understood Alexander and Caesar, Drake and Chatham and Napoleon. To command men greatly, to be the big figure in the big play, this, for Mr. Churchill, is life enriched, life made complete and whole, life fulfilled.

III

In my own view, then, Mr. Churchill is one of the great anachronisms of our time. The war he is waging is not the war that history has staged. He fights Hitler as Marlborough fought Louis XIV, as Pitt fought Napoleon. The immense social forces which have gone to make this war are as outside his consciousness as the principles of the Russian Revolution are outside his understanding. He is not really interested in a post-war world in which the foundations are revised. Partly that is because, like the typical Whig aristocrat, he sees all politics in terms of people on his side of the House of Commons or on the other side; he is unaware of the impersonal forces of history. He can understand Mr. Bevin, but not trade unionism; Herbert Morrison, but not socialism; Lloyd George, but not liberalism. His insights are always concrete and not abstract.

His imagination is visual, and the thing which influences him is always the thing before his eyes. He can sympathize with all the earnestness of his generous nature with East Enders in London whom the blitz has rendered homeless; he cannot feel in the same way for unemployed miners in Wales or displaced shipwrights in Jarrow. He can put all his mind and heart into the things that interest him: the plan of a battle, for instance, or a bill of which he is going to take charge. But it is difficult to win his attention for something remote from his own sphere of action.

Like all the men of our time whose roots are in the Grand Whiggery of the eighteenth century, Mr. Churchill is an intense individualist. If it be said that in that period, between 1906 and 1914, when his fortunes were associated with the Liberal Party, he was one of the most ardent supporters of an "advanced" program, there are, I think, two answers. First, because he is a great adventurer, whatever Mr. Churchill does he is compelled to do intensely; since there had to be action in those years, he supported the call for action with all his strength. And, secondly, no one who examines the speeches of his Liberal period can fail to note in him then the son of Lord Randolph Churchill; their spirit is that of Tory democracy, which in its turn was the child of Disraeli and the Young England of the forties. The real Winston Churchill is imperialist, paternalist, in favor of a strong government which shelters the weak from the blasts of life. But he is not concerned to build a world in which the weak can stand by themselves. An equalitarian society has no interest for him. He would hate a world which found no room for the romantic exploits of the empire-builder. His temperament makes him transform every argument into a battle, and once he has engaged his forces, while he loves the game, he is desperately anxious for victory.

He deploys the forces of a Britain whose bargain with fate he conceives, in its large outlines, to have been finally made. Its magnificent past enthrals him so that he cannot go beyond it for his inspiration. Each of its institutions, each, indeed, of its possessions, is for him like some dear family heirloom with which he cannot bear to part. And he finds it difficult to admit as a colleague anyone who does not think in these terms. He can understand Cobbett, because in that stout old agitator was concealed an ardent Tory. But Shelley or William Morris, the Webbs or Bernard Shaw, these and their ideas breed in him at once a sense of profound mistrust. They can reject the past he cherished without a single sigh of regret; or like Mr. Shaw they can laugh at his idols without any emotion of sacrilege.

Mr. Churchill has not a speculative mind; with him a theory begets not interest but suspicion. His habits of thought have been formed in the House of Commons, where the men on the front benches argue either to keep power or to achieve it. Even his books are nothing so much as speeches; and his vast life of Marlborough cannot be judged unless it is regarded as a massive reply to a vote of censure. So that the future of Mr. Churchill turns above everything on the issue of whether the problems faced by Britain are soluble within the framework of its traditions. If they are, Mr. Churchill will end his career in a blaze of glory. If they are not, he may well come, like the Duke of Wellington after Waterloo, to seem like some splendid but obsolete survival of a vanished epoch. His best friends will wish that, as the war closes, he will retire to write a history which in interest would rival Thucydides; but I think those are more likely to prevail who urge upon him that the man who won the war must at least inaugurate the peace. He will not yearn to profit by his own solemn warning that a great war minister seldom succeeds in the epoch which seeks to consolidate his victory.

His weaknesses are monumental; no honorable opponent can fail to recognize that his virtues are monumental, too. He has always had courage; he has always seen the virtue of audacity where audacity was called for; he has always hated wrong where he could see that wrong had been inflicted. Throughout his life he has been a loyal friend and a generous foe. He has had imagination and pity in that grand manner to which he was born. He has always met danger without flinching, and the more dark the hour the more proudly he has faced its threats. He has loved life in every aspect that called for the soldier's virtues. He has known, as few men have known, how to evoke the best in those who served him. I do not think the future historian will grant him that supreme quality which makes perhaps half a dozen statesmen in the last four centuries the decisive architects of a new world. But I think he will say of Mr. Churchill that in one of the most splendid hours in the history of his country no man did more to safeguard its strength and maintain its dignity.

A Tax on Money Hoarding

BY GEORGE RICHMOND WALKER

THE idea of incentive taxation as a method of forestalling post-war unemployment is receiving attention in unexpected quarters. Proposed by economists such as Dahlberg, Hazelett, and Stuart Chase, it has been considered favorably by the president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, by the editors of Fortune, and by United States Senators, notably Senator O'Mahoney of Wyoming, who headed the Temporary National Economic Committee.

The purpose of incentive taxation is to encourage those who contribute to, and to penalize those who interfere with, the production and distribution of wealth. An essential feature of any program of incentive taxation would be a tax on funds retired from active business enterprise and held as idle money in a bank. The argument in favor of such a tax, given in a previous article,* may be summarized as follows:

A private-enterprise economy cannot survive unless it can maintain reasonably full employment. Industry, however, cannot provide jobs beyond its ability to sell the goods that its workers produce. The sales of industry depend upon consumer expenditure and capital expenditure. In so far as income is saved, consumer expenditure is reduced, and unless savings are promptly spent or invested, the sales of industry, and likewise employment, will necessarily decline. The power to employ labor is therefore derived, not from the ownership of plant and machinery, but from the ownership or control of funds available for investment. At present the power to employ is divorced from responsibility. Those who own or control investment funds may say in effect: "We will spend our money or not as we please. And we will invest if we anticipate a satisfactory profit for ourselves, and not otherwise. Any unemployment resulting from our refusal to spend or invest is not our concern."

In short, the profit motive alone cannot be expected to induce a flow of funds into industry sufficient to maintain full employment. The decade of the thirties proved that, and therefore an added incentive is necessary. This brings us to the question: Is it practical to tax idle money? How shall such a tax be devised and collected?

It is obvious, in the first place, that the tax should not apply to savings accounts, time deposits, or ordinary consumers' balances in commercial banks; it should apply to demand deposits and currency above a reasonable exemption. It should be easy to administer and difficult to evade. A tax on funds held by individuals might take the following form:

> 1. The end-of-the-month balances held by the banks as demand deposits for the account of individuals and personal holding companies shall be taxed, after deducting an exemption of $5,000, at the rate of 0.3 per cent per month. The exemption shall be allowed in one account only.
> 2. Uncashed travelers' checks and letters of credit, certified checks, and any other uncollected items debited to individual account shall be included with deposits when balances are determined for the purpose of this tax.
> 3. The tax shall be collected by the banks, debited to the respective accounts, and transmitted to the Treasury. The banks shall be paid for this service by the government.

These provisions are simple and practical. The amount of the exemption and the rate of the tax would of course have to be determined by Congress. A graduated tax, varying with the size of the bank balance, might be considered preferable to a flat tax.

A tax on currency should be assessed at the same time as the tax on demand deposits in order to prevent shifting and evasion, as follows:

> 4. Individuals and personal holding companies owning more than $1,000 in coin and currency of the United States on the last day of the month shall report within fifteen days to the Bureau of Internal Revenue the total amount of coin and currency owned on that day, wherever located. The amount so reported, less an exemption of $1,000, shall be taxed at the rate of 0.3 per cent per month.

There would be some, of course, who would not make honest reports of their cash holdings, just as there are some who fail to report all their income on their tax returns. But as one of the certain effects of a tax on money hoarding would be a rise in the price of securities and other assets, the motive for hoarding, which is usually a fear of declining values, would largely disappear. However, if it became apparent that considerable amounts of cash were unreported, the Treasury could be authorized to issue a new currency exchangeable for the old at par during a limited period and thereafter at a discount. There would be nothing unusual in issuing a new currency, for it was done several years ago when the size of paper money was reduced. The knowledge that a new currency might be issued would be likely to cause all but a few to make honest reports of their cash holdings.

* Tax Idle Savings! By George Richmond Walker. The Nation, November 6, 1943.

In order to prevent a shift from demand deposits to time deposits, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, together with the Federal Deposit Insurance Commission, should be given authority to fix the minimum rate of interest which banks may pay on time deposits. (The board and the FDIC already have authority to fix the maximum rate.) If a minimum rate were not fixed, banks might accept time deposits from their customers, paying only a nominal or even zero rate of interest, and thereby assist them in avoiding the tax on demand deposits. With a minimum rate in effect, banks would not accept time deposits unless they could earn something more than the minimum by expanding their loans and investments. The reason for not taxing time deposits is that they are not used, except in rare instances, as money, and should not therefore be regarded as part of our current money supply. The shifting of funds back and forth between demand and time deposits would be undesirable, aside from tax avoidance, because it would mean an alternating contraction and expansion of our money supply which would further complicate the problem of effective monetary control.

To prevent the purchase and sale of securities by individuals from and to banks over the date of assessment of the hoarding tax there should be an excise tax of 1 per cent on the sale of securities by individuals to banks if the securities have been held for less than forty days.

Currency and bank deposits in the hands of brokers and agents would be taxable to them, and they could pass on the tax to their principals. Loans by individuals to trusts and corporations, unless evidenced by a bona fide mortgage or a public issue of bonds, would require the prior approval of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Finally, there would have to be controls over the export of capital funds, but these we are likely to have in any case. With the foregoing provisions in effect, the hoarding tax would be difficult to evade. Nevertheless, some loopholes would probably be found, as in the case of the income tax, and these would have to be plugged as they appeared.

So much for the penalty on hoarding by individuals. How can we prevent the excessive accumulation of cash by trusts and corporations? The following is suggested:

> 1. The normal tax on corporations shall be at the rate of 50 per cent of their net taxable income less an exemption of $25,000.
> 2. Net taxable income shall be considered as net profits less dividends paid out, and less one-half the sums invested out of earnings during the year in plant and equipment and charged to capital account.

Allowing the deduction of dividends paid out, in determining taxable income, would mean a drastic cut in taxes on corporations, but it would encourage the distribution of profits and increase the revenue from taxes on personal incomes. It would also distribute the burden of taxation more fairly, for stockholders with large incomes would pay at higher rates than stockholders with small incomes. Present taxes on corporate profits take the same percentage from small as from large stockholders.

Exemption of half of reinvested earnings would encourage the expansion of plant and equipment, which is most desirable. But it would hardly be fair to exempt all reinvested earnings, for then it would be possible for a small company to grow into a giant corporation without the stockholders or the company itself paying any taxes whatever. The value of the capital investment in a company increases as the company grows, and it is proper that this capital gain should be taxed. Exempting half of reinvested earnings from a 50 per cent normal tax would mean a 25 per cent tax on reinvested earnings, which is the same rate as the present tax on capital gains.

Congress may think it advisable after the war to retain the tax on the excess profits of corporations but to reduce the rate. The present tax, however, bears far more heavily on small growing companies than it does on large ones which are overcapitalized or which have a record of big sales in the past. If excess-profits taxes are retained, they should be designed to catch only the unreasonable profits of monopoly. The normal tax will take care of new enterprises and small and medium-sized concerns in competitive industries.

In addition to taxes on profits, it may prove necessary to impose a direct tax on cash held by corporations which, in relation to invested capital, current liabilities, and volume of sales, is obviously in excess of the reasonable requirements of the business. A tax on excess cash might be needed especially in the case of investment trusts and of corporations other than banks whose principal business is financial in character.

Although a tax on hoarding would unquestionably stimulate the investment of idle funds, there may be periods in the future when savings cannot be invested in private industry even at a nominal rate of return. In such a period the hoarding tax might cause funds to be invested at a negative rate of interest. It is suggested, therefore, that if money hoarding is penalized by taxation, the Treasury should maintain a tap issue of 1 per cent non-transferable five-year notes available only to individuals and non-profit organizations. This would put a floor under interest rates and make the government responsible for the investment of surplus savings which private enterprise could not absorb.

When the war ends, our money supply will be excessive, and will have to be contracted if the danger of a serious inflation is to be avoided. With the suggested taxes in effect, the government could borrow the surplus funds held by individuals and business concerns, at a low rate of interest, and use the money to reduce the government's indebtedness to banks. This would contract the money supply by reversing the process by which it was expanded. Once the money supply was adjusted to the needs of the economy, on the basis of full production and employment, it could be controlled so as to avoid both inflation and deflation. Without taxes on hoarding, no effective monetary control is possible, for changes in the volume of money made by the monetary authorities would continue to be offset and nullified, as in the past, by extreme variations in the rate of circulation.

Diary of the Future

BY VERNON BARTLETT

[This is the sixth instalment of "a cautionary tale . . . a rash attempt to write history before it has happened," by a distinguished British journalist and member of Parliament. In The Nation of December 4 Mr. Bartlett described the opening of the Washington Peace Conference in September, 194–.]

VI. De-Nazifying Germany

OCTOBER 15. The Commission for German Reeducation is said to be in difficulties. The arguments on either side are equally plausible, and it is a great pity the problem was not decided one way or the other while Germany was still fighting, for discussions now give a lamentable impression of weakness and indecision. One argument is that Germany must be occupied for an unspecified number of years by foreign teachers as well as by foreign troops, since German teachers could never be trusted to do the job. The other is that we must somehow differentiate between the bad and the less bad of some seventy million Germans, and to some extent put our trust in the less bad, since an occupation which is not as nearly "invisible" as possible will inevitably play into the hands of the German war party.

The argument that Germans must reeducate themselves raises at once the question that is the bogy of so many delegates: What sort of Germany do we want? Are we so frightened of socialism that we dare give no encouragement to the Socialists and Communists who opposed Hitler so strongly that they were tortured in concentration camps? Certainly that fear seems to be uppermost in the minds of many delegates, and they would prefer to deal with the Prussian officers, who also, they assert, often stood out against Hitler. In the British and American delegations there is a remarkable tendency to forget that the Officer Corps opposed Hitler at first because he wasn't socially acceptable and later because it feared the rivalry of his Brown Shirts and Black Shirts. It is also carefully forgotten that these men and their families have maintained themselves in power for generations with the same stubbornness as the British aristocracy, with the very important difference that they have done so by a succession of foreign wars, while the British have done so by a succession of social compromises at home.

As for the German middle class, somebody quoted from Fortune's supplement on United States relations with Europe the salutary reminder that "in all German history the German burgher has stood by, wringing his hands, while others performed his political tasks for him." It was, after all, the lower middle class that showed its lack of political balance by becoming Hitler's earliest and most enthusiastic supporter. It would seem as though the only Germans who are politically conscious and who would probably be constructive are the workers, and there are remarkably few of them among the German refugees hanging round the delegations here.

I have been much shocked since I came here by the number of people who have openly deplored our refusal to deal with Ribbentrop and Papen when we had the chance to do so, and who are opposed to giving the slightest encouragement to the trade unionists and other labor leaders who are beginning to emerge above the flood of bewildered and timid German mediocrity. It was inevitable such men should be thrown up, since they run the essential services of the nation. Without them, there is no coal, no transport, and no food. If we treat them with the contempt with which we should treat the kind of German who has run the country since Bismarck, we shall push Germany and Europe into a series of revolutions, the end of which nobody can foresee.

October 19. Sir Arthur Salter as chairman of the Transport Commission is involved in a great battle with private interests to retain control over shipping. Although the Atlantic is now a "safe" sea and munitions no longer have to be brought across it, there is still a shortage of ships, partly, of course, on account of the vast military supplies that are being sent out to India, but partly on account of the terrific demands from Europe.

Some governments in exile from the occupied countries had managed even during the war to lay up stocks for their own people, and now, naturally but unfortunately, they want to regain absolute mastery over their own vessels or to charter vessels from other countries to bring these stocks home. They are prepared to offer almost any sums, and the shipping companies don't like to see such offers made and not accepted. On the other hand, Salter and the UNRRA officials are most emphatic that Europe must be treated as a whole. It has all along been obvious that the countries most in need of help are the ones least able to pay for it, and if we once begin to consider the Continent as a hotchpotch of separate countries, these poorer parts will drift into ever greater misery, all the old national rivalries will be revived, and the opportunity of uniting Europe will have passed.

October 22. David Woodward has written from Berlin. Says there is a great scrap among the disarmament experts about bases in Germany. It has not yet been reflected in the Disarmament Commission over here, but it soon will be. The British want to hang on to Wilhelmshaven and maybe Hamburg and Kiel, with enough air bases on the Frisian Islands to prevent their being taken by surprise—which seems unnecessary if the Germans are to have no aircraft at all. The Russians want Stettin and Rügen, so as to keep Berlin covered. The French and the Poles want everything they can get. The Americans, so much farther away from Germany, are strongly opposed to all these suggestions, which they treat as "annexations."

October 24. News on the radio of a deputation, organized by a nasty-sounding bunch of people, to the Ministry of Economic Warfare to demand that no further blankets, sheets, and so on should be sent to the Continent because they are wanted at home. Of course they are, but the deputation saw the Parliamentary Secretary, Dingle Foot, and he seems to have been in the best possible form. Reminded them of the number of divisions the Germans had had to allocate to the policing of Europe, of the much greater sufferings the Europeans had known than we had, of the generosity and thoughtfulness of the British toward one another during the blitz, and of the fact that mean-minded people were often also cowards. Then he ended up with the most devastating details of the havoc caused in Europe, twenty miles away from England, by Polish influenza, malaria, typhus, and tuberculosis. The fear of this influenza is now so great in Britain that every visitor is inoculated at his port of arrival. Judging from the way I felt during my own very slight attack, I'm not surprised, and I bet some of the organizers of the deputation went home and gargled themselves sick.

October 25. The Economic Subcommittee of the Economic and Financial Commission of the Preliminary Peace Conference—to give it its full and ugly title—has now got down to brass tacks. In this atmosphere of secrecy, which grows denser as the resentment of the Big Four against any criticism becomes more peevish, it is difficult to know details. In any case, since the decisions will be made by three men—the American, British, and Russian chief delegates—a lot of the arguments seem unnecessary. If these men listened to their experts, the arguments would be useful. If the public were allowed to be represented, the arguments would be useful. As it is, they only add to the general bitterness and confusion.

The Anglo-American attitude is definitely opposed to any attempt to treat Germany as it treated the states that came under its domination. If we were to make that attempt, we would burn every book we disliked; we would send German children to other countries where, cut off for the rest of their lives from all contact with or knowledge of their parents and their birthplaces, they would be trained as non-Germans; we would decide exactly where German factories were to be and what they should manufacture; we would order German workers around Europe, pay them about half the pay of non-Germans, and make them live in the equivalent of forced-labor camps; we would torture or kill anybody whom our secret police believed to be dangerous.

But the Anglo-Americans could not enforce such a policy unless their people wanted it, and most of their people don't. To change roles with Germany in that way would be to decide that we were designated by fate to be the Herrenvolk. The Americans lack the necessary racial unity, and the British lack the necessary manpower; both lack the necessary lack of any sense of humor. The "soft" attitude—the adjective comes from one of the Poles—not unnaturally angers the smaller nations that until a few months ago were under the Nazi heel. You can't blame them, but also you can't encourage them if, this time, you are going to win the peace.

Some farsighted Germans are said to welcome the Atlantic Charter method, with its immediate disarmament and economic help. Germany couldn't, anyhow, make war for at least a decade, and they hope that our disarmament commissions will behave in such a way that the German people will be ready to rearm when the time comes. They know Germany will have to pass through terrible hardships in the next years, and they will be glad to put the blame on the Atlantic Charter rather than on themselves.

But that is a danger we must meet, and one realizes now how unwise it was to avoid discussion of it while the war against Germany was still on. We might then have come to the conference with a policy common to all the United Nations. Instead, the smaller powers are going around grumbling like the devil.

It's against this political background that the economic experts have to do their stuff. These are some of the proposals they are arguing about: First, all German heavy industry must be "internationalized," with non-Germans in part-control of the factories and on every board of directors. In that way raw materials could not be diverted to war purposes. But there are two objections to this. There was a lot of "internationalization" of industries before the war, and nobody believes that the very close relations between the great chemical combines, for example, did anything to prevent war. Quite the contrary. The American press has come out very strongly against any step that would put us still more under the influence of these cartels, especially as Germany was so darned efficient at organizing them. Therefore, some of the newspapers argue, foreigners on these boards of directors must be representatives of governments and not of firms. Only a few of the newspapers produce this argument; far too many of them are influenced by the slogan "free enterprise." The prejudice against anything in the nature of government control will probably prevent any real control over German heavy industry.

October 28. The Juridical Commission is discussing a solution of the "war-criminals" problem which sounds unimpressive but which seems to win supporters whenever it is discussed. The commission has to avoid several snags: (1) it is hampered by the absence of adequate international law; (2) it must avoid any action which might convert these gangsters into martyrs in the eyes of future Germans; (3) the extradition of Himmler from the Argentine has not been obtained, and the Americans will make no attempt to persuade the Argentine government to give way if a death penalty is to be imposed; (4) Anglo-American opinion, especially among supporters of the various churches, is more and more opposed to a series of spectacular trials and executions.

The Prime Minister of the Provisional Government of the Netherlands, Dr. van Kleffens, was, I believe, the originator of the present proposal, which is that the war criminals should merely be sentenced to hard labor on reconstruction work for the rest of their lives. They would work in Belgium, Poland, or some other country to which they had helped to bring destruction and misery, and their wardens would be ordinary prison wardens of non-German nationality. Precautions would be taken against active maltreatment but also against the slightest alleviation of their lot.

Partly, one suspects, to keep public opinion quiet, and partly to remind the commission that it has other subjects to deal with besides the fate of war criminals, a monster demonstration is being organized in favor of the new Declaration of the Rights of Man, an international Bill of Rights. One thing Hitler has taught us is that the old conception that a government might treat the people under its control as it pleased is a sure way of getting war. In the past—and the League of Nations came up against the problem time after time—we were always told we must not interfere in matters of domestic jurisdiction, with the result that the Nazis were able to destroy in their own country the whole conception of the integrity of the individual—the basis of Christianity and democracy alike. And we were told we must not interfere.

It is going to be difficult to devise a system which carries out in practice the freedoms of the Atlantic Charter, but public opinion in the United States, in the British Commonwealth, and in most countries of Europe seems pretty united in demanding some sort of machinery to enable a man who can't get justice in his own country, for racial, religious, or political reasons, to appeal to an international court.

In the Wind

WHEELER McMILLEN, editor of the Farm Journal, who has been mentioned as a possible Republican candidate for the Presidency, told a recent Chicago meeting he was "tired of being confused by vague generalities," and offered the following platform of his own: prosperity, national productivity, a strong America, expanded happiness of Americans, and United States international policies serving our interests.

"BOSS" ED CRUMP OF MEMPHIS recently ordered the cancelation of a meeting in a Negro Baptist Church at which A. Philip Randolph, president of the International Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, was billed to speak on Negro problems. The Boss's command was transmitted through Sheriff O. H. Perry, who called some twenty prominent Memphis Negroes to a conference. He met them, not in the conference room of the state's attorney's office, but in the bull-pen of the county jail.

THE CRITICAL FACULTY: From a review of Sholem Asch's "The Nazarene" and "The Apostle" in the Nevada edition of the Register, a national Catholic newspaper: "We express unmitigated contempt for these works. . . . Among the books forbidden by Catholic law (Canon 1399) are . . . volumes of any non-Catholic treating professedly of religion unless it is certain that nothing is contained in them against the Catholic faith."

WANT AD in the San Francisco Chronicle: "Nylon, 3 prs., reward for unfurn. apt. or small bung."

FROM A LETTER by an American soldier in Africa: "It gave me a funny feeling to see some newsreels of the Tunisian war and to be sitting next to men who had fought in the same campaign. There were also many photos of and praise of guys like Eisenhower, Patton, etc., with no pictures or comment on Alexander, Montgomery, etc., who everybody over here knows were responsible for the entire victory practically. It sort of gripes the Tommies, and I don't blame them a bit."

FESTUNG EUROPA: Native Danish storm troopers have become such a public nuisance that the German authorities have been forced to arrest a number of their leaders. They are said to be more an embarrassment than a help to the Nazis. . . . Yank reports, "There's a strong possibility that the Germans have already executed Primo Carnera, the former world's heavyweight champion, for his anti-Fascist activity in northern Italy."

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

How French Resistance Grew

BY JULES MOCH

[Jules Moch, a Socialist Deputy and former Minister, was arrested on Pétain's order in September, 1940. After his release from prison in 1941 he joined the resistance movement and devoted himself to coordinating the efforts of the underground organizations until he was forced to flee from France. In an article published in this section on December 4 he described the hostility to Vichy that dominates all classes of Frenchmen today. A third article will deal with the problem of setting up a republican government in liberated France.]

IN ORDER to give American readers some feeling of the present strength and activity of the underground in France, it is necessary to recall briefly the state of affairs immediately after the armistice and to show how the forces of resistance gradually coalesced and developed into a unified national movement. The armistice left France both confused and demoralized. The millions of uprooted people who clogged the roads were stunned; no one could understand what was happening. Laval took advantage of the chaotic situation to convoke the National Assembly and have it vote unlimited powers to the man of his choice, Pétain. Of the 950 members, more than 200—wounded, captured, or held in the occupied zone—were unable to reach Vichy. Of the others, only 80 voted against this treason.

Every party had its renegades. The eighty who stood fast included thirty-nine Socialists, fifteen Radicals, and twenty-six moderates and conservatives (the Communist deputies loyal to Moscow had been unseated after the Russo-German pact). The Socialist parliamentary group numbered 156 deputies and 16 Senators, of whom about 100 were present at Vichy. Thus less than half of them, plus scarcely a quarter of the Radicals, opposed the fascist military dictatorship.

The moral disintegration in the Assembly was duplicated throughout the country. Soldiers left their units for home, declaring that they had been betrayed by their officers or by the parliamentary regime. General de Gaulle's courageous, farsighted, and noble appeal to his countrymen aroused but a small minority of the people. The abdication of the Parliament at Vichy brought few protests.

In September, 1940, Reynaud, Daladier, Léon Blum, and many of the Socialists who had voted "no" at Vichy were arrested. French democrats, shaking off their torpor, then began to understand that Pétain meant to instal his own brand of fascism and to discredit the Republic and its representatives by charging them with responsibility for the defeat. The country's confidence in "the savior of Verdun" was shaken. Depression was accentuated when the Marshal went to see Hitler at Montoire in October. It was lessened in December when he dismissed and imprisoned Laval—only to release him immediately afterward. The elevation to power of Admiral Darlan in February, 1941, marked the high point of "Pétainism."

But Darlan proved to be an even more willing collaborator than Laval and praised the "generosity of the Germans." Pro-Pétain sentiment was further diminished by the racial laws promulgated at the end of 1941 and tightened in 1942, the persecution of foreign-born and later of French Jews, and the harsh rule set up in Alsace. Laval's return to power wiped out the people's last illusions. Finally, the man-power levy in late 1942 and the deportation of French workers to Germany in 1943 brought their hatred of Vichy to a climax and cemented the unity of their resistance.

Paralleling the trend of public opinion against Pétain, there was a reawakening of national self-respect and a desire to redress France's wrongs. After June, 1940, everyone tuned in regularly on the B. B. C. broadcasts. With their sharp critical sense the French soon perceived the servility of their press, and news from abroad became a necessity to them. People fought at newsstands for such Swiss papers as still came in. They bought out the radio shops. The news was passed along by word of mouth, and the Vichy papers were read only for rationing announcements. Patriots discovered other patriots, repeated General de Gaulle's messages. The resistance movement was born.

In the factories, shops, and cafes men calling themselves Gaulliste coalesced into groups. Soon remnants of the political parties began to meet in secret—first the Communists and Socialists, then the Catholics, moderates, and Radicals. But no Frenchman knew where his neighbor stood or dared confide in him. Naturally therefore in the beginning the political groups had few adherents and little communication with one another. Even a party as disciplined as the Socialist Party reappeared only in scattered cells. All action was local, uncoordinated, and ineffective.

Toward the middle of 1941, however, certain elements established regular relations with General de Gaulle and the Free French in London and received from them valuable advice and aid. From then on underground activity expanded rapidly. Leaflets were printed. Newspapers made their appearance and were systematically distributed by "chains" of coworkers. Daring men carried the copies in heavy valises from the printing plant to various cities. Here the papers were divided among the leaders of the chains, who in turn divided them among the members; single copies were then delivered by these individuals.

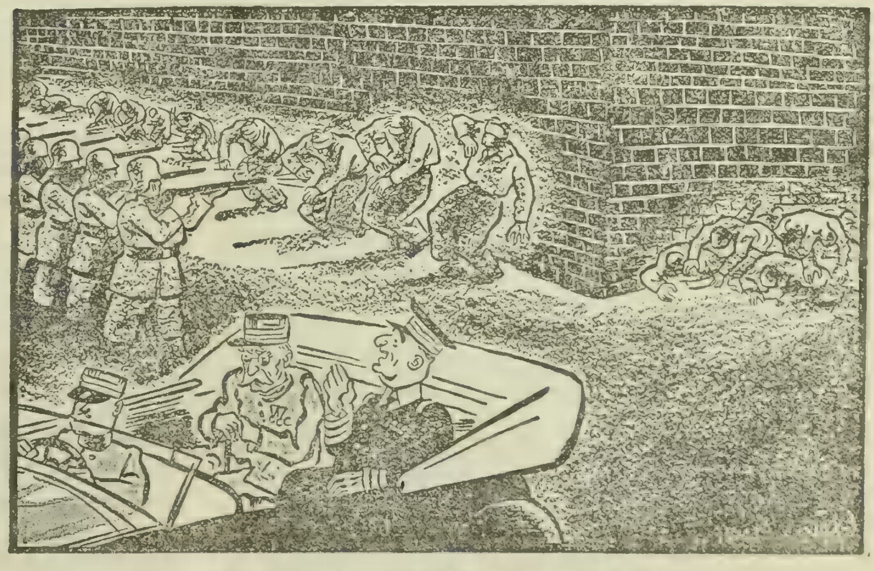
At present seventy underground papers appear fairly regularly once or twice a month. The largest of them prints 100,000 copies, another 70,000. Le Populaire, the Socialist Party paper, has one central and eight regional editions; l'Humanité, the Communist organ, has an equally large printing—this in a country where one's every move is watched by the police and where the paper shortage is acute. Do Americans realize the cleverness, perseverance, and heroism that go into obtaining newsprint for these papers, setting the type, and distributing the copies?

Organizations publishing a paper utilized their distributing systems to form affiliated groups throughout the country. By the middle of 1942 about a dozen national organizations had established many branches and were carrying on various kinds of work. One group formed a quasi-military troop and armed it as best it could in preparation for the liberation struggle. Another trained anti-fascist shock brigades to combat the Legion of Veterans and other fascist or governmental militias. These brigades frequently took the offensive and smashed the windows of government offices and fascist headquarters. Some organizations enrolled their members by professions. Three-quarters of the telephone operators of a city, nine-tenths of the railroad workers and customs officials, were ready to obey a given signal immediately. Even the army and the police force were honeycombed with resistance cells.

Two steps remained to be taken. One was to strengthen the liaison between the Free French and the resistance movement; the other, to coordinate the activities of the resistance forces. The first was achieved in July, 1942, when all French underground organizations announced their support of General de Gaulle, declaring that he symbolized for them and for all France the refusal to capitulate, loyalty to the Allies, and the strugge for victory.

At the same time the French National Committee in London decided to change its name to the "Fighting French" for reasons set forth in La France Combattante of August 28, 1942: "In view of the adhesion of all the groups within France that are participating actively in the resistance movement, we [the French National Committee] have chosen the name the 'Fighting French' to show that our organization includes the Free French forces, Frenchmen in our overseas possessions and abroad, and 'Captive France,' which is struggling against the invader and the authority usurped by a pseudo-government under the control of the enemy." From then on De Gaulle was the acknowledged leader not only of the tens of thousands of volunteers who joined him in London but also of the millions resisting the invader and Vichy in France.

Coordination within France was obtained more slowly, first, because the division of the country into two zones had forced the various organizations to limit their activities to one side or the other of the demarcation line, secondly, because the existence within the underground movement of non-political or secret-party groups created a delicate situation. Certain of these groups wanted no recognition of the old political parties. Finally, however, the difficulties were overcome. By the end of 1942 a committee of coordination was at work in each zone. In 1943 the Central Council of French Resistance was set up with authority over all organizations, political or otherwise, in both zones. The council consists of one representative of the Fighting French and sixteen delegates from the resistance organizations—eight from the non-political groups, six from the reconstituted political parties, and two from the trade unions.



"Mon Dieu! I was afraid it was my back tire."

The strength of the resistance forces has greatly increased since the formation of the French Committee of National Liberation in Algiers. A secret army is being equipped whose effectives are estimated to number 200,000 men. This army punishes traitors, destroys German supplies, commits sabotage according to plan, and offers a refuge to men who have fled from forced labor in Germany. For Laval and the Germans it is a source of anxiety which they no longer attempt to conceal. We have seen it in action in Corsica, where thousands of patriots rose against the enemy before the Fighting French forces arrived. Well armed and disciplined, they went into battle with the cry, "Long live the Republic! Long live De Gaulle!"

With the aid of its many branches the resistance movement has made a complete list of officials to be ousted, of men to replace them, and of traitors to be arrested. On the day that the Allies land in France not only will a French army fight at their side but a republican administration will be prepared to take over the reins of government from the men of Vichy.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

IF FOOD is a weapon, it is one that the Germans unfortunately are finding they can use to considerable effect. It has passed to them by virtue of the food situation in southern Italy, which is very much worse than it was before the Allied invasion, and worse than it is in northern Italy under German rule. The basic diet of the southern Italians consists of macaroni and bread. Under Fascism the macaroni ration was 650 grams a week; today practically no macaroni is obtainable. The bread ration was graduated from 150 grams a day for persons doing the lightest work to 500 grams for the heaviest workers; today 100 grams is the ration for all classes. In a word, as Mayor LaGuardia put it, the situation is "desperate."

Rumors about conditions in Italy, as may be imagined, have spread all over Europe—and the Germans are reaping the advantage. They are circulating the report that the Allies have carried off the entire food supply, and are emphasizing the contrast between the actuality and the people's previous hopes of having more to eat after the entry of the English and American troops. As the Paris radio expressed it:

> The gullible fools who have been spreading fantastic stories about the imminent return of the good old days now see their hopes going up in smoke. The United States has no intention of feeding the countries which it may occupy. What we shall have to do when the Sammies and Tommies have landed in Europe will be to tighten our belts another hole. . . . How much your English liberators will leave you is extremely uncertain. Our people in North Africa say that almost their whole harvest has been sent to Britain.

As usual, German statements on the subject have been so exaggerated as to damage their credibility. The well-known race expert Professor von Leers has discovered—and his discovery has been broadcast in many languages—that the scarcity of food in Italy is part of a deliberate policy of race extermination.

> The Jew Lehman, a leader of Tammany Hall, is director of Allied food shipments to occupied countries, and his policy is to let the people die of hunger. . . . The promises that food would be furnished the population from military stores have proved a swindle. The occupying armies requisition food. In Reggio, as early as September 28, the hungry masses stormed the military depots where requisitioned food had been stored. As a reprisal ten persons were shot. . . . The bread ration in the "liberated" regions is seventy-five grams a day. Only persons who publicly revile Fascism receive a small allowance of poor macaroni. The Americans call this distribution of macaroni "feeding the pigs." Behind it all lies not muddle but a plan to destroy the population by starvation.

Such extravagant assertions convince nobody. The average European listener may well conclude that the Allies did not cause the food scarcity but have simply been unable to relieve it. Nevertheless, the fact that the Italians are hungrier under the Allies than they were formerly under Mussolini or are even today under Hitler cannot be entered on the credit side of the psychological balance sheet. It may easily make a greater impression on people than the news of the setting up of the UNRRA.

When public opinion lacks normal means of expression, it discovers subtle ways of making itself felt. This is illustrated by a dispatch in the Stockholm Aftontidningen of November 7 describing certain happenings in Vienna. Soccer, it should be explained, is the favorite sport of the Viennese.

> Anti-German and anti-Nazi demonstrations occurred in Vienna when the Vienna Soccer Club returned from Stuttgart, where it had defeated the Luftwaffe soccer team. Whispered campaigning before the team's return caused it to be welcomed with Hoch instead of the official Heil. City Councilor Blaschke was made uneasy by this open demonstration against Germany and asked the crowd to give a cheer for the Führer, but only a few persons responded. Immediately afterward a very large number shouted Sport Frei, the greeting used in the old days by the Socialist workers' sport associations.

The Gauleiter of Vienna, Baldur von Schirach, the dispatch continues, "contemplates the prohibition of all soccer games between Austrian and German teams, fearing that they will always give rise to anti-German demonstrations."

MARIANNE MOORE

The Poetry of Millay

COLLECTED LYRICS. By Edna St. Vincent Millay. Harper and Brothers. $5.

MISS MILLAY belongs to the ages. Posterity, which is an anachronism, may prove this strong impression an illusion. But we shall not know about that. Meanwhile Miss Millay has written a good many poems, most of them in this new collection or in her collected volume of sonnets, which make her a great poet to most readers of poetry. These readers consider Edgar Allan Poe, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Blake, and Shakespeare great poets also; and if they read Poe, Longfellow, and Miss Millay, rather than Blake and Shakespeare, what else can be expected? How else can these readers sustain their view of what great poetry is?

This new collection shows how Miss Millay belongs to an age as well as to the ages. She is dated in a good sense. Like Scott Fitzgerald, H. L. Mencken, Sinclair Lewis, prohibition, and midget golf, she belongs to a particular period. No one interested in that period will fail to be interested in Miss Millay's poems. This is not to say that she, or the other authors, was a spokesman. The notion that a creative author can be a spokesman is a convenient and unanalyzed confusion. Creative authors are not elected like Congressmen or chosen like committees, and a creative author can only write well what he truly believes. But there is an inherent sympathy or rapport between the unique talent of some authors and the leading tendencies of the age. The age draws forth and often helps to fecundate what it can use or what it finds interesting and significant in an author. And this is often a sad thing, for some authors are used and then discarded, after groundless illusions have been forced upon them; soon, for example, no one will remember who James Branch Cabell was. But this fate will not overtake Miss Millay. Her lyrics were used by the period, and she was made famous by their usefulness; but now they are inseparable from the period, and they will always illuminate the liberated Vassar girl, the jazz age, bohemianism, and the halcyon days of Greenwich Village. Who can forget the famous quatrain in which a lady's candle burns at both ends, and will not last the night, but gives a lovely light? How could this point of view have been stated with greater economy of means or more memorably? Yet not all that is memorable is admirable.

Some authors can survive a Zeitgeist success, especially if, like Mann, they are profoundly frivolous as well as serious. And some, like Yeats, learn and gain a great deal precisely because their hour in the limelight has come and gone. But Miss Millay has perhaps been defeated by her very success. "Fatal Interview," the volume of sonnets she published in 1931, is probably her best book, but there is nothing in it which represents an advance in perception or insight over her first book, which was published in 1917. To compare the two books is to see how all that is good in her work, all that is of permanent interest, is circumscribed by the period in which she became a famous poetess.

Consider, as an example, the view of love which recurs without exception in these lyrics and in many of Miss Millay's sonnets; in one of her best-known sonnets, "What lips my lips have touched and how and why/ I have forgotten," Miss Millay compares the female protagonist of the poem to a tree and "the unremembered lads" who were her lovers to birds. Is this not the eternal feminine of the day when woman's suffrage was an issue and not yet an amendment? If one has a weakness for visualizing images, then the dominant image of the poem certainly presents the female and the lads in unfair proportions. Elsewhere some lovers are assured that a love affair is not any the less true love because it has been rapidly succeeded by several more love affairs, an assurance which might come gracefully from Catherine the Great, let us say, but which is not really the kind of attitude that makes great poetry. Is it not, indeed, just as shallow as its opposite, the squeezable mindless doll whom Hemingway celebrates? Yet just such attitudes explain Miss Millay's popular fame at the same time as they exhibit her essential failure. The late John Wheelwright remarked that Miss Millay had sold free love to the women's clubs. Yes, this has been at once her success and her failure; and one should add that another attribute of this kind of famous authoress is that of inspiring epigrams.

When we look closely at Miss Millay's poetic equipment—her images, diction, habits of style, and versification—we find the same twins of success and failure. Her diction especially is poetic in the wrong sense: the candles, arrows, towers, scullions, thou's, lads, girls, prithees, shepherds, and the often-capitalized Beauty and Death are words which come, not from a fresh perception of experience, but from the reading of many lyric poems by the Elizabethans, Heine, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, and Christina Rossetti. The alternative is not the simple one of substituting electric lights for candles and machine-guns for arrows; Sandburg is just as falsely poetic as Miss Millay because he embraces this opposite. If there is an alternative, it is perhaps to be seen flickering in the poems in which Miss Millay draws upon what she has actually looked at on the New England coast or in the Maine woods: "the soft spitting snow," "the silly bleating sheep," "the scratching of dry leaves," the pines, the hemlocks, the apple orchard, and the blunted ax.

But if Miss Millay had cultivated and searched out the actuality of this experience instead of using it as a stage set, she would not be the first text of all the girls who are going to write poetry; she would not have depended upon attitudes which are as characteristic of literate youth as the sophomore year; after her second volume she would have abandoned the obvious and banal poses she has struck in the face of love and death. She would not be the most famous poetess of our time, and she might have composed a body of poetry characterized by the nonesuch originality—however often warped, thin, fragmentary, exotic, or ingrown—of Marianne Moore, Leonie Adams, Louise Bogan, and Janet Lewis, four poets who will never be as popular as Miss Millay.

DELMORE SCHWARTZ

Life of a Hero

THE DUKE: A LIFE OF WELLINGTON. By Richard Aldington. Viking Press. $3.75.

RICHARD ALDINGTON has cultivated many literary crops, but hitherto he has not attempted to raise a biography. Nevertheless, he has succeeded in producing a fine, sturdy plant even though its shape and color are rather unexpected. Readers who recall "Death of a Hero"—a notable example of the post-1918 anti-militarist school of fiction—may be surprised to find its author treating a general with respect and even affection. But national heroes have come into their own again. In the twenties they were ruthlessly cut down to pigmy size; today they are back on their pedestals with new cubits added to their statuary.

I do not wish, however, to convey the impression that Mr. Aldington has idealized the Duke of Wellington so as to make him unrecognizable. His is a flesh-and-blood portrait, and the blemishes have not been painted out, although they have not been high-lighted either. But if the author has inhibited his considerable gift for irony so far as his hero is concerned, he has given it full rein in treating the minor characters who crowd the scene, and has been something less than just to many of them. No one has cause for complaint when he directs his sarcasm at the fatuous Duke of York, who for many years was commander-in-chief of the British army and its worst affliction, or at other royal incubi of the time. But Wellington did not beat Napoleon on his own or in spite of his subalterns, as Mr. Aldington sometimes seems to suggest. And some of the Duke's political coadjutors had more sense and patriotism than they are given credit for.

Since Wellington—born Arthur Wesley—was a younger son of a noble but temporarily impoverished house, in an age when family meant almost everything, it is a little hard to make an Alger hero of him. But Mr. Aldington has tended to stress the odds he had to overcome to conquer fame. True, he was neglected and unhappy in his youth, and his mother had a low opinion of him, announcing at one point that he was "food for powder and nothing more." His education might have made a rebel of him; instead, it confirmed him in all the prejudices of his caste.

For want of better preferment Wellington entered the army as an ensign at the age of eighteen. Six years later he was a lieutenant colonel. Such rapid promotion at that time could only be achieved by powerful patronage. Yet he was very dissatisfied and was constantly seeking more lucrative employment—a fact which his latest biographer records with obvious sympathy.

There is no need here to summarize Wellington's military career. Nearly two-thirds of this book is devoted to his battles in India against Tippoo, Sultan of Mysore, and the Mahrattas, the Peninsula War, and the brief campaign of Waterloo. Mr. Aldington gives a clear and readable account of these wars and avoids entanglement in too much detail. He brings out well the Duke's eye for terrain and his genius for logistics. Above all, he emphasizes his hero's unfailing common sense, which proved an invaluable asset in dealing with over-romantic opponents. This quality was displayed to the best advantage in the part he played in the pacification of Europe, when he used his influence against the imposition of crushing burdens on France.

Wellington lived on for thirty-seven years after Waterloo, and for twenty or so he was perhaps the most influential figure in British politics. The history of this period is a prolonged drama, in many of the most stirring scenes of which the Duke appears in the role of a Canute bidding the wild waves of reform to halt their advance. In the years that he had been campaigning abroad forces had been born which he did not understand. The Industrial Revolution had gathered increased momentum, the country had become rapidly urbanized, and a new middle class and new proletariat were demanding with growing insistence that the landed aristocracy surrender its political monopoly.

Wellington, said Disraeli, "knew nothing about England," d Mr. Aldington, for all his contempt for Dizzy, is forced agree with this verdict. The result was that fifteen years er he returned from Waterloo, a national hero, he had come the most execrated man in the country. Throughout ose years he had defended stoutly the divine right of the glish ruling class. He saw the movement for parliamentary form either as a reckless attempt to upset an almost perfect nstitution or as a conspiracy fostered by foreign gold. wice he led the Tory forces to defeat reform bills, and the ndon mob smashed his windows. Yet in the end he grasped e fact that the alternative to reform was civil war and used s influence to insure enough absenteeism in the House of ords to allow the bill to pass. Nor was this the only occasion hen he finally aided the passage of measures, such as the peal of the Corn Laws, which he and his fellow-Tories had hemently opposed. As Mr. Aldington justly observes:

> The Duke knew perfectly well that a country can only be governed by one of two powers, the people or the sword, and on the whole, much as he disliked the people, he disliked the sword more. That is why he would oppose popular measures with which he disagreed, but never beyond the point where rioting might become revolution.

I think this passage explains why Mr. Aldington has hosen to celebrate this particular hero. Wellington was a reat soldier who never became a militarist.

KEITH HUTCHISON

iction in Review

AS I began James T. Farrell's "My Days of Anger" (Vanguard, $2.75), the fourth and final volume of he Danny O'Neill series, I was struck by how vividly Farrell's characters had remained in my memory from my reading, some years ago, of no more than a single one, the first, of the Danny O'Neill novels. Danny's father Jim (now dead), his mother Lizz, his cranky and wonderful old grandmother, his Uncle Al, who worships education as a holy mystery, and his drunken Aunt Margaret—all Danny's family recalled themselves with uncommon clarity. I found myself contrasting this experience with the experience I had had when I reread John Dos Passos's "U. S. A." Surely I am not the only reader who has difficulty remembering the people in Dos Passos's novels, and it occurred to me that perhaps the reason we forget them so quickly is that while Dos Passos gives them an intellectual understanding, he gives them no real love. Even his pity is a kind of symbolical literary pity rather than pity out of his own feeling. This is quite the opposite of Farrell's relation to his characters. Of the two writers, Dos Passos undoubtedly has the more various and dramatic imagination; indeed, it is Farrell's great weakness as a novelist that his people have so little dramatic possibility; he seems unable to permit his literary creations to grow up and have a life of their own in the big world. But he has the more creative heart: his characters endure in memory because they were created in profound affection.

Of course, in the measure that the material of Farrell's fiction is autobiographical, his love must also be called self-love. His long fictional obsession with the theme of his own background is so revealing in this regard that the reader is almost embarrassed, and perhaps it is embarrassment that accounts in some part for the gruffness with which each new iteration of the Chicago subject is received by certain critics. But even granting that Farrell's love of mankind is love only for that section of mankind from which he drew his own being, there are few contemporary writers who have the power to trace their sources and their growth with so much talent for observation and in such a disciplined prose. For some reason or other, in the years since I last read one of his novels, I had got the impression that Farrell was a careless writer—quite as if, being like Dreiser a realist, he had necessarily to be tarred with the brush of Dreiser's stylistic slovenliness. But actually Farrell is a meticulous if limited craftsman, choosing both incident and language with thought and skill; in fact, the contradiction between the apparently uncontrolled flow of his narrative (and the rapidity with which novel follows novel) and the care with which each scene is chosen for its place in the whole pattern of the story is one of the paradoxes of his work. There is another paradox which relates to Farrell's obsession with his past: although his energies are so disconcertingly devoted to self-portraiture, his basic objectivity of approach and his refusal to intervene on behalf of Danny O'Neill's author could surely serve as a lesson to many writers who would condemn him out of hand for his excessive self-concern.

"My Days of Anger" covers the years 1924-27—the years in which Danny comes to young manhood. He earns his own living, studies at the University of Chicago, breaks with Catholicism, and, perhaps most important, makes his first eager steps as a writer. O'Neill-Farrell is moving out from the family group and testing its values; and because he is young and soon to be an artist, the education of his mind and emotions is the education of his taste in poetry. In literature he finds meaning for the environment in which he was raised, and in the promise of literature the promise of the righting of its wrongs. At the end of the novel, his grandmother dead, Danny is leaving for New York, and he thinks: "His people had not been fulfilled. He had not understood them all these years. He would do no penance now for these; he would do something surpassing penance. There was a loyalty to the dead, a loyalty beyond penance and regret. He would do battle so that others did not remain unfulfilled as he and his family had been." In other words, it is on a call to battle, at once touching in its naive inadequacy and moving in its personal passion, that Farrell concludes the education of his novelist as a young man.

But literature is not made from calls to battle, and it is one of Farrell's grievous errors to think that it is, just as it is his error and misfortune to see even his purely literary problems as the continuing conflict between two dreadfully opposing sides. On the one side is truth, on the other side lies; and since he knows that he tells the truth, he thinks that whatever someone else wants him to say is untruth. Thus in "My Days of Anger" Danny is studying with a professor of creative writing, a not very subtle caricature of the academician. "You want to be a realist," says this thin voice of criticism. "But is it realism to say that all life is unhappy?" The professor goes on to take the young author to task for omitting a "glimmer of hope" in his stories. Danny replies, "I didn't make unhappiness. I didn't invent Chicago. I'm only trying to describe Chicago as I know it." That is, Farre would seem to sum up all possible objection to his metho as objection to his unpleasant truthfulness. Well, perhap some unimportant section of opinion has expressed itself o this low level; it would be the same opinion that acclaims book like "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn." But Farrell deceive himself harmfully if he regards all serious adverse criticism as so essentially without seriousness.

For, clearly, his pleasantness or unpleasantness is quite beside the point of his ultimate success as a novelist. The people he writes about could be rich and beautiful instead of poor and woeful and superstitious, and he would still be subject to the same criticism for the limits within which he has held his imagination. One of the finest things about Farrell is his love, but even love, and certainly all the accuracy in the world, cannot compensate for his preference for the actionless, the plotless, and the unvarious. He seems to believe that to intensify by dramatic action or by the invention of plot is to falsify; but this is as if, telling the story, say, of Othello, he should think it more truthful to record a lifetime of Othello's emotional insufficiencies and racial inferiorities than to introduce an Iago to precipitate Othello's uneasy innocence into violence. And his rigid refusal to allow his characters movement in the world has a significant resemblance to the loving-cruel family authority which so crippled all the O'Neills and made it necessary for his grandmother to die before Danny O'Neill could leave Chicago.

When Freedom Is Forgotten

FREEDOM, FORGOTTEN AND REMEMBERED. By Helmut Kuhn. University of North Carolina Press. $2.50.

WE HAVE had many books on the cultural and spiritual, as well as on the economic and political, roots of Nazism. Of the many I doubt whether there is one which is equal in sanity, breadth, and depth to Kuhn's "Freedom, Forgotten and Remembered." This is something more than a simple and self-righteous interpretation of Nazism as the consequence of German romanticism, after the manner of several recent expositions of the cultural roots of Nazism. Kuhn, who was once a professor of philosophy at the University of Berlin and a secretary of the Kant Society and who is now teaching philosophy at the University of North Carolina, sees the German sickness in the context of the total spiritual problem of the Western world. He understands the demonic force of Nazism more profoundly than most non-German critics; but he also understands the static corruption of the Western world which gave this dynamic corruption the chance to grow. "There are," he writes, "two ways of consigning freedom to oblivion. It may suffer a gradual loss of substance and thus fade away. This process is reversible. The forgotten freedom may be remembered. Or freedom is repudiated and cast out by an irrevocable act of despair; from it there is no return save through rebirth." He believes that the democratic world is guilty of forgetting freedom in such a way that it may yet be reclaimed and that Nazism represents the repudiation of freedom by an irrevocable act.

Guilty of Cowardice

by Leon Henderson

America loves courage.

America loves success.

Not long ago we honored ourselves as Americans by applauding two old friends, Sweden and Denmark, for conspicuous gallantry and success on the field of action. Our citation should read, "For unexampled moral bravery."

How I wish that we might also make an American citizenry award to the United Nations for similar moral courage towards Jewish people in Europe.

But you know and I know that this is impossible.

The Allied Governments, in the face of a clear call of moral duty, have been guilty of cowardice.

For years, the leading Allied National Governments have known that the major political weapon of Nazi bestiality was extermination of the Jews.

But this war issue has been avoided, submerged, postponed, played down and resisted with all the forms of political force available to powerful governments.

One of the aims of warfare is the destruction of the political structure of the enemy. Woodrow Wilson knew this well. The Allies knew how to help break Fascism under Mussolini.

But the Allies have left the Nazis taunt them, and by so doing have made conspicuous a frightening moral and political weakness within our own structure.

I say, in all earnestness, that Sweden and Denmark have proven the tragedy of Allied judgment. At a time when the ideals for which we fight need illumination and fortification, these two brave countries have shown America the path of leadership.

Make no mistake. This is a concern, this is a responsibility for all Americans and all Allies. This is a matter of national honor and not a very private and confidential business of those who happen to be of Jewish descent.

Our leaders know how America flamed about the extermination of Lidice. Well, Lidice has been repeated on a monumental scale and the Nazis have announced their intent to make every Jewish community in Europe another Lidice.

Why do we stand idly by?

We hear vague statements of "military expediency." This is an abuse of the rightful use of military expediency. Why not let the public conscience judge between expediency and Jewish extermination?

I know, far better than many of you, that the Allies have engaged in many a bold, risky and concealed venture to handle special situations of high political and strategic importance. But I know of none which are more justifiable than specific aid which the Allied Governments might extend to European Jews.

Let the United Nations, with all solemnity and force, tell Hitler and everyone who assassinates the Jew that they are being set down for trial for murder.

Let them know we care.

Let the United Nations open the doors of the slaughter house from the outside.

Let the United Nations make provision for temporary asylum, for temporary visas, so that agonized Jews may help themselves.

Let the United Nations tell satellite countries like Bulgaria and Roumania, and neutrals like Turkey and Spain, that it wants to help Jews to be saved. Above all, let the United Nations speed their own self-redemption by bold action through a recognized, formal organization so that all the world, enemy, neutral and friend, may know their clear intent.

This is no postwar problem.

This is no matter to await the Peace Table, a peace table that will be haunted by the ghosts of millions that have already perished. It calls for moral action now, action that will nourish our moral fibre.

If this be a war for civilization, then most surely this is the time to be civilized.

(From an address at a mass rally in Carnegie Hall, N. Y. C., organized by this committee in honor of Sweden and Denmark.)

We are trying to do our duty. Do your share, too!

There are four million Jews still alive in Europe.

They can be saved. Experts agree on that. Sweden and Denmark have just proved it by saving 6,000 Jews in a few days.

This committee considers it a sacred duty to do all humanly possible to save them. Our offices and representatives in Washington and in London, in Palestine and in Turkey, are steadily working in this direction, trying to get large-scale government action. This action will have to express itself in the creation of an Intergovernmental Agency to save the Jewish people of Europe and in declaring the doors of Palestine and other countries under United Nations control open for escaping Jews. For it is now strictly a race for time against death. Every day that passes dooms thousands who can be saved.

This Committee is asking the American people for substantial financial support with which it hopes—and believes—results can be secured effecting the rescue of the four million martyred Jews in Europe.

We need your financial help immediately. By your support will be determined the speed, scope and effectiveness of our work to save the Jewish people of Europe.

....

In expounding this thesis he illumines many of the perplexing issues of our day. He shows us why a democratic government which allows freedom for the expression of various creeds and philosophies cannot save the democratic way of life if meanwhile a high sense of purpose no longer animates those who claim this freedom. In such a case they may think of freedom as no more than the right to pursue conflicting interests and may interpret interest in merely economic terms. Professor Kuhn gives us a penetrating account of the emptiness of our bourgeois world, which the Nazi devils sought to fill; and in doing so he carefully estimates the contribution which historical relativism, the "either-or" philosophy of existential philosophy, and other cultural forces made to either the liberal or the Nazi sickness.

Professor Kuhn deals with the future as profoundly as with the past. He sees no easy possibility of rebirth for Germany, and he has a lively sense of the political realities which must be incorporated into a decent peace. He hopes that the war will not end "with a compromise between a generous fiction and a brutal reality," the fiction incorporating the ideal of universal justice in some unworkable league of nations and the brutal reality expressing the vindictiveness and will to power of the victors.

On the inadequacy of a purely military victory I know of no better word than the author's:

> It is not intolerable, either to an individual or to a nation, to be defeated by a real victor, that is, by one who believes in the truth of his triumphant cause. Only the meaningless adversity is utterly crushing and demoralizing. It would be a meaningless catastrophe for Germany and Italy to be defeated by superior resources rather than by men who believe in the freedom for which they fight. We must hope that the despondency of the politicians will not belie the valor of the fighting men. Only a true victory will prompt the enemy to acquiesce, morally as well factually, in the defeat as final and decisive.

This is definitely a book worth reading with care. Incidentally it is written so imaginatively and in so robust a style that one suspects the author of no ordinary linguistic gifts. The retouched prose of average émigré writing is usually more labored. REINHOLD NIEBUHR

DRAMA

SINCE "Carmen Jones" (Broadway Theater) falls mainly into Mr. Haggin's province, you will find a review of it on page 742. I shall confine myself to a few remarks about Katharine Cornell and her latest production "Lovers and Friends" (Plymouth Theater). Miss Cornell plays the well-known part of the understanding woman to whom all men turn—and return. The other characters are merely foils. The play, in short, is what is known as a vehicle.

I know that good new plays are as scarce as hens' teeth, and Miss Cornell may have her reasons for not producing a good old play—though the success of "Othello" by one Shakespeare and the easy money flowing through the box offices make me wonder what they are. But her choice, as a producer, of this particular bad play points up what seems to me her great defect as an actress. In "Lovers and Friends" she gives a characteristic performance which her admirers will like. I enjoyed it up to a point, for Miss Cornell is good to look at and she is an experienced and trained actress. But I find her acting less than satisfactory for the very elementary reason that she creates no illusion. I have never seen her surrender to a part, though I should add, perhaps, that I have seen only a limited number of her performances. Whether from a lack of imagination or a lack of humility or both, she appears to be incapable of making the spectator forget that she is Katharine Cornell. In the present play it hardly matters; one may even be glad to believe that Stella Boswell is really Katharine Cornell. It does matter in such a play as "The Three Sisters," which she produced last season. For when one of Chekhov's characters insists on being Katharine Cornell as well, it leads to a serious disturbance of the piece.

Raymond Massey has a limited range as an actor, and he is not well cast as an English barrister. But even if he were well cast, and a first-rate actor besides, he would be hard put to it to give life to the many wooden lines he has to speak, partly because the play gives him no support. The scene in which he tells his wife (Miss Cornell) that he has fallen in love would not be quite so unconvincing, for example, if one believed for a second that his sally into romance might turn out to be a one-way journey instead of a quick round trip. In other words, the play has neither the common garden variety of suspense growing out of uncertainty about its ending nor the tension of good writing, which also creates suspense of a different sort.

This is the time of year when lists are in order. Here are the productions that seem to me worth seeing for one reason or another.

"Carmen Jones"—reviewed elsewhere in this issue. Broadway Theater.

"Othello," for Margaret Webster's clever production and José Ferrer's brilliant portrayal of Iago. Shubert Theater.

"One Touch of Venus," for Mary Martin's charming presence, Sono Osato's dancing, Mainbocher's gowns, and a general sophisticated gaiety. Imperial Theater.

"Innocent Voyage," for the excellent performances of Abby Bonime and her pirate friends, Oscar Homolka and Herbert Berghof. Belasco Theater.

"Winged Victory," for the G. I. cast. Forty-fourth Street Theater.

"A Connecticut Yankee," mainly for Vivienne Segal. (Not reviewed before.) There are dull moments in this revised revival of the Rodgers and Hart musical, but you will enjoy Miss Segal's lusty performance and especially her singing of "To Keep My Love Alive." There is also Vera-Ellen's fast and, to my taste, a bit too furious dancing. I need hardly say that Mark Twain would be as surprised at what goes on here as the Yankee was in Camelot. Martin Beck Theater. MARGARET MARSHALL

Stop Press: "The Voice of the Turtle," which I have seen since writing this review, belongs well up on the list. I shall discuss it next week. Morosco Theater. M. M.

FILMS

"HAPPY LAND" tells how the ghost of a man who fought in the Civil War comes to comfort his middle-aged grandson, whose own son has just been killed in the present war. The old man leads him through the small town and through his own remembrance and his remembrance of the life of the son. Some of this is idyllic and pretty, which is fair enough. But you get no impression that the son had any troubles that a glass of Pepsi-Cola wouldn't cure; so that you wonder whether such a life could have been lived and whether it was worth the bother. The idea advanced here is, quite to the contrary, that the son's life, being American, was worth dying for. This idea seems to me arguable, at least as it is served up here; far too much of it is the sort of boiled-and-buttered native corn, fresh from the can, for which MacKinlay Kantor is beloved by some.

However, the thing is quietly and sincerely played, especially by Don Ameche and Henry Morgan, and as quietly and sincerely directed by Irving Pichel. Also, it was shot in a real town (the more Iowan-looking parts of Santa Rosa and Healdsburg, California; Santa Rosa was first used for Hitchcock's "Shadow of a Doubt"); so a real town's irreducible beauty and validity keep forcing the softly handled theme toward its proper dignity. All of Joseph La Shelle's photography is good; some of it is so cool, flexible, and sensitive that—along with the work of Alfred Valentine in "Shadow of a Doubt"—it takes up the Magna Charta for American films from the cellar corner where it was tossed along with the lost thirty-two reels of "Greed." Also I am glad to see even an attempt to show what a war death means to a family. Therefore, though I think "Happy Land" is tainted with dextrose and with that nasty-nationalistic self-pitying self-congratulation for which we plain Amurrican folks—in more ways than one like ostriches—are developing an ever more sinister and indiscriminate appetite, I also think it is worth seeing.

"What a Woman!" (what a title!) is about Rosalind Russell, a high-paid genius peddler who harpoons a college professor (Willard Parker) to play the romantic lead in a filmed best-selling piece of trash his fantasy life had spilled on to paper. As a profilist for the Knickerbocker Magazine, Brian Aherne looks on, and tells her that she is using only 10 per cent of her womanliness—a generous estimate—in the sort of life she leads. The professor goes gaga. I suppose it is amusing if, like me, you are at all likely to laugh at a kind of smartness on the screen which you—or I, anyhow—would yawn at on Broadway. Either sophistication is highly relative to context or I am. I suspect, and had better worry about, the latter. Anyhow, some of the interiors are nice pieces of kidding.

"Girl Crazy" has nothing in it I can recommend unless you are curious to see what makes one of the biggest box-office successes of the year; unless, like me, you find Mickey Rooney much more bearable since he quit putting his soul into his comedy—he seems now just a detached and very competent vaudeville actor; and unless, like me, you like Judy Garland. Miss Garland is a good strident vaudeville actor too; and has an apparent straightness and sweetness with which I sympathize. Judging by her infrequent "emotional" moments I would like very much to see her in straight dramatic roles.

"The Gang's All Here" highlights Alice Faye singing "No Love, No Nothing," as torturing a piece of torching as the war has evolved, but is mainly made up of Bushy Berkeley's paroxysmic production numbers, which amuse me a good deal. There is one routine with giant papier-mâché bananas, cutting to thighs, then feet, then rows of toes, which deserves to survive in every casebook of blatant film surreption for the next century. But then, for anthropological reasons, so does "No Love, No Nothing," as here filmed.

"The Heat's On" is a stale-ale musical in which a lot of good people apathetically support the almost equally apathetic Mae West. There is one wonderful shot, epitomizing a flop legshow trying to be dirty, in which a lot of peeled girls writhe rather wearily on a flight of steps. Victor Moore is good except for his big seduction scene with Mae, at which both of them merely sniff as if it were a saucer of black-market dog food. Mae West is mainly as good as ever, which is still plenty good enough for me; but evidently she and her colleagues feel that too few people agree with me.

"Madame Curie" is a smooth, rather horrible romanticization of a subject I am sorry to see romanticized. More about that later.

ART

EILSHEMIUS: Paintings of 1909. At the Valentine Gallery through December 31. NICHOLAS MOCHARNIUK: Wood Sculpture. At the Marquie Gallery through December 11.

ARBITRARY though it might appear, no better selection of Eilshemius's work than his production of 1909 could have been made as a starting-point for the revaluation of his art. The quality is surprisingly high and consistent; yet the year marks a critical station in the artist's career. The simplification of his later—or what I choose to call "deranged"—period, with its yellows, acid greens, oranges, tans, and pinks, begins to emerge even as the comparative academicism of his earlier period reaches its fruition. We see that Eilshemius was a comparatively thin but very intense talent. Within certain rather narrow limits he pushed landscape painting to a maximum; where and when he strains beyond these limits he may become more original, but he lacks the sustenance of total feeling and of learning. The febrile, erratic intensity comes from a level too near the agitated surface of Eilshemius's experience, is the result of a mutilation, is fancy without imagination. Like all the deranged, Eilshemius lived toward the end only in a province of himself. This having been said, it can be said further that he was one of the best artists we have ever produced. The brushing of the trembling, loosely defined masses of color in "Sunburst—Delaware Water-Gap" anticipates, yet with a sensitivity to texture all its own, the best post-Cézanne landscape painting. But Eilshemius apparently grew to want his immediate emotion first, his painting last. Almost every other picture here is successful within its own terms—especially "Girl Waving" and "New York Docks" —but there is a gaucherie in the emotional blues; or the flatter, less recklessly handled light greens and yellows, played off against the top elementary composition of lights and darks, turn into something of a picturesque formula. Really, Eilshemius became too radical. His painting was at its best when it retained enough of academicism to give it body, complication—and control.

The work of the young wood-carver Nicholas Mocharniuk is worth being concerned about—if only to point out that he is captured too readily by facile and decorative rhythms suggested by nature, primitive art, and his medium.

He should study the problems of form in its more abstract incarnations—and realize that whatever he may do he belongs to the Gothic-baroque, pre-expressionist tradition of wood-carving, with its closely articulated forms and concentrated detail, rather than to the smooth mass and simplified line of most modernist and primitive sculpture. The fact is, wood seems rarely an appropriate medium for modernist art.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

MUSIC

IN "Carmen Jones" (Broadway Theater) a large amount of Bizet's music is used with a libretto by Oscar Hammerstein II which translates the original story of Bizet's opera into one about Negroes of today: Carmen Jones, a worker in a parachute factory, lures Joe, a corporal of the guard at the factory, from his small-town sweetheart Cindy Lou, gets him to desert and go with her to Chicago where she throws him over for a prizefighter named Husky Miller, and so on. Much of what was serious in the original is translated into terms—Negro characters, situations, ways of thinking, feeling, talking, doing—which are humorous in themselves and in their relation to what they recall to us in the original: T-Bone flinging himself out of the crowd in the few dazzling dance-steps that accompany his invitation to Carmen, as against the decorous advances of the member of the chorus in the original; Carmen's song about "a cafe on de corner" owned by Billy Pastor, to the music of the original Seguidilla about the inn of "mon ami Lillas Pastia"; Husky's "Stan' Up an' Fight," to the music of the Toreador's Song; "Whizzin' Away Along de Track" (to Chicago), to the music of the second-act Quintet; the goings-on in the crowd waiting for Husky's arrival at the stadium, as against the milling-around outside the bullring; and so on.

But not everything serious in the original is changed in this way; and I think—judging by the results I saw on the stage—this is a mistake. It isn't merely that I enjoyed the words of "Stan' Up an' Fight" in combination with the music of the Toreador's Song, but was made uncomfortable by the words of "Dis Flower" in combination with the music of the Flower Aria. It is also that the humorous portions employed the wonderful natural capacities of Negroes for fun on the stage, and produced moments of amusing and exciting theater, but the serious portions demanded an equipment for serious acting—the knowledge, for example, of what to do with body and hands—which these people did not have, and the lack of which resulted in stiffness and awkwardness and amateurishness that were painful to observe.

Then the dancing. Obviously there should have been dancing, not "choreography by Eugene Loring"—which is to say that the dances in Spanish style that one sees in the original opera called for translation into straight Negro. But the first false note—and a terrific shock after the ease and naturalness of the opening—came early in the first scene, when the factory girls were singing their lilting entrance song, and unexpectedly (there is no dancing in the original at this point) dancers began to go through the movements of a piece of serious arty choreography. And worse was to come later: the rising curtain disclosed the most exciting spectacle of the evening—a scene of the crowd dancing at Billy Pastor's that might have been the Savoy Ballroom; but while the audience was still cheering the dancing changed to a choreographed orgy (which I regret to say the audience cheered even more loudly). The one successful bit of choreography was the kidding of Spanish dancing in the country club scene; but better still was the straight Negro dancing of the street crowd in the final scene.

Raoul Pene du Bois's costumes had extravagance and humor that made them part of what is exciting in "Carmen Jones"; and there were excellent settings by Howard Bay. The singing of the principals on the second night was good; the playing of the orchestra under the direction of Joseph Littau lacked mere precision—to say nothing of character or style.

The best works and performances on records issued during the past year were Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5, with the solo part played by Schnabel (V Set 939, $5.50); his Trio Opus 97, played by Rubinstein, Heifetz, and Feuermann (V Set 949, $5.50); and his Quartet Opus 127, played by the Budapest Quartet (C Set 537, $5.50; poorly recorded). Other good works and performances were Beethoven's First Symphony, played by Rodzinski with the Cleveland Orchestra (C Set 535, $4.50; performance tense and hard-driving); his Piano Sonata Opus 27 No. 2, played by Serkin (C Set X-237, $2.50; fair performance, badly recorded); Corelli's Concerto in C, played by Biggs and the Fiedler Sinfonietta (V Set 924, $2.50); Griffes's Poem for flute and orchestra, played by Mariano and the Eastman-Rochester Symphony under Hanson (V 11-8349, $1); Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," played by Monteux with the San Francisco Symphony (V 11-8489, $1); Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, played by Beecham with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (C Set 538, $4.50; first and last movements badly recorded); Sibelius's Seventh Symphony, played by Golschmann with the St. Louis Symphony (V Set 922, $3.50), and by Beecham with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (C Set 524, $3.50; badly recorded); Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony (a diffuse work), played by Sevitzky with the Indianapolis Symphony (V Set 940, $7.50); Verdi's Ah, fors è lui from "La Traviata," sung by Sayao (C 71451-D, $1); his E il sol dell' anima from "Rigoletto," sung by Bjoerling and Schymberg (V 11-8440, $1); Wagner's Bridal Chamber Duet from "Lohengrin," sung by Flagstad and Melchior (V Set 897, $2.50); his songs "Träume" and "Im Triebhaus," sung by Lehmann (C 71469-D, $1). And some of the beautiful music from oratorios of Handel and Haydn in V Set 927 ($3.50) is well sung by Eleanor Steber, some of it poorly sung.

Works I don't care for that were well performed were Bach's Violin Concerto in E, by Busch with his Chamber Players (C Set 530, $3.50); Brahms's Sonata Opus 120 No. 1 for viola and piano, by Lifschey and Petri (C Set 487, $3.50); Schumann's song-cycle "Frauenliebe und Leben," by Lehmann, with very poor accompaniments by Bruno Walter (C Set 539, $3.50).

There were a number of good works poorly performed which I will list next week.

The best jazz performances were the Bechet-New Orleans Feetwarmers "Georgia Cabin" and "I'm Coming, Virginia" (V 27904); the Duke Ellington "C Jam Blues" (V 27856); and some of the performances in Decca's "Gems of Jazz—Volume 5" (Set A-324, $3) and in a few of the volumes of reissues in its Brunswick Collectors' Series: "Ellingtonia—Volume 1" (Set B-1000, $3.50); "Barrel House Piano" (Set B-1008, $3.50); "Riverboat Jazz" (Set B-1010, $3.50).

Letters to the Editors

quality of Sacrifice

ear Sirs: For months our government as been conscripting the persons of its oung men to fight and perhaps to die the defense of our country. In many stances the drafting of these men has volved and will further involve not nly economic sacrifice but disruption f family life in many of its phases. total war government has no choice the matter—it must call on its eligile men and their dependents to make is sacrifice.

But having done so, is it too much ask the Congress to make "equality f sacrifice," so far as is possible, a eality instead of a slogan by bending very effort to enact a tax law which ill conscript our dollars also? A man iding from the draft is an object of ontempt; are weasel dollars, hiding rom taxation, less so?

It seems to me that, over and above he exemption permitted to every taxayer, in this time of emergency no inome, regardless of source, should be eft untouched by taxation.

During the debate on the previous ax bill, when the question was disussed of rescinding the tax exemption of certain securities, it was stated that o do so would be "an unpardonable reach of faith toward the holders of hese issues."

When conscription was in the offing, do you remember the assurance our President gave to parents in his Boston speech—that our young men were not being conscripted for service outside the United States? Mr. Roosevelt spoke in ll good faith, but events nullified his ssurance. In other words, circumstances altered cases. But if, even in the midst of total war, circumstances alter cases for persons and not property, then surely that brave phrase "equality of sacrifice" will ring hollow in the ears of many of our fellow-citizens who have already made their sacrifice.

I have heard it estimated that about eighteen billion dollars' worth of tax-exempt securities are outstanding! It is unlikely that many of them are investments of people of moderate means—they are more likely to be found in the investment portfolios of citizens in the upper income brackets.

While no member of my family happens to own any of the above-mentioned securities, there is another tax inequity of which my mother happens to be beneficiary—through an inheritance which takes the form of annuities.

The income-tax law states that 3 per cent of the amount paid for an annuity shall be considered taxable income. The result in this case is that only $370.92 of an annuity income of $1,080 is taxable. In the case of an insurance annuity amounting to $1,200, only the annual dividend—this year $93.90—is taxable until the beneficiary has received a sum equal to the commuted value of the policy. This means that after deducting personal exemption of $500 my mother has no taxable income, although her actual income is $2,280.

Please contrast this with the tax liability of a single person with no dependents whose earned income could cease at any moment. An annuitant, on the other hand, receives income year in and year out, and because of its certainty is further favored, since there is no obligation to save for a rainy day—not to mention the peace of mind which a sense of security brings.

With the best will in the world there can never be complete equality of sacrifice, for to equate the sacrifice of taxation with that made by families of men in the service would be unthinkable. But surely those of us who are called upon for economic sacrifice only should stand and deliver for the sake of common decency. M. L. S.

The Children of Europe

Dear Sirs: Recently Dr. Howard Kershner, former director of European relief for the Quakers, made a valiant but fruitless attempt to induce the British and American governments to relax their inflexible blockade of European ports of entry. His purpose was to bring aid to starving and disease-ridden children and babies of the occupied regions before it is too late. It goes without saying that the blockade is chiefly effective and deadly against the innocent victims of Nazi aggression, since the Germans are continuing to plunder ruthlessly their helpless slaves. As Dr. Kershner says, the present policy of Britain and the United States will leave all the peoples of Western Europe so weakened by starvation and sickness that the Germans will be the only people having the strength and health to rebuild Europe. The Anglo-American blockade indirectly works a terrible hardship upon the victims of the Nazis, thousands if not millions of whom are condemned to slow starvation, sickness, and even permanent impairment of health. A winter of untold misery awaits these unhappy peoples unless steps are taken to allow the entry of a few boatloads of foodstuffs and desperately needed medical supplies, for which the peoples of Europe can pay. They don't want charity. Now that victory is assured, can we not afford to take a chance on an experiment which has worked well in Greece, it seems, despite the attitude of the British Foreign Office? Is any effective military purpose being served by this slow torture of millions? The responsibility of the authorities who have made the decision is tremendous. I should not want to be in their place.

The Case of Winfred Lynn

Dear Sirs: We know that you, along with all democratic-minded citizens, are ashamed of the racial discrimination now being practiced in our armed forces. We know you share our concern at the sight of a Jim Crow American army fighting against Nazi racialism.

But what can we do about it? The army has disregarded all protests. How can we get action?

There is something practical and immediate you can do about it! The present racial policy of the military authorities is in flagrant violation of the 1940 Draft Act, under which the army is being selected and trained. Almost two years ago a Negro gardener named Winfred Lynn began his long legal fight to force the military authorities to obey the law. This fight is now nearing its climax. In 1944 the Lynn case will come before the Supreme Court of the United States.

In 1857 the Supreme Court decided that an obscure Negro slave named Dred Scott must be returned to slavery. This reactionary decision was one of the causes of the Civil War. Today the Supreme Court must decide the case of the obscure Negro gardener, Winfred Lynn. Slavery was historically outworn in 1857, and second-class citizenship for the Negro is outworn in 1944.

The legal side of the Lynn case is being handled by the American Civil Liberties Union. The noted civil liberties lawyer Arthur Garfield Hays is Lynn's counsel. Funds are needed for legal expenses. And funds are also urgently needed to arouse American public opinion in support of the case. Contributions may be sent to the National Citizens' Committee for Winfred Lynn, 1 West 125th Street.

The Shape of Things

EVER SINCE THE SURRENDER OF ITALY A handful of monarchist generals have been trying to polish up the royal crown, reupholster the throne, and patch the motheaten ermine, but the little King looks shabbier than ever and behaves worse. All the same, the most recent scheme to popularize the monarchy took in so trained an observer as Herbert Matthews of the New York Times. For the first time an Italian force was thrown into action against the Germans. Picked with care, this shock unit went into battle under the cross of Savoy, the royal emblem sewed on its uniforms and painted on its vehicles. The men made a brave enough showing but were badly mauled and suffered heavy losses. Nevertheless, wrote Mr. Matthews, they had showed fighting spirit under royalist leadership, and the Italian liberals would have to swallow their notion that a political change was essential before the army would throw itself into the struggle. But Count Sforza quickly pointed out that the military forces raised by the democratic parties have been disbanded by Badoglio and Basso, and that it was in the King's name that "our most valorous soldiers were sent to their deaths . . . in the service of Hitler." The Italian Committee of National Liberation condemned the King as "one of the gravest obstacles to the rebirth of the nation"; anti-royalist meetings in the University of Naples were broken up by Fascist-appointed officials—backed, we regret to say, by the AMG; and Signor Croce raised the possibility of a formal trial for the King unless he abdicated quickly.

*

IN THESE CIRCUMSTANCES IT WAS NOT THE liberals but Mr. Matthews who had to do the notion-swallowing. Four days after the dispatch cited above he reported anti-monarchist sentiment so widespread that "barring Allied support, it looks as if Victor Emmanuel's days as king are numbered." Unhappily it looks even more as though that support will be forthcoming. The Badoglio regime has been vested with a greater degree of authority, and in violation of pledges made at Moscow the Allied governments, through AMG, are threatening a drastic curb on political activity in southern Italy. The Committee of Liberation, whose scheduled conference in Naples was canceled by Allied authorities, has protested vigorously, and a joint decision by London, Washington, and Moscow is awaited. The moment is ideal to get behind the plea of the Committee for a Democratic Foreign Policy for suspension of the authority of the monarchy—as in Sicily—and recognition of the Committee of Liberation as an interim administrative agency pending the decision of the Italian people.

HAS THE ITALIAN FRONT BEEN RELEGATED to a minor place in Allied strategy? Certainly our progress there has slowed down to an extent which does not seem entirely attributable to the difficulties of the terrain, the weather, or the stubborn resistance of the enemy. These are obstacles not to be despised, but with the Anglo-American forces believed to be available in the Mediterranean at the time of the invasion of Italy, our overwhelming naval strength, and our marked superiority in the air there can be little doubt that Rome could have been captured by this time if the high command had considered that objective worth a comparatively high price. The fact that no attempt has been made to outflank the Germans by means of amphibious operations has suggested to some commentators a reservation of landing craft for more important work elsewhere. The use of Italian and French troops as reinforcements for the Fifth and Eighth armies may mean the transference of some British and American divisions to other theaters. In this connection it is natural to think of preparations for the coming western front, but an invasion of the Balkans—so often prematurely anticipated that amateur seers no longer like to refer to the subject—cannot be entirely ruled out in view of General Patton's visit to Cairo. Meanwhile the Yugoslav Partisans continue to pin down a very considerable German force. Supplies are being shipped across the Adriatic to this gallant and effective army, though not yet on anything like an adequate scale. One recent cause of delay may have been the devastating German air raid on the Adriatic port of Bari, in which, according to some accounts, as many as seventeen Allied ships were destroyed. The success of this attack is a warning against underrating the Luftwaffe. It still has a high nuisance value.

WINSTON CHURCHILL CAN ILL BE SPARED AT this stage of the war by either Britain or the United Nations, and it is good to learn, as we go to press, that he is on the mend. He showed the courage with which he has fought germs and Nazis alike by carrying on with the grueling round of conferences which began at Cairo, despite the fact that he was far from well when he left London. Before he took to his bed he had shared in the formulation of decisive plans for the achievement of victory. We wish him now a speedy and complete recovery so that his leadership will be available when the time comes to translate those plans into action.

WITH EVERYTHING ELSE HE HAS ON HIS mind, President Roosevelt must now decide whether Negro firemen shall function in the locomotive cabs of Southern railways. Evidence taken by the Fair Employment Practices Committee shows that the roads of the country need 850 more firemen and that many now employed are dangerously green. But the roads refuse to accept the order of the FEPC to cease their discriminatory practices because, they say, to execute the order would be to violate their agreement with the union and thus to "impair the whole war effort." The President is in an extremely difficult position. The FEPC, created by him rather than by Congress, lacks statutory authority. Using his war powers, he might take over the roads in order to force compliance, but it is unlikely that public opinion would indorse so drastic a solution. He could cancel war contracts with the affected roads, but not without almost crippling the war program. A likelier course would be to throw the weight of the Administration behind the Marcantonio bill to give the FEPC statutory power. But a far better solution would be a reversal of policy by the Railroad Brotherhoods, which are at this moment planning a nation-wide strike for higher wages. If white railroadmen are entitled to what they deem adequate pay, surely Negro railroadmen are entitled at least to jobs.

THE CALL OF THE BROTHERHOODS FOR A series of strikes will present another critical challenge to the Administration's efforts to hold the line against inflation. This challenge comes at a time when, as Chairman William H. Davis of the War Labor Board has declared, there seems to be an excellent chance of winning the home-front battle if the line can be held for another ninety days. Since a general railway strike at such a critical stage in the war is unthinkable, most observers assume that the Administration will be forced to give way even to the extent of scrapping the Little Steel formula. The recent action of the Senate in voting an eight-cents-an-hour increase to non-operating railway employees against the recommendation of Price Stabilizer Vinson suggests that Congress is prepared to throw over the Little Steel formula if the Administration is not. There is, of course, a feasible alternative. Congress could even at this late date rally to the support of the OPA's efforts to reduce the cost of living to the level of September 15, 1942, thus drawing the teeth of the brotherhoods' assertion that they are striking "against inflation for the privileged few and deflation for the many." If Congress continues to legislate inflation for the few in disregard of its plain duty, the Administration has no choice but to fight a delaying action on railway and other wages in the desperate hope that the people will force Congress to its senses.

ON THE SUBSIDY FRONT THE PROSPECTS FOR a compromise that will prevent an abrupt shattering of the stabilization program have substantially improved. Passage of a special resolution extending the life of the Commodity Credit Corporation for sixty days will give consumers and the general public more time to convince Congress that anti-subsidy legislation would be not only bad economics but bad politics as well. The crucial question of how much money will be voted for food subsidies remains, however, to be thrashed out. For an effective job, achieving a sufficient reduction in the cost of living to permit the Little Steel formula to be retained, at least $2,000,000,000 will be required in 1944. The prospects are for a much lower figure unless constituents get in some good work on their Congressmen during the Christmas recess. The news from the even more important tax front is extremely discouraging. Although the Senate Finance Committee added $144,000,000 to the House bill and eliminated the special 3 per cent levy on low incomes, the bill it reported to the Senate is utterly farcical as an anti-inflation measure. The Senate Finance Committee, like the House Ways and Means Committee before it, seemed far more concerned with extracting the last drop of revenue from the low income groups than with drawing off the excess spending power in the hands of the middle and upper income groups. Hence the reimposition of the notorious victory tax and the elimination of earned-income credit, with no increase in the rate on corporations and a reduction in the $10,000-a-year brackets.

A FARSIGHTED POST-WAR FARM PROGRAM for returning veterans was presented to the Cooley committee in the House of Representatives last week by Russell Smith, legislative representative of the National Farmers' Union. It calls for the establishment in the Department of Agriculture of an "RFC for family farmers," with special authority to assist veterans after the war. Veterans and family farmers would be given preference in the sale of farmland which had been acquired by the government for war purposes, and there would be a revolving fund to enable them to get started. Loans would also be provided for family-farm cooperatives. The National Farmers' Union presents its plan as a means of reversing dangerous trends in American agriculture. The family farm is in danger of dying out. From 1910 to 1940 the number of farms containing 1,000 acres or more increased more than 100 per cent, and the aggregate number of acres in farms of this class rose in the same period from 167,000,000 to 364,000,000 acres. At the same time the number of small family farms decreased. Since the New Deal there has been a slight downward trend in farm tenancy, and if this could be continued and the number of family farms increased, the basis of post-war democracy would be strengthened.

Letter to a Pfc

Pfc. John Doe, Somewhere in the Pacific

DEAR JACK: It's just as well the morning paper hasn't been slung into your foxhole these past few weeks, because our duly elected representatives in Congress—I'm tempted to say unduly elected in some cases—have been expressing themselves on the question of giving you a chance to vote next year. And a good deal of the discussion, if you can call it that, is not the kind of free speech you'd be particularly interested in dying for.

From where I'm sitting, it does seem that if Congress really wanted "our boys," as they call you so fondly, to have a say in choosing a President in the crucial year of 1944, it could be arranged. From where you're sitting, it must look even more plausible. Some of the ordinary and essentially minor rules about absentee voting would have to be suspended. But after all there's a war on, and several other rules have been suspended for the duration.

All this and a good deal more was pointed out by the sponsors and supporters of a bill that would have simplified the process sufficiently to allow you to cast a vote without taking too much time out from your war work. But in the end the Senate passed a substitute measure which leaves the matter in the hands of the state governments.

If you voted, or tried to vote, last year, you know what that means. Only eight state legislatures will meet in time to simplify absentee voting regulations. In only fifteen states are more than thirty days allowed for obtaining and casting absentee ballots; and all kinds of complex requirements—notices of intent, affidavits, applications, etc.—must be complied with. As a soldier wrote to the New York Times, "Anyone who like myself tried to vote in the 1942 election while in the army knows that it would take a very hardy soldier indeed to bother his commanding officer with all the problems of casting one simple vote. In most cases at least four interviews would be necessary" (my italics). It's easy to understand why only 28,000 of you voted.

I've already indicated the basic reason that motivated the opposition, which was made up of Southern Democrats and some Northern Republicans. It's very simple. They hate Roosevelt, and they're afraid he'll pick the Democratic candidate next year if he doesn't run himself. They know that the vote of some 9,000,000 of "our boys"—that means you—might decide the election, and they are afraid you might cast your votes for Roosevelt or his candidate. Of course the people who tried to get the vote for you were not unaware of your potential power either, but that doesn't make the behavior of the opposition any more savory.

The most violent and—shall we say?—picturesque orators for the opposition were Senator E. D. Smith of South Carolina and Representative John E. Rankin of Mississippi. Both come from poll-tax states where you have to pay to vote. As PM pointed out, Rankin owes his political career to the high art of keeping the vote low. In 1942 when he was reelected as usual, only 7,079 votes were cast for him, though the population of his district is given as 263,367. No wonder he believes in the state's right to keep the vote to a manageable size.

Naturally the people who put through the substitute measure don't admit that they don't want you to vote. The very suggestion not only outrages them; it moves them to tears that a crocodile would envy. They rest their case—on the Constitution! Listen, for instance, to "Cotton Ed" Smith. "Mr. President," he said, "I have one platform on which I shall live and die—my loyalty to the Constitution, my loyalty to states' rights, and my loyalty to white supremacy." He apparently never heard of the Fifteenth Amendment, which contains that little phrase about "race, color, or previous condition of servitude." Then he went on to tell a filthy joke about Negroes—on the floor of the United States Senate.

The question is now before the House, but apparently it isn't going to be voted on there until after the Christmas recess. Let's hope all your friends and relatives at home make such a fuss in the meantime that our duly elected representatives won't dare disfranchise you for the duration—and blame it on the Constitution. I'm designing a special New Year's card to send to Representative Rankin and Senator Smith. It's printed on asbestos.

Crocodile Tears

"LITERALLY," Assistant Secretary of State Breckinridge Long told the House Foreign Affairs Committee the other day, "the reports of the consular officers to the Department of State form one of the most thrilling and one of the most saddening and awful pages of our humanitarian history." We agree with Mr. Long, though in a sense other than he intended. "We have taken into this country since the beginning of the Hitler regime and the persecution of the Jews, until today," he said, "approximately 580,000 refugees." These figues were intended to impress the committee with the State Department's generosity. Figures could hardly be more deceptive. In the decade 1923-33 more than two million immigrants entered this country. The number given by Mr. Long for the Hitler decade is 75 per cent lower than for the pre-Hitler decade. It is false to describe these 580,000, as he did, as "refugees."

For the nine-year period 1933 to 1942, of 453,205 immigrants admitted to the United States, only 291,112 came from Europe. The rest were from non-European countries, with Mexico and Canada heading the list. Of the European immigrants, 243,420 came from countries now dominated by Hitler, and of all the immigrants during this period, 163,423 were Jews. "We did every legitimate thing we could do," Mr. Long declared. The best answer is the figures on immigration from the Reich itself since Hitler came to power. The annual German quota was 25,957. From the beginning of 1933 to the end of 1942 we admitted 123,573 immigrants from the Reich, less than half quota allotments. Here are the figures by years: 1933, 1,324; 1934, 3,515; 1935, 3,891; 1936, 6,073; 1937, 11,127; 1938, 17,868. In 1938 came the Anschluss, which added the Austrian quota of 1,413 to the German quota of 25,957. It was not until 1939 that we eased up on restrictions which had kept German immigration below quota since Hitler came to power. In 1939 we admitted 32,759 immigrants from Germany and Austria. Since then admissions have been below the combined quota (27,370). In 1940 admissions of German nationals were 26,083; in 1941 they were 15,051; in 1942 they were 4,883. The number admitted fell after the war began on the basis of a new excuse: Gestapo agents were invading the country behind rabbinical beards. The door, as Mr. Long said, "is open" but "carefully screened." Considering the thousands of applications, it should have been possible, if the department had been really generous, to do that "screening" and still admit the full quota each year.

Mr. Long made much of the fact that visitors' visas were used to permit some entries above quota, and gave the impression that this was largely to help Jewish refugees. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1942, the number entering on visitors' visas was 82,457 (2,292 of them Jews), the number departing 67,189 (1,250 of them Jews). Net: 15,268 on visitors' visas, 1,042 Jews. Most of the visitors were just visitors. In the last half of last year the net remaining on visitors' visas was 8,688, of which 134 were Jews. We do not believe that Jews require or ask more consideration than any other anti-fascist refugees, but they deserve at least as much. In the light of those figures we think it was hypocritical and unfair of Long to tell the committee that the State Department "cannot exclude persons from our sympathy and our sympathetic attention if they are not Jews," and thus inspire Mundt of South Dakota to reply, "It seems to me that would be treading a pretty dangerous path. It is sort of doing the Hitler thing in reverse." On the contrary, all that is asked is that Jewish refugees get as sympathetic consideration as non-Jewish and that some agency be established, as suggested by the Baldwin-Rogers resolution, to help save the stateless Jews of occupied Europe who have no government to speak for them. The need for some such agency, and the danger of leaving the fate of these people in the hands of professional Anglo-American diplomats, is thoroughly demonstrated by Long's attempt to confuse the issue and mislead the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

Year's End

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

WHILE Mr. Churchill recuperates in the sun of Egypt, he should have a chance to do a little quiet thinking about this war in which he plays so pivotal a role. If he uses his enforced rest for that purpose, it will be time well spent—however it may irk his impatient spirit. For at the year's end the progress of the war bears thinking about.

Mr. Roosevelt, brown and healthy after his safe return from the Middle East, is reported as exuberantly optimistic. Mr. Eden, in his careful speech to the Commons, was also, if more soberly, cheerful. Neither one told much about the results of the conferences they had attended, and perhaps nothing further can be told; but both emphasized again the improved relations among the major Allied powers resulting from the talks. I hope their good spirits are genuine; but so far the only evident result of the new unity is a great increase in political activity on the part of the Soviet Union. It is as if Moscow and Teheran had served as green lights assuring Russia that it could now drive ahead in Central and Eastern Europe without arousing the opposition or fear of its Western allies. Nowhere can one discern that common action which the recent talks seemed so definitely to promise. While Britain and the United States pursue their traditional policies, Moscow's moves are rapidly changing the political structure of the Continent.

The Czech-Russian treaty is an example. Planned long before Moscow and delayed as a result of British pressure, the treaty is an important stone in the construction of a new Central Europe. It would be too crude to say that Dr. Benes is putting Czechoslovakia under Russian protection. But he is at least establishing a connection so close as to guarantee his country against any future German threat—or any future Munich. The much-advertised clause inviting Poland's adhesion may have been inserted on the insistence of London and Washington, but the fact that both Czechs and Russians freely discuss their "common frontier" suggests that only a Poland prepared to give up its 1939 eastern boundary can share the security provided by the new pact.

The Soviet Union is also hurrying matters toward a climax in the Balkans. No one knows exactly how far the direct influence of Moscow has penetrated, but it is certain that the Bulgarian Partisans, like their brothers in Yugoslavia, are encouraged and backed by Russia. In Bulgaria the division is simple. Lift off the small pro-German ruling clique and the country is solidly and traditionally with Russia. The chance of an early collapse of the Nazi-controlled regime is good; if it comes, only a full occupation of the country by German troops can prevent the establishment of a pro-Russian government and the rise of a Bulgarian army to fight the Axis.

Greece presents a somewhat similar picture, although the influence of Russia is less evident. As long ago as June, 1942, The Nation published an article by Leigh White which described the attitude of Greek patriots toward King George and his reactionary regime. It was clear even then that resistance to the Germans inside Greece was weakened by the unpopular leadership of the government in exile. But Allied support of the royal government continued until just the other day, when the King issued a statement in Cairo, obviously the result of British pressure, announcing that the time of his return to Greece would "be determined when the hour of liberation" strikes. King George cannot be expected actually to step down from his throne until he receives another prod. But his end is clear.

And so is the end of the royal government of Yugoslavia. Britain and the United States are deeply committed to King Peter's regime; to break relations with it will seem a breach of faith and throw confusion into the ranks of the other exiled governments. It will also, above all, announce to the world the failure of British-American diplomacy in the Balkans and the success of Russia's policy. But the issue will have to be faced, and soon; for the new Partisan government has formally requested recognition, and Russia is not likely to delay long in giving it. Tito's army constitutes the advance guard of the Allied invasion of the Balkans. If his government requires Allied recognition in order to function effectively, it will get it. The British and Americans will do what they must; but again, as in Greece, they will do it only after events drive them to. For they never see in advance—never—that the popular forces in each occupied country are the ones to which they must ultimately turn for help.

Nowhere is this more dramatically demonstrated than in Italy, where the happenings of the last few days bear out word for word the analysis by Gaetano Salvemini published in recent issues of The Nation. The latest results of AMG policy are discussed elsewhere in this issue; here it is necessary only to suggest that among the subjects Mr. Churchill might contemplate during his convalescence is the dismal failure of Allied strategy in Italy. For our political and military record in that country provides a good sample by which to judge British-American methods in general.

Let Mr. Churchill ask himself why it is that the whole of Southeastern Europe is swinging toward Russia as toward a giant magnet. Let him ask himself why it is that in France and French North Africa and the French Levant and in Sicily and Italy popular feeling has shifted from warm friendship for the British and Americans to dull resentment. Let Mr. Churchill consider, as the year ends, how he and Mr. Roosevelt have been conducting their entire political war.

A new power structure is being built on the Continent. Theoretically it rests equally on the resources and energy of the three great nations that have so recently pledged their united effort for the war and the peace. Actually its main underpinnings are being laid in Moscow. Day by day Russia is increasing its political strength in Europe. By clinging to their assortment of discredited kings and generals and dictators, Britain and the United States are day by day losing the good-will of the peoples. Even their military plans are threatened by their political mistakes. And this, above all, is something for Mr. Churchill to think about, now that he has a little time on his hands.

Grist for Goebbels

BY I. F. STONE

WERE the principal events of the past week in Washington to be broadcast by the Axis radio, listeners in occupied Europe and Asia would be inclined to dismiss what they heard as typical Axis exaggerations, if not downright lies. They would hear that in America race prejudice was still so strong that sixteen Southern railroads preferred to suffer from a shortage of firemen rather than hire unemployed Negroes qualified by experience for such work. They would hear that in America respect for authority was so weak, recognition of the need for discipline in war time so rudimentary, that when a Presidential committee ordered those railroads to cease discriminating against Negroes, they publicly announced their refusal to obey and were applauded for it in Congress. Listeners under the Nazi heel, aware of the uses to which prejudice can be put, might be tempted to suspect American railroad "capitalists" of pitting race against race. But they would feel certain that they were listening to some more of Goebbels's handiwork if the Axis radio ventured to tell them that the action of the railroads was largely due to pressure from one of the most advanced sections of the American labor movement, the Railroad Brotherhoods. Past experience with Axis propaganda might lead listeners to scoff at the statement that these progressive unions had been forcing railroads to discharge Negro firemen and give their jobs to white. The Axis radio would purport to quote a Malcolm Ross, chairman of the President's Fair Employment Practices Committee, as explaining that Negroes had done most of the work as firemen on Southern railroads for half a century "until automatic stokers and Diesel-powered engines changed the dirty, heavy work into desirable jobs." The implications of this would seem another of those ugly Nazi canards, aimed this time at the working class of the South. These same brotherhoods—let us imagine we are listening for a moment longer to that Axis radio—are prepared to tie up the whole American railroad system on the eve of the second-front invasion. The five operating brotherhoods have ordered a strike to begin on December 30, and this order is the work not of an irresponsible minority manipulating the unions but of democratic processes and majority vote. The term "majority vote" is inadequate. For the vote was almost unanimous: 97.7 per cent of the 350,000 operating workers cast their ballot for strike action.

Their grievance is that a government board granted a four-cents-an-hour raise. They are prepared to strike for eight cents. (Sophisticated French workers accustomed to the tactics used by the "capitalist" press to inflame soldiers against workers will think this familiar propaganda when they hear it over their radios.) The non-operating unions are also threatening a strike. They want an eight-cents-an-hour raise "straight across the board." They were awarded a raise ranging from ten cents an hour for the lowest-paid workers to four cents an hour for the highest. The difference between the award and the demand in terms of total aggregate wage increase for non-operating railway workers is estimated at less than 10 per cent. (Imagine listening to this through the ears of a Chinese or a Yugoslav guerrilla.) Axis propaganda operates on the principle that the bigger the lie the harder it is for common folk to doubt it. But here we encounter the corollary: the more shameful the truth the harder it is for common folk to believe it.

I suppose many members of the brotherhoods will consider this unfair. Like everyone else, they have their grievances. The wages of the operating railroad workers have not risen as much as those of workers in manufacturing industries, but they were a good deal higher to start with. The question they must ask themselves is whether the difference between four cents an hour and eight cents an hour is worth a nation-wide strike call in the midst of a great war. I know that they feel pretty certain that there will be no strike. But what of the soldier abroad who hears of this strike call? What are his feelings likely to be? Will he be more friendly or less to the labor movement on his return, when American labor may face the greatest battle of its existence? Can brotherhoods which practice prejudice-as-usual and resort to strikes-as-usual expect to be considered on any better level than men who practice business-as-usual? The non-operating railroad workers have a stronger case than the operating, for they include some of the lowest-paid workers in the country. But the Vinson formula which they rejected would have given the lowest-paid third in their ranks more than an eight-cent raise. The question they must ask themselves is whether the minor difference between the Vinson award and the eight-cents-for-all that they want is worth the passage of the Truman resolution, a resolution which throws the doors open to a series of measures which will boost the cost of living.

The seventy-four-to-four vote in the Senate for the Truman resolution derived from many sources, few flattering to labor. One was the power of an organized minority like the brotherhoods. Another was the fear, expressed on the Senate floor, that the alternative would be a strike, and that the strike would lead to government operation of the roads, which are waxing fat on war profits. A third was the desire of the pro-inflationary forces in agriculture and industry further to compromise the hold-the-line fight, to make passage of subsidy legislation more difficult, to clear the way for similar legislation on milk, coal, oil, and a long list of other products. A Congress which talks as though it believes in laissez faire is entering with enthusiasm into the game of raising prices and wages by legislative fiat, an easy way to buy votes. The cost will be national disaster, with labor among the worst sufferers. A taste of what is coming may be obtained from the Disney bill to boost the price of crude oil, which passed the House 171 to 92, despite a brave fight by two oil-district Congressmen, Monroney of Oklahoma and Patman of Texas.

The pernicious parity concept, which tore a gap in the dike against inflation at the very beginning by boosting food prices, is extended by the Disney bill to petroleum. This threatens to launch a kind of leapfrog advance to inflation. The general commodity index, thanks largely to higher farm prices, has risen much more than prices of basic commodities like oil, which we have hitherto managed to hold down. "Parity" here means that we must provide an equivalent increase for crude oil. This in turn will push the general index still higher, laying the basis for further "parity" increases. Under this system the sky's the limit. There is no doubt that some marginal oil men have suffered from higher costs, and premium payments might well be used to stimulate the digging of new wells. But to grant a price boost of from thirty-five to seventy-four cents a barrel, as the Disney bill would, to all producers, further enriching some of the biggest profiteers in the war, is economically indefensible and politically scandalous.

O Little Town . . . (Restricted)

BY WILLSON WHITMAN

WREATHS on the doors of old white houses, wine-glass elms curving above quiet streets, snow caught on carved gateposts—in winter Litchfield, Connecticut, looks like a village on a Christmas card. It is beautiful in summer, too. But on Christmas Eve, with candles behind the fanlights on North Street, it is a lovely picture of Christmas peace.

No railroad and no movies—that we knew, but there had been an inn on the Green where travelers could spend the night. Now it wasn't there.

"No, no inn," they told us cheerfully at the drugstore after we got off the bus.

"But surely this isn't a town without an inn?" we said, up and down the street.

"I'm afraid so," replied the well-dressed customer at the grocery. She said it a bit smugly, as she might have said "no movies," and we began to feel unwanted. It hadn't been like this before. Then, though we had arrived after dark, unannounced, the people at the inn had made us welcome.

Finally we discovered the comfortable house which took tourists and the restaurant that furnished meals. It was at lunch that we got our next shock. The restaurant seemed to be patronized chiefly by townsfolk—there was, one gathered, a servant problem in Litchfield. Two Helen Hokinson ladies, natives, glared resentfully at the next table, where people were sitting whom we hadn't noticed until we followed the glare. Then it was unnecessary to hear what the ladies were saying. We were reminded of something we had heard or read— "They don't let Jews live in this town." Could it be true?

Was it true that even Einstein couldn't live in Litchfield? Why, right out there on the Green was a tablet to show where Lyman Beecher's church had stood, and Harriet Beecher Stowe was born here. Litchfield couldn't be a place for race prejudice. It couldn't be true, but we found it was—in America, in the United States, in New England, in the year of our Lord 1943.

Litchfield, Connecticut, was named for Lichfield in England. The T was put in by accident, but perhaps appropriately. T is for Tory, and many Litchfielders would have gone on drinking tea and paying the king's tax. Dates on the lovely old houses on North Street—1761, 1773—show that the people who lived there were good substantial citizens before the Revolution. One of the descendants, living in the same house, turned down membership in the D. A. R. "My ancestors sided with the British," she told them, "and I think I would have too."

Of course there is a Revolutionary tradition—George Washington slept here, and Ethan Allen, some say, was born here. But that is disputed; associations with Aaron Burr and Benedict Arnold are clearer.

It is the Civil War tradition that counts. This is the Beechers' own town. There were Howes here, too—today a Howe runs the Litchfield Enquirer, founded in 1825. And out in the hills, not far away, John Brown was born. Idealists, these, but there were fighters as well; the monument on the Green carries the names of boys who died at Cold Harbor and elsewhere in Virginia, and even down in Texas. You don't need the flag and the background of elms and white-trimmed red brick to tell you that here is a town in the sound American tradition, a town that should make two Southern visitors raised in the land of Jim Crow feel ashamed of themselves.

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord; his soul goes marching on. But Governor Lehman couldn't live here, or Justice Frankfurter?

Litchfield doesn't work for its living, of course; it doesn't have to. There isn't a factory or a labor union in the town. It was not always so; at the start Litchfield had a lot of industries. In 1810, according to the Gazeteer of the States of Connecticut and Rhode Island, the most important local industry was iron manufacture, requiring four forges, a slitting mill, and a nail factory. There were also a cotton mill, mills for oil and paper and grain, and no fewer than eighteen sawmills. Besides the five large tanneries there were "several on a smaller scale" and five saddlers to use the leather. There were two hatters' shops and two comb factories, two carriage-makers, a maker of fine furniture, and "a number of house carpenters, joiners, and smiths and other mechanics."

Not least worthy of mention is the builder who liked pineapple gateposts and Palladian windows. But all this was in the handicraft period, before the mills sprang up on the fall line and the railroads followed trade. After that happened, Litchfield's only money-making institutions were professional: Miss Pierce's school for young ladies on North Street, and Judge Tapping Reeve's law school on South Street. The young ladies married the young lawyers. One or two of the latter, like John C. Calhoun, got to be well known.

Lawyers and bankers lived on North Street, and preachers of course; and after the old families died out the new people coming in were those who conducted their business elsewhere. As we learned these facts, it was clear to a Southern mind that the pattern of old towns in Virginia and South Carolina was repeated here in the Connecticut hills.

But Litchfield has its great tradition of freedom. It was a station, they say, on the Underground Railroad. It can't be true that today Bernard Baruch or Robert Moses couldn't buy a lot in Litchfield.

"It isn't true. There is a Jewish lawyer living right in Litchfield and doing business there."

The exception proves the rule. The lawyer, still a young man, has lived his whole professional life in Litchfield; he came from law school in New York and Boston and went to work in Judge Hubbard's office. The old judge was an Episcopalian and a good solid citizen. The boy didn't "look Jewish," didn't "act Jewish," and had a name that might have been German. People liked him and still do. Even before the old judge died he was doing most of the work, and so people just went on with him. The firm name is the same, and some new people coming into the office call him Hubbard and make remarks about the Jews right before him, the way they are apt to do in Litchfield.

He takes it well; he belongs to the men's forum at the Congregational Church, and for a while he owned the Enquirer. Maybe he got a kick out of that. But he doesn't put himself forward otherwise. It was years before he bought a house, and then he had more sense than to buy one on North Street. When he sells North Street property now, he knows without being told that he is not to sell it to one of his own race.

Lonesome? Maybe, when people make thoughtless remarks. But he has money, and friends elsewhere, and he could leave if he wanted to. Maybe he likes staying to prove he has a right to stay. Maybe he thinks that in time the prejudice will die out.

Others think differently. A world-famous musician and composer, a playwright, a writer on public affairs—several people whose names are household words in America—Jewish by descent or marital connection, have seen the charm of Litchfield and, perhaps wisely, passed it by.

Won't the war make a change?

There are a hundred stars on the service flag at Litchfield's Catholic church, seventy-five stars on the Episcopal flag, and forty on the Congregational. The war has made changes in Litchfield life, brought many minor inconveniences. It is a wonder to an outsider where the Helen Hokinson ladies who come shopping on the Green get their gasoline.

There is war industry in nearby Bantam, and even a housing problem for workers. The Bantam plant makes aluminum devices for planes and has been doing war work since 1939. But although Bantam is the older community, its relatively modern ways leave Litchfield untouched, or, as Litchfielders would put it, unspoiled.

Litchfield shows no sign of reaction to world thought later than, say, the Nürnberg laws. The Enquirer had an editorial on "Our Town and Its Future" which suggested that the future might "differ, it may be radically in some respects, from conditions we have known at any other period in our past." Comments from "thoughtful men and women" were invited, and one citizen responded with a column-length letter containing this paragraph:

> Because of its isolation, the ideas of its founders, and the general type of the residents whom it has attracted through the years, Litchfield has from its foundation contributed more to the cultural values of life than to its material phases. . . . The town has been thought of chiefly as a cultural community. It therefore tends to attract new residents from those who seek cultural surroundings. These in turn spread the flavor of culture and enhance its reputation from that standpoint. Wherever Litchfield is known, its name is held in great respect because of the atmosphere which is thus attributed to it.

The writer continued along this line to the conclusion that any form of material progress that detracted from its cultural distinction would harm the town. Another reader corrected the newspaper's statement that in 1800 Litchfield had been the fourth-largest town in Connecticut; it was in 1810. There seemed to be no unfavorable reaction to the editorial disclosure that in 1940 the population was 600 less than it had been 130 years before.

Some kinds of population, of course, Litchfield just doesn't want. A good many people whose books are in the town library, whose music couldn't be kept off the air, are barred from buying property in Litchfield. Cannot a cultural community choose its own kind of culture? And, in truth, are there no cultural values—precious, irreparable old things—to be lost in the inrush of the vulgar and the foreign? No movie house on the Green—you were glad of that. No trains to smudge the white-painted fanlights. Why not let Litchfield and the few old towns that are left keep themselves to themselves, as wreaths and wax fruit were kept under glass bells in old-fashioned parlors?

Years ago James Truslow Adams wrote an article on what he called the law of diminishing returns applied to places. In his recollection, he said, Montauk Point on Long Island had been a lovely, quiet spot—a place of natural beauty. Now it was full of pop bottles. He didn't mind sharing Montauk Point, he said, but the fact was that nobody now had the Montauk Point that had been. Trampled by the herd, it was gone forever. It couldn't be shared. It no longer existed.

So Litchfield, shared, would cease to exist? It is one of those deep instinctive arguments hard to combat because they aren't brought into the open. It would be easy to love Litchfield to death. It's only a little town.

But what about Litchfield's contribution to cultural values elsewhere? Other Connecticut towns—Old Lyme, and Sharon of the beautiful Hebraic name—don't welcome Jews either. Jews aren't wanted in the New York suburbs of Bronxville and Jackson Heights. Only a little cancer, but it grows. Surveys show anti-Semitic prejudice throughout the country to be increasing, and to be greatest not in the prejudice-ridden South but in educated New England.

When we have to face the issue of post-war immigration, such prejudice must be considered. We could do worse than adopt a proposal made many years ago—that we continue to welcome immigration but assign the immigrants to specific regions. Professionally trained refugees could then be directed to parts of the country where doctors or lawyers are needed, farm workers could be absorbed in rural districts, and so on. Litchfield might be saved by this solution, though it could hardly be expected to show gratitude since the author of the proposal was a Jewish correspondent of the New York Herald named Karl Marx.

Meanwhile, why not leave Litchfield in peace, resisting modernization in all its ugly forms? Like Charleston contra mundum,[*] let the natives withstand any foreign invasion, bar Italians and Germans and all sorts of people with different cultures.

Only they don't say, in Litchfield, "We won't sell or rent property to Italians or Germans or White Russians or Poles." They say, "We won't sell or rent to Jews." The town of the Beechers has already changed, where it matters—in the head, in the heart.

Litchfield churches are important. St. Anthony's, Roman Catholic, is best attended; St. Michael's, Episcopal, has the most expensive altar. There is no synagogue, naturally, although a builder too lazy to construct a pentagon has put two six-pointed stars on the Methodist church. The Congregational church is oldest and most important. The building where Beecher preached is gone now, but the white church on the Green, with the boxed-in pews, is older.

Litchfield clergymen, like clergymen everywhere, are approachable. They will even talk about anti-Semitism.

"It's not a new idea in the town," one minister said. "It's just that Litchfield people are conservative."

"And they think they have a right to do as they please with their own property?"

"Exactly. And with their social life. They don't welcome strangers of any sort very readily, I'm afraid."

The minister seemed honestly not to understand, at first, a Southerner's questions about the race problem in Harriet Beecher Stowe's home town. A Litchfield lady who owned a house at Bantam had rented to Negroes, and it hadn't been a popular gesture, but otherwise he knew of no race problem.

"Then it isn't true that Jews can't buy property?"

[*] The Nation, November 20, 1943.

Oh, that. Yes, it was true, he believed. Just a sort of general agreement—yes, you could call it a Christian unity among Litchfield people on that point. He smiled at that. No, they didn't realize that it was Hitler's party line. Just didn't follow it through. And of course there had been people who admired Mussolini because he made the trains run. As for this Jewish question—

He was as polite and as distressed as a Mississippi minister asked why Negroes can't vote, and quite as helpless to mend matters. He saw no likelihood of change except as the older generation died off. "Certainly not because of the Four Freedoms," he said with a Republican glint in his eye. But there really was no problem because there were no Jews in the town, except of course the one lawyer who was well thought of.

"Just what they say down South—there's no Negro problem except when the Yankees try to make one. Southerners keep them in their place, in the Jim Crow car."

For some reason he didn't quite like that, but he was urbanity itself as he accepted a Southerner's compliments on Litchfield architecture.

"Yes. Yes. And shall we say, next time you come we hope you won't find North Street full of Jews?"

It was a time to wonder whether the successors to the Beecher pulpit in Litchfield ever had occasion to dust off the Beecher sermon preached sixty-six years ago on the occasion of an exhibition of anti-Semitism new and shocking to this country—the exclusion of Jewish guests from the Grand Union Hotel at Saratoga Springs. Dr. Beecher reviewed at length civilization's debt to the Jews in morals, politics, and social justice, and the particular religious debt of all Christians. He noted with approval that "they are becoming land-holders in America. . . . They come here to live and stay; and their children will intermarry with ours; their blood will flow into the common stream with ours; and if their virtues might be incorporated with ours it would be of unspeakable advantage to us." He added a hope: "May they understand that under this government there is no place to which they may not aspire—no sphere of finance, no walk in literature, no avenue to honor, no field of art or of science, which is shut to them. The heaven above their head is not more free to every one of them than all the ways of men in this land."

So spoke Beecher; and in Litchfield the great Beecher elm still lifts its branches to the heaven he saw arching above North Street. But the clergyman now standing in Beecher's shoes made it plain, in a pleasant-spoken way, that Beecher's hope was mistaken. St. Peter and St. Paul couldn't live on North Street.

The New Pacific Front

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE outstanding war news of the past few weeks concerns the developing American offensive in the Central and Southwest Pacific. Though they have been cautiously conducted in order to avoid heavy casualties, the recent thrusts in these areas are the most important moves made by the United States in a year.

The offensive is two-pronged. In the Southwest Pacific the forces under General MacArthur have been moving west and north in the general direction of the Philippines. The story of their progress repeats itself: heavy air bombardment of a strong point is followed by an advance on land and sea from one base to another. Unfortunately, at each step stubborn Japanese resistance and the obstacle of the jungle cause a long delay which gives the enemy a chance to strengthen the base to which he retires. The desirability of this method of getting to Tokyo cannot be justly gauged at the moment, for we have used only small contingents in our attempt to advance. It should be recalled, moreover, that the southern route was not our choice but was forced on us by the necessity of defending Australia and New Zealand. Since the limited forces then available did not permit diversions elsewhere, we were obliged to wage war in an unfavorable area, where two years of fighting, though they have inflicted large losses on the enemy, have not brought us much closer to the Japanese mainland. The Solomons—most of them—a few outlying islands, and a third of New Guinea are piker profits from so long a struggle. At this rate twenty years might well elapse before our soldiers marched down the streets of Tokyo. The snail's pace cannot be attributed to defective direction, for our leadership in this area, with some lapses, has been sound though exceedingly cautious. Greater boldness may come with the greater military might we can now supply.

The length and difficulty of the southern road to Tokyo lend significance to the recent venture into the Central Pacific, by which the Gilbert Islands were captured in four days. The venture was an experiment with a different technique of war in a new and promising area, though it was aided by the bases so laboriously obtained farther south, which supplied many of the planes for the preliminary softening by air. The lessons learned from this experiment should enable us to shorten the Pacific war.

The details of the expedition, reported far better than has been the navy's usual practice, are of interest. After neutralization of nearby air bases, a huge fleet, covered by its own planes, moved in for the kill. Unlike the Japanese in similar cases, we did not send a boy to do a man's work but provided a naval force more than adequate for the purpose. There were two good reasons for its size: first, nothing short of the main Japanese fleet could have challenged us with any prospect of success; and, second, a large force could do the job more quickly and with smaller loss.

The last step, the landing of marines to mop up resistance, proved by far the hardest, and demonstrated the limitations of both air power and sea power. Despite the most intense bombardment from land and sea Japanese pillboxes had to be cleaned out the hard way. Inevitably losses at Tarawa were large, though well below those of the enemy. While better management in the future may reduce such losses, we must expect to pay a substantial price for further gains.

Nevertheless, the Central Pacific route to Japan has many advantages over island-hopping in the southwest. It avoids the long circuitous approach through the Southern Hemisphere, and it presents fewer natural obstacles. Most of the atolls of the Gilbert, Marshall, Caroline, Marianas, and Bonin groups are small, flat, and rather barren. Operations are hindered neither by the dense jungles of the South Pacific nor by the weather troubles of the Aleutians. An invaded island can be won in a few days, or even hours. Finally, a success would place American bases on the flank of all southward Japanese communications. Before the war these advantages were considered so important that the approach through the Central Pacific was regarded as the best if not the only feasible way to attack Japan.

In one respect operations in the Gilberts and Marshalls have been disappointing: the navy has failed to exploit fully the element of surprise by mounting other invasions immediately after seizing the Gilberts. True, the delay has allowed us time for the consolidation of gains and for making any tactical changes suggested by experience—in other words, it will help to keep down future casualties—but it has also afforded breathing-time to the enemy and given good notice of American intentions. However, the flexibility of our war plans in the Pacific makes a shift of attention to a new area always possible.

On the other side of the world, the Russian front has reached something approaching temporary stability, and it is possible to weigh the results of a year of fighting. During 1943 the northern part of the front has remained nearly stationary, but in the central and southern sectors the Red Army has gained hundreds of miles. The battle line has swung as on a hinge and at present runs almost directly north and south except near the Sea of Azov. The front has thus been reduced in length by several hundred miles.

On two occasions during the past year the Wehrmacht came very close to the sort of disaster which could have ended the war. In February the German armies in the south were flanked and threatened with encirclement. More recently, in late October and early November, the simultaneous successes scored in sealing the Crimea and in pushing down from the Dnieper bend toward Krivoi-rog seriously imperiled perhaps sixty German divisions. None of the later Russian attacks on the central front have offered so serious a threat.

The escape of the Germans from these two traps is typical of what they have been able to do even in defeat. In both cases sharp attacks on Red Army units which had outrun their supply lines gave the threatened armies the chance to escape destruction. Bad weather also played a part in slowing Russian progress at critical moments.

Despite their stinging defeats the Germans are still extremely powerful on land. They have had to conduct some long retreats in order to survive, but these retirements, made with great skill, have usually served their purpose. Moreover, the logistics problem of the Germans has been eased while that of the Allies has been made harder. Both in Italy and Russia the Nazis are fighting skilfully and well. They cannot, of course, retreat indefinitely, but they can still fall back for hundreds of miles before Germany is subjected to the horrors of invasion. From time to time reports of lowered enemy morale make their appearance, but in general these have not been substantiated on the battlefield.

For several weeks neither side has made any large territorial gains. Minor actions have occurred on the central front, at the Kiev bulge, and in the Dnieper bend as the Germans have counter-attacked and striven to lessen the Russian threat. In all likelihood the present comparative lull, which is mainly due to the weather, is being used by both sides in preparation for a greater struggle.

The steps being taken by the Germans are certain to prove mainly defensive since all chance of a complete military victory has evaporated. While the Nazis can set up defenses farther west, they would probably prefer to anchor as much of their defense on the Dnieper as possi-

Far more important are the plans of the Soviets. Since a strong German offensive is a very remote possibility, they no longer have an incentive to hold huge armies in reserve as during former years. On the contrary, in 1944 the Red armies have every reason to attack relentlessly in an effort to win the complete military decision which so narrowly escaped them in 1943. Reserves may be thrown in now for another reason also. Stalin has certainly been promised in very definite terms the long-demanded Anglo-American assault on Western Europe. Only the time and place of the attack and its relationship to a Russian offensive remain uncertain. It is very possible that either the Anglo-American zero hour will be moved up or the Russian time-table slowed down to assure a simultaneous attack from many directions and prevent much shifting of enemy reserves.

While the main European front has been comparatively quiet, the Allies have scored tactical gains on the Atlantic and in the air over Europe. In both theaters Germany's widely heralded new weapons have been unable to reverse the trend toward defeat. The leveling-off of American shipbuilding, coming on top of record-breaking production, tells a story which is confirmed by news releases on submarine sinkings. Submarines are now a major nuisance, not a major threat.

Improved German defense against air attacks has been met by an alteration in bombing tactics. Feints, the use of cloud masses to hide attackers, the splitting up of fleets to attack several objectives, the repeated saturation bombings of an especially valuable target are not new, but they have recently been employed with singular imagination and effectiveness. The percentage of losses on R. A. F. raids has actually gone down in recent weeks. The losses of the American Eighth Air Force on its daylight precision raids, on the other hand, have mounted. However, there is little doubt that we can still afford the price exacted. With most of its forces tied up elsewhere Germany continues to be in a singularly unfavorable position to meet air attack. The constant pounding has certainly weakened German industry and eased the path of invasion. We should be on our guard, however, against expecting miracles from the air war. A large amount of German industry has yet to be bombed, and the repeated raids on Essen, Cologne, Emden, and other targets are admissions that some of the earlier attacks did less damage than was thought.

The Italian campaign continues to get the headlines, but it does not deserve them. The Germans have made no real attempt to defeat the Allied forces since they failed to do so at Salerno. Instead, they have waged a very successful delaying action, aided greatly by mountainous terrain and heavy rains. Both sides have fought cautiously and refrained from committing themselves too deeply, and neither has recently been guilty of many mistakes.

As the United States enters its third year of war there are many portents of success. The United Nations have moved far along the path to victory and are justifiably confident. But the war has not yet been won. Final triumph waits at the end of a long and bloody road.

Diary of the Future

BY VERNON BARTLETT

[This is the concluding instalment of "a cautionary tale . . . a rash attempt to write history before it has happened," by a distinguished British journalist and member of Parliament. In the preceding issue Mr. Bartlett outlined some of the problems with which the various commissions of the Washington Peace Conference were engaged.]

VII. The International Police Force

NOVEMBER 4. Several days of sensation and bad temper. The Armaments Commission has been meeting in even more somber secrecy than the other commissions. It has been able to use the argument that since the war against Japan is still on, secrecy is necessary for reasons of security. The reply to that one is that no plan for the general control of armaments, as against the unilateral and perpetual disarmament of an aggressor state, is likely to encourage the Japanese to fight with greater vigor or to give them valuable military information. Then the secrecy merchants trotted out the argument that all the conference needed to do was to regulate the disarmament of Germany and the other European aggressors, to which the reply is that the methods used for preventing Germany from ever making war against us must fit into the general pattern.

The Czechoslovak delegation had taken the lead in preparing a scheme for an international air police (cf. diary, September 17) and had won for it widespread support among the smaller European nations. Very correctly they had kept it secret until they could obtain the commission's agreement to its publication. There was a row last Tuesday because that agreement was not forthcoming, despite their argument that no international police would ever be established until public opinion had had time to accustom itself to the idea. It was known that the opposition to publication came mainly from the British and Americans.

Then, on Thursday morning, Iverach Macdonald was able to send a very complete summary of the scheme to the Times of London and Drew Middleton an equally complete one to the Times of New York. Everybody accused everybody else of bad faith. Where the news came from I don't know, except that Iverach tells me he did not get his story from the Czechs themselves. Most of us newspapermen got nasty cables from our papers asking why we had been scooped. Ted Montgomery and I each had one from our editor, and in our distress we drank so much rye whiskey with Middleton, who had his success to celebrate, that I woke next morning feeling—in Drew's words—as though a dwarf had walked over my tongue with muddy boots on.

And this morning comes the cable to Anthony Eden signed by a couple of hundred members of Parliament. Their protest that the British delegation is handing over British defenses to foreigners would have been out of date at the end of the last war. In fact, it's even more misleading and deceptive than the warning that came to the Versailles Peace Conference from a roughly similar bunch of members of Parliament. But it has put the fear of the devil into the minds of our delegates.

November 11. This morning's sensation was produced by Victor Gordon-Lennox in the Chicago Daily News. General de Gaulle is in one of his Joan of Arc moods, and has told Anthony Eden that he has it in mind to leave the conference and to summon a rival one in Brussels or Paris. He hinted—according to Victor's story—that he had the support of the Russians for a scheme to enable the Europeans to decide their own future without the intervention of non-European states such as the British Commonwealth or the United States. He was particularly bitter that these two great powers should put forward their demands for the control of any international police force at a conference to decide the fate of Germany and Italy and their lesser European allies.

A French colonel, two American majors, and a British civilian had a terrific row at a table near ours in the Mayflower this evening. "Do you realize," Ted Montgomery asked me in the middle of it, "that today is the anniversary of the armistice that ended the last war?"

November 12. Axes are being ground so noisily and so aggressively that the voices of the smaller nations can scarcely be heard. Their first demand is of course accepted by all the delegations—that Germany and Italy shall not be allowed to build or to possess aircraft of any kind for fifteen years and after that time shall be entitled to do so only if the nations change this decision by a four-fifths majority vote. If all airfields everywhere in the world are open to the aircraft of the international air police and the commercial aircraft of all the signatory nations, these two countries will not be able to train pilots even if they are able in some way to get machines. You may be able to hide factories—although it is very doubtful whether you could manufacture so complicated an instrument as an airplane in secret—but you certainly cannot hide an airfield. Since aircraft and air-borne divisions are so vitally important in modern war, this restriction on Germany and Italy should make it unnecessary to maintain large Allied forces of occupation in these two countries.

Therefore the delegations of large and small powers agree on this first demand. They don't on the second, which is that the commander-in-chief and the majority of members of the chief of staff's committee be from the smaller states, so that too much strength shall not be placed in the hands of the United States, Great Britain, the Soviet Union, and China. Nor do they agree on the third, which is that members of the international air police should wear no badge to denote the country of their origin. The over-fifties, whose opposition is based on nationalism, are making the most of the argument that this demand is incompatible with the fourth—that except in times of emergency, and particularly in the first few years, an effort should be made to keep a high proportion of members of this force in the country of their origin, so that public opinion will be helped to look upon the international air police as its own police force.

If there is a real row on this, I suppose I shall fly back to London in the hope of taking part in a House of Commons debate. It will be a great tragedy, it seems to me, if we lose this opportunity of starting off a real international force with an international loyalty. It could be done; in the early days of the League of Nations one found a real esprit de corps developing among men of all nationalities in Geneva. On a more limited scale, General Eisenhower achieved it in the Mediterranean. Also we went a long way toward it when men of several nationalities were brigaded together or flew in the same squadrons to fight the Germans. To succeed in this more ambitious scheme we should start with as few outward signs of different nationalities as possible. Some of my colleagues in Parliament are going on a deputation to the Prime Minister to urge this view on him and to try to counteract the effect of the cable from our two hundred other colleagues—confound them!

There is also likely to be a great deal of dispute about the proposal that all aircraft be produced under international license. One of the troubles in the old days was that the small nations depended for their defense on a few great armament manufacturers in a few great countries. This tempted them to set up factories of their own and thus to increase the competition for markets. Also their sense of insecurity made them ready to believe stories about the wicked intentions of their neighbors and inclined to order weapons they couldn't afford. And the manufacturers, with the money they received from these poor and nervous little countries, built up bigger and better armaments for use by the great powers.

It seems absurd that we should start this trouble and distrust all over again in the matter of aircraft. The American objection to internationalism is much more comprehensible than the British, since the States have built up such enormous production. On the other hand, the very immensity of it is proving the strongest argument for national, and ultimately international, control.

I have had enough of this. I drafted a cable to my editor asking for permission to come home. Dined alone in an atmosphere of gray misery and drank rye whiskey. The dwarfs with muddy boots on will be active during the night, but I tore the cable up. I suppose one will have to see it through.

November 15. Dined with Harold Nicolson, and we got to talking of the last peace conference and of the way in which so many of its mistakes are being repeated a generation later. He reminded me that we had both written books about it. "Yours was very good," I said. "Yours was very bitter, but not too much so," he replied, "I wonder what sort of books we should write about this one?" I quoted to him a sentence about the last peace conference from his own book, "Why Britain Is at War": "The conference was conducted in an atmosphere of angry and hysterical rush." I left him shortly to go up to my room and to run through the pages of this diary. Here, I thought, was the material for another book about another peace conference. But I was too bitter, too sick at heart, to polish it into a neat volume. Perhaps, even so, my publisher might be interested.

So much for my unlived diary, written now in the hope that I may not have to live it later on. A hundred and fifty years ago Thomas Paine wrote these words, which should still inspire men today: "We have it in our power to begin the world over again." They are more true now than they were when they were written by that extraordinary Anglo-American who was elected to the Convention in Paris during the French Revolution. For now words, arguments, and appeals can encircle the world in a fraction of a second, and oceans have ceased to be obstacles to the spread of ideas.

It is because I believe in our power, the power of ordinary humble men and women, that I have asked you, at a time when we still have to face the nagging anxieties of war, to realize how great an effort we shall have to make even when the war is over. Justice Brandeis said of the men who won American independence that they believed "liberty to be the secret of happiness and courage to be the secret of liberty." Millions of people, by their resistance to tyranny during the last few years, have shown that they share this belief. With so many allies there is no cause to be faint-hearted.

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

How Fascism Came to Argentine

FROM the beginning this section has taken a serious view of the situation created by the coup d'état of Ramirez. To those who look upon this war as just another, greater military struggle, the only important question was whether the new Argentine regime would or would not break with the Axis. Nothing else mattered. That Ramirez was ideologically identified with the Axis, that he would never rupture relations if there were any way to avoid it, did not interest them. Nor did they realize that even if a break were accomplished, it would be only a formal gesture which left untouched the fundamental aspect of the Argentine problem—the existence in the greatest country in South America of a fascist dictatorship, born at the very time when fascism was being defeated on every battlefield.

I have declared a hundred times that the only way to win this war for democracy, to assure collective democratic security, is to establish firmly the principle that the survival of a single fascist state in Europe, in Asia, or in America is a menace to the rest of the world and as such intolerable.

Full understanding of the gravity of the Argentine situation cannot be obtained from isolated news items or comments in the daily press. The threat implied by the existence of the Ramirez regime can be measured only if the present circumstances are placed in their historical context, if the incidental is separated from what is a natural consequence of the past. As in every country of Latin America, the middle class in Argentina has never had enough organized strength to thwart the repeated attempts of military cliques to gain control of the government. The Partido Radical, considered the strongest party in the country, ruled for fifteen years without a clear political line, much less an economic or social program. Its outstanding figure, Irigoyen, President of Argentina from 1916 to 1922, was brought back to the presidency in 1928 by an impressive majority at the polls. He was a myth; not much of a ruler. I visited him in 1922 in my capacity as delegate of the Nansen Mission, which helped fight the famine in the Ukraine. He impressed me as a generous and well-meaning man. But neither he nor his party, at that time or later, was able to evolve a program based on anything more solid than an inarticulate desire for freedom.

In 1930, therefore, General Uriburu and his officers found it an easy matter to put an end to fifteen years of Radical administration. But if Radicalism had failed to define a program, the military men who took its place had nothing more constructive to offer. Moreover, they lacked the popular appeal which characterized Irigoyen and explained his large following. A few months of Uriburu's dictatorship were enough to reinstate the Radicals in public favor. The Argentine masses could not reconcile themselves to the abandonment of constitutional methods. They rallied around the three anti-dictatorship parties—the Partido Demócrata-Progresista, the Partido Radical, and the Partido Socialista. And the strong men of the government, forced by the opposition to institute elections, adopted every device of corruption to prevent a genuine expression of the people's will. Since 1930, whatever may have been believed in the United States, Argentina has had no truly representative government.

On this ground, fertilized by thirteen years of arbitrary rule, the colonels established their government in June, 1943. That is what makes their presence in the Casa Rosada so grave. It is not a mere temporary reflection of fascism. It is fascism with a past, with deep roots, growing out of a period during which the people's franchise was never honored but always falsified and twisted to suit the will of the powerful.

The war has played into the hands of the colonels. Their most ardent supporters, the landowners and the big cattle-raisers, are interested only in profiting from this war as they profited from the last, when they sold their products to both camps at fabulous prices. The importance of the role of the cattle-raisers and landowners in the political life of Argentina may not be fully appreciated in the United States. Or the role of the cattle. It is more than thirty years since the last census of human beings was taken in Argentina. But every year a detailed estimate of livestock is published. We don't know how large the Argentine population is today, but we do know that in 1942 Argentina counted more than thirty-one million head of beef cattle, fifty million head of sheep, five million head of pork, seven million horses, and three million goats. The land which produces the excellent Argentine meat and cereals is vast, but it is owned by a few thousand families. Millions of people live in miserable circumstances, barely able to obtain their livelihood. Certainly it is not difficult for the landowners to play a decisive role in any major Argentine crisis. Today they want neutrality and no idle chatter about the century of the common man.

The disparity between the activity of the Axis and that of the democracies in Argentina also helps the colonels. The Axis is energetic, dynamic; it has enlisted the support of the Spanish Phalanx and the Spanish clergy in its machinations. As late as December 12 a cable from Lisbon reported the departure of forty Spanish priests for Buenos Aires. In contrast, the democracies are weak and hesitating. Americans and British vie with each other in trying to establish a firm hold on Argentina for the period following the war. The office of the Coordinator of Latin American Affairs publishes a magazine, En Guardia, which every liberal Argentine considers an insult to his intelligence. Allied diplomacy flirts now with one Latin American dictator, now with another. American universities welcome the opportunity to confer honorary degrees on tyrants, great or small. If Ramirez would only break with the Axis, they would gladly make him a Doctor of Laws—even though he is destroying the universities in Argentina. All these errors and contradictions are effectively used by Axis agents to discredit democracy.

The Ramirez coup d'état cannot be interpreted as anything so dignified as a revolution, despite Colonel Perón's easy use of the arrogant and pompous phraseology of National Socialism. The overturn of June 4 was not a revolution but a cuartelazo, a military coup. Even the entrance of the "G. O. U.," the conspiratorial group which brought Ramirez to power (the initials stand for "Government, Order, Unity"), was no innovation. Secret cells have always existed in the Argentine army. The only novelty is the extreme and clearly defined fascist tendency of the G. O. U.

The growing strength of Argentine fascism has not, however, eliminated internal weakness and confusion. The coup d'état was achieved without previous consultation with the army and without the support of the navy, which continues to be hostile to Ramirez. The coup was a child of the city of Buenos Aires, in whose vicinity lies the Campo de Mayo, the traditional gathering place for regiments which perform the cuartelazo. Since its inception the movement has lacked a chief with prestige. The previous public record of General Ramirez was confined to a broadcast to Brazil which praised the Estado Novo of Getulio Vargas. The movement was born without a program, basing its appeal on a few commonplace and rhetorical slogans against the corrupt administration of the Castillo regime and a few ambiguous words about the "fulfilment of the continental pacts." The widespread hatred of Castillo made the denunciation of his administration very palatable to the masses. And in their desire to see Argentina end its unpleasant isolation, the Allied embassies took his reference to the "continental pacts" as a happy sign that Ramirez intended to break with the Axis. Those two facts explain the popular acclaim accorded Ramirez in his first days of power and the speed with which the United States recognized his government, against the advice of trustworthy pro-Allied elements in Argentina.

Colonel Perón

For about six months the colonels succeeded in concealing growing differences in their own ranks and between themselves and the army. But now the disunity has become apparent, and measures have had to be taken to alleviate it. To begin with, the colonels' government has been reduced to three effective members. The triumvirate has been formed outside the Cabinet because, in one respect at least, Ramirez respects the constitution. That document limits the Cabinet to eight members. And so, when the new Department of Labor was created, Juan Perón, Ramirez's right-hand man, was necessarily appointed Under Secretary instead of Secretary. The power of government is concentrated in the hands of Perón, Enrique González, Secretary of the Presidency, and Emilio Ramirez, Chief of Police. Each one tries to extend his control at the cost of the others.

González fancies himself as a Goebbels, and under his direction a true Ministry of Propaganda has been installed, in the image of the one set up in 1933 by the shrewd and malignant Nazi. It already controls the press, the radio, book publishing, the theater, the movies.

Lieutenant Colonel Hector J. Ladvocat, Under Secretary in charge of press relations, has made it clear that no editor can fool with the colonels. Now and then the great papers, which for years were the pride of all Argentines, still allow themselves the satisfaction of publishing an editorial praising freedom and reaffirming their solidarity with the United Nations. But they measure every word, and no reference is ever found in the Argentine press to persons whom the police arrest in the night and abduct from the capital.

One of the functions of the new department is to "cooperate" with the foreign correspondents in Buenos Aires to make certain that no news goes out from Argentina inimical to the "national interest." This determination to control the news may arise from a desire to conceal the efforts the dictatorship is making to extend its influence throughout South America by creating a strong military bloc under Argentine leadership. The plan is very ambitious, and in the minds of its mysterious promoters it includes Paraguay, Bolivia, Chile, and Peru. I say "mysterious" because the best observers in Buenos Aires begin to think that some hand which is not that of Ramirez directs the plot. But whoever directs it, the idea behind it is clearly of Nazi origin. It can be summarized as follows: As a consequence of the concessions which, for military reasons, the United States and Great Britain are obliged to make to Russia, the Soviet Union will emerge from the war as the strongest political power among the Allies. The United States and Great Britain may perhaps have found a way to avoid bolshevization. But if these five countries of South America remain separated, or if they rely solely upon the protection of the United States, they will be the object of a powerful Communist penetration. The only way to avoid this is by the creation of "strong" governments in each country, composed, of course, of colonels and generals, and dependent upon Argentina for political and military guidance. Together they may successfully resist the Communist plague.

It is in relation to this plan that one must consider the picturesque details of the current visit to Argentina of the dictator of Paraguay, General Morinigo, who has been received in Buenos Aires with unprecedented pomp, reminiscent of the reception given the heads of the small satellite states by Hitler before the war. Indeed, the Hitlerian aspect of the new regime strikes even the visitor. I talked the other day with an American business man who had just returned from Buenos Aires. He is connected with the film industry and spent many years in Europe. "How would you define Argentina today?" I asked him. He said, "Germany in 1933."

Juan Perón, the most capable and audacious member of the triumvirate, tries to manipulate the working class through the newly created Department of Labor, combining demagogic promises with repression, inviting minor labor leaders to his office while suppressing the two strongest unions in Argentina, the Unión Ferroviaria and the Fraternidad. Perón is undoubtedly the driving force in the regime, but even his motor occasionally fails. He did not reveal himself as a very clever statesman in his recent interview with the Mercurio de Chile, later reprinted in the Prensa of Buenos Aires, which created a new storm after the one that followed the exchange of letters between Foreign Secretary Storni and Mr. Hull. Perón declared that he had on his desk the pledge of fealty of more than 2,500 army officers, ready to forfeit their careers, if necessary, to thwart any attempt to oust Ramirez from power. Perón's statement had a dual purpose. On the one hand, he wanted to show that he was the real boss. On the other, he wanted to present Ramirez outside Argentina not as he is in reality—a prisoner of the colonels—but as the genuine head of the army. The immediate reaction in army circles forced Perón to publish hasty explanations which did little to increase his prestige. Perón may be a potential Führer. But in his attempt to grasp at power he may also provoke the envy and opposition of his colleagues.

The one solution of the present Argentine crisis that would accord with the interests of the Argentine people and of the United Nations is that proposed by the Socialist Party of Argentina at its last congress in October, 1942. It called for the union of all anti-fascist forces in the country, without exclusions or limitations. Only a government emerging from such an alliance and formed by men with a solid reputation for honesty and consistency can put an end to the regime of the colonels without risking the substitution of one dictatorship for another. Only such a government can make a clean break with Germany and Japan and incorporate Argentina in the anti-Axis coalition.

Political War in Bulgaria

THE British Broadcasting Company's European Service, supervised by the British army's Board of Political Warfare, has entered upon what appears to be a major campaign in a war of nerves against Bulgaria. The first big guns were fired immediately after the bombing of Sofia on December 10. The Bulgarian Parliament was in session at the time, and American planes are said to have dropped leaflets urging the Bulgarians to force their government to get out of the war. The B. B. C. followed this up with similar appeals.

The British broadcasts point to Marshal Tito's Partisan army as an example to patriots who want to implement their anti-Nazi views. "The Bulgarian people know," they say, "that the Yugoslav National Liberation Movement, which numbers Macedonians and Bulgarians among its armed forces, and which has in its program the elimination of racial domination and chauvinistic irredentism, can be no enemy of theirs. And there can be no doubt that the anti-Nazi popular forces in Bulgaria have been greatly strengthened by the Allied attitude toward their fellow anti-Nazis. . . . It remains to be seen whether the Bulgarian people and army have the courage . . . to save themselves from the dishonor and disaster of going down to defeat as an ally of Germany."

After the Cairo conference of Roosevelt, Churchill, and Inönu, London let Bulgaria know that Turkey is taking an increasingly unfriendly attitude toward Hitler's Balkan satellites. The Ankara correspondent of the London Times then reported that "up to one year ago, the Bulgarians would have fought gladly against the Turks with the hope of conquering eastern Thrace and Istanbul. Now, however, they seem to be in a much more sober mood, and, in fact, they went out of their way recently to give warm demonstrations of friendship for Turkey." London implies that Turkey might serve as intermediary between Bulgaria and the United Nations.

It is doubtful whether this war of nerves has as yet had any real effect upon the Bulgarian government. There seems to be a major Cabinet crisis at the present time, but the pro-Russian sympathies of the people have made Cabinet shake-ups a fairly normal occurrence in Bulgaria for the past two years, particularly since the death of the iron-fisted King Boris. Recent reports of Bulgarian peace feelers must be taken with reserve. They seem to come from the same sources which reported the resignation of Premier Bojilov on a day when he and all his ministers were touring the country in a frantic effort to enlist support for the government.

If Turkey enters the war, Bulgaria will be between the Turkish army and Marshal Tito's army. Its capitulation would naturally expedite our advance into Central Europe. Under the present pro-German political and military leadership of the country, an immediate Bulgarian collapse cannot be expected, but the United Nations are bolstering internal forces which may be able to bring it about when the Balkan invasion begins.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

WHAT books are read in Germany today? An answer as significant as it is authoritative is found in the Finnish newspaper Hufvudstadsbladet of November 15. The newspaper interviewed the general secretary of the so-called Association of European Authors, one of the institutions of the Nazi "New European Order," and this gentleman, Herr Dr. Carl Rothe of Berlin, gave out some surprising information.

First he made it clear what kind of books Germans are not reading today. Books which have anything to do with the war are "completely neglected" by both buyers and readers. This is because the war makes itself felt in every sector of daily life, and the public does not wish to be reminded of it also in books. What people do read was a more interesting revelation. They are reading the classics, and among these their favorite is the poet Friedrich Hölderlin, who composed his poems and his one novel some 150 years ago. Hölderlin's works are having a "sensational revival throughout Germany." "They are being very widely read."

Their present popularity is indeed sensational, for as persons with a knowledge of German literature will recall, Hölderlin sought refuge from the turmoil of war and revolution in the early 1800's through a flight into antiquity, into Hellenism. He was the first of those brilliant German intellects who bitterly hated their own country. Hölderlin called the Germans "calculating barbarians." "I tell you there is nothing so sacred that these people do not desecrate and debase it." "The virtues of the Germans are but a brilliant curse"—and so on. To quote Stefan Zweig, he poured forth "the fiercest maledictions a German had ever hurled at his own people." And now we hear from a Nazi source that in the fifth year of the war this author is enjoying a "sensational revival" in Germany!

One of the riddles of the war is how cities that have been destroyed from the air continue to exist. Even in Berlin, which has been at most 30 per cent destroyed, the stubbornness with which life goes on is astonishing. "People simply dig in somehow in the ruins," says a report to the Neue Zürcher Zeitung. But Berlin is not yet in the same class as Hamburg. In the Dagens Nyheter of November 27 a Swede who has seen both cities compares them: "In Hamburg," he says, "the destruction amounts to 70 or 80 per cent. Conditions are indescribable. One can drive for half an hour in the heart of the city without seeing a house standing." And yet this did not mean the death of the city. "Despite everything, the inhabitants are returning. Nearly a million are back already, food distribution continues as usual, and traffic has been resumed." Why do they return? Why do the authorities make the effort to bring them back? How do these million people who have found lodging in the ruins gain their livelihood?

A considerable number of the inhabitants refuse to live like ghosts in a dead city. The Nya Daglight Allehanda of November 27 speaks of an extensive new phenomenon—persons who vanish without leaving a trace:

> Workers are forbidden to leave Berlin under any circumstances; they are ordered to report at their place of work after each raid. But many disobey this order. A hundred thousand persons are registered as missing today in Germany. They left their home town after a raid and are living somewhere in the country, paying no attention to the constant appeals to them to return. Despite heavy penalties the number of workers in hiding is increasing constantly, and will be further swelled by the Berlin raids.

I might add that it is not easy, unless one has numerous accomplices, to hide in a country which has strict food rationing.

BOOKS and the ARTS

In Memoriam Stratton Christensen

Laughing young man and fiercest against sham
Then you have stayed at sea, at feckless sea,
With a single angry curiosity
Savoring fear and faith and speckled foam?
A salt end to what was sweet begun:
Twenty-three years and your integrity
And already a certain number touched like me
With a humor and a hardness from the sun.

Without laughter we have spent your wit
In an unwitnessed fight at sea, perhaps not won,
And whether wisely we shall never know;
But like Milton's friend's, to them that hear of it,
Your death is a puzzler that will tease them on Reckless out on the thin, important floe.

Seurat, Science, and Art

GEORGES SEURAT. By John Rewald. Translated by Lionel Abel. Wittenborn and Company. $6.

THE mystery of intuition must be taken for granted in aesthetic experience. The calculation that lies under the maker's activity seems at times more mysterious than the intuition. This is nothing new. Originally, the operations of reason were in the charge of priests—the first geometry, the Pythagorean pseudo-science of numbers, and magic. The hieratic tone of Seurat's art and of his personality was a concomitant of his effort to reduce or expand painting into a rational method. He had a system; the artist who professes that the role of his genius is to apply a system rather than create originally comes as one armed with secrets. It is implied that we can all become artists in the same way as we can all be saved by true faith. This means in effect the socialization of art, as Protestantism by making every man his own priest meant the socialization of religion. The temple of the artist's genius is broken into and its sanctities made common property. Seurat was not the first to have this idea, but he was the first to invoke the aid of the natural sciences. Not that he proposed really to socialize art; he was jealous of his "discoveries" and exploited them privately, or wanted to, like a good capitalist. And he realized quite well the gap between a system and its application. He never bothered to answer the critics who charged him with attempting to eliminate the role of original talent.

The impressionists tended also to make painting scientific, but Seurat was the first to seize the full implications. He was one of those fanatics whose mission it is to realize and fulfil immediately what others have only groped toward. He found nothing that can be called a solution, but by drawing the logical conclusions he exhausted the question. It has not been raised again except by crackpots.

Seurat's enterprise, no less than Zola's delusions about scientific novel-writing, involved really the general purification of the arts undertaken by the French avant-garde after the decline of romanticism. Hitherto the practical theories of painting had been concerned chiefly with the reproduction of nature. Seurat's interest was to secure for painting most economically and expeditiously the maximum of the effects proper to it as a two-dimensional art imprisoned on a plane surface. Scientific method exemplified a way of eliminating irrelevant factors from a problem. With such precedent in mind, Seurat unwittingly arrived at the notion of pure painting überhaupt. He himself seems not to have recognized it, but it was there, in his practice and in his theory. The emphasis of his system lay mostly upon the abstract elements of painting—tone, color, mass, line. He was the first to take the frame into account as part of the picture and to insist on indicating it by painting a border within the picture itself, and he was thus the first to attack the concept of the easel painting as a window.

Seurat was concerned above all with formulating a theory of color and tone; yet his own painting excels by the inviolable order and mathematical calm of its arrangements of line and mass, especially in the landscapes. And toward the last such pictures as "Le Chahut" and "Le Cirque" show abstruse and dazzling counterpoints and harmonies of contour. But color and surface remain unsatisfactory. They make a shimmering, variegated mist which contour and mass have to break through; pointilliste color does not inhere in or define form; surface is paper-thin and translucent, ready to be peeled away. It vibrates outward only—but in this it foreshadows some of the effects that post-cubism aimed at: surface and texture as elements which spring toward the spectator instead of drawing his eyes on into the depths of the picture.

For the "inhumanity" of which modern art has been accused we can blame history, but Seurat was one of the principal channels by which it entered painting. In this his subject matter played almost as great a part as his theory and technique. Like Manet, Toulouse-Lautrec, Renoir, and other contemporaries, he was fascinated by the mass-produced recreations of city life which the nineteenth century had conventionalized into circuses, night clubs, dance halls, cafes, and variety theaters. Seurat seems to have been sensitive to the outside-looking-in attitude that modern entertainment forces upon the spectator. More than the entertainment itself, the inhuman glamour of the entertainers keeps us at a distance. Both the entertainers and the spectators in "Le Chahut" and "Le Cirque" are cartooned; their faces and bodies are part of a weird, alienating humor that speaks from every diagonal, vertical, horizontal, and curved line. See how the forked coat-tails of the man dancer in "Le Chahut" echo his moustache, the bows on the slipper of the girl next to him, her fixed smile, and the smirk on the face of the single visible spectator. It is a world most of us will never enter. Twenty years after Seurat, painting entered a world not unlike it and left a good many of us standing outside.

The objectivity, coolness, and carefulness of research in Mr. Rewald's monograph show how facts about art should be presented. I think it unfortunate, however, that he limited his intention so strictly. "This study," he writes, "is limited to an account of Seurat's life, of the process by which his ideals—and paralleling them, his works—developed, and of the reception accorded them. . . . It is for others to study Seurat's place in the history of art or to analyze his paintings." This disclaimer does not excuse a certain sketchiness, even as to the facts. We gather that Seurat never had to work for a living. What sort of income did he have then? A small point, but it has its own importance. I think too that the exemplifications of Seurat's theories in his work could have been examined in more detail. And as a matter of editing, the locations of the works reproduced—all in black and white—should have been given. The translation by Lionel Abel from Mr. Rewald's French is remarkably smooth.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

John Applegate

MAINSTREAM. By Hamilton Basso. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.50.

LIKE James Truslow Adams, Hamilton Basso is in quest of "the American." But, of a more critical turn of mind, he is more fully aware that "the American character" is "an ideal figment," shaped by "that other ideal figment we call the American tradition." "It is impossible," he asserts, to strike an average or a norm. The happier inspiration would be not to try."

Yet Hamilton Basso tells us in the next sentence that we must speak of that myth. I wonder why. When astrology was discovered to be a myth, a working hypothesis that utterly refused to work, the proper method was to discard it altogether. Myths are not harmless, and the myth of "a national character" is the most dangerous of all. It leads to hundred-per-centism, which leads to totalitarianism, which leads to "My country, right or wrong!" which leads to eternal damnation.

I do not deny that there are "Americanisms." You can, as a rule, tell an American abroad at first sight or hearing. These traits or tricks are of the surface only: they are phonetic, sartorial, and tonsorial rather than spiritual. What we express in the American idiom are human thoughts and passions. The modifiers are period, faith, education, social standing, rather than the abstraction called "national character."

To trot out again a weary but convenient phrase, I agree with Hamilton Basso better than he agrees with himself: it should not be done. But I agree with him, presumably, on a second point: he has done it very well. He takes a John Doe whom he calls John Applegate: corner druggist in a middle-sized town of the Middle West; middle class, middle-aged, and wearing medium-weight underwear. And he wonders what characters in American tradition or folklore have left their imprint on this John Applegate. The list includes Cotton Mather, John Smith, Jefferson, Calhoun, Lincoln, Carnegie, Barnum, Henry Adams, Bryan, Teddy Roosevelt, Huey Long, and F. D. R.

A strangely assorted Pantheon. We miss Benjamin Franklin, Washington, Jackson, John Brown, and perhaps Robert E. Lee, far more of a national legend than U. S. Grant. On the other hand, we wonder whether John Applegate ever was conscious of Cotton Mather, Calhoun, and Henry Adams. There is some uncertainty about the method. Are the heroes of this book presented as individuals, as "representative men," or as "myths"? Only incoherent metaphors can express our delighted bewilderment. The author shoots at an impalpable quarry with protean weapons. He bids us to an Alice in Wonderland croquet game. The book is singularly vivid in tone; intellectually it is a dance of ghosts in the mist at midnight. So let us sweep aside the thesis and treat each sketch as an independent essay. In that light the work becomes of commanding interest. For every one of the men studied presents a unique problem, at times historical, at times psychological; and the problems are, if not solved, at any rate stated with a clarity which is an intellectual joy. Nor do these ten studies lack unity. Only the link between them is not the mythical and lackluster John Applegate, but Hamilton Basso—a decided gain.

Perhaps the best pieces are the portrait of Carnegie—a perfect Horatio Alger success story—and that of P. T. Barnum, "the educator." That term applied to the Greatest Showman on Earth may sound strange until we reflect that evangelizing, education, and advertising are fundamentally the same process—inducing the public to get what it does not want. This, by the way, is the essence of the democratic way of life. The alternative is the doctrine of the absolutists, in religion, art, politics: those in sole possession of the truth have the right, not to preach, but to impose the truth.

Barnum is, of course, "Americanism" pure and undefiled. No other country offers so brilliant a combination of devouring energy and blatant cheerfulness. In the world's mythology Barnum is the god of advertising. But that glorious eminence is due solely to his obviousness. There were greater Barnums than he; only they were more artfully camouflaged. There was a bespangled Barnum in the incredible Marquis de la Pailleterie, alias Alexandre Dumas. There was a second-rate Wagnerian Barnum in William II —and a Barnum in excelsis in Wagner himself. I have attempted to show the part played by the circus element in the Napoleonic legend. If Balzac had had his chance, he would have been Barnum—or Napoleon. The perfect Barnum, infinitely more subtle than our P. T., was Beaumarchais, one of the forgotten founders of this republic. And because Disraeli was a supreme Barnum, England is most reluctant to give up the pomp and circumstance of empire, complete with caparisoned elephants, diamond-studded maharajahs, and durbars of breath-taking gorgeousness.

Let us forget John Applegate. Here are ten conversations with Hamilton Basso, on all the problems which have been vexing us for the last two centuries, and will vex us to the end of time. The book provides unrationed food for thought, and entertainment with a most reasonable price ceiling. In other words, it is a rare bargain.

ALBERT GUERARD

Champion of Zionism

THE FORGOTTEN ALLY. By Pierre van Paassen. The Dial Press. $2.75.

IT WOULD be difficult to find a more doughty champion of any cause than Pierre van Paassen. His sense of justice is all-embracing, so that he serves many a cause. Like most of us he wields a single weapon. His weapon happens to be a very broad sword and not a rapier.

It is no reflection upon van Paassen to suggest that he has but a single weapon, for the weapon happens to be a good one. Van Paassen writes in the white heat of passion and brings the rich experience of a long journalistic life in many corners of the world to bear upon the issue which he is arguing. His books abound in anecdotes, vivid illustrations, personal confessions of the motives which prompt him to espouse the particular issue which engages him, and personal denunciations of those who oppose his cause. The books are discursive and not too logical in their development. They are for all that, or perhaps because of that, extremely effective instruments of his purpose.

His most recent book was inevitable, for van Paassen has been, for a long time, the most effective Gentile champion of the Zionist answer to the Jewish problem. In this book he brings all his polemical skill to bear upon this issue. He denounces the Jewish leaders who imagine that a "nationalist" answer to a great issue is too low to engage their conscience, and who do not understand the difficulty of rising beyond nationalism for a people denied the basic security of national existence. He tells some rather effective stories of European Jews who imagined themselves secure in their assimilation and discovered too late that their security was an illusion. To support his various subordinate themes he regales us with other stories of the heroism of Jewish soldiers in the armies of the Allies and of the duplicity of Arab chieftains and politicians.

This mass of rather diffuse journalistic material is held together by a central thesis. It is that Britain, and to a lesser extent the allies of Britain, are appeasing an essentially unreliable Arab world while betraying the absolute loyalty of the Jewish community in Palestine. He is convinced that the enmity of the Arab world toward the Jews in Palestine has been largely, if not wholly, created by the "divide-and-conquer" technique of British imperialism, and that the British encourage this Arab hostility by a specious display of objectivity and impartiality.

I doubt whether van Paassen does full justice to the complexities of the imperial task in the Mediterranean world; and some of his charges may be too extravagant. But he makes a convincing case for his main thesis. Britain is tender with its dubious allies, precisely because they are dubious, and also because they are involved in its Indian dilemma through the Mohammedanism which partially unites the Arab with the Indian world. The Jews are unable to bargain as the Arabs do, just because they can have no alternative loyalty. This is one among many reasons why Britain alone will not be able to do justice to Palestine. Since American Jewry has become the most powerful single force in the Jewish world community, this is also a good reason why America should become organically and intimately related to the solution of this problem. Our military power in that part of the world has developed more recently than the British, but it is not less potent. Our stakes in Palestine are different from the British stakes, but not less important. Our embarrassments in dealing with the issue are less. That can make for irresponsibility; but if rightly handled it could contribute to a more creative settlement of the issue.

The critical reader may occasionally wish that van Paassen were a little less passionate and more discriminating. Yet the complacency of the non-Jewish world toward the tragic problem which the Jews face is so great that someone must speak with a loud voice. Sometimes his passion betrays him into an absurdity. He declares, for instance, that if only Roosevelt and Churchill threatened reprisals against the German policy of destroying the Jews it would bring results. He writes, "If the Führer should announce that he is going to make Europe Bulgarenrein—and if the governments of Britain and the U. S. A. warned him that for every Bulgarian slain they would exact ten German lives, the Nazis, I am sure, would desist at once." Van Paassen understands the Nazi terror, and he cannot really believe such a statement. It is made because he rightly feels that more support should be given to the Jews.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

The Detroit Riot

RACE RIOT. By Alfred McClung Lee and Norman Daymond Humphrey. The Dryden Press. $1.50.

LIKE both the trivial and important happenings that provide "news" for our rapidly changing urban civilization and are soon forgotten, the Detroit riot of six months ago has become an incident in the history of race relations in America. But the conditions which were responsible for that tragic outbreak have not ceased to exist. This little book, written by two sociologists one of whom was assaulted by a mob when he attempted to save the life of a Negro youth, is a dramatic and at the same time a scientific account of the human passions and the social forces that make possible such racial clashes in our American cities.

The book is divided into three parts. The first part shows in a vivid manner the role of demagogues who play upon nervous tensions and prejudices in race riots, and the costs of rioting in terms of individual insecurity, the cessation of forward-looking movements, and the degradation of democracy. The six chapters of the second part contain a well-documented chronological account of the riot, a description of the manner in which it was handled, an analysis of its social and economic causes, and a comparison with the outbreaks in Los Angeles and Harlem. Unlike most studies of such happenings, this book includes in the third part an account of symptoms that presage the advent of race riots and a program of action to avoid anticipated outbreaks.

This small volume is not only informative; its authors understand what they are talking about. It should be read not only by government officials and others who have the responsibility for maintaining order but by everyone who is interested in maintaining a democratic way of life in America.

E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

DRAMA

"THE VOICE OF THE TURTLE" (Morosco Theater) is a pleasant little comedy with an excellent cast of three, amusing dialogue, and an ingenious single set which shows three rooms at once—living-room, bedroom, and kitchen—like a child's playhouse open on one side. Margaret Sullavan is the romantic young actress who has had two affairs and has lost faith in love. Elliott Nugent is the matter-of-fact American young man, an army sergeant, who restores her faith by the end of the play. Audrey Christie is the disillusioned trouper who is still romantic at heart.

Miss Sullavan is too darned adorable at times, and it is hard to believe that the sergeant, as Nugent depicts him, has ever been a playboy in Paris—his similarity to the professor in "The Male Animal" is also a bit unsettling. Miss Christie is right. The three of them play well together and keep the slight piece moving smoothly.

The only "significant" thing about John Van Druten's bit of froth is its resemblance to a movie. One has the impression not of seeing a play but of watching a film—in this case one of those light, smart, sentimental films which Hollywood does often and does well. In such a film the characters are well-groomed stereotypes—no matter how lowly the heroine may be, she wears the very smartest clothes and her living conditions are elegant. The dialogue is amusing and clever and sounds as if it were written by the yard. The plot is the one about boy meets girl. The desired effect is the illusion of a daydream, not of reality. Entertainment, not catharsis, is the objective, and to hell with Aristotle.

Every element of the patented Hollywood daydream is present in "The Voice of the Turtle," which with a few concessions to the Hays office can be made into a very successful film. The heroine is the adorable child-female that all women are presumed to dream of being. Elliott Nugent is the gruff protecting male. Miss Christie is the battered woman of the world who throws in racy lines but who would also like to be an adorable child-female. It is all pretty adolescent. And dramatically too it is a study in arrested development: the characters do not grow at all, let alone up; the theme, if any, is still-born; and there is really no climax, only a clinch.

I enjoy the light Hollywood film, and I enjoyed "The Voice of the Turtle." But the film industry manufactures an adequate supply of daydreams, and I hope the theater isn't going in for them on a large scale. The occasional purge of a good adult play, comedy or otherwise, wouldn't do any of us a bit of harm. And that goes for actors as well as audiences. I for one should like to see Margaret Sullavan in such a play, because I think she has the makings of a good actress. In her present role she makes a few valiant attempts to turn a type into a character, but she doesn't get much help from the script and falls back on prettiness and charm. She possesses a great deal of both—so much, indeed, that if she wants to be a legitimate actress with more than one role in her repertory rather than a stereotyped star in the streamlined Hollywood daydream—at daydream money—she had better watch out.

FILMS

Prize Day

A YEAR is ending. It ends our second at war, the fiftieth—or twentieth, as you prefer—in the history of the great recording, communicative, educational, and artistic medium of our time. In another fifty years—or ten, I am willing to bet—moving pictures will no longer be the central medium. Radio will have taken their place; television, very likely, will have taken the place of both.

Let us try to assess what has and has not been done in moving pictures, particularly those made in this country, during the year.

Our only really good films have been our straight record films. Of these, the best have been of war, whose special intensity requires a minimum of intelligence to do fairly well with. Of these, we can still have no idea how much is kept from us or for what good or insufficient reason. Of the material we have seen it is clear that nearly always, when there has been a chance to prepare for the shot through the mind and the mind's eye rather than the eye purely of courage and of the camera, the mind has been painfully inferior to the possibility offered. The presentation invariably has been worse. The prevailing quality has been that of American commercial romanticism, as taught, for example, by the Life school.

In Russia, in occasional shots, great records of war have been made. But much is still staged and falsified and rhetorical in the shooting itself, and the editing, still more, has been posterish, opportunistic, and anti-human. In neither camera work nor editing have I seen anything which was not derived, and degraded, from Dziga-Vertov or Eisenstein.

In England warmly casual, humane, mature, cinematically firm films have been made; the most essentially good and perceptive which I have seen from anywhere this year—good enough, and strange enough to us, so that I am not surprised by what amounts to a conspiracy in this country against showing them at all widely. But there is no use thinking too well of these films. "Desert Victory" is unquestionably the best film of the year; but it is the result of a great subject handled rather with thorough cinematic common sense than with cinematic creative energy. Humphrey Jennings's "Listen to Britain" so uses the one first-rate creative idea of the year that after making a few clear—and several fuddled—statements the idea apologizes and limps out quietly by the back way.

In this country the spectators are treated as fools, more often than not by other fools. Or call them misled. The proof is in every commentator's voice, his phrasing, his abject mawkishness and political childishness, and in the puff-paste, onanistic, heartless quality of most of the camera work, whose nearest equivalent is the tradition Leni Riefenstahl froze in Germany. In Russian films people are photographed and appealed to essentially as animals and are treated as human individuals only to force-feed inhuman, anti-individualistic points. In England they are regarded as human individuals, and the jumbled leftish-democratic line accordingly holds more hope; but here too, when creativity is not absent, it is tempered to shorn lambs or is abdicated for equally sorry reasons.

Here, the only films I can feel any well-grounded excitement over are the army orientation films. Of these only two out of the six completed have reached the civilian public. Of these the first, "Prelude to War," was treated like a poor relation by most exhibitors, and the second, "The Battle of Russia," was gelded of its already sterile political equipment. "Battle of Russia," next to "Desert Victory," is the best film of the year. But like the other orientation films it is saturated with words and only begins to use the possibilities of the screen, as such, to show and teach. And like all the others it can make you sick to the very soul with its political timidity.

Nearly all of the most talented people in moving pictures work in fiction, and most of the greatest possibilities lie within fiction. The record in fiction is not a happy one.

In disagreement with most qualified people I think more well than ill of "Shadow of a Doubt"; but I must admit that its skill is soft and that it is distinctly below the standard set by Hitchcock's best English work. "The Hard Way" is one of the few films of the year worth seeing again; but seeing it again, group-theatricality, Bette-Davism, and compromise impair even its justly famous first half hour. "The Ox-Bow Incident" I underpraised; it stands in memory very firm, respectable, and sympathetic. But I still think it suffers from rigor artis. "The Watch on the Rhine" was a carefully screened play about which, cinematically, I feel little beyond respect for Paul Lukas's beautiful performance. "Casablanca" is still reverently spoken of as (1) fun, (2) a "real movie." I still think it is the year's clearest measure of how willingly, faute de mieux, people will deceive themselves. Even "Jeannie," hardly a movie at all, was better fun; or even that affable imitation-of-an-imitation, "Tartu."

As for those pictures in which Hollywood "grew up," or began to pull its weight, I won't waste space even naming them. The solemn, expensive anti-fascist and war dramas like "The Moon Is Down" are just as depressing; even "This Land Is Mine" is just sincerely polished bone. The stertorous underground melodrama "Hangmen Also Die" stands up better than most of them. "The Human Comedy" and "Happy Land" put up the so-called home front in syrup but deserve at least a polite bow each, the first for a few moments of genuine sweetness, the second because, along with "Shadow of a Doubt," "The Hard Way," and some of the RKO shorts, it is photographically the only hopeful work of the year.

The semi-documentaries — such as "Air Force"—learned absolutely nothing of value. All alike they tried to combine hopelessly ill-appreciated primer smatterings of technical realism and studio combat with romanticized men and talk which chemically guaranteed the defeat of all possible reality. The easier, more traditional task of making war melodramas brought "Bataan," "Sahara," and "The Cross of Lorraine." However essentially formularistic they were, and however rectally fed their cinematic, psychological, and political intelligence, they were among the few cinematically alert and pleasing jobs of the year.

In the line of plain "entertainment" there was no indication that anybody realizes that entertainment and artistry are inseparable and virtually synonymous. The musicals I saw gave perhaps twenty seconds of genuine pleasure with each two hours of annihilation. "The More the Merrier" was fair fun until the whole cast began dancing the joke into my ribs. "A Lady Takes a Chance" was amusing when you could see past Jean Arthur's moues and the thick snow of Captain Billy's Whiz-Bang. I can recommend "Lassie Come Home" to any dog who will check his interest in films in the theater lobby. But if you want simple pleasure you may as well go to another Maisie picture or a Laurel and Hardy or an Abbott and Costello; and even there you have to work for it. I regret my failure, still, to see "Holy Matrimony," which I hear is really good. I wish it well; but I wonder whether Aristophanes himself could alter the balance of this year.

The whole business has been dying here, ten years or more. Last year, it seems to me, was the all-time low—so far.

And a very good New Year to you, too.

JOHN MARIN: Oils, Water Colors, and Drawings. At An American Place, through January 9.

For several years now Marin has been seeking to advance his development through oil rather than water color. He is better in oil, I think, than is generally admitted. Yet in this show of his latest work the only oil that comes off at all is "The Three-Masted Schooner," which has a four-square pictorial compactness which is strange to Marin and to which WILL Britain's working men and women be willing to go back to their 1939 status when the war is over? If not, what reforms do they have in mind, how do they intend to go about securing them, and what are the chances of success? Will the post-war government be a labor government? If so, will it be aggressive or timid in its efforts to make a better society?

HAROLD J. LASKI, British labor's leading progressive spokesman, will discuss these and other questions in a series of articles for The Nation this winter.

the "self-decorated" frame may contribute largely. As for the water colors, vividness is gained from the introduction of a blood red, but there is nothing that expands the notion of Marin's style in the medium. More startling is the pink used against aquamarine in the oil "3 Figures and Sea Shore," where decorative nudes suddenly appear. At this point Marin's painting definitely stops threatening to retreat into black and white. The six excellent lead-pencil drawings "Pertaining to the Sea" show, however, the reason for this threat. The colorist in Marin has not yet got the complete ascendancy.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

RECORDS

DESCRIBED as the first of a new "Hall of Immortals" series, Victor's "Metropolitan Revivals—With Enrico Caruso and All Star Casts" (Set 953, $10) offers the 1912 recording of the Sextet from "Lucia" with Caruso, Tetrazzini, Amato, Journet, and others; the 1914 recording of the Quintet E scherzo od è follia from "Un Ballo in Maschera" with Caruso, Hempel, and others; the 1908 recording of the Quartet from "Rigoletto" with Caruso, Sembrich, Severina, and Scotti; the 1908 recording of the Quartet from "La Bohême" with Caruso, Farrar, Viafora, and Scotti; the 1912 recording of the Quartet Dormi pur from "Marta" with Caruso, Alda, Jacoby, and Journet; the 1912 recording of the Trio Qual volutta trascorrere from "I Lombardi" with Caruso, Alda, and Journet; the 1910 recording of the final Trio of "Faust" with Caruso, Farrar, and Journet; the 1919 recording of the Trio Je viens célébrer la victoire from "Samson et Dalila" with Caruso, Homer, and Journet.

The title of the set correctly describes its contents: Caruso was the featured singer in these recordings, the one whose phenomenal voice had to be reproduced in its full beauty and power; and one hears exciting recordings of this voice from 1908, when it was still light in color, to 1919, when it had achieved darker magnificence. It may be that with the limitations of early recording the clear reproduction of Caruso's voice in a large group could be achieved only at the cost of the other voices; the fact is that Tetrazzini's often is lost in the jumble above which Caruso's soars, and that even when it can be heard it has only a bare suggestion of the extraordinary loveliness we know it had; and that what one hears of Sembrich's singing is only enough to convey its superb musical style. In the first part of the "Bohême" Quartet, where the four voices are heard singly or two at a time, they are clear; and Farrar's lovely voice dominates the "Faust" Trio. In the later "Lombardi" Trio and "Marta" Quartet all the voices are clear; 1914 recording is able to keep Hempel's wonderful singing clear along with Caruso's in the "Ballo in Maschera" Quintet; and 1919 recording reproduces not only the rich beauty of Homer's contralto with increased fidelity, but the three-voiced texture with increased clarity and spaciousness.

I heard Caruso and Homer in "Samson"; I was already hearing opera at the Metropolitan when Caruso, Hempel, and others were singing in "Ballo in Maschera" and made the recording in this volume. These two recordings bring my own past experience into the living present for me; but even the others are exciting for me in the way they bring to life, however imperfectly, those historic occasions which I did not myself experience, when these legendary groups of singers were heard. One imperfection I am grateful for: possibly because of the Petrillo ban new orchestral accompaniments have not been dubbed in; and while, as a result, the recordings retain the original wheezy orchestral accompaniments, they also retain the original sounds of the voices, which would have been altered in the dubbing process. Some of the surfaces of my copy are quite noisy in spots.

Poorly performed on records of the past year were Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, by Walter with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (C Set 525, $3.50; badly recorded); his Quartet Opus 59 No. 1, by the Busch Quartet (C Set 543, $6.50; poorly recorded); Florestan's aria from "Fidelio," by René Maison (C71410-D, $1); Debussy's "La Mer," by Rodzinski with the Cleveland Orchestra (C Set 531, $3.50); Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, by Mitropoulos with the Minneapolis Symphony (C Set 540, $4.50; poorly recorded); Mozart's Or sai chi l'onore and Non mi dir from "Don Giovanni," by Rose Bampton (V 11-8466, $1); Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony," by Golschmann with the St. Louis Symphony (V Set 942, $2.50); Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter" Overture, by Stokowski with the N. B. C. Symphony (V Set 937, $2.50); Schumann's Piano Quintet, by the Busch Quartet with Serkin, who played well (C Set 533, $4.50); Strauss's "Don Quixote," by Reiner with the Pittsburgh Symphony and Piatigorsky (C Set 506, $5.50); Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite, by Stokowski with the N. B. C. Symphony (V Set 933, $2.50).

"No doubt you have long since read 'The Man With the Baton' by David Ewen and are well acquainted with its contents," wrote a reader of this column. What he assumed I was familiar with was Mr. Ewen's rating of Weingartner, in that book, as one of the supreme conductors of all time; and he went on to describe and answer what he considered outrageous misstatements about Weingartner in Mr. Ewen's recent "Dictators of the Baton." They constituted, he thought, "a piece of knavery which merits your attention and possibly an exposé." I answered that my correspondent was mistaken in his initial assumption: Mr. Ewen's writing was something I would not read for myself; and its possible influence was, I thought, so small that I did not feel obligated to read and discuss the books for others.

This brought me a letter in which my correspondent presented factual evidence that the influence of Mr. Ewen's books was greater than I thought. He had, for example, gone through the card file of the University Library and gave me the appalling numbers of the copies of the various books of Ewen that were available. "The University Radio Station uses his books as references in writing musical scripts. And one teacher of music appreciation, who has been director of such courses, uses his books as semi-texts and esteems his opinions highly (it was from this woman that I borrowed 'Dictators of the Baton'—with her high recommendation); and the music appreciation courses are the most popular courses in the music school, with registration for the most part from other colleges in the university. . . . Ewen, because of his 'interesting, non-technical manner of writing,' is doing a great deal more corrupting of American musical thought than you realize."

So it appears from the evidence my correspondent presented; but still I am reluctant to waste my time and The Nation's space on discussion of Mr. Ewen's books. Let readers of this column be guided by the paragraphs they have just read.

Letters to the Editors

Letter from London

Dear Sirs: You will have seen that small raids on London have been serialized for a month or so. They are very disagreeable and with a minimum of damage make a maximum of noise. One is less braced for them than for the big raids, which were so exhausting that one simply slept through them. I think, however, that, unpleasant as they are, they are excellent propaganda to the effect that the war is far from being over. We are all very ready to jump to the conclusion that the war will be over by next week, next month, next year, and these raids after a temporary lull remind us that it is by no means over. There is a lot of bugaboo about Hitler's "secret weapon" and fantastic descriptions of what this may be. While I should not put it past him to have brought nastiness to high achievement, I cannot help remembering that when we were in affliction and bombing was at its height, we also prated of "invisible rays" and other fairy tales which, for the moment, gave us comfort. I expect we shall have more shocks, but I do not really think that they can exceed those we have already managed to put up with.

One thing that strikes me in this fifth year of the war is a sort of general fatigue, especially among women. And if we have it, when things are so very much better, how greatly must it affect those whose fortunes are on the down, instead of the up, grade. The calling up of women of fifty aroused a good deal of feeling, more among men than among women, I think. And this was due to a sudden realization that the middle-aged woman was all that stood between a large part of the population and the complete disappearance of home. The middle-aged woman hasn't shone much in this war, except in so far as she has been commended publicly from time to time for working twenty-five hours a day. It has sometimes been mentioned that she is completely without service, without help; that she also works in factories, looks after her family, washes, scrubs, shops, when shopping means waiting in a crowd, looks after the old people, keeps a home for the young, and so on. Then came the call-up and with it the unpleasant realization of what life would be without "Mother," as husbands call her, and "Mum," as the children say. And suddenly it was considered very wrong that the poor old thing should be roused out of her dotage and made to work regular hours, instead of all hours, and, incidentally, that home should go to pot and that there should be no one to cook, or wash, or mend socks, or look after the cat, or make beds. August men have even been known lately to make their own beds without being asked, and some of them have realized that chops were not really so nice when cooked amid clouds of blue smoke as when "Mum" took a hand and curbed the exuberance of a fierce, masculine fry! I think perhaps American men do rather more for themselves than do our men, or rather, they do different things; and so the dependence of the Briton on the center of the household, who is also being asked to do factory or other work, has to be described to be realized. M. H.

Speaking of Profits

Dear Sirs: I quote the following from the editorial entitled the Showdown on Prices in your issue of November 27: "The elements that are seeking to break down the defenses against inflation—the large farmers, the food industry, the coal operators, railway employees, and a few other highly organized labor groups—are, on the other hand, among those that have gained most, relatively speaking, as a result of the war" (my italics).

As a representative of one of the railroad brotherhoods, I want to point out some facts in connection with wages paid to railroad employees and let you judge whether, relatively speaking, railroad employees are among those who have gained the most, as you put it, from this war.

Maintenance-of-way employees (track men) receive 48 to 52 cents an hour; yard switchmen or brakemen, $7.56 for an eight-hour day; yard firemen, $7.73 for an eight-hour day; clerks, from $70 to $150 per month; skilled shop men, boilermakers, machinists, blacksmiths, $7.20 for an eight-hour day. Road engineers, conductors, firemen, and trainmen average $9.50 for a day of 100 miles or eight hours. They get no money for expenses when they are away from home. About one-half of these men spend 50 per cent of their time away from home.

I regret that you classified us with the profit groups, of which we certainly are not a part.

You also failed to mention railroad management, which is surely profiting greatly as a result of the increased business in moving troops and material of war. G. F. IRVINE, Chairman,

Congress and World Organization

Dear Sirs: Many of your readers who believe in a democratic world organization and are looking for a means to make Congress understand that the American people are ready to assume the responsibility of such an organization will be interested to know that Free World groups are being formed all over the country for this purpose.

One of the activities of these groups is to distribute a ballot listing the following three questions: (1) Do you believe the United States should belong to an international organization with authority to settle disputes peacefully between nations? (2) Should such an organization have available a military force to be used solely to stop military aggression and maintain peace? (3) Should the United States take the initiative in calling the United Nations together to form such an organization now?

The Greenwich Village Group of American Free World, the first in New York City, has been conducting an intensive ballot campaign which we hope will be a pattern for a nation-wide effort. Congressmen will be informed of the results of the poll.

Appended is a list of regional headquarters of the American Free World Association. We urge all readers who want to mobilize mass public opinion behind the idea of world organization to ask the nearest regional office for information on how to start a local group or to join one already in existence.
